Each session concluded, he turned with zest to the books, magazines, pamphlets, and newspapers which had accumulated on his desk, and the columns of his paper attested to his thorough acquaintance with British, European, and North American affairs. Wanting to observe at first hand, he explored every nook and cranny of large sections of his native province. The fruits of these travels – the "Western Rambles," which appeared in the Novascotian between 24 July and 9 Oct. 1828, and the "Eastern Rambles," appearing between 16 Dec. 1829 and 4 Aug. 1831 – concentrate on the physical features of the regions and the social characteristics of their people. Occasionally Howe would publish verses of his own, some of which appeared in Poems and essays, published the year after his death. Commenting on his poetry, Professor J. A. Roy has said that although "he had the urge towards poetry and poetic expression . . . his ear was defective; he was imitative and trite, and ignorant of the most elementary prosodic principles." Howe sought also to "elevate the character of the country . . . and lay the foundation of a Provincial Literature" by printing such works as Beamish MURDOCH's Epitome of the laws of Nova Scotia and Thomas Chandler Haliburton*'s The clockmaker and The historical and statistical account of Nova Scotia; these ventures provided an important service to the province but greatly increased the financial difficulties that perennially embarrassed Howe.

Although Howe turned out to be a political animal, it was not his original intention to seek the improvement in all aspects of colonial society that he wanted through direct political action. Not inaccurately he has been described as a mild Tory at this stage. What people, he asked on 17 Jan. 1828, have "a government which sits lighter on the people, or under which they may enjoy more of rational freedom"? He stood for "the Constitution, the whole Constitution, and nothing but the Constitution."

Even the Brandy Dispute of 1830, in which the council prevented the assembly from correcting an error in the revenue laws at the cost of defeating the entire appropriation act [see Enos COLLINS], did little to change his opinion. Apparently he felt that an assembly which opposed one outrageous action would also intervene in less extreme cases. Furthermore, he still considered parties to be factions operating against the public interest; personally he wanted to belong to only one party, "the party of Nova Scotia." It took another series of issues to make him appreciate the complex forces at work in Nova Scotian society and realize that the machinations of the true possessors of power were not disinterested.

In 1832 and 1833 Nova Scotia's banking and currency problems showed the assembly's weakness and the council's power. The five councillors who were directors of the Halifax Banking Company first delayed the incorporation of a second bank and then whittled down its powers. The manipulations of the two banks soon led to a depreciated currency, and the assemblymen, moving like puppets controlled by wires from the council, did not demand the action that would restore the currency to a sound basis. In 1834 Howe denounced an assembly which seemed willing to negotiate with the British government for the commutation of quitrents on land in return for a suitable establishment for the public officials. The quitrents, he insisted, should be commuted unconditionally; Nova Scotia would do justice to its public servants without having a club held over its head.

In 1835 an even more belligerent Howe dared to publish a letter alleging that, in the previous 30 years, the magistracy and police of Halifax had "by one stratagem or other, taken from the pockets of the people, in over exactions, fines, etc., etc., a sum that would exceed in the gross amount £30,000." Though he had undoubtedly broken the law of criminal libel of the day, he pleaded his own case before a jury, won an acquittal, and proclaimed that "the PRESS OF NOVA SCOTIA IS FREE." This was his first resort to the oratorical talents which placed him head and shoulders above his Nova Scotian rivals and, according to Professor Keith Thomas, above George BROWN and John A. Macdonald* in many respects: "he was a master of factual detail and its skilful presentation; in his smooth and effective transitions he possessed the last touch in structural skill; his astounding adaptability allowed him to persuade even a greater range and variety of audiences than those won over by the others; and his powerful rhythm could reinforce and make still more effective all his other qualities of persuasion."

Thus it was a transformed Howe who wrote on the state of the province and the prospects of Halifax in 1834 and 1835. As usual, he painted an idyllic picture of the sturdy agriculturist who had won a good living from the wilderness by the sweat of his brow. Nova Scotia, he warned, had no place for "gentleman merchants," "gentleman mechanics," and "gentleman farmers," but unfortunately the high salaries of the officials induced the industrious classes of Halifax to attempt a similar style of living, while each village contained "a little knot of traders, lawyers, and public officers, through whom the fashionable follies of the capital are reflected upon the surrounding country." Howe told the people to look at the faulty structure of the council, at the great string of public officers who took so much of the revenue that they were "in truth our masters", and at the assembly in which the lawyers led a time-serving majority, and then to adopt the only true remedy: elect a "public-spirited assembly" which would bring "the sentiments of the Country . . . to bear upon the rottenness of Denmark."

Thomas Chandler Haliburton warned Howe not to seek election to the assembly; the Novascotian "(always enough on one side of politics) will be thought after your election . . . a party paper altogether." But Howe felt the assembly would be "an admirable school" for his own development; besides, "being under great obligations to many thousands . . . I ought not to shrink from any sacrifice of time and labour to pay the debt." Accordingly he ran and was elected for the county of Halifax in the general election of 1836. His message to the voters was a simple one: ". . . all we ask for is what exists at home – a system of responsibility to the people."

But Howe was still not the typical colonial reformer. For, when he proposed his twelve resolutions to the assembly in 1837, instead of demanding a responsible executive council as Robert Baldwin* did in Upper Canada, he simply advocated an elective legislative council. Apparently he thought that an exact copy of British institutions was unsuited to a small colony like Nova Scotia and that two elective houses could keep in check the advisers of the governor and the provincial bureaucracy. Yet, when Lord Durham [John George Lambton*] recommended otherwise in his Report, Howe unreservedly accepted his conclusions. Indeed, to meet the objections of the colonial secretary, Lord John Russell, Howe addressed a series of letters to him in September 1839, which Chester Martin* describes as the colonial counterpart of the Durham Report. Howe told Russell that the remedy for colonial problems was the one prescribed by Durham: "the Colonial Governors must be commanded to govern by the aid of those who . . . are supported by a majority of the representative branch."

In his attitude towards political parties Howe still found it difficult to don all the trappings of the typical colonial reformer. Although he admitted that there were questions in the colonies that might "form the touchstones of party" much as in England, he could not dispel his earlier fears that parties would become selfish factions; he was also suspicious of highly disciplined parties that restricted their members' freedom of action. None the less, it was much of his doing that the assemblies which were elected in 1836 and 1840 contained majorities favouring Reform principles. His success so antagonized the official faction that he was forced to fight a duel with John Halliburton, son of the chief justice, on 14 March 1840; Halliburton missed and Howe fired his pistol into the air.

The strongest act in which Howe participated – an address to the crown in 1840 requesting the removal of Lieutenant Governor Colin Campbell* – brought Governor General Charles Poulett Thomson* (soon to be Lord Sydenham) to Halifax and led, in October 1840, to Howe's entering the Executive Council in a coalition with the Tory James W. JOHNSTON. Sydenham persuaded Howe that it was his duty to cooperate in reducing discord; he was wrong, however, in suggesting that Howe had "made the amende honorable and eschewed his heresies on Responsible Government publicly in his newspaper." Howe agreed for the moment that "the Queen's representative [could] devolve the responsibilities of his acts on no man"; but he felt there was little difference between Sydenham's and the Reformers' ideas of responsibility, since in the former's scheme the governor must depend upon public confidence and popular support, and would be foolhardy to refuse the advice of a council which had to defend his acts. Howe's conduct, wrote Chester Martin, was logical for one who "distrusted stark theories and relied . . . upon the subtler accommodations of practice and experience." Indeed, during the election late in 1840, Howe argued that, if Nova Scotia were to be a normal school for the other colonies, it ought not to press organic changes too rapidly, but be content with steady, piecemeal progress. Naturally he regretted that such Reformers as Herbert Huntington*, the Robert Baldwin of Nova Scotia, refused to support the coalition, which they considered, at best, an ineffectual armistice, reversing the progress towards a well-disciplined Reform party.

During the coalition period Howe became speaker of the assembly (1841) and collector of excise at Halifax (1842). By the end of 1841 he had decided upon a full-time political career and sold the Novascotian. Meanwhile the coalition was experiencing rough weather. In early 1843 Howe told Lieutenant Governor Falkland [Lucius Bentinck Cary*], that something more was "required to make a strong Administration than nine men, treating each other courteously at a round table – there is the assurance of good faith – towards each other – of common sentiments, and kindly feelings. . . ." During the session of 1843 Howe's denunciation of grants to denominational colleges, particularly Acadia, exacerbated his relations with the Baptist Johnston. After the Tories assumed office in Britain in September 1841, the governor had relied more and more upon the Tory councillors. Towards the end of 1843, during Howe's absence from Halifax and against his advice, Falkland dissolved the assembly, supposedly to escape the party government which he said the Reformers were trying to force on him. He got what he wanted: a Tory majority, albeit small. Then, in December 1843, he weighted his ministry altogether in favour of the Tories by appointing Mather Byles ALMON, Johnston's brother-in-law, to the council, ostensibly to demonstrate his belief in mixed rather than party government. Howe and the two other Reform councillors resigned forthwith.

Until the election of August 1847 Howe devoted all his energy to undoing the effect of the coalition and reviving the Reform party. From May 1844 to April 1846 he assumed the editorship of the Novascotian and the Morning Chronicle, and "his armchair became the centre and rallying point of the whole party." Again the readers could say: "Why, here is Howe among us again; not Mr. Speaker Howe, not the Hon. Mr. Howe, but Joe Howe . . . making us laugh a good deal, but think a good deal more, even while we [are] laughing." Howe delineated the issues more clearly than ever before, and the election of 5 Aug. 1847 was as much a referendum on the single issue of responsible government as a British-style election is likely to be. The Reformers' margin in seats was only seven, but their victory was certain, for none of the new assemblymen fell into the category of "loose fish." It was simply a question of voting out the Tories on 26 Jan. 1848; a Reform administration was installed a few days later. Nova Scotia had become the first colony to achieve responsible government, and Howe boasted it had been done without "a blow struck or a pane of glass broken." Yet he was being somewhat sanctimonious, for external circumstances such as the rebellions in the Canadas played no small part in making it possible.

James Boyle Uniacke* rather than Howe, the architect of victory, headed the new administration. Howe was paying the price for his intemperate conduct. Unable to stand exaggerated criticism and invective for long, he had reacted violently to Falkland's conniving with Tory publicists behind the scenes. However, his lampoons and pasquinades reflecting on the governor – the "Lord of the Bed-Chamber" was the best known – not only horrified the colonial Tories but also hurt his reputation for moderation in England. Nevertheless, Chester Martin goes much too far when he suggests that this barbarous type of warfare "embittered [Howe's] most cherished memories, coarsened his nature, and stained his name; lost him perhaps the first premiership under responsible government overseas in 1848, and in the end contributed not a little to fasten upon him the cardinal sin of indiscretion that barred him from the career he coveted beyond his native province." Actually Howe's loss of the premiership was more in name than in substance, for to many it was his ministry all the same. Indeed, because of his friendship with Sir John Harvey*, some suggested he ran not only the government, but also the governor.

As provincial secretary, Howe played an active role in adapting the province's institutions to responsible government. But by March 1850 he had turned his chief attention to the idea of building a railroad from Halifax to Windsor, N.S. "It is the first duty of a government," he said, "to take the front rank in every noble enterprise; to be in advance of the social, political, and industrial energies, which they have undertaken to lead." In November he went to Britain to determine the conditions on which Nova Scotia might borrow money for the project. Then one of his so-called "flashes" transformed a purely pecuniary mission into a plan for the elevation of the empire. It included promoting vital public works through imperial credit, preparing crown lands for settlement, and encouraging the migration of the poor from Britain through cheap transportation. After an initial rejection of his plan, the colonial secretary let Howe come "face to face with the people of England"; his speech at Southampton on 14 Jan. 1851 drew wide and favourable attention in the British press.

By March he appeared to have won guarantees from the British government for lines from Halifax to Quebec and Portland, Maine. On his return he sought, in a speech-making tour, to educate the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Canada to the value of the combined project. He told them that, as a political leader, he rejected the pageantry of sitting on gilded chairs and pocketing his salary; "those who aspire to govern others should neither be afraid of the saddle by day nor of the lamp by night." On the beneficence of his scheme he waxed especially eloquent: "Aid me in this good work, and the capital of England will flow into North America . . .; aid me in this good work, and the poor rates of Britain may be beaten down . . .; aid me in this good work, and . . . North America will rise to the rank of a second or third rate power, with all the organization and attributes of a nation."

By year's end the blow fell. The colonial secretary denied that he had intended to offer guarantees for the Portland branch and Howe's grandiose plan lay in tatters. At the time he personally accepted blame for the misunderstanding; later he attributed his failure to sinister influences operating on the British government. Howe was now determined that Nova Scotia should build its own railways as public works. Late in 1852 he arranged for adequate financing on favourable terms with Baring Brothers. Even then he had to accede to the demands of the opposition that private enterprise have the first opportunity. When it reneged he finally, in 1854, got railway legislation along the lines he wanted. Shortly afterwards he resigned as provincial secretary to become chief commissioner of a bi-partisan railway board. It is sometimes said that the only figures he understood were figures of speech, but he had no difficulties with the details of railway finance, and no scandal or bumbling occurred in railway building under his management.

In addition to the railway commissionership, Howe had the Crimean War to occupy him during 1855. Because of his attitude towards Britain, he accepted without question the British case in this conflict. Furthermore, during March and April 1855 he engaged in a "recruiting" mission to the United States; according to him, he simply made known the conditions of acceptance to those who voluntarily offered their services and he did not break the American neutrality laws. But he himself admitted that, if ordered to violate the policy of any foreign state in order to assist "the gallant fellows in the Crimea . . . , I would have obeyed without a moment's hesitation," and there is evidence to suggest that he did commit such violations even without express instructions from his superiors.

His American venture had unforeseen repercussions. It allowed him only 18 days to fight the general election of 22 May and he went down to personal defeat before Dr Charles Tupper* in Cumberland. Indirectly, but of greater significance, it led him into conflict with the Irish and other Catholics of Nova Scotia. He had noted that some Irish priests had recently founded the Halifax Catholic and were using it to gloat over British reverses in the Crimea. A little later the president of the Charitable Irish Society had met Irish volunteers from the United States on their arrival in Halifax and persuaded them not to enlist for Crimean service; he also publicized Howe's activities in a New York newspaper, forcing him to flee from the United States in fear of arrest. Finally, in May 1856, Irish navvies working on the Windsor railway, as a reaction to their being taunted about their religious beliefs, inflicted a merciless beating on their Protestant tormentors at Gourley's Shanty. For the moment Howe held himself in check. But when the alleged perpetrators of the crime went free in December 1856, and the Halifax Catholic warned Protestants not to ridicule Catholics – especially those of the "mercurial" Irish variety – about their beliefs, Howe was betrayed into saying that Protestants had the right to make fun of any doctrines that they found to be absurd.

The controversy led to the complete estrangement of all Catholics – Irish, Scottish, and Acadian – from the Liberal party. When the assembly met in February 1856, all the Catholic Liberals and two Protestant Liberals from Catholic counties deserted their party and brought the Conservatives to power. Howe resigned as railway commissioner and contemplated leading a Protestant alliance, but soon thought better of it. As one who had been foremost in advocating complete Catholic equality, he regarded this episode as one of the most regrettable of his life. He insisted, however, that the Catholics "left me foolishly and without cause, and like little Bo-peep in the nursery rhymes, I let them alone till they choose [to] come home, wagging their tails behind them."

Religion intruded itself strongly into the general election of 12 May 1859; the Liberals described their opponents as "Romo-Johnstonites" and were in their turn labelled "Proscriptionists."

The Liberals won by 3 seats, but half a dozen of their members were allegedly disqualified because they held offices of emolument under the crown. None the less, the assembly voted out the Conservatives in February 1860 and Howe, who had been elected again in Cumberland, became provincial secretary in William Young*'s administration. Eventually committees of the assembly confirmed all the Liberal members in their seats. This outcome of the "Disputed Election of 1859" exacerbated further an overheated political situation. Since January 1855 papers like the Acadian Recorder had been wondering if there were "any cogent reason for the division of the Representatives of Nova Scotia into two parties, regularly organized for the annihilation of each other, in the halls of our Legislature." Over the next few years things got worse, and this was the situation Howe inherited when Young became chief justice and Howe took over the government in August 1860.

Howe's premiership was an unending struggle to maintain his precarious majority against the out-and-out onslaught of Charles Tupper. More than once he told Tupper that he would "never command that influence which he wishes to attain until he learns to have more of . . . Christian charity in dealing with his fellow-men." In 1862 Howe almost got agreement upon an intercolonial railway, only to be defeated by the political difficulties in Canada. Generally, however, he was occupied with picayune, humdrum matters. On the basis of an occasional excerpt from his diary or letters, J. A. Roy pictures him as utterly despairing and disillusioned during this period, but this was not his typical state. None the less, he did welcome, in December 1862, his appointment as imperial fishery commissioner under the reciprocity treaty of 1854 although the position provided little scope for his talents. Almost against his will he contested the general election of 1863, in which a worn-out, leaderless Liberal party went down to overwhelming defeat, and he suffered personal loss in Lunenburg.

Howe's acceptance of an imperial office was the culmination of protracted activity which had begun in March 1855, when he made a request to the colonial secretary, Lord John Russell, for an under-secretaryship in his department. This desire for office fitted into his design for the organization of the empire first put forward in his second series of letters to Lord John Russell in the autumn of 1846 and unfolded in the legislature in February 1854. It included the representation of colonials in the House of Commons and the participation of leading colonials in the government of the empire. "What national distinction ever lights upon British America? Has she ever supplied a governor to the Queen's widely extended dominions, a secretary, or an under-secretary of state? . . . How long is this state of pupilage to last? Not long. If British statesmen do not take this matter in hand, we soon shall."

When, in November 1858, the two volumes of his speeches and letters (the so-called [William] Annand* edition) came off the press, he forwarded copies to many Britons of influence to demonstrate his own capacity for high public office. J. A. Roy describes Howe's pleas as "one of the most humiliating and self-abasing dunnings of Downing Street on record," but Howe's 15 letters over a six-year period during which the colonial secretaryship often switched hands hardly constituted a highly concentrated campaign of self-aggrandizement. In any case his requests were motivated by much more than personal ambition. To him responsible government had conferred on colonials only part of the rights enjoyed by Britons, and the empire should be organized to confer these rights in their entirety. To serve the empire, preferably at its centre in London, but alternatively even in so remote and primitive a region as British Columbia, was the noblest mission Howe could conceive.

Howe's ideas for the organization of empire cannot be divorced from his attitude towards intercolonial union. He has often been accused of being inconsistent in opposing the union he allegedly advocated over a long period. The record shows, however, that from 1838 he had been contending that an improvement in communications, especially in the form of an intercolonial railroad, was a necessary prerequisite to union. Only at a convivial affair in Halifax on 13 Aug. 1864 did he express himself otherwise and, as he himself put it, "Who ever heard of a public man being bound by a speech delivered on such an occasion as this?"

Howe declined Tupper's invitation to be one of the Nova Scotian delegates to the Charlottetown conference in September 1864. Apocryphally, he refused to "play second fiddle to that damn'd Tupper"; actually, he had been instructed by Russell to finish his work as fishery commissioner as quickly as possible, and did not have permission to accept Tupper's invitation.

Myth has it that it was Howe who roused Nova Scotian public opinion against the Quebec resolutions. But by November 1864 the governor of the province had found so many leaders of the community opposed to them that he doubted whether they could be carried. As a public servant, Howe did not participate in the confederation debate, other than to publish anonymously his "Botheration Letters" in the Morning Chronicle between 11 Jan. and 2 March 1865. Some have said that they rallied opinion everywhere, but few knew their authorship, and their function, together with a mass of similar literature, was simply to reinforce existing opinions. Until March 1866 Howe played no further part in the discussions of confederation in Nova Scotia. Then Tupper's determination to use the Fenian scare to press a resolution favouring union through the legislature forced Howe to make a decision. Should he accept the editorship of the New York Albion and financial ease, or should he stay in his province now that the commission work was ended to assist "poor old Nova Scotia, God help her, beset with marauders outside and enemies within"? Why did he choose the second alternative? At one level there was the fear that implementation of union would deal a death-blow to his scheme for the organization of the empire. At another level his opposition was based on practical grounds: railroads, and social and economic intercourse, were needed first to make union a success; the Quebec resolutions, born of Canadian necessity, would lead to the loss of independence and the economic ruination of Nova Scotia. In providing specific evidence to demonstrate these points, Howe used too many arguments, some good, some bad, some indifferent. But his prediction that the tariff increases under the new order would be ruinous to Nova Scotia turned out to be all too correct, and his prophecy that it would take "the wisdom of Solomon and the energy and strategy of Frederick the Great" to weld the disparate people of the proposed union into "a new nationality" was not too far off the mark. However, the factor which more than any other propelled Howe back into active politics was Tupper's decision not to consult the people on union. As Howe's friend and admirer, George Johnson*, put it, a "firm, fixed passion for the people's rights was at the bottom of all Mr. Howe's opposition to the Union of the Provinces."

Howe could not prevent the Nova Scotian legislature from adopting Tupper's resolution in April 1866. The result, for him, was two years of frenzied activity. Almost immediately he embarked on a speaking tour of the western counties. Then from July 1866 to May 1867 he headed a delegation to England to oppose the passage of an act of union. During that time he published a major paper, Confederation considered in relation to the interests of the empire (September 1866), and interviewed or addressed letters to any man who might assist his cause, all to no avail. On his return home he campaigned actively to ensure that the British government appreciated the true state of feeling in Nova Scotia, and in the general election of 18 Sept. 1867 the Nova Scotian confederates returned only one member to the House of Commons and two to the House of Assembly. After participating actively, as the member for Hants, in the first session of the first dominion parliament, Howe led the Nova Scotia repeal delegation to London between February and July 1868. He got only one concession: the colonial secretary agreed to ask the dominion government to review the impact of its taxation, trade, and fishing policies on Nova Scotia with a view to their modification. Howe's participation in the two delegations left him – always a great admirer of British political institutions – highly disillusioned with British public men and the British political process. He noted that only ten peers were in their place when the House of Lords gave third reading to the British North America Act. "If disloyal men can be made at all it is by such treatment as that." Once he had felt that a man with an honest case would always get fair play from the independent English gentlemen in the House of Commons. "If you ask me if I feel that confidence now, I am sorry to say that I do not."

By mid-1868 Howe knew that the game was up, but he did not openly "accept the situation" until December 1868, when Gladstone's newly installed administration confirmed that the union was to remain as it was. Throughout the summer and autumn of 1868 Howe's main function was to keep in line the advocates of insurrection and annexation within the anti-confederate ranks. If the issue had been one simply between Canadians and Nova Scotians, he said, "I would take every son I have and die on the frontier before I would submit to this outrage," but he had been a loyal and devoted British subject all his life and would continue one to the end.

In January 1869 Howe and his fellow Nova Scotian MP, Archibald W. McLelan*, reached an agreement with the federal minister of finance, Sir John Rose*, for granting "better terms" to Nova Scotia and on 30 Jan. 1869 he entered the dominion cabinet as president of the council. The necessity of fighting a by-election in Hants in mid-winter against determined opposition resulted in his complete physical breakdown, and, although he won the election, he never fully regained his health.

As a federal minister, he was the subject of controversy on two occasions. On 16 Nov. 1869 he became secretary of state for the provinces and in that capacity oversaw the arrangements for bringing Manitoba into Canada. Anxious as always to see things at first hand, Howe overtaxed his ebbing strength by a visit to the Red River. Later, when the lieutenant governor–designate, William McDougall*, could not enter the new province because of insurrection, he blamed his difficulties on the loose talk and anti-Canadian bias of Howe. But the House of Commons declined to go along with him.

Howe's disillusionment with the British government reached zenith when it failed to safeguard Canadian interests in the negotiations leading to the Treaty of Washington of 1871. In an address to the YMCA of Ottawa on 27 Feb. 1872, he suggested that if "Englishmen, unmindful of the past, repudiate their national obligations," Canadians had the ability to work out their own destiny by themselves. In any case he felt that the time was rapidly approaching when Canadians and Englishmen would have to reach "a clear and distinct understanding as to the hopes and obligations of the future." Sir John A. Macdonald was not amused: "although [Howe] had outlived his usefulness he has not lost his power of mischief."

In May 1873 Howe became lieutenant governor of his native province. He had held that office less than three weeks when he died at government house in Halifax on 1 June 1873.

For his part in the winning of responsible government Howe has received fair and judicious treatment at the hands of the historians, especially from Chester Martin in Empire and commonwealth. But he has fared badly on the confederation issue. The style was set by his contemporary, Presbyterian pastor G. M. Grant*, who attributed his position on the Quebec resolutions purely to egoism. "Was he to help, to be the lieutenant of Dr. Tupper, the man who had taken the popular breeze out of his sails . . . only a hero would have done his duty. . . . And Howe was an egotist . . . [possessed of an] egotism which long feeding on popular applause had developed into a vanity almost incomprehensible in a man so strong."

E. M. Saunders* in Three premiers of Nova Scotia and W. L. Grant* in The tribune of Nova Scotia accepted G. M. Grant's thesis at its face value. But more recently (1935) J. A. Roy went them one better in Joseph Howe: a study in achievement and frustration. A professor of English, he treated Howe as the protagonist of a Shakespearian tragedy whose fortunes proceeded inexorably downwards after reaching their apogee. "Once [responsible government] was achieved his main work was done. Dullness succeeded enthusiasm, cynicism, faith; and from now on, his story is one of fading day and falling night." In writing of Howe, most general historians and biographers of Howe's contemporaries have taken their cue from G. M. Grant or J. A. Roy or both.

None would deny that Howe was an egotist, but Grant adduces not a tittle of evidence to indicate that egoism determined his opposition to the Quebec resolutions. The fact is that Howe's position was thoroughly consistent with the statements and activities of his past life and was entirely predictable, apart from considerations of jealousy or egoism.

Any suggestion that the later Howe was basically a disappointed, disillusioned, embittered, cynical man fails to take into account his irrepressible ebullience. Despite serious disappointments and disillusionment with institutions by which he set great store, he quickly rebounded with new ideas or, at least, with a renewal of faith. In any case, just because Howe was unsuccessful in his advocacy of some proposals and in his opposition to others, it ought not to be assumed – as some historians have done – that he was guilty of bad judgement or suffered from a deficiency of character. It was Howe's fate to have the soundness of his later political ventures judged by the criterion of success and, as Professor R. G. Trotter* indicated, there is "no justice in that sort of ex post facto verdict on political opinions." It would mean that a public man who craved favourable recognition in the history books would have to calculate the probabilities of alternative lines of action and act in accordance with the likely outcome rather than his own principles. But when Howe made his fateful decision in April 1866, could anyone have forecast the probable success of the union? Surely this kind of criterion for making judgements would "downgrade a person of unimpeachable motives who makes a strong fight against impossible odds and at the same time tend to enthrone Machiavellianism as a cardinal virtue of politics."

Howe, "a liberal imperial federationist" (to use Professor Donald Creighton's description), may be criticized because he failed to appreciate that his plans for the organization of the empire ran completely counter to the trend of thinking in Britain when he proposed them. He may have been altogether too unwilling to recognize the feasibility of a united British North America in the 1860s and he may have exaggerated the possible evil effects of that union on Nova Scotia. But he has suffered unfairly because the charges of inconsistency, precipitate intervention, and bad motives that were made against him by the partisanship of the confederation era were perpetuated in a hoary mythology that has been resistant to reinterpretation.

Throughout his career Howe exhibited failings and deficiencies of varying kinds: when it suited his own purposes he could be annoyingly ingratiating; although his diaries reveal him as humble and self-effacing, on occasion he was highly egotistical; in the matter of office-holding by members of his family, he permitted himself a line of conduct he would not tolerate in others; after putting up with abuse for a time, he might finally demonstrate an utter lack of moderation; self-educated in a hard school, he sometimes lacked refinement, as instanced by his off-colour allusions in the assembly and his stooping to outright vulgarity with less sophisticated audiences. But these are minor blemishes and they are more than counterbalanced by a basic consistency, an adherence to principles, which is uncommon.

None the less, Howe is a difficult man to categorize. Basically he was a conservative reformer, even though his name is primarily associated with radical, even revolutionary objectives. Although he personally thought of himself as a liberal, he outdid even the most ardent Tory in his devotion to Britain. As a man who felt that land, easily acquired in Nova Scotia, should be the basis of the franchise, and whose government abolished the universal suffrage which had been operative for a decade, he could hardly be labelled a democrat. Yet he did insist that the people had a right to be consulted directly on intercolonial union.

Time has vindicated Howe in the sense that the right of the electorate to give prior approval to radical constitutional changes has become an established convention of the British constitution. Furthermore, despite the impracticability of his ideas on the organization of the empire, the commonwealth has become what he hoped it would become: "a partnership, which may last for centuries, and need not terminate at all, so long as it is mutually advantageous." But perhaps Howe would like best to be remembered for his efforts to rescue his compatriots from the parochialism which besets a small community. When accused of "innoculating the public mind with extravagant and unrestrained ideas," he pridefully admitted that he was guilty of giving his countrymen enlarged views and concepts on many subjects. "I have striven," he said, "to elevate their eyes and minds from the little pedling muddy pool of politics beneath their feet to something more enobling, exacting and inspiring, calculated to enlarge the borders of their intelligence, and increase the extent and area of their prosperity."

J. Murray Beck

[PAC, MG 24, B29 (Howe papers); MG 30, D9 (Johnson papers). British Colonist (Halifax), 1848–73. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 1844–73. Novascotian (Halifax), 1827–73. Sun (Halifax), 1845–67. Times (Halifax), 1834–48. Nova Scotia, House of Assembly, Journals and proceedings, 1837–68.

For older biographical material on Howe, see: G. M. Grant, Joseph Howe (1st ed., Halifax, 1904; 2nd ed., Halifax, 1906); G. E. Fenety, Life and times of the Hon. Joseph Howe, (the great Nova Scotian and ex-lieut. governor); with brief references to some of his prominent contemporaries (Saint John, N.B., 1896); Saunders, Three premiers of N.S.; Longley, Howe; and W. L. Grant, Tribune of N.S.: Howe. For more recent biographical material, see: J. A. Roy, Joseph Howe, a study in achievement and frustration (Toronto, 1935), and J. M. Beck, "Joseph Howe," Our living tradition, 4th ser., ed. R. L. McDougall (Toronto, 1962), 3–30

For extracts from Howe's speeches and letters, see: [Joseph Howe], The speeches and public letters of the Hon. Joseph Howe, ed. William Annand (2v., Boston, 1858); Speeches and letters (Chisholm); The heart of Howe, selections from the letters and speeches of Joseph Howe, ed. D. C. Harvey (Toronto, 1939); and Joseph Howe: voice of Nova Scotia, ed. and intro. J. M. Beck (Toronto, 1964). For an account of Howe's early career, see: J. M. Beck, "Joseph Howe: mild Tory to reforming assemblyman," Dal. Rev., XLIV (1964–65), 44–56. For his part in the movement for responsible government, see: Martin, Empire and commonwealth. For his recruiting activities in the United States, see: J. B. Brebner, "Joseph Howe and the Crimean War enlistment controversy between Great Britain and the United States," CHR, XI (1930), 300–27. For his efforts to secure imperial office, see: J. M. Beck, "Joseph Howe: opportunist or empire-builder?" CHR, XLI (1960), 185–202. For his participation in the confederation issue, see: J. M. Beck, "Joseph Howe and confederation: myth and fact," RSCT, 4th ser., II (1964), sect.II, 137–50; and J. M. Beck, Joseph Howe: anti-confederate (CHA hist. booklet, 17, Ottawa, 1965). For conflicting views of various aspects of Howe's career see: Joseph Howe: opportunist? man of vision? frustrated politician?, ed. George Rawlyk (Issues in Canadian History, ed. Morris Zaslow, Toronto, 1967). J.M.B.]

HUMPHREYS, JAMES DODSLEY, singer and music teacher; b. in Mansfield, Nottinghamshire, Eng., *c.*1811, son of Francis Humphreys and Mary Hardwick Unwin; d. in Toronto, Ont., 23–24 Feb. 1877.

Little is known of James Dodsley Humphreys' early life. He claimed at one time that he was "formerly of the Royal Academy of Music," but there is no evidence for this claim. He first comes to our attention in 1835 when he sang at two "Musical Meetings" in Toronto along with the famous English songwriter, Henry Russell.

Humphreys was considered by many as Toronto's "favourite tenor." He made more concert appearances, over a longer period, than any other Toronto artist in the second third of the 19th century. He appears to have been able to satisfy all the demands on a singer's repertoire made by Toronto audiences. Most often he performed songs, ballads, or, as part of a vocal ensemble, glees, but he frequently included Italian opera and oratorio music by Händel and Haydn. He sang in the first act of Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia" in 1853, although in a bass part, and in "Judas Maccabeus" and the "Creation" in 1858.

Humphreys was associated with many Toronto musical societies as performer or executive. He was a conductor of the Toronto Choral Society of 1845, president of the Metropolitan Choral Society (1858–60) and conductor of the Societa Armonica (1861–62) and the St Cecilia Society (1864–65). In 1850 he was singing master pro tem at Upper Canada College; he remained on its staff until 1854 and may have taught singing at that school until his death. He was also singing master at ladies' schools, a private teacher, and in the 1840s leader of the amateur choir of St James' Cathedral.

In 1843 Humphreys had a number of compositions published in New York by J. F. Nunns including four waltzes and several ballads; one ballad, "When we two parted," he dedicated to Mary Jane Hagerman, his best known pupil. When production of sheet music in Toronto began a year or two later, after Abraham Nordheimer* and his brother Samuel* had opened their music house, it was mentioned on their first publication, J. P. Knight's "Beautiful Venice," that it was "sung with much applause by Mr. Humphreys." Of later date, only one composition, the song, "The junior warden's toast," has been discovered.

Humphreys' last known concert appearance was in 1873, nearly 40 years after his Toronto debut; "and within a year of his death, his fine tenor had still much of its wonted power." In 1876 a concert was held for his benefit in which leading Toronto musicians including Frederic Herbert Torrington* and Waugh Lauder* participated. He was called "so skilled a musician, so genial a gentleman, and so true a friend" and "not only a good teacher but perhaps the best performer in our midst."

Humphreys' widowed mother had married the Toronto widower Samuel Smith Ridout* in 1838; Humphreys himself married Ridout's daughter, Caroline Amelia, and they had several sons and a daughter.

Helmut Kallmann

The Canadian Music Library Association (Canadian Library Association, Ottawa) is compiling a list of J. D. Humphreys' publications.

Anglo-American Magazine (Toronto), II (1853), 334. Belford's Monthly Magazine (Toronto), I (1876), 711. Correspondent and Advocate (Toronto), 31 Dec. 1835. Globe (Toronto), 26 Feb. 1877. Mail (Toronto), 26 Feb. 1877, 21 Dec. 1878. Mail and Empire (Toronto), 7 Nov. 1896. Toronto Patriot, 14 Feb. 1844. Rowsell's city of Toronto and county of York directory for 1850–1 . . ., ed. J. Armstrong (Toronto, 1850). C. C. Taylor, Toronto "called back" from 1886 to 1850 . . . (Toronto, 1886). Samuel Thompson, Reminiscences of a Canadian pioneer for the last fifty years; an autobiography (Toronto, 1884).

Chadwick, Ontarian families, I, 39–40. J. R. Robertson, Landmarks of Canada, a guide to the J. Ross Robertson Historical Collection in the Public Reference Library, Toronto, Canada (Toronto, 1917), 562. D. J. Sale, "Toronto's pre-confederation music societies, 1845–1867," unpublished MA thesis, University of Toronto, 1968. F. N. Walker, Sketches of old Toronto (Toronto, 1965).

HUNKAJUKA (Little Soldier, sometimes cited as Little Chief), chief of a nomadic band of Assiniboine Indians of the North-West Territories; killed at Cypress Hills (Saskatchewan), May 1873.

Virtually nothing is known of Little Soldier prior to the significant event in which he lost his life. The incident has an explanation in social problems in the North-West Territories when the area was acquired by Canada in 1870: horse stealing was rife among the Indians and the southwestern region was demoralized by American whiskey traders infiltrating from posts on the Missouri River. The episode began with a band of "wolfers," traders and hunters who followed the buffalo hunt and poisoned carcasses to kill the scavenger wolves whose furs they sought. A mixed party of Canadian and American "wolfers" had their horses stolen while en route to Fort Benton, Montana Territory, in early spring 1873. Organizing an expedition to recover them, they rode into Canadian territory, and arrived at the whiskey-trading outpost of the Fort Benton merchants, operated by Abel Farwell and Moses Solomon in the Cypress Hills. There they found Little Soldier's band, whom they mistakenly suspected of the thefts. Little Soldier attempted to appease the "wolfers" but drunkenness on both sides contributed to the violence which ensued on a Sunday in early May (probably 4 May). Little Soldier and between 15 and 35 of his followers were wantonly slain.

The Canadian government had already introduced legislation to provide for policing the territories, but news of this massacre hastened the organization of the North-West Mounted Police. Dispatched to the area in 1874, the subsequent persistence of the NWMP in bringing the "wolfers" to trial demonstrated their resolve to administer justice in the North-West Territories without racial distinction and won them the respect of the native people.

Allan R. Turner

SAB, Dan (Ochankugahe) Kennedy, Cypress Hill's massacre, 1873; Dan Kennedy, Eschappie's version of the massacre; Saskatchewan Historical Society, 100.

P. F. Sharp, "Massacre at Cypress Hills," Saskatchewan History (Saskatoon), VII (1954), 81–99. J. P. Turner, "Massacre in the Hills," Royal Canadian Mounted Police Quarterly [Ottawa], VIII (1940), 302–9.

HUNT, CHARLES, miller and contractor; b. 5 March 1820, at Motcombe, Dorsetshire, Eng., eldest child of John Hunt and Mary Golpin; d. 2 Oct. 1871, at New York, U.S.A.

Charles Hunt received only one year's formal education because of his father's early death in 1827. He worked for a miller at Stalbridge and a grocer at Cranborne before emigrating. In 1842 he arrived in Windsor, Canada West, where he was employed in the provisions and shipping business of J. and J. Dougall until 1845. He next farmed at St Thomas for two years, and then returned to Windsor to begin a business career which, even for that period, was remarkable for its diversity.

In Windsor, Hunt rented the dock property of James Dougall* and began a forwarding and lumber business, later expanding into contracting and land speculation sometimes in partnership with Dougall. In 1854–55 Hunt built the Great Western Railway depot, including a dock, freight house, and some bridges. Then in 1856, in partnership with William Knight, he went into shipbuilding, contracting with the railway for the Union, a 750-ton ferry and icebreaker, which ran between Windsor and Detroit from 1857 to 1874. In 1857 he rebuilt the steamer Transit. When Windsor was incorporated as a village in 1854 he was elected to the first council.

Hunt decided, however, that London was the future commercial centre of western Ontario. He moved there in 1856 though he always retained interests in Windsor. In 1853 he had purchased land on the Thames River from John Kinder Labatt for a flour mill and, in 1854, he had begun to construct there the City Mills, which were operated by his descendants until 1957. The mill had four stones capable of grinding 123 barrels of flour a day. Grain was purchased at various Great Lakes centres and flour was supplied to western Ontario, the Great Lakes cities, New York, and Great Britain. Hunt also developed operations in commissions, coopering, groceries, lumber, wood, and coal (being the first London dealer in this last commodity, in 1868). In addition, he built the Bank of British North America in 1856 and his own block in 1866. Finally, in 1867 he added a 70,000-bushel grain elevator to his operation. His business flourished in spite of setbacks occasioned by floods, his backing of Dougall who ran into financial difficulties, and litigation over street closure.

In London Hunt also played a leading role in the financial and commercial community. He was president of the Board of Trade in 1861–63 and 1869–70, chairman of the group that briefly operated the London City Oil Refining Company in 1866–67, and from 1864 first president of the City Gas Company (now part of the Union Gas Company). He was a director of the Bank of British North America and of the Great Western Railway (1864–69), and was elected a director of the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway (later the Detroit, New Haven, and Milwaukee Railway) in 1863.

An Anglican, he was a warden of St Paul's Cathedral in 1861–62 and 1864–65, and in 1861 agreed to support a missionary in the north of the diocese of Huron. He was well known for his charity in the city, providing flour for the poor and helping to arrange the shipment of cheap wood during a firewood shortage in 1867.

On 19 May 1845, at St Thomas, he married Emma Brewer, a native of England (c.1822 – 1909), and they had a large family. Two sons, Charles Brewer and John Inkerman Alexander, carried on the business. Charles Hunt died at New York City while travelling to the West Indies for his health. He "was one of the best known men in Western Ontario; and by his energy and enterprise did much to stimulate a development of its resources."

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

St Mary's Church (Motcombe, Dorsetshire, Eng.), Registers. [Charles Hunt], "Charles Hunt, 1820–1871," ed. G. W. H. Bartram, Centennial review, 1967 (London and Middlesex Hist. Soc. pub., XVI, London, Ont., [1967]), 55–85. London Free Press, 6 Oct. 1871, 15 March 1917. "London: its manufactures and general progress," Western Ontario History Nuggets (London), no.13 (1947), 7. City of London and county of Middlesex general directory for 1868–9 . . ., ed. James Sutherland (Toronto, 1868), 277. [Archie Bremner], City of London, Ontario, Canada; the pioneer period and the London of today (2nd ed., London, Ont., 1900), 68, 143. History of the county of Middlesex, 251, 362–63, 369, 866–67. F. J. Holton et al., "History of the Windsor and Detroit ferries," Ont. Hist., XVI (1918), 40–51.

HURLBURT, THOMAS, Methodist missionary, linguist and philologist; b. 3 March 1808, in the township of Augusta, Upper Canada, the fourth son of 16 children of Heman Hurlburt and Hannah Mosier; m. 1832, Betsy Almira, eldest daughter of the Reverend Ezra Adams; d. 14 April 1873, at Little Current, Ont.

Heman Hurlburt was a prosperous farmer and gave each of his children a good education; of his 11 sons, five became Methodist ministers. It is not known where Thomas received his formal education, and he does not appear to have attended university. However, although his 45-year career as a missionary, first of the Methodist Episcopal Church, then of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, was spent primarily in remote areas, he showed a thorough knowledge of many of the works of major scientists, philologists, and theologians, and produced some scholarly studies in geology and philology.

Hurlburt began teaching Indians at Muncey, Middlesex County, under Methodist auspices in 1828, and the next year was put in charge of a mission. In 1834 he was sent to the Indian village of Saugeen on Lake Huron, and in 1835 he was ordained. Moving to the St Clair mission in 1837, he came under the superintendency of James Evans* whom he assisted in the development of his recently invented orthography of the Ojibwa language. He continued to work closely with Evans in 1838 when they were sent to the outposts of the Lake Superior mission (later called Pic River) by the Methodist Missionary Society. Hurlburt remained at Pic River until 1843; in 1844, for the sake of his wife's health, he was given leave to work under the Indian Mission Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States in Missouri and neighbouring regions in the Mississippi valley. He returned to Canada in 1851 and served in the Indian villages at Alderville and Rice Lake until 1854 when he was appointed chairman of the Hudson's Bay District. He travelled to his new post at Norway House accompanied by John Ryerson, who was on a tour of inspection of the Methodist missions in the northwest.

Hurlburt remained at Norway House until 1857 when he was sent to Garden River and, in 1858, to the St Clair mission. He laboured mainly at this post and on Manitoulin Island until his death on 14 April 1873, which resulted from injuries caused when he fell on the ice while building a boat for a missionary journey. Except for five years spent in pastorates among whites, he had served in almost all the Methodist Indian missions in Canada, and, for seven years, in missions in the United States.

Hurlburt's aim was to Christianize and civilize the Indians. Only their Christianization, he argued, could bring about their civilization, and the primary needs were "the Scriptures in the vernacular, and . . . a native agency, with day schools and preaching all in the language of the people." Hurlburt encouraged the training of Indian teachers and ministers; he made translations of scripture, catechisms, and hymns into Cree and Ojibwa and printed them. While stationed at the St Clair mission, he began to publish, in 1861, Petaubun, Peep of Day (Sarnia), a monthly newspaper in Ojibwa and English. His mastery of several Indian dialects, won by an expert knowledge of the functions of the organs of speech and of Indian phonetics, was an outstanding achievement. He was the only Methodist missionary of his time who could preach to Indians without an interpreter.

In the 1850s, the government began to expropriate lands in the Bruce Peninsula claimed by the Indians, with a view to settlement by whites. Hurlburt did not oppose expropriation but did object to the unjust and unnegotiable compensation given the Indians and their relegation to a state of "perpetual minority." He decried the government's assumptions that the Indians were lazy and that they would soon be extinct and urged that the only good policy was to make the Indians "citizens in every respect."

Hurlburt's views went unheeded and, despite his work and that of his contemporaries, the churches and governments failed to conceive a viable way of life for the Indian in Canada.

Arthur G. Reynolds

Thomas Hurlburt was the author of Evidences of the glories of the one divine intelligence as seen in his works (Toronto, 1867); "A memoir on the inflections of the Chippewa tongue," in Information respecting the history, condition, and prospects of the Indian tribes of the United States . . ., ed. H. R. Schoolcraft (6v., Philadelphia, 1851–57), IV, 385–96; and "Review of Sir Charles Lyell on The antiquity of man," Methodist Review (New York), XLVII (1965), 559–82. His writings and translations in Cree and Ojibwa, as well as other writings attributed to him, have not been located.

UCA, John Maclean collection, material gathered for a biography of Thomas Hurlburt. Christian Guardian (Toronto), 1838–73. Carroll, Case and his cotemporaries, III, IV, V. John Maclean, Vanguards of Canada (Toronto, 1918), 66–83. Erastus Hurlburt, "Thomas Hurlburt, Indian missionary," Methodist Magazine (Toronto, Halifax), XXXIV (1891), 52–59

HURTEAU, ISIDORE, notary, company director, and mayor of Longueuil; b. 11 July 1815 at Contrecœur, Lower Canada, son of Gabriel Hurteau and Louise Duhamel; d. 16 Dec. 1879 at Longueuil, Que.

Isidore Hurteau completed his course of study at the age of 18. He received legal training from a practitioner whose name we do not know, and on 24 Dec. 1838 obtained a commission as notary. At this time, when the province was under martial law, he took up residence at Longueuil, where on 1 Feb. 1839 he signed his first act. He was to practise there for nearly 40 years, and in particular he was the notary and adviser of the Montenach family, which was closely related to Marie-Charles-Joseph Le Moyne de Longueuil, Baronne de Longueuil and seigneur of Belœil. The parish council of Saint-Antoine-de-Longueuil also called upon his services when it made over some land to the newly formed community of the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary.

In 1846, at Longueuil, Isidore Hurteau organized a brewery, which lasted only a short time. According to the Gazette (Montreal), "after the temperance lectures delivered by Father [Charles-Paschal-Télesphore Chiniquy*], Mr. Hurteau became convinced of the evils of the liquor traffic and preferred to lose the sum he had invested in the brewery and to destroy the business which he had inaugurated at so great an expense." In 1848 Isidore Hurteau became the first mayor of the municipality of the parish of Longueuil. During his period of office he obtained from the agent of the barony of Longueuil a grant of a piece of land for a public market. Thirty years later this site, "embellished with magnificent clumps of trees," received the name of Hurteau Place. Hurteau was elected mayor a second time in 1870, and held the same office once more from 1876 until his death, by which time Longueuil had become a town. In 1847 he was lieutenant and adjutant of the 4th Battalion of Chambly, in 1853 captain and major, and in 1862 he became lieutenant-colonel commanding the 3rd Battalion of militia in the Chambly division.

In 1865 Isidore Hurteau took part in instituting the Longueuil Shipping Company, which operated a ferry service between Longueuil and Montreal, and became its principal director. To his manifold activities he added that of co-owner and probably principal silent partner of the Montreal political daily, La Minerve. Precise details are not known but this development may have occurred around 1874–75, when Ludger Duvernay*'s son, Louis-Napoléon, ended his association with the paper on assuming other managerial responsibilities. Hurteau's son-in-law, Clément-Arthur Dansereau*, was at that time the senior editor. Hurteau was appointed arbitrator for the Canadian government in 1868, and held this important office for nearly ten years.

Isidore Hurteau passed away at Longueuil in December 1879, after long months of suffering. He was still mayor of his town, and was given an impressive burial. He was interred in the crypt of the church at Longueuil, the resting-place of so many members of its founding family, the Le Moynes de Longueuil. In February 1838, at Longueuil, Hurteau had married Françoise Lamarre, who survived him by 25 years. Of this marriage were born four girls, one of whom, Cordélie, married Clément-Arthur Dansereau in 1866.

JEAN-JACQUES LEFEBVRE

"Les Grant de Longueuil," J.-J. Lefebvre, édit., APQ Rapport, 1953–55, 123–28. La Minerve (Montréal), 20 déc., 27 déc. 1879. Dom. ann. reg., 1879, 406. Alexandre Jodoin et J.-L. Vincent, Histoire de Longueuil et de la famille de Longueuil (Montréal, 1889), 221–650.

HYMAN, ELLIS WALTON, tanner and entrepreneur; b. Williamsport, Pennsylvania, in 1813, son of Jacob and Sarah Hyman; d. London, Ont., 12 April 1878.

Ellis Walton Hyman, the son of a builder of German descent, was trained as a tanner and currier, and emigrated to London, Upper Canada, in 1834. He became a British subject in 1850, "when political feeling ran high" following the movement in favour of annexation, along with Elijah Leonard*, the younger, and other Americans.

In 1835 Hyman established a tannery in partnership with David O. Marsh, and about 1838 they obtained the boot contract for the new British garrison at London. Marsh retired in 1845. Hyman's tannery was not reopened after a boiler explosion in 1873, but in 1867 he had built a second tannery which was later expanded. In 1874 he began a shoe factory in partnership with his son Charles Smith*, and in 1877 a pork-packing plant in London East (now in London) for the English export trade. He sometimes operated the firms in partnership and, at different times, had branches in Tillsonburg, in Centreville, Oxford County, and in Hamilton, where he and John McPherson operated a wholesale shoe business. In 1876 the total value of his London businesses was estimated at between $200,000 and $250,000; when he died there were 75 employees. The tannery remained in the family until 1947, and in operation until 1970.

A leading member of the small group of entrepreneurs under whose aegis London developed from an administrative centre into the economic metropolis of western Ontario, Hyman was an incorporator of the Board of Trade in 1857, a member of its council through most of the 1860s, and a founder of the Chamber of Commerce in 1875. He was instrumental in establishing the Huron and Erie Savings and Loan Society (now the Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation), was its vice-president, 1864–67, president, 1867–71, and a director until 1876. He was also one of the incorporators of the London and Port Stanley Railway in 1853, of the City of London Oil Company in 1866, of the London, Huron and Bruce Railway (of which he was treasurer in 1871–73), of the Bank of Hamilton (in which he was a provisional director in 1872), and of the London Life Insurance Company (in which he was a director from 1873 until his death). In a different field, he set up the first Music Hall in the town in 1866. A few years after his death it was averred that "everything he touched seemed to turn to gold"; except for his participation in the unsuccessful first Tecumseh Hotel syndicate in 1854, this claim would appear to hold true.

In politics Hyman was a Reformer, acting as organizer in London for Elijah Leonard in the 1862 election. Hyman himself was an alderman in 1853–54 and later was active in establishing a public water supply for London; he and Tory John Carling* were jointly elected first water commissioners in 1878. He attended St Paul's Anglican Cathedral and was an active freemason.

Hyman married, first, Frances L. Kingsley of New York, who died in 1848, and by whom he had one son. In 1850, he married Annie Maria Niles (1824–1901), daughter of William Niles; two of their sons succeeded Hyman in the businesses: Charles Smith, later federal minister of public works, and Jesse Willett. Ellis Hyman's mansion, "Elliston," was later owned by Adam Beck* and has long been a London landmark.

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

Middlesex County Registry Office (London, Ont.), Joint Stock Company register, Liber A (1851–66), 10–11. PAC, RG 31, A1, 1871, district 10, sub-district London, ward 1; RG 68, 1. Bradstreet's reports of the Dominion of Canada, February 1, 1876 (New York, 1876), 246. London Advertiser, 17 Jan. 1878. London Free Press, 8 Feb., 5 March 1856; 13 April 1878; 28 July 1938; 22 Aug. 1947. The Honourable Elijah Leonard, a memoir (London, Ont., [1894]), 43.

Can. biog. dict., I, 673–74. City of London and county of Middlesex general directory, for 1868–9 . . ., ed. James Sutherland (Toronto, 1868), 283–84. Dom. ann. reg., 1878, 353–54. [Archie Bremner], City of London, Ontario, Canada; the pioneer period and the London of today (London, Ont., 1897), 84, 87, 90, 91; (2nd ed., London, Ont., 1900), 32, 34, 116. C. T. Campbell, Pioneer days in London; some account of men and things in London before it became a city (London, Ont., 1921), 6. History of the county of Middlesex, 362, 365, 374. J. E. Middleton and Fred Landon, The province of Ontario: a history, 1615–1927 (5v., Toronto, [1927–28]), III, 18–20. Ross and Trigge, History of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, III, 67–68. "London, its manufactures and general progress," Western Ontario History Nuggets (London, Ont.), no.13 (1947), 13–14.

I

IFFLAND, ANTHONY VON (baptized Antoine), physician, surgeon, and epidemiologist; b. 3 March 1798 at Quebec, son of John (Johann) Iffland and Marie-Madeleine Bibeau, dit Portugal; d. 7 Dec. 1876 at Quebec.

Anthony Iffland's father was born in Germany in Hutten (county of Hanau, later integrated with Hesse-Cassel); he served with troops of Hesse-Hanau in America during the Revolutionary War, and settled in Quebec as a farmer and tavern-keeper. Anthony, though baptized in the Roman Catholic Church, opted for the Protestant religion of his father, and identified with the English-language community.

Soon after he started medical practice, Anthony added von (the German particle of nobility) to his name. Though he later also adopted the style of doctor of medicine, like most practitioners of his time he was licensed without a medical degree. He had apprenticed in surgery with the senior medical examiner for the district of Quebec, Dr James Fisher*, former chief surgeon at the garrison. Iffland completed his medical studies in England at the London Hospital, passed the examinations of the Royal College of Surgeons of England in January 1818, and obtained his licence as physician and surgeon in Quebec in July. At that time, only five of 31 medical practitioners in the district of Quebec and 51 in the district of Montreal possessed the MD degree.

Iffland was secretary and lecturer in anatomy as well as general practitioner at the Quebec Dispensary, privately established toward the end of 1818 as a general medical centre and clinic for indigents and immigrants. His medical colleagues were Pierre-Jean de Sales Laterrière*, Charles-Norbert Perrault*, and Augustin Mercier*. When the dispensary failed in 1820 for lack of money, Iffland was unable to combine, as he had hoped, private practice with a clinic for the indigent sick. In 1821 he travelled on an arduous government assignment to vaccinate people for smallpox in the isolated, and therefore vulnerable, district of Gaspé.

In Quebec City Iffland had been harassed for his procurement of cadavers at a time before satisfactory legal provision of bodies for medical research, and he felt it impossible to continue his work in anatomy there. Also, with the closing of the dispensary he must have had serious financial problems. Consequently he spent many years in the garrison town of William Henry (Sorel), where there was only one other doctor, and the nearby parish of Saint-Michel-de-Yamaska. In 1836 he married Elizabeth Allen, daughter of a prominent merchant and landowner in William Henry, and sister of the town schoolmaster; they were to have three children. To supplement his income he served as commissioner of census for Richelieu County in 1831 and 1835, as well as preventive officer of customs from 1824 until 1832. Although from 1830 he continuously held a commission as justice of the peace, he appears not to have exercised the function.

Like many English Canadians, Iffland was an early supporter of the idea of the union of Upper and Lower Canada. But despite an effort, unsuccessful, to win election to the legislature for Gaspé in 1834, Iffland was not a political person. The campaign in Gaspé was widely cited in the press as an instance of corrupt electoral practice. Iffland and his electors arrived at the poll at the appointed day and hour only to discover, too late to intervene, that the venue had been changed, and they could not vote.

With recurrent epidemics of Asiatic cholera in Canada beginning in 1832, and later of typhus, Iffland became concerned with the care of the victims and generally with questions of public health when he moved back to Quebec. An important centre for sick travellers, who often brought epidemic diseases, was the Marine Hospital (later the Marine and Emigrant Hospital), where in the winter of 1836–37 Iffland became resident physician and resumed teaching. The hospital served as a focus for medical teaching and training until the incorporation in 1845 of the School of Medicine of Quebec [see Joseph PAINCHAUD]. This school was functioning in 1848 and was absorbed by the faculty of medicine of the Université Laval in 1852.

After a further stage as a country doctor at Saint-Michel-de-Yamaska, between 1838 and 1847, Iffland returned to Quebec to work closely with Dr James Douglas* for most of his subsequent career. First at the private hospital in Beauport set up by Douglas to care for typhus patients, he was then on the staff of the Lunatic Asylum that Douglas cofounded with Charles-Jacques Frémont* and Joseph Morrin* on government contract to provide modern progressive facilities for the insane. In 1852 Iffland moved to the Quarantine Station at Grosse Île (Montmagny County), about 33 miles downstream from Quebec to assist Douglas at the Quarantine Hospital. He succeeded him in the position of medical superintendent in 1860, until his own retirement to Quebec in 1867. At his death he was the dean of physicians in the old capital.

He had been the secretary of various medical commissions, notably Dr Wolfred Nelson*'s commission on the state of hospitals and asylums held during 1848–49, and the committee to investigate the cholera epidemic of 1854. He became corresponding member of the Epidemiological Society of London in 1856, the year he served as vice-president of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Lower Canada. He wrote minor articles on medical cases, the profession, and public health.

Although Iffland's long medical career was not in any sense outstanding, it is of interest because it spanned a period of considerable scientific and political change, and because of the variety of his preoccupations. As an epidemiologist he did not hesitate to risk his life in the care of cholera victims and of those suffering from the other contagious diseases that proliferated with increased immigration. Yet Iffland's early interests and talents were blunted for lack of consistent opportunities in his profession. Although his first love was anatomy, early in his career it proved impossible to continue research in that field openly. A devoted, though often disappointed practitioner, Iffland tended to resist a purely comfortable routine life. But, inevitably drawn to administrative tasks under financial pressure, he was overshadowed by more creative medical men who were his friends, and with whom he worked.

LEWIS HERTZMAN

Anthony von Iffland's writings include the following: "Apperçu d'un voyage dans le district de Gaspé pendant les mois de mai, juin, juillet et une partie d'août 1821, par le Docteur Von Iffland," Revue d'histoire de la Gaspésie (Gaspé), VII, no.1 (1969), 19–41; "The duties and responsibilities of physicians to insane asylums," British American Journal of Medical and Physical Science (Montreal), IV (1848–49), 154–57, 177–78; "Sheets from my portfolio," British American Journal of Medical and Physical Science (Montreal), IV (1848–49), 24–26, 109–11, 137–38.

PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 16, pp.332–39. Canada, Province of, Sessional papers, XXI (1863), PT.5, no.66; XXV (1865), PT.1, no.14; XXVI (1866), PT.3, no.6. Canada, Sessional papers, I (1867–68), PT.8, no.40. Quebec Mercury, 27 Nov. 1834. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, 384. Abbott, History of medicine, 50, 54–55, 63. Ahern, Notes pour l'histoire de la médecine, 539–41. C.-M. Boissonnault, Histoire de la faculté de médecine de Laval (Québec, 1953). E. D. Worthington, Reminiscences of student life and practice (Sherbrooke, 1897).

INKSTER, JOHN (nicknamed Orkney Johnny), merchant, politician; b. 1799 in the Orkney

Islands, Scotland; d. 30 June 1874, at Kildonan, Man.

Nothing is known about the parentage or background of John Inkster. In 1819 he came to Rupert's Land as a stone mason in the service of the Hudson's Bay Company. On 20 Jan. 1826, in St John's parish, he married Mary Sinclair, daughter of Chief Factor William Sinclair. They had nine children, of whom the eldest, Colin*, was to become sheriff of Winnipeg. John Inkster did not serve out his contract with the HBC. In 1823 or 1824 he had joined an uncle, John Inkster, who had come to the country in 1797 and who owned land on both sides of Red River. John Inkster began farming on the west side of the river, but he was to win prosperity and respect as a freighter and one of the earliest independent merchants of the settlement. He dealt in a variety of goods ranging from pemmican to "plough irons," from shirts to shot and powder. Among his customers were numerous Red River worthies, other traders such as his brother-in-law James Sinclair*, missionaries, Indians, and tripmen. His dealings extended from Portage la Prairie to York Factory and St Paul (Minn.). Some produce came from local sources, such as wheat and potatoes; other goods were imported from Edinburgh, London, and Hamilton, Canada West. The HBC handled his overseas financial transactions and brought in a proportion of his supplies by the bay; others came via St Paul. After his death, his estate was evaluated at about $20,000.

In 1856 the settlers of Red River decided a steam grist mill was essential for a more reliable service than that given by the wind and water mills. Inkster, who already owned a water mill, became president of the Steam Mill Company, which brought components for a mill down-river by barge to be set up at Redwood (Kildonan Park) with a sawmill attachment. A fire destroyed the mill in 1860.

Inkster is said to have been the first teacher in the school organized in 1849 by the Scottish settlers in Kildonan. He attended St John's Cathedral and served as rector's warden. He served as magistrate for the Lower District from 1850 to 1858 and as petty judge with a salary of £5 a year. In 1863 he became auditor of public accounts and worked on committees dealing with the regulation of liquor imports and the marking out of public roads. He was concerned with such public matters as the provision and upkeep of bridges and postal services. A member of the Council of Assiniboia from 1857 to 1868, he attended 54 meetings. He was elected as one of the English-speaking members to a council convened by Louis Riel* in November 1869 but could not attend.

Of special interest is the imposing house he built, constructing the stone foundation himself in 1851. Work was interrupted by the flood of 1852; however, the nine-room, two-storey house, built of squared oak logs floated down from Baie Saint-Paul (Man.), was completed in 1853. A much smaller structure alongside served as a store and post office. Seven Oaks is today a museum.

IRENE M. SPRY

PAC, MG 19, E7 (John Inkster papers), account books, papers. PAM, John Inkster, correspondence, 1860–74; John Inkster, papers, 1862–73. Surrogate Court for the Eastern Judicial District (Winnipeg), will of John Inkster, 16 July 1874. Begg's Red River journal (Morton), 165, 357, 396. Canadian North-West (Oliver), I. J. W. Graham, Winnipeg architecture; the Red River Settlement, 1831–1960 (Winnipeg, [1960]), 6. W. J. Healy, Women of Red River; being a book written down from the recollections of women surviving from the Red River era (Winnipeg, 1923), 46, 74, 86, 90–92, 95–96, 200. Martin Kavanagh, The Assiniboine basin; a social study of the discovery, exploration and settlement of Manitoba (Brandon, Man., 1966), 197.

IRVING, WILLIAM, master mariner and shipowner; b. 10 March 1816 at Annan, Dumfrieshire, Scotland; d. 28 Aug. 1872 at New Westminster, B.C.

In William Irving's youth Annan was a shipbuilding centre and his father was a shipwright in one of the yards. He himself went to sea as a cabin boy in the locally built brig Helen Douglas in 1831. Later he served in ships on the New York run, and it is said that he had some steamboating experience in New Brunswick.

Attracted to the Pacific coast by the gold discoveries in California, Captain Irving and an associate bought the bark Success and arrived at San Francisco in May 1849. In August, Irving moved to Portland, Oregon, where he later acquired extensive properties; a suburb of the city is still known as Irvington. In 1851 he became part owner of the steamer Eagle, the first of several steamers operating on the Columbia and Willamette rivers in which he had an interest. The gold rush to the Fraser River lured him north and in 1859 he purchased a share in the British Columbia and Victoria Steam Navigation Company. This he soon increased to a controlling interest. The company was operating the Governor Douglas, the first steamer built in British Columbia, between Victoria and New Westminster, as well as the Colonel Moody and Maria up the Fraser from New Westminster to Yale and to Harrison Lake.

The years 1862–65, which saw the height of the Cariboo gold rush, were a period of intense and often unscrupulous competition on the Fraser. Rate wars were frequent; competitors who had been paid subsidies to take their steamers off the river often sold them, whereupon the new owners would put them back in service. Steamboat inspection was lax, and boiler explosions not infrequent. Irving himself had a narrow escape in April 1861, when an explosion demolished the Fort Yale, a rival of his own ships, on which he happened to be travelling.

Irving was not satisfied with the ships he had acquired and he sold all three in May 1862. He had decided to concentrate on the run between New Westminster and Yale and ordered a new vessel specially designed for the service. This was the sternwheeler Reliance of about 300 tons, launched at Victoria in October, which proved to be the most successful Fraser River steamer of her time. In spite of strenuous competition, she proved, under Irving's shrewd management, to be a consistent money-maker. In 1865 he built the 283-ton Onward, an improved version of the Reliance with more comfortable passenger accommodation, and she repeated the earlier ship's success. By 1866, however, the Cariboo mines were declining and traffic on the Fraser declined with them. Only one competitor of Irving's Pioneer Line had survived, and to cut costs the two companies agreed to operate their ships alternate years until trade improved.

Irving was by this time perhaps the most popular and prominent citizen of New Westminster. He served for several years on the city council and was its president in 1868. He had many business interests, including control of the Albion Iron Works in Victoria. A generous man, he would willingly carry free a passenger who was genuinely unable to pay his fare, but he was not one to be imposed upon. He was thus characterized by the Victoria Colonist at the time of his death: "An intrepid navigator, possessed of more than ordinary pluck and push, he had an open hand and a warm heart for the needy."

In 1851 Irving had married Elizabeth Jane Dixon, who was born in Indiana. They had four daughters and one son. The home Irving built in New Westminster in 1864 was purchased from his granddaughters by the city of New Westminster and is now Irving House Historic Centre.

For a dozen years William Irving was the leading figure in shipping on the Fraser River. Under his son, Captain John Irving*, the Pioneer Line united with the coastal shipping interests of the Hudson's Bay Company to form the Canadian Pacific Navigation Company which in 1901 became the British Columbia Coast Service of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

W. KAYE LAMB

Colonist (Victoria), 1859–72. M. A. [Irving] Cox, Saga of a seafarer; the annals of Capt. William Irving (New Westminster, B.C., 1966). Lewis and Dryden's marine history of the Pacific northwest (Wright). N. R. Hacking, "Steamboating on the Fraser in the 'sixties," BCHQ, X (1946), 1–41; "British Columbia steamboat days, 1870–1883. I: Fraser and Stikine River steamboats," BCHQ, XI (1947), 69–111.

J

JACKMAN, WILLIAM, sealing captain and sailing master; b. 20 May 1837 at Renews, Nfld., eldest child of Captain Thomas Jackman, a descendant of a native of the Isle of Wight who was shipwrecked on the southern shore of the Avalon Peninsula; m. Bridget Burbage by whom he had four children; d. 25 Feb. 1877 at St John's, Nfld.

William Jackman, like his celebrated brother "Viking Arthur" [Arthur Jackman*], entered the cod and seal fisheries as a boy with his father. He commanded sailing vessels on the Labrador and at the ice; between 1867 and 1876 he was in charge of Bowring Brothers' sealing steamers Hawk and Eagle. A man of immense energy and strength, Jackman was on 9 Oct. 1867 the hero of a striking sea rescue at Spotted Islands, Labrador. He had taken his vessel there for safety during fierce gales, and saw the fishing schooner Sea Clipper, with 27 persons aboard, run aground on a reef some 600 feet from the shore. With little more than two hours to effect a rescue, Captain Jackman swam through heavy seas to and from the vessel 11 times to carry 11 persons to safety on his back. Then, companions having fastened a rope around his waist, he made 16 more swims to bring the remaining men and women ashore. He was presented with the medal and diploma of the Royal Humane Society on 18 Dec. 1868.

His death at the age of 39 cut short a sealing career of great promise, and removed one who, as president of the Star of the Sea Society, had devoted exceptional energy to the improvement of the status of Roman Catholic fishermen and seamen.

C. W. ANDREWS and G. M. STORY

Newfoundlander (St John's), 29 Nov. 1867, 27 Feb. 1877. Public Ledger (St John's), 27 Feb. 1877. L. G. Chafe, Chafe's sealing book; a history of the Newfoundland sealfishery from the earliest available records down to and including the voyage of 1923 . . . (3rd ed., St John's, 1923), 91–92. M. E. Condon, The fisheries and resources of Newfoundland . . . (St John's, 1925), 106–9, 113. J. R. Smallwood, "Stories out of our history," The book of Newfoundland, ed. J. R. Smallwood (4v., St John's, 1937–67), III, 457–58.

JACKSON, EDWARD, merchant, prominent Methodist layman, and philanthropist; b. 20 April 1799 at Redding, Conn.; d. 14 July 1872, at Hamilton, Ont.

Edward Jackson received his elementary schooling at Redding and was then apprenticed in the trade of tinsmith. After his marriage in 1826 to Lydia Ann Sanford of Redding he emigrated to Niagara, Upper Canada, moving shortly after to Ancaster, and, in 1830, to Hamilton. There he sold tinware and set up a tin factory which employed his nephew William Eli Sanford* and four other men, all of whom in time became partners in various branches of the business. Jackson held the controlling interest in these but preferred to remain anonymous. Thus, the Hamilton firm, under Dennis Moore*, was D. Moore and Company, and a foundry in London, Anderson, Sanford and Company. With industry and sound investment, Jackson eventually amassed a considerable fortune.

Jackson's parents were members of the Episcopal Church but his wife was a Methodist. He was converted to Methodism during revival services in 1832 and became a life-long class leader and Sunday school worker. Of his three children, only a daughter, Emmeline, survived infancy. She married her cousin, William Sanford, in 1856, but died 18 months later, only briefly survived by an infant daughter.

The effect of this double bereavement was to direct Edward Jackson's energies to religious and philanthropic works. He supported Methodist missions on the Pacific coast, was the main contributor to the founding of Wesleyan Female College in Hamilton, and served as president of the board of the college. He was also founder and principal supporter of Centenary Methodist Church, the corner-stone of which was laid by Mrs Jackson, 28 May 1866. He took an active part in the campaign to provide an endowment for Victoria College, Cobourg, and personally endowed the chair in theology in 1871. A year later, aged 72, he died at family prayer.

Edward Jackson was a man of handsome bearing and unimpeachable character, and was noted for his wit. He was highly respected as a public-spirited citizen, a successful businessman, and a sincere Christian.

H. P. GUNDY

A biography by Nathaniel Burwash in the Canadian Methodist Magazine (Toronto), III (1876), 7–10, 97–104, was later issued as Memorials of the life of Edward and Lydia Ann Jackson (Toronto, 1876). Christian Guardian (Toronto), 17, 24 July 1872. Herald (Hamilton), 11 Nov. 1910. W. H. Poole, A sermon occasioned by the death of Edward Jackson, Esq., of Hamilton (Toronto, 1872). Can. biog. dict., I, 708–9. J. E. Middleton and Fred Landon, The province of Ontario: a history, 1615–1927 (5v., Toronto, [1927–28]), III, 126. Mabel Burkholder, "Out of the storied past," Spectator (Hamilton), 8 Dec. 1956.

JARVIS, GEORGE STEPHEN BENJAMIN, soldier, judge, and politician; b. at Fredericton, N.B., 21 April 1797, son of Amelia Glover and Stephen Jarvis*, loyalist, of Danbury, Conn., who came to New Brunswick after the American Revolution and who in 1809 moved to York (Toronto), Upper Canada; d. at Cornwall, Ont., 15 April 1878.

George Stephen Jarvis attended schools at Fredericton and York but his education ended in 1812 when, at the age of 15, he enlisted as a "gentleman volunteer" in the 49th Regiment. He was commissioned an ensign in the 8th Regiment in 1813. His service during the War of 1812 was distinguished; he was present at most of the major engagements, including Queenston Heights (when he was mentioned in general orders), and Lundy's Lane, where he commanded a company at the age of 17.

After the war Jarvis remained in the regular forces as a lieutenant of the 104th Regiment (formerly the New Brunswick Fencible Infantry), but he returned to civilian life when the regiment was disbanded in 1817. He then studied law in the office of Jonas Jones* of Brockville, was admitted an attorney in 1820, and was called to the Upper Canada bar in 1823. Two years later, at age 28, he was appointed judge of the Ottawa District (Prescott, Russell, and part of Carleton counties), and for the rest of his life he held a series of appointments as a judge. He became judge of the Johnstown District (Leeds and Grenville) in 1837 and of the Eastern District in 1842; after the abolition of the districts in 1849 he continued as judge of the united counties of Stormont, Dundas, and Glengarry until his death. He was also appointed judge of the Surrogate Court of Stormont, Dundas, and Glengarry in 1858.

At various times he held a number of other public offices. He was collector of customs at Cornwall, 1836–41, and was twice, in 1835–36 and 1840, president of the board of police of Cornwall.

In the general election of 1836 he was elected as a Conservative to the House of Assembly of Upper Canada for Cornwall Town (there not being any constitutional barriers preventing a judge from sitting in the assembly), but did not stand for re-election in 1841. During the period of the rebellions of 1837–38 he commanded a body of cavalry troops attached to the 1st Regiment of Stormont militia, as captain (1838) and major (1839). In 1850 he succeeded to the command of the regiment as lieutenant-colonel but he resigned in the same year, retaining his rank.

Jarvis married first Julia, daughter of Adiel SHERWOOD, sheriff of the Johnstown District, and second, Anna Maria Mountain, daughter of the Reverend Salter Jehoshaphat Mountain*, Church of England rector in Cornwall. There were ten children of the first marriage, and three of the second.

J. K. JOHNSON

PAC, RG 9, I, B5, 6; C4, 5; C6, 7; RG 68, 1. James Croil, Dundas; or, a sketch of Canadian history, and more particularly of the county of Dundas, one of the earliest settled counties in Upper Canada (Montreal, 1861). G.B., WO, A list of the officers of the Army and of the Corps of Royal Marines, 1815–17. Armstrong, Handbook of Upper Canadian chronology. Chadwick, Ontarian families, I, 126–33. Dom. ann. reg., 1878. L. H. Irving, Officers of the British forces in Canada during the war of 1812–15 (Welland, Ont., 1908).

JENNINGS, JOHN, Presbyterian clergyman; b. near Glasgow, Scotland, 8 Oct. 1814, son of John Jennings, merchant of Glasgow; d. Toronto, Ont., 25 Feb. 1876.

John Jennings was raised by his maternal grandfather, the Reverend John Tindal (sometimes spelled Tindall), secession Presbyterian minister at Cupar, Fife, Scotland. He attended St Andrews University from 1828 to 1831 (receiving no degree), and the Theological Hall of the United Associate Synod. He was ordained by the secession presbytery of Cupar on 11 July 1838 to be a missionary to Canada. The next day he married Margaret Cumming of Cupar.

Jennings arrived in Canada in the fall of 1838, and during the winter of 1838 and 1839 he served as a missionary for the Missionary Presbytery of the Canadas, making extended tours into the area of lakes Simcoe and Huron, and organizing congregations in Vaughan and King townships. On 9 July 1839 he was inducted as minister of the United Associate Church in Toronto (later Bay St Church), where he remained until March 1874. Under his pastorate the congregation grew from seven members to 273, erecting in 1848 a large white-brick Gothic church costing £3,000.

Jennings took an active part in promoting the cause of education in Upper Canada. He was prominent in the agitation for the secularization of the clergy reserves, contributing many articles to the press on the subject, and drafting a petition sent to the British House of Commons 13 Feb. 1840 from the Canadian Synod of the United Associate Presbyterian Church calling for the secularization of the reserves for educational purposes. Again, in 1848, while moderator of the Synod of the United Presbyterian Church in Canada, he led in petitioning the government of Canada to devote the proceeds of the clergy reserves to educational purposes. A strong supporter of Robert Baldwin*'s university bill and of free public schools, and a firm believer in the complete separation of church and state, he opposed any division of the university endowment to provide state support for denominational schools or the establishment of a theological chair in the University of Toronto. He also took a prominent part in organizing the Toronto Society for the Instruction of the Deaf, and Dumb, and the Blind.

Jennings was a member of the Council of Public Instruction for Upper Canada (Ontario) from 1850 to 1875, serving on the standing committee on regulations and textbooks for many years, and working for the establishment of the Toronto Normal School and the Education Office in Toronto. He was also a member of the senate of the University of Toronto from 1851 to 1872, of the committee of the senate for Upper Canada College at various times during these years, and a trustee of the Toronto Grammar School. In the United Presbyterian Church, he took an interest in theological education, home and foreign missions, the union of the various Presbyterian bodies in Canada, and pensions for the widows and children of deceased ministers. He was editor in Toronto of the Canadian Presbyterian Magazine from 1851 to 1854. In the Canada Presbyterian Church formed in 1861, he served as a member of various standing committees, including those for the Kankakee Mission and the Home and Foreign Record of the Canada Presbyterian Church (Toronto), for both of which he was convener. He was a member of the senate of Knox College, and a lecturer there in 1867. He received an honorary Doctor of Divinity from New York University in 1857 and was the author of two books.

Jennings was described as a kindly, genial man, of strong physique, liberal in his views, and honest and wise in his judgement. He died in 1876 survived by his wife and five children.

C. GLENN LUCAS

John Jennings was the author of Reason or revelation; or the religion, philosophy, and civilisation of the ancient heathen, contrasted with Christianity and legitimate consequences (Toronto, 1852) and Say no (Toronto, 1865). His papers are in the possession of Douglas Jennings, Toronto.

General Record Office (Edinburgh), Minutes of the Synod of the United Associate Synod of Scotland, 1837–44. UCA, Minutes of the Missionary Synod of Canada, 1843–47; Minutes of the Synod of the United Presbyterian Church in Canada, 1848–61; Minutes of the Synod of the Canada Presbyterian Church, 1861–69; Minutes of the general assembly of the Canada Presbyterian Church, 1870–75; Minutes of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, 1875–80; Minutes of the Presbytery of Toronto, Presbyterian Church in Canada, 1875–80. Banner (Toronto), 1843–48. Canadian Presbyterian Magazine (Toronto), 1851–54. Globe (Toronto), 1876. Presbyterian Record for the Dominion of Canada (Montreal, Toronto), 1876. United Presbyterian Magazine (Edinburgh), 1847–77. United Secession Magazine (Edinburgh), 1833–45. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1888), 462–63. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, 204–5. Documentary history of education in Upper Canada (Hodgins), V, 18; VI, 111; X, 277; XI, 206; XVII, 171.

JOB, THOMAS BULLEY, businessman and politician; b. near Teignmouth, Devon, in 1806, fifth son of John Job and Sarah Bulley; d. in Liverpool, England, 30 Nov. 1878.

Thomas Job's father was one of the founding partners of the firm of Bulley and Job, which had branches in St John's, Newfoundland, and Teignmouth, England; by 1809 the centre of the English branch had moved to Liverpool though strong links were maintained with Devon. The Bulley connection with the firm had ceased by 1839, and in that year four of John Job's sons formed a co-partnership – Samuel and John Jr in Liverpool, and Robert* and Thomas Bulley in St John's. The Liverpool house carried on a considerable timber trade with Canada, but the St John's branch – assuming its present name of Job Brothers and Company – continued its exclusive concern with Newfoundland. Among the largest in 19th-century Newfoundland, the firm supplied extensively for the cod and seal fisheries, and carried on a large export trade with Europe and Brazil.

Both Robert and Thomas Job were active in public affairs. Prominent members of the local merchant society, they were associated with the campaign to gain a constitution for the island – a concession made in 1832. The association is symbolized by Thomas' marriage on 8 July 1834 to Jessy Carson, daughter of one of the most radical agitators for this reform, Dr William Carson*. Job himself was not a radical, however, and from 1846 until his defeat in 1852 he sat in the assembly with the Conservative minority as a member for Trinity Bay, a constituency along the southern shore where his firm did a considerable business. Always a quiet Conservative never associated with the famous political battles of the period, Job was appointed to the council in 1852 and resigned on the introduction of responsible government in 1855.

In 1859 his only son Thomas Raffles Job joined the partnership and, together with the more experienced Stephen Rendell as co-partner and manager, took over the St John's business when his father with the rest of the family (four daughters) moved to Liverpool. Thomas Raffles joined his father in 1866, and it was another branch of the family which returned to run the Newfoundland business later in the century. Thomas Bulley Job became prominent in Liverpool as a town councillor from 1858 to 1864, and as a borough justice and member of the Dock Board. There, as in St John's, however, the activity of the firm was of more lasting importance than its senior partner.

J. K. Hiller

Newfoundlander (St John's), 12 Dec. 1878. Gunn, Political history of Nfld., 129, 198. R. B. Job, John Job's family: a story of his ancestors and successors and their business connections with Newfoundland and Liverpool, 1730 to 1953 ([2nd ed.,] St John's, [1954]), 33–47, 117, 119.

JOHNSON, WILLIAM ARTHUR, Church of England clergyman, biologist, and educator; b. 10 March 1816 at or near Bombay, India, the second son of Lieutenant-Colonel John Johnson and Dederika Memlingh; m. in the parish of Dunn, Upper Canada, 13 Dec. 1836, Laura Eliza Jukes; d. in Yorkville (now in Toronto, Ont.), 29 Dec. 1880.

Colonel Johnson retired from active service in 1819. His son William Arthur was educated at Addiscombe Military College at Croydon, near London, England. He was destined for the army, but abandoned that career, and in 1835 migrated with his father to Upper Canada to a settlement being formed near Port Maitland.

In his early twenties William Johnson became aware of the pressing need for Church of England clergymen in the colony. In 1848, when he was living in Yorkville, he was interviewed by Bishop John Strachan*. Strachan considered him " a very fine lad," and encouraged him to attend the Diocesan Theological Institution at Cobourg where A. N. Bethune was principal. Johnson did so, was ordained deacon on 26 Oct. 1851, and admitted to the priesthood on 10 Oct. 1852.

Meanwhile, in 1848, Dr James Bovell had arrived in Toronto from the West Indies to practise medicine. Possibly he and Johnson had previously known each other for on 3 Sept. 1848 Bovell stood godfather to Johnson's second son, Arthur Jukes, and his third son was named James Bovell. Both men were skilled in the use of the microscope, and had similar interests, including religion; their close friendship continued for the rest of their lives.

After his ordination as deacon Johnson was appointed officiating minister at Scarborough. The next year he was sent to Cobourg, and remained there until March 1855. Returning to Yorkville, he assisted the minister of St Paul's, John George Delhoste MacKenzie, and agreed to act as assistant minister for one year. His appointment as minister of St Paul's was discussed but a few members of the congregation threatened to leave if Johnson was retained. An appeal was made to Bishop Strachan, who recommended that Johnson withdraw and appointed him incumbent of Weston. Johnson's removal to the village of Weston might be considered a demotion, but it afforded him scope to develop the talents by which he is chiefly remembered: the founding in 1865 of a well-known Canadian residential school, Trinity College School; and the guiding of one of its pupils, William (later Sir William) Osler*, into the field of scientific research.

In the early 1860s Johnson, with three sons to educate, started a small school for boys in Weston, at his own expense. In 1864 he proposed that it be placed under the control of the University of Trinity College and be known as the Trinity College School. Trinity agreed, appointed a headmaster, Charles Howard Badgley, and left Johnson to be responsible for the finances. The school, opened in May 1865 with nine pupils, was modelled on an English public school: the main subjects were classics and mathematics, and prefects were appointed from among the senior boys. Johnson taught French, drawing, and painting, without remuneration. The most popular sport was cricket.

Johnson's connection with the school was brief, ending in 1868 when the school was moved to Port Hope. The number on the roll from 1865 to 1869 was 131. The medical director of the school was Bovell, and he and Johnson, usually accompanied by William Osler who was one of the prefects, spent parts of many weekends at Weston collecting and mounting specimens for microscopic study. Throughout his life, Osler acknowledged that a large part of his success was due to the influence and friendship of Bovell and Johnson.

Johnson was also a hard-working and devoted pastor, and won the respect and affection of the majority of his congregations. However, because of his ritualistic views and practices he incurred the hostility of a small but vocal and determined number. For his part Johnson was outspoken and as determined as his opponents; he appears to have enjoyed the controversies which were occasioned by what his bishop called "errors in judgment."

Both Johnson's parents were artists of some note, and his inheritance of their artistic ability may be seen from his paintings, sketches, and wood-carving. A cabinet, Johnson's handiwork, containing a large number of his slides, is on view in the Academy of Medicine in Toronto.

George W. Spragge

PAO, Strachan letter books, 1844–49, 8316. Anglican Church of Canada, Toronto Diocesan Archives, W. A. Johnson file, W. A. Johnson to Bishop Arthur Sweatman, 6 June 1879. Trinity College Archives (Toronto), Corporation minutes, 1850–68, 40, 52, 83, 324, 338–39. A narrative of certain circumstances which took place at St Paul's Church, Yorkville; to which are appended all the correspondence and papers, which came to hand during the unhappy discussion (Toronto, 1856). University of Trinity College, Toronto, Calendar, 1865–68. Canadian Churchman (Toronto), 14 Oct. 1852. Church (Toronto), 30 Oct. 1851. Harvey Cushing, The life of Sir William Osler (2v., Oxford, 1925). F. K. Dalton, "The Reverend William Arthur Johnson, clergyman, artist, architect, scientist, teacher, 1816–1880," Can. Church Hist. Soc. J. (Toronto), VIII (1966), 2–15. C. E. Dolman, "The Reverend James Bovell, M.D., 1817–1880," in Pioneers of Canadian science, ed. G. F. G. Stanley (Royal Society of Canada "Studia Varia" series, IX, Toronto, 1966), 81–100. J. B. Elliot, "The Johnson cabinets in the Osler collection at the Academy of Medicine," and N. B. Gwyn, "The early life of Sir William Osler," in International Association of Medical Museums, Bulletin IX, and Journal of Technical Methods (Montreal, 1926), 465–69, 109–49. [A. J. Johnson], "T.C.S. history, reminiscences of Dr A. Jukes Johnson (1865)," Trinity College School Record (Port Hope, Ont.), XLIII (1940), 45–50.

JOHNSTON, GEORGE MOIR, surgeon; b. 10 Oct. 1817 in Pictou, N.S., son of Dr George Johnston and his wife Sarah Hatton; d. at his residence, Hillside, in Pictou, 17 Jan. 1877. He married Sarah Mortimer Smith, daughter of George Smith, merchant and MLA for Pictou County, 1836–40; they had four sons and one daughter.

George Moir Johnston attended the University of Aberdeen in Scotland, where his father had been educated, and was admitted to the Royal College of Surgeons of England on 1 June 1838. Returning to Pictou, he established a medical practice, which he continued for 38 years. On 15 April 1841 Dr Johnston was appointed health officer for Pictou;

he was also on the Board of Health for that town. Pictou was then one of the most important ports in the province and its health officials sometimes had to care for sick and poverty-stricken immigrants. From 1843 to 1865 he served as surgeon to the 1st Regiment of Pictou County militia, and then as surgeon to the Militia Artillery Brigade. In 1867 he was elected one of the officers of the Pictou County Rifle Association.

Dr Johnston was a founding member of the Medical Society of Nova Scotia in 1854 and served as first president of the Pictou County Medical Society in 1864. He was a delegate to the Dominion Medical Association at Montreal in September 1868; the next year he was a member of the council of the Medical Society of Nova Scotia.

He took a deep interest in the advancement of agriculture and horticulture, and was an enthusiastic patron of the arts and sciences in Pictou County. When the Pictou Literary and Scientific Society was formed in 1834 he was one of the founding members. He was prominent in the freemasons, having been an officeholder in the New Caledonia Lodge of Pictou, where he was associated with Simon Hugh Holmes* who became premier of Nova Scotia, James MacDonald*, later chief justice, and Edmund Mortimer McDonald, of the Eastern Chronicle.

Phyllis R. Blakeley

PANS, Pictou County, death certificates for the quarter ending 31 March 1877; "Distinguished Pictonians of New Caledonia Lodge," compiled by E. T. Bliss, 1960; Halifax Medical Society, Minutes, 1853–61; Nova Scotia Medical Society, Minutes, 1861–68; "Pictou County Cemeteries' list," compiled by H. C. Ritchie, 1951, 1956. Colonial Standard (Pictou, N.S.), 23 Jan. 1877.

JOHNSTON, JAMES WILLIAM (the name is sometimes written Johnstone, but he signed Johnston), lawyer, politician, and judge; b. 29 Aug. 1792 in Jamaica; d. 21 Nov. 1873 at Cheltenham, England.

In the mid-18th century, James W. Johnston's grandfather, Dr Lewis Johnston, emigrated from Scotland to Georgia, where he became treasurer and president of the council at Savannah. Dr Johnston and his sons fought for the crown during the Revolutionary War and, in defeat, fled the colony. William Martin Johnston and his bride, Elizabeth Lichtenstein, eventually settled in Jamaica, where their youngest son, James William, was born. At the age of ten, the boy went to Scotland for several years' education under carefully selected tutors. In 1808, shortly after his father's death, James rejoined his mother and other members of the family in Nova Scotia. He settled at Annapolis Royal with his sister, Elizabeth, and her husband, Thomas Ritchie, a member of the provincial assembly. Ritchie assumed the role of James' guardian, placed him in his law office as a clerk, and enrolled him under his command in the local militia during the War of 1812. When he reached his maturity in 1813, James gained admission to the Nova Scotia bar and began practising law in Kentville.

Shortly after the restoration of peace in 1815, Mrs Johnston, who wished apparently to regain in Nova Scotia the prominence which the family had had in Georgia, brought James to live with her at Birch Cove on the outskirts of Halifax. James entered into a law partnership with Simon Bradstreet Robie*, then provincial secretary and speaker of the House of Assembly. Johnston was an imposing figure – over six feet tall, thin, with a Grecian nose, black hair and eyes, a large mouth, a well-defined chin, and skin which showed "a tint of the tropics." In 1821 he married Amelia Elizabeth Almon, daughter of an influential Halifax doctor.

At this time young Johnston appeared quick-tempered, proud and rash. Soon after arriving in Halifax he reacted to certain courtroom remarks of Charles Rufus Fairbanks* by challenging the man to a duel and then shooting him in the foot, allegedly to end his rival's dancing career. Johnston's letters from these years, however, indicate that he was experiencing deep intellectual and emotional turmoil. After a brief enthusiasm for Enlightenment rationalism, he moved increasingly towards a strong religious faith, perhaps influenced by his mother. Contacts with a group of evangelicals active in the Anglican community of Halifax were equally stimulating. Johnston began meeting on Sunday afternoons with other young members of the social élite for prayers, scripture reading, and hymn singing. He joined the Poor Man's Friend Society to work as a "visitor" among the destitute of Halifax.

In 1824 a crisis erupted in St Paul's, Halifax's Anglican cathedral, when Bishop John Inglis* blocked efforts to place the evangelically minded John Thomas Twining* in the recently vacated rectorship. Johnston was swept into the centre of the controversy when the parishioners of St Paul's called upon him to plead their case against the bishop in the Court of Chancery. The court upheld the bishop, but could not prevent a mass defection from St Paul's. Most of the dissidents withdrew to St George's Anglican church, but a small minority, including Johnston, set out in search of a new allegiance. They tried to establish a proprietary chapel, independent of the bishop, with Twining as their pastor, but Twining refused to sanction this defiance of ecclesiastical authority and left his erstwhile disciples to drift uncomfortably among Halifax's dissenting congregations. Their isolation ended in 1827 when Edmund A. Crawley*, who had studied law under Johnston, returned from Massachusetts with two leading Baptist clerics from Newton Theological Seminary. These men impressed Johnston and the others so favourably that they agreed to establish a Baptist church on Granville Street and appointed one of the men from Boston, Alexis Caswell, their first pastor.

The Granville Street converts quickly emerged as leaders among the Baptists. They provided recruits for the ministry, founded a newspaper, the Christian Messenger, and launched a drive to improve educational standards throughout the Baptist community. J. W. Johnston helped found an education society in 1828, and assisted in the management of the academy which was built that same year in the Annapolis valley. In 1841 he was instrumental in helping secure a charter for Queen's (Acadia) College at Wolfville, and sat on the new institution's board of governors.

Meanwhile, Johnston's career was steadily advancing. He was closely tied to Halifax's expanding business community, and belonged to a number of commercial societies. In 1832 he joined several of the capital's leading merchants in forming the Bank of Nova Scotia to break the monopoly of the Halifax Banking Company. In 1834 Johnston secured the appointment of provincial solicitor general, and in the late 1830s he began building, on the Dartmouth side of Halifax harbour, an estate, Mount Amelia, named in memory of his recently deceased wife.

At this point Johnston's career began to be influenced by the provincial reform movement, which, under Joseph Howe's leadership, was starting to undermine the oligarchic power structure. In 1837 the British government, in response to the assembly's demands for change, dissolved the Council of Twelve and created separate Executive and Legislative councils. Because of his qualifications as a skilled administrator, a confidant of the business community, and a champion of the province's leading dissenting sect, Johnston was named to both councils. In the Legislative Council he occasionally supported the forces of change in the province, as when he urged that dissenters receive an equitable share of school lands which had been set aside for the Church of England. From time to time Johnston proposed other limited changes, always in the name of greater administrative efficiency. Only once did he decisively break from his normal pragmatic approach. He was a member of the Nova Scotia delegation which visited Lord Durham (John George Lambton*) in Quebec during the autumn of 1838. Johnston returned to Nova Scotia an advocate of Durham's plan for the legislative union of British North America, which he persistently urged against the almost universal hostility of his colleagues.

Johnston's reservations about Joseph Howe's programme for reform remained private until 1840 when three years of agitation culminated in the assembly's demand for the recall of the governor, Colin Campbell*. Johnston's sense of duty drove him to speak out against what he considered an unjustified attack on the representative of the crown. On 30 March 1840 he angrily lectured Howe on the folly of political extremism. Johnston opposed responsible government, maintaining that Nova Scotia, which lacked England's social balance, could not successfully adopt the mother country's constitutional practices. He predicted that responsible government would destroy all prospects for administrative excellence by ushering in an era of "party struggling against party" for nothing but naked power.

The speech revealed the extent to which Johnston held to the traditional values of the old regime. His views reflected those prevailing in English ruling circles, and he was one of the first consulted by Governor Poulett Thomson*, who came to Halifax in July 1840 in search of a settlement to the crisis. Thomson's discussions with various leaders resulted in a compromise. Demands for the immediate granting of responsible government were set aside, and Howe and Johnston agreed to work together in a coalition Executive Council which would attempt to find solutions for pressing popular grievances.

Johnston's decision to cooperate with Howe set him apart from Tory die-hards; the gap widened as the exigencies of trying to keep the coalition together forced him to modify his anti-democratic sentiments. During an 1842 constitutional debate Johnston, who had been appointed attorney general in April 1841, agreed that no executive could govern in defiance of the expressed wishes of an assembly majority. Although he still urged that institutions must be "moulded and tempered according to the circumstances of the country," Johnston now recognized the need to make concessions to public opinion. The attorney general's change of position drew a tart comment from the Pictou Observer: "Alas! we find him today a schismatic – tomorrow the advocate of Conservatism – and the third day, he shines forth as the brilliant champion of Responsible Government."

Johnston's conciliatory attitude failed to secure harmony between Reformers and Tories. Howe's administrative reforms aroused the ire of vested interests, and the two factions were soon struggling for ascendancy. By 1843 enmity and mistrust so permeated the Executive Council that it was virtually useless as a decision-making body. Amid this confusion Johnston strove to preserve a position of neutrality and keep the coalition alive. He held aloof from ultra-Tory agitation and consistently supported the government's programme of administrative reconstruction.

If Johnston felt any uneasiness about Howe's intentions he kept these doubts to himself and might never have broken his silence had not Howe, during the 1843 legislative session, supported William Annand*'s motion to withdraw provincial grants from sectarian colleges and devote public funds to the creation of one non-denominational university. This move placed Acadia College in jeopardy, thereby providing the Tory-leaning Baptist leaders with a cry which could rally their rank and file against all Howe's policies. During that same session Howe had announced his intention to push ahead toward full responsible government, including "the formation of a cabinet composed of heads of departments." Johnston interpreted this as a demand for party government, and in a memorandum to the governor he argued that implementation of Howe's policies would introduce rule by political factions and "lead to the oppressive and corrupting use of patronage." The attorney general insisted that the executive power must be shared among a variety of groups acting in a coalition if abuses were to be avoided.

Fears of political dislocation and the introduction of a "godless" system of higher education finally persuaded Johnston to abandon non-partisanship. He attended the June 1843 annual meeting of the Baptist Association in Yarmouth, and delivered a rousing indictment of Reformers and their educational policies. Endorsed by the clergy, Johnston and Edmund Crawley held "educational meetings" throughout central and western Nova Scotia to rally popular support. By early autumn Howe was defending his anti-sectarian policies, and provincial newspapers teemed with arguments on higher education. Seeing his executive advisers out stumping in opposition to one another, a dismayed Governor Falkland [Lucius Bentinck Cary*] ordered dissolution of the assembly on 26 Oct. 1843 in the hope that an election might clear the air. Johnston greeted the news by resigning from the Legislative Council and entering the active political arena as candidate for Annapolis County. Simultaneously, the attorney general and his religious allies broadened the basis of their campaign by attacking "party government." This shift brought them the support of Halifax Tories and other traditional foes of Howe. These allies apparently thought that with Johnston leading a sizeable bloc of votes in the new assembly, the pace of change could be slowed or made more amenable to their interests.

Johnston's strategic objectives in the campaign appeared to be maintenance of the status quo. The impossibility of stabilizing the situation on the basis of the 1840 compromise quickly became apparent, however. In December 1843, as final election returns were coming in, Governor Falkland was impolitic enough to appoint Mather Byles ALMON, a Tory and Johnston's brother-in-law, to the Executive and Legislative councils. Howe, James Boyle Uniacke*, and James McNab denounced the appointment as an intolerable display of favouritism toward the attorney general, and resigned from the coalition.

When the house met in 1844, Johnston assumed leadership of the "rump" administration and, after a hectic three weeks' debate, staved off an opposition non-confidence motion by a two-vote margin. The assembly's decision was essentially negative, more a hesitant withholding of support from Howe than an enthusiastic endorsement of Johnston. Recognizing this, Johnston tried to strengthen his position by negotiating for restoration of an all-party coalition. The opposition refused to cooperate. For three years Johnston struggled to maintain his slim majority. Although weak and generally indecisive, his government did enact a compromise settlement which preserved the principle of state-supported sectarian colleges, brought in a series of minor administrative reforms, authorized surveys for a Halifax to Quebec railway, and passed a simultaneous voting act decreeing that future elections take place on the same day throughout the province. Perhaps more significantly, Johnston used this period to consolidate his leadership, transforming the loose coalition of his supporters into a disciplined party with considerable popular support. Each autumn found him on the hustings trying to rally electoral support behind the gradualist policies of his administration. After a last futile attempt to reactivate the all-party coalition in 1846, Johnston secured dissolution of the assembly from the new governor, Sir John Harvey*, and led the Conservatives into an election.

Through a long, bitter campaign Johnston stumped the province, uttering dire warnings that Howe had abandoned the coalition ideal for "a system pregnant with all the elements of anarchy." Political antagonisms became intertwined with religious feelings as Conservative spokesmen, including Johnston, raised the cry of "Catholic Ascendancy," alleging that the Liberal party's Irish allies were plotting Protestantism's destruction. Racial tensions further confused the issues, and just before the campaign closed Halifax witnessed a minor riot between Negro Conservatives and Irish Liberals. Voting took place on 5 Aug. 1847, and as returns trickled in it became apparent that the Liberals had won, although their margin of victory remained uncertain. Johnston refused to accept this result as a clear mandate for change and stayed in office in the hope of reconstructing the coalition. Early in 1848 the assembly decisively voted non-confidence in the administration; Johnston resigned immediately.

Following the government's defeat, Governor Harvey offered to help his ex-attorney general find a place in the imperial service, but the idea quickly died, probably because Johnston had no desire to leave the province. Despite loss of office, his professional skills and business connections in Halifax provided him with position and material comfort. In addition, he had just settled into Mount Amelia with his new wife, Louisa Pryor Wentworth. He had not, moreover, appeared to enjoy being a partisan politician; certainly his temperament was not suited to the role. Volatile pride and a rather humourless sense of propriety made him vulnerable to criticism. Within the assembly Johnston's supporters found him aloof and withdrawn; he went into company rarely and then almost exclusively among Halifax's élite. He did keep his assembly seat, however, perhaps because of his sense of mission, his ambition, and an irascible refusal to admit defeat.

Johnston's early efforts as opposition leader were devoted to a defence of the existing social order. For example, he opposed any extension of the franchise for fear that influence be given to an "inferior class," who were without property and irresponsible. Although consistently conservative in motivation, Johnston frequently advocated radical measures. He urged replacement of the appointed Legislative Council and appointed justices of the peace by an elected upper house and elected municipal councils. He ultimately emerged as an advocate of manhood suffrage. Yet this zeal for franchise reform resulted from his conclusion that the rate-paying franchise was unsatisfactory because it could be used by the executive to manipulate the electorate to its own advantage. He openly predicted that an elected upper house would curb "the surges of popular opinion." Thus Johnston's principal objective in urging these changes was to hobble the reform-dominated Executive Council by decentralizing authority and restoring what he described as a "just balance" of power among the various branches of government.

Not surprisingly, the electorate did not regard Johnston as a champion of reform. He did briefly stir popular enthusiasm in the mid-1850s, when, as present worthy patriarch of the temperance movement, he rallied a bipartisan group of assemblymen behind a prohibition measure. The bill failed in its last stages because of Johnston's unwillingness to include Annapolis valley cider in the ban.

Railways preoccupied most Nova Scotians through the 1850s. Johnston emerged as a voice of caution, criticizing many suggested construction schemes and refusing to support a line from Halifax to Quebec without imperial financial backing. Early in the decade he appeared to favour a form of commercial union with the United States as the surest guarantee of provincial economic expansion. If railways must be built, he urged a line from Halifax to Windsor as a first step towards linking Nova Scotia and the New England states in an all-steam transportation system. In 1850 Johnston attended the Portland railway conference and pledged his support to an overland rail line from Maine to Nova Scotia [see POOR].

Shortly after the return of the delegates from Portland, Howe announced that a shortage of private capital necessitated government construction of Nova Scotia's section. Johnston immediately attacked Howe's policy, predicting that public railways would be ruinously expensive and patronage-ridden. Sectional and monied interests rallied to the Conservatives during the 1851 election, weakening the Liberal majority and delaying the start of construction. Meanwhile, Johnston had opened negotiations with William Jackson, agent of an English engineering firm involved in several North American rail projects, including the Grand Trunk. In 1853 Johnston announced that British capital was ready to finance railways in Nova Scotia and the assembly moved to suspend Howe's policy and await a firm offer from Jackson's principals.

The opposition leader appeared to have triumphed, and in September 1853 he and Jackson attended a railway celebration in Saint John, N.B., where Johnston boasted that modern means of transportation would enrich the British North American colonies and ultimately "unite them by iron bands into one great confederation." The bubble of optimism burst within weeks, however, when Jackson withdrew his offers, arguing that disturbed conditions in Europe made it impossible to secure the necessary private capital. The assembly met in 1854 and Howe easily gained permission to proceed with his plan. The affair seriously undermined Conservative unity and morale and led the Novascotian to comment that Johnston had "been used – sucked dry – and then thrown aside like a dry orange."

The opposition leader was again roused by the 1854 reciprocity treaty which threw open Nova Scotia's coastal fisheries to the Americans. Johnston told the assembly that this was a virtually gratuitous surrender of provincial resources resulting from Nova Scotia's isolation and consequent weakness. He used the occasion to reiterate his belief that the province's destiny lay in a union of British North America which would have an "acknowledged national character" and the strength to resist absorption into the United States. Johnston also advocated union as a means of escaping the rancour and corruption which had plagued local politics since the coming of responsible government.

The province continued to grumble about the reciprocity treaty but no support materialized for Johnston's union proposals. People increasingly tended to discuss the opposition leader as "the old man malignant" clinging to impractical and lost causes "like grim death to a dead nigger." After a disastrous Conservative showing in the 1855 election, Johnston announced that the "infirmities of age" had persuaded him to "leave the trials and responsibilities of statesmanship in the hands of more youthful and vigorous men." It was widely assumed that the informal mantle of party leadership had passed to Charles Tupper*, the newly elected member from Cumberland.

Johnston's status remained uncertain through the succeeding months of intrigue as religious antagonisms aroused by the Crimean War eroded the strength of William Young*'s Liberal administration. In 1857 the bloc of Roman Catholic assemblymen shifted their allegiance over to the Conservatives, and Johnston, who had just completed a successful courtroom defence of the Irish navvies accused of murder in the Gourley Shanty religious riots, returned to take office as attorney general and head of the new government. His leadership seems to have been nominal: he failed to prevent wholesale political purges in the civil service, and appears to have largely surrendered control of patronage to Tupper. Nevertheless, Johnston played a major role in terminating the General Mining Company's coal monopoly in Nova Scotia. After journeying to England and negotiating a preliminary agreement with the company in 1857, he returned to pilot a settlement through the assembly. Suspicions that Johnston, as the company's ex-solicitor, might have betrayed provincial interests were unfounded: a Liberal, Adams G. Archibald*, had participated in the negotiations and fully concurred in the terms.

The year 1859 brought another fierce electoral contest from which the Liberals emerged as apparent victors. As in 1847, Johnston refused to resign, maintaining that several of the Liberals were legally disqualified from sitting in the assembly. His critics, probably with cause, saw this as a desperate attempt to stay in power until the aged Sir Brenton Halliburton* died and cleared the path for Johnston's promotion to chief justice. After months of squabbling the Conservatives were driven from office. William Young, who became premier, shared Johnston's ambitions for the bench and shortly succeeded Halliburton. With unconcealed fury Johnston proclaimed the moral bankruptcy of responsible government in Nova Scotia.

Three years later, in 1863, Charles Tupper engineered a campaign which virtually annihilated a demoralized Liberal party, and the Conservatives returned to office under Johnston's nominal leadership. The new government had been formed amidst a renewed interest in colonial union, especially a union of the Maritime provinces. Early in 1864 Johnston told the assembly, "I look at a union of the Lower Provinces as a step toward a larger one. I have never favoured a union of the provinces by way of federation, for it did not appear to tend to the great object we had in view. What we want is to produce a real unity – make the parts that are now separate a homogeneous whole – give them a oneness of existence and purpose." A few weeks later he published a letter reiterating his preference for a legislative union, but saying that he was prepared to accept federation as a temporary expedient.

In May 1864 Johnston retired to the bench. Tupper's intention to create a second chief-justiceship had been blocked by the Liberals in the Legislative Council with the result that Johnston accepted office as judge-in-equity, a position subordinate to William Young. This appointment prevented him from actively participating in the conferences leading to confederation, but in 1867 he made several grand-jury addresses appealing for the calm acceptance of membership in the new dominion. His partisanship was rewarded in 1873 when John A. Macdonald* proposed that Johnston succeed Howe as Nova Scotia's lieutenant governor. The old man, who was in France at the time, initially accepted the offer. In June 1873, however, he wrote Tupper from London saying that poor health prevented his assuming new official duties. Johnston died in England a few months later.

In many ways Johnston always remained a figure of the old regime, adhering to an 18th-century view of society as a hierarchical order based on property rights. At the same time, however, evangelical zeal, which made him an ardent advocate of mankind's spiritual redemption, enabled him to go beyond the oligarchy and become a spokesman for alienated dissent. When he entered politics in the 1840s he drew together disparate interests into an alliance which ultimately emerged as the Conservative party. Under Johnston's leadership, party policy hovered precariously between reaction and reform. He never fully committed the Conservatives to responsible government, being more concerned to spread his view that Nova Scotia's prospects depended on her entry into a larger economic and political entity. After a brief flirtation with New England, he returned, in the mid-1850s, to his conviction that British North American union offered the best avenue for escape from provincial isolation and political frustration. Johnston, as a survivor of the old regime, could well have seen confederation as a final triumph over the volatile local democracy which had so disrupted his public career.

D. A. Sutherland

PANS, Pierce Stevens Hamilton diary, 1861–78; James W. Johnston letters; Johnstone family papers; Simon Bradstreet Robie papers; Sir Charles Tupper papers; White family papers; Halifax Poor Man's Friend Society, Proceedings, 1820–26. PRO, CO 217/175; CO 218/115, 218/116, 218/119, 218/125.

Nova Scotia, House of Assembly, Debates and proceedings, 1856–61, 1864; Journals and proceedings, 1836–64; Legislative Council, Journals of the proceedings, 1836–43. [Joseph Howe], Speeches and letters (Chisholm). [E. L. Johnston], Recollections of a Georgia loyalist, ed. A. W. Eaton (New York and London, 1901). J. W. Johnston Jr, The Crawley memorial address . . . June 4, 1889 (Halifax, 1889). Commercial Society, Rules and regulations (Halifax, 1822). Society for the Encouragement of Trade and Manufactures, Rules and regulations with a list of subscribers (Halifax, 1838). E. M. Saunders, A sketch of the origin and history of the Granville Street Baptist Church (Halifax, 1877). Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 1850–73. British Colonist (Halifax), 1849–73. Christian Messenger (Halifax), 1840–73. Halifax Morning Post, 1840–48. Novascotian (Halifax), 1836–73. Pictou Observer, 1842. Royal Gazette (Halifax), 1838. Times (Halifax), 1840–48. Directory of N.S. MLAs (Fergusson).

Beck, Government of N.S. W. A. Calnek, History of the county of Annapolis . . ., ed. and completed by A. W. Savary (Toronto, 1897), and A. W. Savary, Supplement to the history of the county of Annapolis . . . (Toronto, 1913). Harris, Church of Saint Paul. G. E. Levy, The Baptists of the Maritime provinces, 1753–1946 (Saint John, N.B., 1946). R. S. Longley, Acadia University, 1838–1938 (Wolfville, N.S., 1939). MacNutt, Atlantic provinces. Martin, Empire and commonwealth. Saunders, Three premiers of N.S. [Charles Tupper], The life and letters of the Rt. Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, ed. E. M. Saunders (2v., London, 1916).

J. M. Beck, "The Nova Scotian 'Disputed Election' of 1859 and its aftermath," CHR, XXXVI (1955), 293–315. John Doull, "Four attorney-generals," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXVII (1947), 1–16. D. C. Harvey, "The age of faith in Nova Scotia," RSCT, 3rd ser., XL (1946), sect.II, 1–20; "The intellectual awakening of Nova Scotia," Dal. Rev., XIII (1933–34), 1–22. G. W. Hill, "History of St. Paul's Church," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., III (1883), 13–70. W. R. Livingston, Responsible government in Nova Scotia: a study of the constitutional beginnings of the British Commonwealth (University of Iowa studies in the social sciences, ed. Louis Pelzer, IX, no.1, Iowa City, 1930). Peter Lynch, "Early reminiscences of Halifax – men who have passed from us," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XVI (1912), 171–204. D. J. McDougall, "Lord John Russell and the Canadian crisis, 1837–1841," CHR, XXII (1941), 369–88. J. Y. Payzant, "James William Johnston, first premier of Nova Scotia under responsible government," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XVI (1912), 61–92. M. C. Ritchie, "The beginnings of a Canadian family," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXIV (1938), 135–54. Benjamin Russell, "Reminiscences of the Nova Scotia judiciary," Dal. Rev., V (1925–26), 499–512. Norah Story, "The church and state 'party' in Nova Scotia, 1749–1851," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXVII (1947), 33–57.

JUCHEREAU DUCHESNAY, ELZÉAR-HENRI (also called Henri-Elzéar), lawyer, seigneur, legislative councillor, and senator; b. 19 July 1809 at Beauport, son of Antoine-Louis Juchereau* Duchesnay, seigneur of Beauport, and of Marie-Louise Fleury de La Gorgendière; d. 12 May 1871 at Sainte-Marie-de-la-Beauce and buried in the parish church.

After receiving an excellent education within his family and through lessons from skilful tutors, Elzéar-Henri Juchereau Duchesnay completed his legal training and was called to the bar on 10 Jan. 1832. He married for the first time on 24 July 1834, and went to live at Sainte-Marie-de-la-Beauce, where his wife, Julie Perrault, daughter of Jean-Baptiste-Olivier Perrault*, bore him three children. At her death, on 22 Aug. 1838, she bequeathed to him part of the Sainte-Marie seigneury. Having been appointed stipendiary magistrate for the district of Montreal on 22 July 1839, then police magistrate on 8 April 1840, Juchereau Duchesnay took up residence at Sainte-Marie-de-Monnoir. But in 1843 he returned to the practice of law at Quebec. On 17 June 1844, he married his first wife's cousin, Élisabeth-Suzanne, daughter of the Honourable Jean-Thomas Taschereau* and sister of Cardinal Elzéar-Alexandre Taschereau*, and this marriage brought him back to Sainte-Marie-de-la-Beauce. They had seven children who, like their descendants, made their mark in the society of the time; one son was Charles-Edmond*, who was superintendent of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in British Columbia.

In 1846, having received military training during his youth, Juchereau Duchesnay became lieutenant-colonel of the Dorchester, the 4th militia battalion of his region. His sympathies were with the Conservative party, and on 29 Sept. 1856 he was elected legislative councillor for the Lauzon division; he remained a councillor until confederation, and on 23 Oct. 1867 was named to the Senate of the dominion.

He was a great philanthropist, and a promoter and benefactor of education. The guerre des éteignoirs [see MEILLEUR] raged in his parish, as it had elsewhere since 1846, and the local school commission broke up, leaving education in utter neglect. On 28 Aug. 1849 Juchereau Duchesnay addressed to Lord Elgin [Bruce*] a petition signed by 42 notables requesting a new school commission for the village. On 24 September the governor replied favourably. The promoter of the commission, having become its president, assumed the thankless task of reviving the schools; he undertook all the correspondence with the superintendent of education, and personally drafted the contracts of appointment with the schoolmistresses. Louis PROULX, who became priest of the parish in 1851, gave him strong support. The two "friends of education" succeeded in putting 15 schools into operation again, and the report of the superintendent for 1855 praised their tireless zeal. In August 1856 Juchereau Duchesnay handed over his responsibilities to his colleague.

Juchereau Duchesnay was also interested in agriculture. At the time the agricultural society of the county was revived, on 23 Feb. 1847, he became president. Le Canadien on 3 Feb. 1864 reported that at an annual meeting he was re-elected. It seems that in the interval he had continued to be president, and that in this way he championed the cause of agriculture in the county for at least 18 years; he was a farmer himself, and as a philanthropist took an interest in the bettering of the occupation of farming.

Juchereau Duchesnay was also mayor of Sainte-Marie-de-la-Beauce from 1868 to 1870. Finally, at his death he was still lieutenant-colonel of the reserve militia, division of La Beauce. At his funeral four farmers carried his coffin.

HONORIUS PROVOST

Archives de la Fabrique Sainte-Marie (Beauce, Qué.), Papiers des écoles. ANQ, QBC, Instruction publique, 28, 29, 35, 36, 37, 41, 42, 43, 50, 51, 55, 62, 64. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1856, app.16, "Report of the superintendent of education for Lower Canada for 1855." Le Canadien (Québec), 3 févr. 1864. La Gazette des familles acadiennes et canadiennes (Québec), 15 juin 1871. Honorius Provost, Sainte-Marie de la Nouvelle-Beauce; histoire religieuse (Québec, 1967). P.-G. Roy, La famille Juchereau Duchesnay (Lévis, 1903); La famille Taschereau (Lévis, 1901).

K

KANE, PAUL (his name is spelled Kean on his baptismal certificate), artist; b. 3 Sept. 1810, probably at Mallow, County Cork, Ireland; d. 20 Feb. 1871 at Toronto, Ont.

Paul Kane was the fifth of eight children born to Michael Kane and Frances Loach. Michael Kane was a native of Preston, Lancashire, England, and served in Captain G. W. Dixon's troop of the Royal Horse Artillery from 1793 to 1801, when he was discharged with the rank of corporal. He had evidently been stationed in Ireland, where he married prior to his discharge. In 1805 he was living in Fermoy, County Cork, but some of his children were born in Mallow. It was repeatedly asserted by Paul Kane and his friends that he was a native of Toronto, but there can be no doubt that he was born in Ireland. About 1819 he immigrated with his parents to York (Toronto), where his father became a wine and spirits merchant.

Paul Kane is supposed to have been a pupil at the Home District grammar school at York though evidence is lacking. Thomas Drury (Drewery), a local painter and the art teacher at Upper Canada College, gave him painting lessons about 1830. When Kane decided to become a professional painter he followed a common practice among North American artists and worked briefly as a sign painter at York. Later he was a decorative painter of furniture in Wilson S. Conger's furniture factory, also at York.

In 1833 he met James Bowman, an American artist then at York, who persuaded him that study in Italy was necessary for an artist aspiring to be competent and professional. However, Kane did not go overseas immediately. He lived in Cobourg from 1834 to 1836, working as a decorative painter in F. S. Clench's furniture factory and painting portraits. His style in these portraits varied greatly. Some, like those of Mrs F. S. Clench and Mrs William Weller (Mercy Willcox), are primitive in approach but have a direct appeal and a warm colouring that make them attractive.

In 1836 Kane went to Detroit, where Bowman was then living; they had intended to go to Italy with Samuel Bell Waugh, an American portraitist who had worked briefly in Toronto. Bowman, however, had married recently, and the trip was again postponed. Instead, Kane remained in the United States and painted portraits for the next five years in Detroit, St Louis, Mobile, New Orleans, and other cities of central United States. None of these works were signed and only one canvas, depicting a ship owner or master with a Mississippi River boat in the background, has been traced to this period.

Kane's passport documents his movements in the next two years. Leaving New Orleans by ship in June 1841, he arrived at Marseilles in September. A brief visit was made to Genoa where he saw his first gallery of old masters, and then he went to Rome for the winter. Along with many British and American art students in Rome he studied at the academies and copied paintings by Murillo, Andrea del Sarto, and Raphael. In the spring of 1842 he and a Scottish artist friend, Hope James Stewart, hiked to Naples. Several authors have stated that Kane went on to North Africa and the Near East but his passport does not bear out this claim. He remained with Stewart in northern Italy from May to September. In Florence Kane sketched the Donatello sculpture on Or San Michele and copied Raphael's "Pope Julius II" in the Palazzo degli Uffizi; in Venice he copied canvases in the Accademia delle Belle Arti. He went north that autumn, going by foot through the Great St Bernard Pass into Switzerland on his way to England. After spending about four days in Paris, he reached London in late October and stayed for the winter, living with an English artist, Stewart Watson.

While in London, Kane met the American artist George Catlin. Catlin was then exhibiting and also lecturing in northern England and at Egyptian Hall in Piccadilly, London, on his paintings of Indians from the American prairies and the foothills of the Rockies. In his book, Letters and notes on the manners, customs and conditions of the North American Indians (London and New York, 1841), published just before Kane's arrival in London, Catlin predicts the early disappearance of the North American Indian because of his contacts with Europeans. Thus, he argues, it is the artist's duty to record his features and customs for posterity, while this is still possible. Kane, obviously inspired by this argument, decided to do in Canada what Catlin had done in the United States. He left London early in 1843, went first to Mobile, Alabama, where he had earlier been a popular artist, and set up a portrait-painting studio in April 1843. After working to repay money he had borrowed for his passage back from Europe, he returned to Toronto in late 1844 or early 1845.

Kane's own later writings record the next four years of his life until 1848. He left Toronto alone on 17 June 1845 with only his portfolio, sketching materials, and gun, intending to travel to the west coast. That summer he painted constantly in the Lake Huron and Lake Michigan region. In his account of the trip, Kane makes particular mention of his visits to the Saugeen Reserve on Lake Huron, to Sault Ste Marie, and to Fox River and Lake Winnebago, west of Lake Michigan. At Manitowaning on Manitoulin Island, he was present at an assembly of 2,000 natives from the whole area when the tribes received their annual presents. Later, at Mackinac Island, he attended an assembly where a payment for lands ceded to the United States government was made. Sketches were made among what Kane described as the Chippewas, Ojibwas, Ottawas, and Potawatomis, and among the Menominees.

A meeting with John Ballenden*, the Hudson's Bay Company chief trader at Sault Ste Marie, changed Kane's immediate plan to continue west beyond the Lake Michigan area. The trader pointed out the difficulties such a trip involved and suggested that he first request assistance from Sir George Simpson*, the superintendent of the HBC in North America. Following this advice, Kane returned to Toronto that autumn and visited Simpson in Montreal. Kane received permission to travel with the company's fur brigades and was promised free lodging at company posts. That winter he remained in Toronto and painted canvases from the previous summer's sketches. The finest of this group are his "Encampment among the islands of Lake Huron" and "Sault Ste Marie."

Kane's second year of sketching began after he overtook the HBC spring fur-trade brigade at Fort William on 24 May 1846. He travelled westward with the fast moving canoes and sketched when they halted at portages. A brief stop at Fort Frances gave him the opportunity to meet Saulteux Indians. A series of sketches illustrating the annual Métis buffalo hunt and also Sioux was made during an excursion south from Upper Fort Garry. Continuing north with the brigade, he spent several weeks at Norway House as a guest of Donald Ross*. He then turned westward with the brigade to follow the Saskatchewan River past

Fort Carlton, where he sketched the Crees, to Fort Pitt. While riding overland from Fort Pitt to Fort Edmonton, he was accompanied by the Reverend Robert Terrill Rundle* and Chief Factor John Rowand*. His party crossed the mountains from Jasper House to the upper Columbia River, which they descended, stopping at Fort Colvile and at Walla Walla. On 8 Dec. 1846 they reached Fort Vancouver (now Vancouver, Washington), the principal HBC post west of the mountains, administered by Peter Skene Ogden* and James DOUGLAS.

Kane made Fort Vancouver his principal base, and from it he journeyed to Oregon City, visited the Clackama Indians, and sketched in the Willamette River valley. On 25 March he left Fort Vancouver to explore the lower Columbia area. He sketched the erupting Mount St Helens, the last active volcano in North America, and was fascinated by the canoe burials on the Cowlitz River and by the various head deformation practices of the Indians farther north.

Kane continued to Fort Victoria and arrived at a time of particular activity. Fort Vancouver was to be abandoned by the HBC when the Oregon country was transferred to the United States, and Fort Victoria was being enlarged to replace it. Here he sketched intensively, at the fort, along the Vancouver Island coastline, and on the mainland down to Puget Sound, among the Haidas and other west coast tribes. Returning to Fort Vancouver on 20 June 1847, he stayed only ten days before beginning the journey back to Toronto.

Along the way, Kane visited the Grand Coulee Lake region around Walla Walla and sketched among the Cayuse, Nez Percés, and other Plateau Indians. At Fort Colvile he was present at a Colville (Kane called them Chualpays) Indian scalp dance, and watched the Indians salmon fishing. The lateness of the season made crossing the mountains difficult and the small party of HBC employees accompanying Kane did not reach Fort Edmonton until December. This was Kane's headquarters until the following summer, providing him with the opportunity to sketch the Indians of the western plains and visit Rocky Mountain House. The Crees especially attracted him and he witnessed their medicine pipe-stem dance and other ceremonials. He left Fort Edmonton on 25 May travelling eastwards with the fall fur-trade brigade led by John Edward Harriott*. At Norway House he joined some British army officers also travelling to Sault Ste Marie. Here he boarded a steamship and reached Toronto in October 1848, after an absence of two and a half years.

Kane was but one of a group of painters who were discovering the emerging west, and several other artists visited the Columbia River during the 1840s. Henry James Warre*, a British army officer, sketched there and at Fort Victoria in 1845. John Mix Stanley, whom Kane had probably met at Detroit in 1836, did considerable work among the Columbia River Indians in 1847 and painted some subjects identical to those chosen by Kane; Kane missed meeting him by only a few days. Father Pierre-Jean DE SMET, a Jesuit, also sketched the Columbia Indians in 1845. Finally, in 1855 Gustavus Sohon worked among the Flatheads and other tribes east of Walla Walla, sketching some of the same individuals Kane had previously portrayed. Yet, although Kane is not the only artist to document the whole region artistically, he must be considered the most important because of the excellence of his work and the extensive and thorough treatment he gave his subject-matter.

Many of Kane's sketches are particularly important for the study of 19th-century Canada. His portrayal of the Métis buffalo hunt is detailed and his record of the HBC forts is of tremendous interest. Two of the Columbia River sketches are unique: that of the Whitman Mission, which was destroyed at the time of the massacre of 1847, and that of the church of Saint-Paul-de-Wallamette in the Willamette valley, the first brick building on the Pacific coast.

Ethnologists find a wealth of information in his portrayal of the life and customs of the native peoples. Of particular significance are sketches from Victoria of women spinning and weaving, and of Indian artifacts. Equally important are the sketches of fishing and of the scalp dance rituals on the upper Columbia, and of the rituals of the militarist society of the Indians of the plains. No other pictorial record of the early Canadian northwest even approaches the wealth or magnitude of that made by Kane.

Kane returned to the northwest in the spring of 1849, but only went as far as the Red River Settlement. On this occasion he guided Sir Edward Poore, a young officer, and two of his friends who were in search of adventure in the west. The trip was made almost entirely in American territory by way of the Mississippi River and Kane does not mention having done any sketching.

For the remainder of his life Kane was a painter in Toronto. He had made more than 700 sketches from 1845 to 1848, some carefully executed and others hasty pencil notes. They now became virtually the entire subject-matter for his canvases and he occasionally painted several versions of the same subject. He had already, in the winter of 1848, begun painting these canvases, including 14 destined for Sir George Simpson. The canvases, in oil, are stolid and dull compared to the brilliant and fresh water-colour and oil studies completed in the field. He was afraid, it would seem, to follow his own sketches literally; in them the colours are almost impressionistic. He later often substituted dull grey backgrounds for his portraits.

Kane has been criticized for the European characteristics found in these paintings. In some, for example, the clear Canadian skies of the sketches have been overlaid with European cloud formations. Other instances of this European influence may be simply the consequence of particular circumstances: trimmed greenswards may have resulted from the lack of detail in small spot sketches. However, it has been shown that a few compositions are actually based on European prototypes. Occasionally, the horses in his canvases have classical lines, modelled after Italian engravings. In his "Assiniboine hunting buffalo," Kane reinterpreted an Italian engraving of 1816 of two Romans hunting a bull. "The death of Big Snake" is inspired by a European romantic artist who painted like Théodore Géricault; it is an entirely imaginary work painted after Kane heard an incorrect report of the death of Big Snake [Omoxesisixany*]. The Indian actually died in 1858, several years after the execution of the painting. This painting was lithographed in Toronto under the supervision of the artist in the mid 1850s and is said to be the first coloured lithograph published in that city.

These "created" compositions are, however, exceptions to the rule. Most canvases were painted either from individual studies or from several studies which he combined onto a single canvas. His "Winter travelling in dog sleds" is based on a pencil sketch of the scene and on water colour studies of a sleigh, of two harnessed dogs, and of trees covered with snow.

Kane stressed that he strove for accuracy in recording his subject-matter but this assertion is only partly true for his canvases. His Indian portraits are often embellished with features such as hair ornaments and elaborate robes which do not appear in the field sketches but which produce a more exotic effect. Nor was any real attempt made to relate the artifacts reproduced on the canvas to the tribal designation of the sitter. The result is often confusing to the ethnologist.

Today's public will find many of Kane's field sketches his most attractive works. They were executed simply and precisely, their colours are fresh, and they make an immediate impact on the viewer. On the other hand, the canvases based on the sketches, which were intended for gallery display and on which Kane felt that his reputation would rest, lack the brilliance of the colour of the more intimate sketches; though many are impressive works, they are sometimes laboured, and often include too many embellishments.

Opportunities for the public exhibition of paintings in the Ontario of Kane's day were limited. His early canvases were shown at the exhibitions of the Society of Artists and Amateurs in York in 1834 and of the Toronto Society of Artists in 1847. A two-week exhibition of 240 sketches by Kane and of the Indian artifacts he had collected during his trips was held at the Toronto City Hall in November 1848, giving Canadian residents their first real opportunity to view the northwest. Newspaper publicity was extensive both on the subject-matter and on the value of the sketches to aspiring young artists for study purposes. Kane probably first met George William Allan*, a leading Canadian financier and politician who was to be his future patron, at this exhibition. The next year the governor general, Lord Elgin [James Bruce*], and his wife called at his studio to see his western sketches.

Between 1851 and 1857 Kane exhibited his western paintings and won awards at the annual Upper Canada Agricultural Society exhibitions held in various centres in Canada West. He was acclaimed a celebrity when he appeared at one of these in person. The excellent reviews of the canvases the Canadian government sent to the Paris exposition of 1855 reputedly much cheered the artist.

Until the 1850s only a portrait painter could hope to earn a reasonable income from artistic production in Canada. In 1851, Kane had applied to the Canadian government for monetary assistance to paint the canvases from his sketches, basing his claim on the national importance of his work. The government gave him a grant of £500 on condition that he deliver 12 canvases to the Library of Parliament, and several paintings were commissioned by private individuals. His most important work with his western sketches constitutes a cycle of 100 canvases painted for Allan for $20,000, and completed by March 1856. Kane intended illustrating the Canadian native peoples, their customs, and the scenery of the country in which they lived by this group of paintings. Catlin and Stanley had painted similar cycles, which they sold to the Smithsonian Institution in Washington as a permanent record of the American Indians. Similarly, Kane would undoubtedly have preferred to have had the government buy his works, and he wished to see the group preserved for the people of Canada.

As early as October 1848 Kane planned a book describing his trips of 1845–48, based on the notes and diaries he kept en route. In the 1850s he began writing Wanderings of an artist among the Indians of North America. Although some chapters were delivered before the Canadian Institute (later the Royal Canadian Institute) in 1855, published in its annual proceedings, and republished in the Daily Colonist, the publication of the complete volume was long delayed. Finally, a visit by Kane to England in 1858 and, simultaneously, pressure from influential persons, presumably Simpson and his associates of the HBC, resulted in the publication of the volume in 1859. A pirated French edition appeared in 1861, and, in 1863, a Danish edition. When it was first published, the volume contained coloured lithographs and woodcut illustrations based on the sketches and canvases in the Allan collection. A German edition with newly prepared lithographs and woodcuts, and genre scenes by another artist, was published in several parts beginning in 1860 and as a complete work in 1862. Kane also intended publishing a book consisting of plates depicting the west. He prepared a portion of the text for such a volume but it was never published. Kane dedicated his Wanderings to George Allan. Simpson took umbrage at this and ordered the HBC staff neither to receive Kane at their posts nor to assist him in any way in the future. It was apparently for this reason that Kane abandoned a proposed sketching trip to Labrador in 1861.

Kane exerted a major influence on many people. Sir Daniel Wilson*, professor at the University of Toronto, became a close friend and relied heavily on Kane's information on the plains and Pacific coast Indians for his Prehistoric man, searches into the origin of civilisation in the old and the new world, the first major anthropological work written in Canada. Among Kane's later associates were men like Allan, Wilson, and Frederick A. Verner*. The last, in emulation of Kane, painted the Indians and buffalo of the prairies. Lucius Richard O'Brien* was also influenced in his early years as an artist by Kane.

Kane had married Harriet Clench of Cobourg, the daughter of his former employer, in 1853, and they had several children. After 1862 they lived in a house which they built on Wellesley Street in Toronto. The artist evidently maintained a studio on King Street until he was forced to retire because of his increasing blindness, which began to be apparent in 1858. He kept somewhat aloof in later life, possibly embittered by his bad sight (which he blamed on the glare from the snow in the Alps during his 1842 trip and also in the west), and by the lack of continuing interest in his work on the part of the general public.

He died suddenly at his Toronto home shortly after returning from his daily walk.

J. Russell Harper

[The great bulk of known sketches and paintings by Paul Kane is divided between three depositories. Of the 12 canvases he delivered to the Library of Parliament, 11 are now in the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa. The cycle of 100 paintings completed in 1856 was purchased by Sir Edmund Boyd Osler* in 1903, and presented to the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto, where they are now located. Most of the sketches made during the field trips are in the Royal Ontario Museum and with the Stark Foundation in Orange, Texas. Kane's collection of Indian artifacts was donated by the Allan family to the Manitoba Museum of Science and History in Winnipeg. A catalogue raisonné of Kane's sketches and paintings is in Paul Kane's frontier; including Wanderings of an artist among the Indians of North America by Paul Kane, ed. J. R. Harper (Toronto, 1971). Frederick A. Verner produced three portraits of Kane. The most important one is now in the collection of the Royal Ontario Museum. An early self-portrait is in the Weir collection in London, Ont. Another, painted during his first western tour, is in the Stark Foundation collection.

Paul Kane, "The Chinook Indians," Canadian Journal, new ser., II (1857), 11–30; "The Chinook Indians," Daily Colonist (Toronto), 6, 7, 8, 9 Aug. 1855; "Incidents of travel on the North-West coast, Vancouver's Island, Oregon, etc. The Chinook Indians," Canadian Journal, III (1854–55), 273–79; "Notes of a sojourn among the half-breeds, Hudson's Bay Company's territory, Red River," Canadian Journal, new ser., I (1856), 128–38; "Notes of travel among the Walla-Walla Indians," Canadian Journal, new ser., I (1856), 417–24; Wanderings of an artist among the Indians of North America from Canada to Vancouver's Island and Oregon through the Hudson's Bay Company's territory and back again (London, 1859); republished with intro. and notes by L. J. Burpee (Master-works of Canadian authors, ed. J. W. Garvin, VII, Toronto, 1925; repub. with intro. by J. G. MacGregor, Edmonton, 1968). The 1859 edition is included in Paul Kane's frontier.... The Wanderings has also been translated into French, German, and Danish: Les Indiens de la baie d'Hudson, promenades d'un artiste parmi les Indiens de l'Amérique du Nord . . . , trans. Édouard Delessert (Paris, 1861); Wanderungen eines Künstlers unter den Indianern Nordamerika's . . . , trans. Luise Hauthal (Leipzig, 1862); En Kunstners Vandringer blandt Indianerne i Nordamerika . . . , trans. J. K. (Copenhagen, 1863).

Kane's writings were reviewed in: Charles Lavollée, "Un artiste chez les Peaux-Rouges," Revue des deux mondes (Paris), XXII (1859), 963–86. Daniel Wilson, "Wanderings of an artist," Canadian Journal, new ser., IV (1859), 186–94. Athenaeum (London), 2 July 1859, 14–15. Kane's work is mentioned in the following catalogues: Catalogue of the first exhibition of the Society of Artists and Amateurs of Toronto (Toronto, 1834). Catalogue of sketches and paintings by Paul Kane (Winnipeg, 1922). Catalogue, pictures of Indians and Indian life by Paul Kane (property of E. B. Osler, n.p., [1904]). Paul Kane, Catalogue of sketches of Indians, chiefs, landscapes, dances, costumes, etc. (Toronto, 1848). National Gallery of Canada, Catalogue of paintings and sculpture, ed. R. H. Hubbard et al. (4v., Ottawa, 1959–65), III: The Canadian school, 151–56.

Art Gallery of Ontario (Toronto), Challener papers, notes on Paul Kane. Church Missionary Society Archives (London), Journal of the Reverend J. Hunter. HBC Arch. D.4/54, D.4/67, D.5/15, D.5/24. British Colonist (Toronto), 14 Nov. 1848. Canadian Agriculturist (Toronto), III (1851), 228; IV (1852), 292–93. Morgan, Sketches of celebrated Canadians, 731–33. Oregon Spectator (Oregon City), 11 Feb. 1847. "Paul Kane", Anglo-American Magazine (Toronto), VI (May 1855), 401–6. Valley of the Trent (Guillet), lvii.

W. G. Colgate, Canadian art, its origin and development (Toronto, 1943). Davin, Irishman in Canada, 611–17. J. R. Harper, Painting in Canada, a history (Toronto, 1966). W. H. G. Kingston, Western wanderings or, a pleasure tour in the Canadas (2v., London, 1856), II, 39, 42–47. A. H. Robson, Paul Kane (Toronto, 1938). Daniel Wilson, Prehistoric man, searches into the origin of civilisation in the old and the new world (2v., Cambridge and London, 1862).

D. I. Bushnell Jr, Sketches by Paul Kane in the Indian country, 1845–1848 (Smithsonian Misc. Coll., XCIX, Washington, 1940). W. G. Colgate, "An early portrait by Paul Kane," Ont. Hist., XL (1948), 23–25. J. R. Harper, "Ontario painters 1846–1867," National Gallery of Canada, Bull. (Ottawa), I (1963), 16–31. K. E. Kidd, "Notes on scattered works of Paul Kane," Royal Ontario Museum, Art and archaeology division, Annual, 1962, 64–73; "Paul Kane – a sheaf of sketches," Canadian Art (Ottawa), VIII (1950–51), 166–67; "Paul Kane, painter of Indians," Royal Ontario Museum of Archaeology, Bull. 23 (Toronto, 1955), 9–13; "The wanderings of Kane," Beaver, outfit 277 (December 1946), 3–9. Daniel Wilson, "Paul Kane, the Canadian artist," Canadian Journal, new ser., XIII (1871–73), 66–72. Kathleen Wood, "Paul Kane sketches," Rotunda (Toronto), II (1969), 4–15. J.R.H.]

KEEFER, JACOB, merchant, miller, and notary; b. 8 Nov. 1800 in Thorold Township, U.C., the second son of George Keefer*, UEL, and Catherine Lampman; m. 8 June 1829 Christina Theresa Grant, and by her had nine sons and six daughters; d. 12 June 1874 at Thorold, Ont.

Jacob Keefer was employed in his youth by a druggist in Erie, Pennsylvania, where a brother-in-law practised medicine. After a few years he returned to Upper Canada and kept general stores at Mud Creek, Beaver Dams, the Deep Cut, and Thorold. In 1826 he was commissioned to receive affidavits and began to serve the community as a notary. From 1826 to 1832 he was postmaster at Beaver Dams and Thorold.

In 1828 Keefer was granted the right to erect a sawmill on the Welland Canal in Thorold. By 1843, he estimated, the sawmill had yielded him an average annual profit of more than £209 over the past 12 years. His major enterprise, however, was the Welland Mills which he decided to construct in Thorold in 1845 after the Welland Canal had been rebuilt. When the mills were completed by 1847 they were among the largest flour mills in Canada with a capacity to grind 200 to 300 barrels of flour per day, a ship elevator capable of discharging 1,000 bushels of wheat an hour, and storage space for 70,000 bushels of wheat and 5,000 bushels of flour. After he had invested $3,000 in labour and materials, Keefer learned of Sir Robert Peel's intention to repeal the corn laws and eliminate the preference Canadian flour had enjoyed in the British market. It was a serious blow to his financial prospects, but after considering the alternatives he concluded that the mills must be completed if loss was to be avoided. He was further disappointed when Robert Gillespie* of London, England, failed to purchase a partnership in the mills for his nephew, Alexander Gillespie Jr, as he had proposed. Faced with a shortage of funds, Keefer mortgaged the mills heavily. Scarcely had they begun operating when prices declined sharply. From 1847 to 1850 it was frequently necessary for him to obtain short term loans from the Bank of Montreal and the Bank of Upper Canada in addition to large advances from John Torrance*'s firm in Montreal with whom he did business. By 1850 he was faced with a debt of more than £8,000 and was unable to obtain further credit. He lost control of the mills in April 1850 when James Oswald and Samuel Zimmerman*, who held one of the mortgages, brought a suit of ejectment against him. He continued to hope that he would be able to repay his debts and regain possession of the mills but this hope vanished in December 1855 when Oswald and Zimmerman carried foreclosure proceedings through the Court of Chancery.

In addition to his milling operations Keefer had numerous other interests. He was president of the Thorold Joint Stock Cotton Company and, until 1847, of the Erie and Ontario Railroad. He was chairman of the common school commission for Thorold Township in 1842 and in 1846 he was superintendent of common schools in the Niagara District. After he lost control of his mills in 1850, Keefer purchased a partnership in W. H. Ward's lumber business in Thorold, but in less than a year the partnership was dissolved. Henceforth, he occupied himself mainly with notarial work and his duties as postmaster, which he resumed in 1851 and continued until his death. In 1851 he was appointed clerk of the 4th division court of the united counties of Lincoln and Welland and in 1853 he received a commission as a notary public.

Although he was not active in politics, Keefer generally supported moderate reform principles. In the 1820s he solicited subscriptions for William Lyon Mackenzie*'s Colonial Advocate, but in 1837 he served as a captain in the militia and participated in operations against Mackenzie on Navy Island. As a result of his financial experiences he had become convinced by 1849 that annexation to the United States was essential for the economic survival of Upper Canada. Beyond openly expressing his opinions in his correspondence, however, he did not agitate in favour of annexation.

Throughout his life Keefer was a staunch supporter of the temperance and sabbatarian movements, but he was not active in the leadership of either movement.

WILLIAM ORMSBY

PAC, MG 24, B18 (W. L. Mackenzie papers), 1; E1 (Merritt papers), ser.1, 20, pp.3288–91; 23, pp.3905–8; I33 (Keefer papers); RG 11, ser.2, 43, f.7539. PAO, W. H. Merritt papers, 12 July 1848. "The annexation movement, 1849–50," ed. A. G. Penny, CHR, V (1924), 236–61. J. of Education for Ont., XXVII (1874), 107. Chadwick, Ontarian families, II, 92. [W. H. Wetherell], Jubilee history of Thorold, township and town, from the time of the red man to the present (Thorold, Ont., 1897–98).

KEITH, ALEXANDER, brewer and politician; b. 5 Oct. 1795 in Caithness-shire, Scotland, son of Donald Keith and Christina Brims; d. 14 Dec. 1873 in Halifax, N.S.

When Alexander Keith was 17, his father sent him to an uncle in northern England to learn the brewing business. Five years later, when Keith migrated to Halifax, he became sole brewer and business manager for Charles Boggs, and he bought out Boggs' brewery in 1820. On 17 Dec. 1822 he married Sarah Ann Stalcup, who died in 1832. On 30 Sept. 1833 he married Eliza Keith; they had six daughters and two sons. One son, Donald G. Keith, became a partner in the brewing firm in 1853.

In 1822 Keith moved his brewery and premises to larger facilities on Lower Water Street and in 1836 he again expanded, building a new brewery on Hollis Street. In 1863 he began construction of Keith Hall which was connected by a tunnel to his brewery. Keith Hall, now occupied by Oland's Brewery, is in the Renaissance palazzo style, with baroque adornments, pillars of no particular style, and a mansard roof. This peculiar combination of styles resulted from the fact that the designs were probably derived from books with plans of buildings in Great Britain and the United States. Keith's appointment as a director of the Bank of Nova Scotia in 1837 along with William Blowers BLISS is an indication of his importance in the Halifax business community. Beginning in 1837, he also served as a director, at various dates, of the Halifax Fire Insurance Company. In 1838 he helped found the Halifax Marine Insurance Association, and in the 1840s he was on the board of management of the Colonial Life Assurance Company. He was also a director of the Halifax Gas, Light, and Water Company, incorporated in 1840, and in 1844 helped incorporate the Halifax Water Company, becoming a director in 1856. By 1864 Keith was a director of the Provincial Permanent Building and Investment Society. At the time of his death his estate was evaluated at $251,000.

Keith's interest in utilities and insurance was but part of his general involvement in the public life of Halifax. He was unsuccessful in the general election of 1840 when he stood as a Conservative candidate for the town of Halifax but was elected to the first city council in 1841. In 1842 he served as a commissioner of public property and in 1843 was selected mayor of Halifax. He continued as a member of council until he again served as mayor, by election, in 1853 and 1854. In December 1843 he was appointed to the Legislative Council and in June 1867 he accepted the appointment of president of the council, declining a seat in the Canadian Senate. As a supporter of confederation and president of the council, he was helped at first by the fact that before 1 July 1867 Charles Tupper* had filled several seats in the upper house with known confederates. Although the premier, William Annand*, appointed to the upper house in November 1867, had complete control of the lower house, he did not dare introduce a resolution into the upper chamber in 1868 calling for repeal of union. The anti-confederates gradually secured control of the upper house, however, and Keith was unable to prevent passage, in 1871, of a particularly flagrant bill which took the vote from all federal officials in provincial elections. It was perhaps a commentary on Keith that he was not actively involved at this time with the Conservative party organization which was run by such party stalwarts as Philip C. Hill* and James MacDonald*.

Throughout his career Keith was connected with several charitable and fraternal societies. He served as president of the North British Society from 1831 and as chief of the Highland Society from 1868 until his death. In 1838 he was connected with the Halifax Mechanics Library and in the early 1840s with the Nova Scotia Auxiliary Colonial Society. Keith was perhaps best known to the Halifax public as a leader of the freemasons. He became provincial grand master for the Maritimes under the English authority in 1840 and under the Scottish lodge in 1845. Following a reorganization of the various divisions in 1869, he became grand master of Nova Scotia.

K. G. PRYKE

Halifax County Court of Probate, will of Alexander Keith. PANS, Keith family papers; "Masonic grand masters of the jurisdiction of Nova Scotia, 1738–1965," compiled by E. T. Bliss, 1965, 21. Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 15 Dec. 1873. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 15 Dec. 1873. Annals of the North British Society of Halifax, Nova Scotia, from its foundation in 1768, to its centenary celebration March 26th, 1868, compiled by J. S. Macdonald (Halifax, 1868), 187. G. A. White, Halifax and its business: historical sketch and description of the city and its institutions (Halifax, 1876), 87–88.

KELLETT, Sir HENRY, officer in the Royal Navy, oceanographer, Arctic explorer; b. 2 Nov. 1806 at Clonabody, Tipperary, Ireland, son of John Dalton Kellett; d. 1 March 1875 at Clonabody.

Henry Kellett joined the navy in 1822. He served for five years in the West Indies before being appointed to survey vessels commanded by William Fitzwilliam Owen* and Edward BELCHER on the west coast of Africa and in the East Indies. Shortly after distinguishing himself in the Opium War with China (1840–41), Kellett attained the rank of post captain. In 1845 he was appointed to command the frigate Herald for survey work on the Pacific coast of Central America. In the summers of 1848, 1849, and 1850 he and his ship were detached from this service to cooperate with Commander T. E. L. Moore of the Plover, then based in Kotzebue Sound, Alaska, in the search for the lost ships of Sir John Franklin*. In pursuance of this duty, Kellett in 1849 discovered and landed on Herald Island in the Russian Arctic and obtained a distant view of Wrangel Island. The following year on 31 July, in the neighbourhood of Cape Lisburne (near the northern exit of Bering Strait), he met Commander Robert MCCLURE, of the Franklin rescue ship, Investigator, who had become separated from his commanding officer, Captain Richard Collinson* of Enterprise. Kellett remonstrated against McClure's intention of going directly into the ice without waiting for his consort, but did not use his superior rank to forbid the action.

In 1851 Herald returned to England and the crew was paid off. Despite his strenuous cruise of six years, Kellett immediately accepted a posting to the command of HMS Resolute, and in the spring of 1852 sailed as second in command in the expedition led by Sir Edward Belcher, whose orders were to prosecute the search for Franklin by way of Lancaster Sound. Belcher stationed North Star as depot ship at Beechey Island, and took his ship Assistance and the Pioneer up Wellington Channel. He sent Resolute and its tender Intrepid, captained by the famous Arctic traveller Commander Francis Leopold M'Clintock*, to search for Franklin in the Melville Island area, and, if necessary, to give aid to Investigator, unreported for many months, but believed to be in that region.

Kellett berthed his ships for the coming winter at Dealy Island off the south shore of Melville Island. An autumn travelling party under Lieutenant Frederick Mecham* visited Winter Harbour, 50 miles to the west, and there discovered a record planted by McClure from which it was learned that Investigator had discovered a northwest passage and that it had later become icebound in the Bay of Mercy on the north shore of Banks Island. The Arctic winter was too far advanced for help to be sent until the following spring. In the bitter cold of March 1853, Lieutenant Bedford Pim* made the 160-mile journey by dog-sledge across Viscount Melville Sound to bring McClure word of the rescue ships. Investigator was abandoned on Kellett's order and her starving and scurvey-ridden crew trekked over the ice to Dealy Island.

In the meantime, under Kellett's direction, M'Clintock and Mecham, on sledge journeys of great length, found no trace of Franklin, but added Eglinton and Prince Patrick islands to the map of the Arctic.

On the voyage home Kellett's ships were frozen in at the west end of Barrow Strait and passed the winter of 1853–54 near Cape Cockburn. In April, Belcher, who was still in Wellington Channel, sent orders to Kellett to abandon his ice-bound ships and take their crews, with the men of Investigator, on foot to the depot at Beechey Island. Kellett protested that his ships were not in enough danger to warrant this desertion but he had no choice but to obey. Belcher deserted his two ships as well; all crews were taken home on North Star and two summer supply ships. Belcher's written orders requiring Kellett to abandon his ships procured the latter a prompt acquittal by court-martial for their loss; Kellett also received a handsome compliment from the president of the court on the services he had rendered. Kellett's judgement was vindicated in the autumn of 1855 when James Buddington, an American whaling skipper, found Resolute drifting in Baffin Bay and sailed her, still seaworthy and manageable, to New London, Conn. The United States Congress purchased the derelict and gave her, refitted, to Queen Victoria. A table from her oaken beams stands today in the White House to commemorate this act of generosity.

The British parliament voted £10,000 to McClure and his crew for the discovery of the northwest passage. (It was not positively known in 1855 that Franklin's lost crews had anticipated McClure by the discovery of an alternate passage by way of Victoria Strait.) Kellett's crews, but for whom the men of Investigator must inevitably have perished, expected a share of this bounty. McClure, however, secured the entire grant for himself and his crew by his blandly unscrupulous testimony before a parliamentary committee that he could have brought his men out alive without Kellett's aid. This ungrateful attitude was not endorsed by the petty officers and men of Investigator. At a meeting in honour of Dr Alexander Armstrong*, Investigator's surgeon, they took the opportunity of voicing their thanks to Lieutenant Pim – and by implication to Kellett – but for whom "many of us would never have seen old England again." Kellett was hurt at the manner in which his services were neglected, especially for the sake of his men who had suffered much hardship during the last winter through sharing sleeping quarters and bedding with 60 additional hands from the Investigator.

Kellet subsequently held commands in the West Indies and on the China Station, and then retired to his native Clonabody, where he died in 1875.

In addition to the rescue of McClure and the survey work done by M'Clintock and Mecham under his command, Kellett is credited by Soviet writers with doing the first hydrographic work in the eastern Russian Arctic. The Canadian explorer, Captain Joseph-Elzéar Bernier*, paid a fine tribute to his professional character. There are numerous witnesses to his kindness and to the pains he took to keep up morale and good humour under trying conditions. The stormy "Jacky" Fisher, who served under Kellett in China, was at first repelled by him: "He hasn't a spark of religion about him, never goes to Church, and this, together with his being an Irishman, makes me distrust him," but soon yielded to his charm: "he is so full of kindness to me."

Leslie H. Neatby

Baker Library, Dartmouth College, Stefansson coll., Grinnell Scrap-Book, undated newspaper clipping, c. October 1854. A. A. Armstrong, A personal narrative of the discovery of the north-west passage; with numerous incidents of travel and adventure during nearly five years' continuous service in the Arctic regions while in search of the expedition under Sir John Franklin (London, 1857). Edward Belcher, The last of the Arctic voyages; being a narrative of the expedition in H.M.S. Assistance, under the command of Captain Sir Edward Belcher, C.B., in search of Sir John Franklin, during the years 1852–53–54 (2v., London, 1855). J. A. Fisher, Fear God and dread nought: the correspondence of Admiral of the Fleet Lord Fisher of Kilverstone, ed. A. J. Marder (3v., London, 1952–59), I. [McClure], Discovery of the north-west passage (Osborn). G. F. M'Dougall, The eventful voyage of H.M. discovery ship "Resolute" to the Arctic regions in search of Sir John Franklin and the missing crews of H.M. discovery ships "Erebus" and "Terror", 1852, 1853, 1854 . . . (London, 1857). J. A. Miertsching, Frozen ships; the Arctic diary of Johann Miertsching, 1850–1854, trans. with intro. L. H. Neatby (Toronto, 1967). B. C. Seemann, Narrative of the voyage of H.M.S. "Herald" during the years 1845–51, under the command of Captain Henry Kellett . . . being a circumnavigation of the globe and three cruizes to the Arctic regions in search of Sir John Franklin (2v., London, 1853).

DNB. J.-E. Bernier, Report on the dominion of Canada government expedition to the Arctic Islands and Hudson Strait on board the D.G.S. 'Arctic' [1908–1909] (Ottawa, 1910). C. R. Markham, Life of Admiral Sir Leopold McClintock (London, 1909). L. H. Neatby, In quest of the north-west passage (Toronto, 1958). V. IU. Vize (Wiese), Mori͡a Sovetskoi Arktiki (Leningrad, 1939). Noel Wright, Quest for Franklin (London, 1959). F. H. Burns, "H.M.S. 'Herald' in search of Franklin," Beaver, outfit 294 (autumn 1963), 3–13. L. H. Neatby, "McClure and the passage," Beaver, outfit 291 (winter 1960), 33–41.

KELLY, FRANCIS, land surveyor, business agent, farmer, and politician; b. May 1803 in Mulloloughan, County Monaghan, Ireland; d. 19 April 1879 at Fort Augustus, P.E.I.

Francis Kelly completed his schooling in Dublin, where he worked as a teacher and law clerk. Sometime before he emigrated to Prince Edward Island in May 1835, he married Catherine Lennon of Tullycorbett. Upon arrival on the Island, Kelly settled at Fort Augustus in Lot 36. There a large landowner, the Reverend John McDonald, hired him to survey his estates and to serve as his business agent. This association lasted until 1 May 1846.

After two unsuccessful attempts in the 1840s, Kelly was elected to the House of Assembly for Queens County, Third District, in 1858 as a running mate of the Liberal premier, George Coles. With the exception of the 1872 session, Kelly held this seat until his death. A strong Catholic layman, he was often in the forefront of attempts by the church to gain educational concessions. In 1870 an internal crisis in the Liberal government over the granting of public funds to Catholic St Dunstan's College caused Kelly and six other Catholic assemblymen to leave the party and join the Tories led by James Colledge Pope*. Such a shift in an assembly of 30 members was enough to bring the Tories to power, and as a reward Kelly was named chief commissioner of crown lands. He held the post until the government changed hands in 1872 and regained the position for 1875 and 1876.

On the other issues of his era Kelly took the position of most of his contemporaries. In the 1860s he ardently opposed confederation and voted for James Pope's "no terms" resolution in 1866; when union became a financial imperative seven years later, however, Kelly joined Pope to seek "better terms." On the land question he argued in favour of easier conditions for tenants wishing to purchase their farms.

Kelly's importance as an Island politician stems from his longevity and from his constant and forthright support for the educational demands of his church. It is this cause which motivated him and explains both his change in party allegiance and his about-face on confederation.

D. B. Boylan

PAPEI, Prince Edward Island, Executive Council, Minutes, 1858–79, especially 10 Sept. 1870. PRO, CO 226/82, 108–10; 226/106, 225–27. Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Debates, 1858–78, especially 1861, 126–27; 1871, 45–46, 57; 1872, Session 2, 237; 1875, 198, 359; Journals, 1858–79, especially 1860, 186–87; 1876, 86. Colonial Herald (Charlottetown), 9 July 1842. Examiner (Charlottetown), 4 Dec. 1871; 7 Aug. 1876; 19 April, 2 May 1879. Islander (Charlottetown), 15 July 1870. Patriot (Charlottetown), 21 July, 20, 25 Aug., 3, 17 Dec. 1870. Royal Gazette (Charlottetown), 21 April, 28 July 1846. Can. parl. comp., 1874; 1875; 1876; 1877; 1878; 1879. Bolger, PEI and confederation.

KENT, JOHN, commission agent and politician; b. in Waterford, Ireland, in 1805; d. 1 Sept. 1872 in St John's, Nfld.

John Kent came to Newfoundland in 1820. He served for a time as clerk to his uncle, Patrick Morris*, who had emigrated to Newfoundland 20 years before, and whose impetuosity, wit, and belligerence Kent seems to have shared. By 1830 Kent was already established as an auctioneer and commission agent, and doing a business sufficient for him to be able to marry the sister of the Roman Catholic bishop of the colony, Dr Michael Anthony Fleming*. It was Bishop Fleming's influence that was largely instrumental in getting John Kent elected for St John's in the first Newfoundland assembly. This assembly was established by an imperial act in 1832, in the movement for which Kent had played an important role.

Kent's electioneering was a compound of his own strident vitality, intimidation, and clerical influence. Newfoundland in 1832 had virtually universal suffrage under a household franchise, and it was not difficult to secure election by turbulent, and very effective means. Kent was of the school of Reformers who relished quarrels with authority. He was a democrat by instinct, hating irresponsible power, by which he meant any power unresponsive to popular demands. He had all of William Lyon Mackenzie*'s rabble-rousing facility, and a rich command of language, not to say invective; but he had other attributes Mackenzie had not, acquisitiveness, a driving ambition, and a real capacity for administration. One of Kent's most characteristic utterances was his address to a public meeting in St John's on 24 May 1848, in which he quoted George Canning: "inaction never yet begot repose, nor were the objects of human ambition ever yet attained but by human exertion."

Given principles and capacities like these, John Kent would go far as a popular demagogue. He seems never to have scrupled much about the means he used to get elected, and stay elected: he was never defeated in any election. But then Kent was no worse in this respect than many of his contemporaries. It was alleged by Protestants in 1836 that the Catholic population of Newfoundland (37,600 as against 36,000 Protestants) was controlled "by an ignorant, vicious and a political priesthood." The Protestant author of that statement, Henry D. Winton*, the editor of the Public Ledger, had had his ears cut off just the year before. But Protestants were no better. Not even an angel, wrote one exasperated governor of Newfoundland, Captain Henry Prescott in 1839, could "still the storm of religious rancour. . . ." Kent made no attempt to do so. He enjoyed the storm and rode it to his own advantage, though as he grew older he developed a greater sense of responsibility and his youthful asperities softened somewhat.

In 1842 Kent was appointed to the new amalgamated legislature, made up of 11 elected members and 10 appointees of the crown; in 1849 he became speaker of the reseparated assembly. Later that same year he was given the post of collector of customs and resigned his seat in the assembly.

Kent had by this time become an enthusiast for responsible government. He had first proposed the system in 1846; he believed that the assembly could be made responsible by giving it responsibility, whereas without responsible government an opposition would remain permanently demagogic. This was an argument from Robert Baldwin* in Canada West; but the St John's Morning Courier asked (30 May 1848) if Newfoundland, lacking a cohesive population, did not need some solid institutional structures of local government first. To bring responsible government at this time would be folly. It would put it "on a rotten foundation . . . propped by needy partisans, who have not sufficient industry to earn their own substance. . . .” Governor John Gaspard Le Marchant believed that the agitation for responsible government, coming, as it did, nearly exclusively from the Reform or Liberal party, was simply a mask for Catholic striving for power. Kent may have been naive in believing that the circumstances that had justified, or had seemed to justify, responsible government in the provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia could apply in Newfoundland.

In 1848 the Liberals in the assembly controlled about 3/5 of the seats – a proportion continued by the general election of 1852. Nearly all of their holders were Roman Catholics, and all of these were pledged to responsible government. After many representations the British government agreed, reluctantly, to grant responsible government to Newfoundland. Elections to this end were held in May 1855, and in the same month the first cabinet was sworn in in Newfoundland, under the Liberal premier, Philip Francis Little*. John Kent, who had resigned his office as collector of customs and been elected in 1852, was made colonial secretary in an administration consisting of four Roman Catholics and two Protestants.

In 1857 the draft Anglo-French Convention signed by France and Britain in the spirit of cooperation engendered by the Crimean War threw all parties into one unanimous protest. The convention, on the question of the French Shore, which at this time ran from Cape St John (about 150 miles northwest of Cape Bonavista) to Cape Ray on the west coast (about 230 miles south of Pointe Riche), was subject, on the British side, to ratification by the Newfoundland legislature. Among other vital details, the convention proposed an extension of French fishing privileges into Labrador; it also gave the French an exclusive right (except for certain limited military and administrative purposes) to an important section of the existing treaty shore. Newfoundland, now under responsible government, reacted swiftly and violently.

In March 1857, Kent, with Frederic B. T. Carter* of the Conservative opposition, went to Halifax, N.S., thence to New Brunswick and to Canada, to drum up colonial support for the Newfoundland cause. They won support in all the colonies, Prince Edward Island included, an incident that may have influenced Newfoundland’s willingness to at least consider confederation in 1864 and 1865. “We cannot soon forget,” said the Newfoundlander, on 16 April 1857, “our obligations to our Sister Colonies . . . who have identified themselves with our struggle.” As a result of these colonial representations Britain abandoned the convention, and Kent subsequently served as one of two British delegates on a joint Anglo-French commission in 1859. He was dropped from the commission early in 1860. The suspicion was that he had not made much of a contribution to it; possibly he was too refractory.

Kent had become premier in 1858, following P. F. Little’s appointment to the Supreme Court of Newfoundland. He was returned to power in the general election of November 1859, an election contested with more than the usual bitterness. In these years the sectarian rivalry had sharpened fiercely. The census of 1857 had shown a shift in the narrow balance between Protestant and Catholic in Newfoundland. In the census of 1845 the Protestants had had a slight edge – 49,500 to 47,000 – but now the margin had increased (the result of a considerable Methodist immigration) to 64,000 Protestants against 55,000 Roman Catholics.

The Kent ministry fell upon bad times. The early years of responsible government had gone well; as Kent put it, “the sunshine of prosperity” had beamed upon the Little government. In 1859 revenues dropped and in 1860 there was a partial failure of the fishery. This in turn necessitated consideration of direct provincial relief for the poor – a problem that had a splintering effect on Kent’s party. The issue was whether poor relief moneys should be administered by local members (and thus become a form of patronage) or by a non-partisan committee. Kent was under some pressure from the bishop to opt for the latter solution, but his own party refused to accept it. The Roman Catholic church was in fact now turning against Kent. He had always enjoyed the confidence of Bishop Fleming, but Fleming had been succeeded in 1850 by Bishop John Thomas Mullock*, a man with even more Irish in him than his predecessor, and Kent never had the same rapport with Mullock. The new bishop seems to have gravitated toward Ambrose Shea*, member for Burin.

The quarrel about relief within the Liberal party broke into the open in 1861. The failure of the 1860 potato crop had made relief essential; but Kent believed, perhaps rightly, that the administration of poor relief had to be tightened. Early in 1861 regulations to this effect were published which aroused considerable popular resentment, and members of Kent’s own party were not above capitalizing on it. In the assembly Kent defended himself and his government’s action in his usual forthright style. He was being attacked, he said, by a “miserable faction who sought his political destruction; a set of frozen serpents which having been warmed into life had stung the breast which gave it vitality." The cabal against him was engineered by a "designing, cozening, cunning rogue," whom Kent did not name, but whom everyone knew to be Ambrose Shea.

Kent succeeded in saving his ministry in January 1861, but within a month he was hit from another quarter. A bill had been introduced by the government authorizing the payment of public accounts, and official salaries, at a reduced rate of exchange – a loss of about 4 per cent. Strong protests came in from both officials and the Conservative opposition. Kent was angry. In the assembly he spoke darkly of a conspiracy against his Liberal government by the governor in league with the opposition. Perhaps the speech was one way, crude enough in all truth, of healing the rift within the ranks of the Liberal party. Governor Sir Alexander Bannerman*, who had resented Kent's dictatorial methods and disliked his administration, partly because he thought it corrupt and partly because he knew it was Catholic, asked Kent for an explanation of his words against the queen's representative. Kent imperiously replied that he need not account for his words in the assembly to anyone. Then Bannerman struck. Having ascertained that the opposition would be willing to form a government, he dismissed the Kent ministry early in March 1861. Bannerman's conception of his role as governor was clearly, in the context of responsible government, anachronistic. Kent moved and carried resolutions in the assembly protesting that his dismissal was a "gross act of treachery" to the people of Newfoundland; the house was then dissolved and the tumultuous election of the spring of 1861 began. Only the defeat of Kent and his party could save Governor Bannerman. The issue may account for some of the character of the 1861 election.

Kent and his Liberal party were defeated, though only narrowly; it was upon doubtful constituencies, where feeling had run high, that office and power turned. There had been rioting and loss of life; troops had had to be called in; but in the end was ameliorated the old habit of Catholics who were voting Liberal intimidating Protestant and Conservative voters, and vice versa. Most of the members of the legislature seemed ready to recognize that Newfoundland's own interest, to say nothing of her reputation, required that further disorders on this scale be avoided. Hugh W. Hoyles*, the Conservative premier, was able, with some important Roman Catholic support, to put measures through the legislature increasing the police establishment, and to secure more independence for jurors. Governor Bannerman was seen, by Daniel W. Prowse* in the perspective of later years, to have begun the trend toward parties crossing religious lines and toward the lessening of electoral violence. Bannerman was much helped in this endeavour by the courageous and firm Hoyles government. Nevertheless there are many unanswered questions about this amelioration of Newfoundland politics. Some have suggested a private pact between Hoyles and Ambrose Shea; some that Bishop Mullock's withdrawal from active party politics – perhaps as a result of pressure exerted from Rome – was the reason for the change.

Kent had kept his own seat in St John's East in 1861, but he was ere long replaced as leader of the opposition by Shea. Kent never forgave Bannerman for the events of March 1861; on Bannerman's departure in September 1864, Kent denounced him fiercely in the pages of the Newfoundlander. The coalition government that came to power in the awful depression year of 1865 appointed Kent as receiver general, and he went to Ottawa as one of the Newfoundland delegates to discuss confederation in 1869. When, however, that government was defeated on the confederation issue in the general election in the autumn of 1869, Kent retired from politics. After an extended trip abroad, he returned to Newfoundland and died suddenly, in his sleep, at St John's on 1 Sept. 1872. He was survived by his wife and by at least two children.

Kent had developed his political career in a period of Newfoundland history notorious for its rabble politics; his régime as premier was weakened by the corruption within his own party, and by the consequent alienation of the Roman Catholic bishop who preferred Ambrose Shea. Kent's style was in fact outdated. There was still much rabble-rousing to be done in Newfoundland politics, but more skilful and more circumspect politicians were on the scene. Kent would have been much in sympathy with the Newfoundlander's boredom before the prospect of the assembly that was about to meet in 1864: nothing interesting was to be expected from that assembly – only the "dull" dispatch of legislative business.

P. B. WAITE

There are no known collections of John Kent papers. Newfoundland newspapers, however biased, are the best contemporary source – notably the Liberal Newfoundlander (St John's), 1830–72, and the Conservative Public Ledger (St John's), 1830–72. Also useful is PRO, CO 194, the dispatches of the Newfoundland governors to the Colonial Office.

The most recent and most complete secondary work for the period is G. E. Gunn, Political history of Nfld., which has a comprehensive bibliography. Also useful is A. H. McLintock, The establishment of constitutional government in Newfoundland, 1783–1832: a study of retarded colonisation (Royal Empire Society Imperial Studies, 17, London, 1941). For the French Shore see F. F. Thompson, French Shore problem in Nfld. For Newfoundland and confederation see the chapter in P. B. Waite, Life and times of confederation. A still useful general account of Newfoundland by a Newfoundlander is D. W. Prowse, History of Nfld. P.B.W.]

KER, ROBERT (the family name is also spelled Kerr or Carr, but his branch used Ker), public servant; b. 14 Aug. 1824 in Dalkeith, Scotland, son of James Ker and Janet Ker; m. at Bathgate, Scotland, on 19 July 1855 to Jessie Russell by whom he had five sons and one daughter; d. 11 or 12 Feb. 1879 at Victoria, B.C.

Robert Ker belonged to a family long prominent on the Scottish border. He was educated in Scotland, presumably as an accountant, and is said to have become a freemason before he emigrated to Victoria, Vancouver Island, in 1859. He had intended to join the gold rush to the mainland colony of British Columbia, but instead he became a clerk in the Treasury Department of B.C. on 1 June 1859 and on 12 July 1860 was made chief clerk in the Department of the Auditor General. He was himself appointed auditor general of B.C. on 14 March 1865; he also acted as auditor for the colony of Vancouver Island from 31 Aug. 1861 to 21 April 1864, when the audit office of B.C. was moved from Victoria to New Westminster and he was obliged to resign the Vancouver Island appointment. On the union of the colonies in 1866 Ker was continued as auditor general, and when the capital was moved from New Westminster to Victoria in 1868 he returned to Victoria to live.

He remained in the service of the province until confederation, when he was given the office of dominion paymaster general, which the Victoria Colonist called "a responsible position, for which his tried integrity and past experience eminently fit him." He retired on pension on 1 Oct. 1874 and died of exposure in "the great snowstorm" of 1879. The 100th anniversary of Robert Ker's arrival in Victoria was commemorated in 1959 by his grandson, Robert Henry Brackman Ker, who donated the Ker Memorial Wing to the Greater Victoria Art Gallery.

DOROTHY BLAKEY SMITH

[Information on the family was received from R. H. B. Ker in an interview on 5 Aug. 1970. D.B.S.] General Register Office (Edinburgh), Parish registers, Register of proclamations and marriages for the parish of Bathgate. PABC, Robert Ker correspondence, 1861–71. British Columbia, Blue Books, 1859–70 (copies in PABC). Colonist (Victoria), 1859–79. Government Gazette (Victoria), 12 Aug. 1865. Victoria Daily Times, 6 Jan. 1960. R. E. Gosnell, A history of British Columbia (n.p., 1906), 588. S. D. Scott, "The attitude of the colonial governors and officials towards confederation," British Columbia & confederation, ed. W. G. Sheldon (Victoria, 1967), 159, 161.

KÉROUAC (Kirouac), LÉON, school-teacher; b. in 1805 at Saint-François-de-la-Rivière-du-Sud (Montmagny County), L.C., son of Charles de Kérouac and Josette Blanchette; m. on 11 April 1836 at Saint-Marc (Verchères County) Éléonore Létourneau; d. 21 Feb. 1880 at Montreal, Que.

Léon Kérouac was a school-teacher at Saint-Antoine-sur-Richelieu. On 23 July 1845 he was elected president of the Association des Instituteurs of the district of Montreal (Belœil section). La Minerve of 7 Aug. 1845 stressed the importance of this association, and Dr Jean-Baptiste MEILLEUR gave it resounding praise in his Mémorial de l'éducation du Bas-Canada. For many years Kérouac devoted himself to teaching the children of the Richelieu valley. On 4 March 1857, at a banquet which brought together the teachers of the École Normale Jacques-Cartier (Montreal), the superintendent of the Council of Public Instruction, Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau*, sat Kérouac beside him as the "senior among the schoolmasters present"; yet he was only 52.

On 28 Aug. 1857 Léon Kérouac was nominated as a member of the Association des Instituteurs of the district of the École Normale Jacques-Cartier. From the time of the creation of the first normal schools, the superintendent had strongly encouraged the formation of these associations "connected with the École Normale Jacques-Cartier or Laval." They met at the normal school at least four times a year: pedagogical questions were the principal topics of discussion, and teachers were invited to give lectures on methodology, pedagogy, psychology, and teaching methods. Matters relating to the welfare of the school-teachers were also talked over. The Journal de l'Instruction publique gave accurate reports of each of these meetings.

The same journal reports in 1857 that for nine years Kérouac had contributed to the teachers' pension fund (£1 a year). In 1856 a law had authorized the superintendent to deduct from his budget "a sum not exceeding 500 louis to help in forming a fund for the support of the teachers of the common schools of Lower Canada who had become old or exhausted by their work, provided always that no teacher [had] a right to a share of the said funds if he [had] not contributed to such a fund the amount of at least one louis a year." This contribution was optional, and a number of school-teachers, alleging their poor salary as a pretext, refrained from contributing to the pension fund. On several occasions Chauveau complained of the teachers' indifference in this respect.

Kérouac was deemed to be a teacher of great experience, very attached to his profession, conscientious, a man who took on the duties and obligations prescribed by the school laws and who stood out among the teachers as a leader.

LOUIS-PHILIPPE AUDET

AJM, Registre d'état civil (notes biographiques fournies par J.-J. Lefebvre). JIP, mars 1857, 71; août 1857, 163; sept. 1857, 187. J.-B. Meilleur, Mémorial de l'éducation du Bas-Canada (2^e éd., Québec, 1876), 280–82. La Minerve (Montréal), 7 août 1845. L.-P. Audet, "P.-J.-O. Chauveau, ministre de l'Instruction publique, 1867–1873," RSCT, 4th ser., V (1967), sect.I, 171–84.

KERR, JAMES HOOPER, staff commander in the Royal Navy and hydrographic surveyor; b. in 1828 in Jersey, Channel Islands; m. in March 1862 at Simonstown, Cape of Good Hope, to Mary J. Bull; d. 24 Aug. 1877 at Hammersmith, Eng.

James Hooper Kerr entered the Royal Navy at Portsmouth on 18 Oct. 1843 as a volunteer in the Victory. His mathematical ability must have been exceptionally high for he was soon rated acting master's mate in the navigating branch of the navy. In 1844 Kerr joined the Flamer in the Mediterranean and in the same year was promoted second master in the Volage on the same station. He was appointed in 1851 to the surveying ship Pandora for the New Zealand survey. Five years later he was promoted master in the Actæon for the survey of China and the Tartary coasts. The Actæon was engaged in operations against the Chinese and Kerr was awarded the China War Medal (1857–60).

James Kerr's work in the surveying service – to which so much is owed by all the maritime nations of the world – had been noted by the Admiralty, and in April 1864 he was appointed master in charge of the important Newfoundland survey. For nearly eight years, working both ashore and afloat, he surveyed and charted the coasts and harbours of Newfoundland. Lines of soundings, rocks, shoals, and other hazards to navigation had to be accurately fixed by compass bearings or sextant angles of special marks on the coast line; then they had to be plotted on charts. In 1867 Kerr was promoted staff commander.

Over 40 of Kerr's Newfoundland surveys, topographic maps, and sketches – including that of the telegraph cable in 1866 – are preserved in the archives of the Hydrographic Department. Current editions of Admiralty charts which still give credit to Staff Commander Kerr include Gander Bay to Bonavista and Cape Bonavista to Bay Bull, including Trinity and Conception bays.

In 1871 Kerr returned home to take charge of the survey of the west coast of England. He remained at that post until his retirement, shortly before his death. Staff Commander Kerr was one of the distinguished fraternity of seaman-scientists who have served in the Royal Navy down the ages. The work of surveying uncharted coasts was always arduous, often dangerous, and called for a high degree of professional skill. James Kerr was a man dedicated to his profession.

MICHAEL GODFREY

G.B., Ministry of Defence, Hydrographer of the Navy (Taunton, Somerset), Admiralty charts by J. H. Kerr, 1866–71. PRO, Adm. 38/2118 (Victory, muster books); Adm./Ind. 12568-57/1 (surveying officers services). G.B., Adm., Navy lists (London), 1844–77. Archibald Day, The Admiralty hydrographic service, 1795–1919 (London, 1967).

KILLALY, HAMILTON HARTLEY, engineer and civil servant; b. in Dublin, Ireland, in December 1800, son of John A. Killaly and Alicia Hamilton; d. at Picton, Ont., 28 March 1874.

Hamilton Hartley Killaly graduated from Trinity College, Dublin, BA 1819 and MA 1832. He learned engineering from his father, a prominent engineer who worked on the extension of the Grand Canal in Ireland.

In 1831 he came into contact with Edward George Stanley and John Fox Burgoyne, who were to form good opinions of him and to influence the course of his life. In that year Stanley, as chief secretary for Ireland, formed the Board of Works, and he appointed Burgoyne as chairman: "Determined honesty," Stanley told Burgoyne, "and decision to check all jobbing (no very easy task in Ireland) are the first requisites." Killaly served the board "principally as a consulting Engineer" from its inception until 1833 by which time he had become discouraged by the proclivity of Burgoyne, a military engineer, for employing officers of the Royal Engineers. He was himself later to resist similar tendencies in Canada since he thought they would inhibit growth of its engineering profession. Nonetheless, Stanley stated that Burgoyne considered Killaly to be "a very clever Engineer, and a steady man of excellent character." Stanley was "at all times my [Killaly's] steady friend," and his good opinion was, according to Killaly, "above all" responsible for his receiving senior engineering employment in Canada. He was to need such a powerful imperial ally.

In 1833 Killaly married Martha Jane Handy and in the following year they moved to the New World, where they were to have three sons and two daughters who lived to maturity. The Killalys passed some time in New York State and in the Niagara peninsula before settling in the township of London in 1835. Though he kept possession of his land until November 1848, Killaly tried his hand at farming only until 1837, when he secured an engineering post.

Killaly's arrival in Upper Canada coincided with lively consideration of the merits of railways, giving year-round service, versus water routes, which might be iced for about five months of the year. Many engineers of the day believed that railways were unsuited to the terrain of North America and to long hauls. In the mid-1820s, the provinces north of New York had responded to the Erie Canal by investigating the potentialities of railways. By the late 1830s, a number of railway inventors had elaborated a railway technology. In 1840 the United Kingdom had 1,331 miles of railway, the United States had 3,328 miles, and the Canadas had "our solitary famed fourteen miles between Laprairie and St Johns" in Lower Canada. This line was constructed by two engineers of New York – William R. Casey and Robert R. Livingston – and was opened for traffic in July 1836. The Upper Canada legislature had incorporated a company in 1834 to construct a line from Burlington Bay through the town of London to the navigable waters of the Thames River giving access to Lake St Clair, but when the line was begun in 1836 it was to run from Burlington Bay to Port Dover on Lake Erie to "divert a portion of the trade from that job of all jobs – the Welland Canal," as a newspaper put it.

Both military and commercial men in the Canadas desired to move material quickly to and from the Atlantic and the lakes, but their opinions sharply clashed over the use of the St Lawrence route, most of which formed the frontier with the United States. In view of the experience of the War of 1812, and of the Richard Rush–Sir Charles Bagot* agreement, few soldiers and no sailors believed that Britain could maintain a naval supremacy on the lakes by use of the St Lawrence route. Army extraordinaries had financed, and military engineers had built, an alternative to the St Lawrence route. This alternative followed the Ottawa and Rideau rivers to Kingston (a section completed in 1832) and contemplated that supplies in wartime would pass into the Bay of Quinte and go by the Trent River to Lake Simcoe. From Lake Simcoe, the contemplated route might have three branches: to Lake Huron by the Severn River, to Lake St Clair by the Thames, and to Lake Erie by the Grand River. In 1819 Wellington had expressed a preference for linking Lake Simcoe by railroads or canals direct to the Rideau's confluence with the Ottawa River. Another alternative to the St Lawrence route would follow the Ottawa and Mattawa rivers and Lake Nipissing to Lake Huron. Killaly, who was to be largely concerned with the building and improvement of canals, was to support for some 30 years the development of the St Lawrence route. This preference was to bring him into conflict with military men.

A lengthy association with the Welland Canal, an integral part of the St Lawrence route, began for Killaly in 1837. The Welland, opened in 1835 by the efforts of William Hamilton Merritt*, was now experiencing difficulties because of an urgent need for deepening and for repairs that could not be financed by private investors. The government of Upper Canada, preparing to step in, ordered a re-survey by (in the words of the act) "two scientific and practical Engineers." Nicol Hugh Baird* and Killaly reported early in 1838, whereupon Killaly again was unemployed. On 15 May of that year Killaly was appointed engineer of the Welland Canal Company, a post he kept until Lord Sydenham [Thomson*] appointed him chairman of the reorganized Board of Works of Lower Canada early in 1840. Killaly speedily prepared for Sydenham a master plan for public works in the two Canadas which he incorporated in a memorandum dated at Kingston on 12 August 1841. As early as May 1840 Sir George Arthur* was objecting to his scheme.

Killaly had become an executive councillor on 17 March 1841 and was also a member of the assembly. George Jervis Goodhue* had persuaded him to seek election in London and he had defeated John Douglas in the first union election on 8 April. Killaly professed to be out of his own milieu: "politics, politics – I had rather be a mason's attendant than have my brain confined in it – & every moment occupied in a manner so wholly contrary to my inclination," he wrote to Baird on 2 June 1841. Nor was his master plan for public works politically balanced: "You say I may expect a rowing for disposing so summarily of the Trent & Ottawa. I care not a cent for a rowing – nor do I consider how any report of mine will be received, favourably or otherwise. I act conscientiously – while I feel I do so, I care not what the world says." However, the major weakness of Killaly's master plan was that it under-estimated costs of construction, as was common before precise costing techniques were developed. It became known only in 1845 that his estimates fell far short of the costs.

On 17 Aug. 1841 royal assent was given to the statute by which the union Board of Works was established. Killaly fully understood that the act would centralize decision-making: "The truth is . . . now is a critical time for the profession in this country," he informed Baird on 23 July 1841, "for recollect I tell you that the establishment of the district councils & their district Engineers or Surveyors at 2 or 300 a year will use up all the business ex officis, which heretofore has been done by jobs and which has been some of the most profitable employment." Under the act only the board's chairman and secretary were salaried and they were forbidden to perform in other professions or callings. It was originally intended that the board would be composed of the principal officers of the government who would provide information "relating to the general bearing of the works," and the act authorized the governor general to appoint up to five persons to the board, one of whom would be chairman. Killaly acted as chairman even before his formal appointment on 29 Dec. 1841, along with Samuel Bealey Harrison* and John Davidson. All three were members of both the assembly and the Executive Council. Killaly's salary was lower than that of most of his council colleagues but the statutory basis of his post rendered him somewhat immune from politics. The secretary of the board was Thomas A. Begley. When the government assumed full control of the Welland Canal, Killaly, Harrison, and Dominick Daly* were appointed a board of directors on 16 Feb. 1842. Daly refused to serve and Davidson was appointed in his place. Finally, on 4 March 1842, the three were named commissioners for superintending and maintaining the Lachine Canal.

That October, a large loan guaranteed by the imperial government was made available for Canadian public works, including the six St Lawrence canals west of Lachine; these were, in Killaly's words about the Cornwall Canal, "so much exposed to annoyance from the American side, that it would not be possible, in the face of the enemy, to work a Boat. . . ." The St Lawrence canals competed with the four pre-existing canals on the Ottawa and Rideau rivers, and the strategists agreed that in wartime the St Lawrence canals would have to be destroyed to prevent them from falling to the Americans. Their value depended upon continuing peace.

Killaly's selection of the south side of the river St Lawrence for the Beauharnois Canal was one of the principal grounds of attack on Bagot's government in 1842; his tempo of work drew criticism in 1843 from his former patron, E. G. Stanley, now secretary of state for the colonies ("Lord Stanley thinks we are going too fast!!!").

In 1843, the governor general, Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe*, appointed Melchior-Alphonse d'Irumberry* de Salaberry to be aide-de-camp for Canada East without having first asked the opinion of his Executive Council. On plea of sustaining their influence by their having the final say on matters of patronage, and in furtherance of responsible government, on 27 Nov. 1843 Killaly and all other councillors except Dominick Daly officially resigned. Killaly did not resign as chairman of the Board of Works, however. During the time that he was in the Executive Council, Killaly seems to have been regarded not as a politician but, in the words of a naval officer, Captain Williams Sandom*, as "a talented and persevering engineer." It was in that character that Metcalfe retained his services as chairman of the board. He did not stand for election thereafter.

Meanwhile, the imperial government's interest in Canadian defence and in development of colonial communications forced a review of Killaly's work. His memorandum of 12 Aug. 1841 had discouraged work on the Trent, saying that it would cost much more than the current estimate and would never be of more than local importance. Just a few months earlier, on 31 March 1841, the Duke of Wellington had, on the other hand, stated that "Its completion will facilitate, if not render certain, all military operations. . . ." The two conflicting opinions were to be resolved, it was imagined, by a military and naval commission appointed confidentially to determine "the best mode of protecting the general line of communication and rendering it available in case of war for military purposes." In June 1844, Metcalfe directed Killaly to give the commission all information and assistance in his power. It consisted of Captain (later rear-admiral) Edward Boxer and Lieutenant-Colonel William Cuthbert Elphinstone Holloway. Boxer and Killaly quarrelled. Echoing others, Boxer though that "our only safety valve" was uniting all the British North American provinces under one government; and he was "decidedly of opinion that our safety depends entirely on a Railroad from Halifax to Port Sarnia." If Boxer's view ultimately prevailed, it was largely because Killaly's works and the later railways running across the international border at many points rendered Canadian defence so expensive that the British could not afford to maintain their guarantee of it.

Killaly grew unhappy in his job: "I would most cheerfully tomorrow take a permanent situation of 400 a year in any line or in any part of the Province," he wrote to Baird on 15 July 1844, predicting that, once the loan money for public works ran out, civil engineers would have a hard time making a decent livelihood in Canada. While the loan lasted, Killaly's operations employed many notable engineers including Charles Atherton, Alfred Barrett, George W. Cattley, Casimir Stanislaus Gzowski*, John Jackson, Samuel Keefer*, James Lyons, John B. Mills, and Freeman Talbot.

Dissatisfaction with the Board of Works finally led to a commission of inquiry, gazetted on 6 Sept. 1845, and consisting of William Cayley*, Frédéric-Auguste Quesnel*, George Sherwood* (who had earlier opposed Killaly's works and who did not sign the commission's report), Moses Judah Hays* and John Redpath*. The commission in effect recommended that the chairman be a politician to whom all engineers would be decidedly subordinate. On 9 June 1846, the soldier-governor Charles Murray Cathcart* assented to a statute which abolished the board and created instead the Department of Public Works. William Benjamin ROBINSON took over from Killaly, who had only sporadic appointments until June 1848, when Étienne-Paschal Taché*, chief commissioner of the department, invited him to accompany him on a tour to select projects for deletion in an economy drive. Though the measures taken included a reduction in staff, Taché recommended that Killaly take over superintendence of the Welland Canal from Samuel Keefer, Killaly's former subordinate in the Board of Works, who was now appointed to the departmental headquarters in Montreal. Killaly moved to St Catharines and sold his farm in London Township. In June 1849 and again in September Killaly took a leading part in founding the Canadian Institute (incorporated 5 November 1851) in the Toronto office of the architect Kivas Tully*.

On 15 Feb. 1851, Killaly was appointed assistant commissioner of public works and became virtually the department's permanent deputy head with no seat in the legislature or in the council. In 1858–59 he served under chief commissioners Louis-Victor Sicotte* and John Rose*, both of whom felt it necessary to reassert political supremacy; Killaly's position was abolished by legislation assented to on 26 March 1859. His competence as an engineer was widely recognized, but his judgement on matters of policy was open to fair criticism and his capacity for financial administration may be inferred from his remark in 1850 about the audit procedure (there was a departmental pre-payment audit followed by a post-payment audit by non-departmental auditors): "What earthly use there is in this Roundabout I never could see."

In consequence of the departmental reorganization of 1859, Samuel Keefer, of the Board of Railway Inspectors, was appointed deputy commissioner on 6 May 1859. Killaly's only public office was that of inspector of railways, but he seems to have devoted little time to this office for Keefer reported that during the years 1859 and 1860 he had himself inspected 149 miles of line (including the Victoria Bridge) while Killaly and the assistant inspector, A. De Grassi, had together inspected a total of less than 132 miles. Nonetheless, Killaly kept close records of changes in the system of transportation within the province, and referred to himself as "general Inspector of Railways."

In 1855, Killaly had taken up residence in Toronto in a commodious dwelling on Wellington Place. The property had been part of the ordnance lands, ownership of which was a contentious issue between the imperial and Canadian governments so that he never had clear title.

Similar confusion existed about the naval reserves – lands set aside for naval defence. The Admiralty had decided before the American Civil War broke out to investigate the status of its long-neglected naval reserves. However, its representative, Captain Richard Collinson*, R.N., did not arrive in Canada until after the war had erupted. The War Office's representative was Lieutenant-Colonel Bernard Whittingham, R.E., and on 18 July 1861 the Canadian government appointed Killaly to represent it on the commission of inquiry. To Killaly the officers "appeared . . . to consider themselves confined strictly to reporting upon the simple matters of the Titles under which each Naval Reserve was held – its situation and extent – and its value; upon most of those ordinary points, full information could have been furnished, in a few hours, from the Crown Land Office here, without the appointment and expense of any Special Commission." Consequently, Killaly induced the officers to join him in a wide-ranging inquiry that took the three into the United States and its waters. Collinson submitted the information on naval reserves to the Admiralty; Killaly submitted his own report on defence to the Canadian government which was not, however, prepared to expend funds for this purpose (an imperial responsibility). Killaly's report nevertheless served to alert the government of Canada to the deplorable state of colonial defence.

Late in 1861 the Trent affair made relations between the United States and Great Britain especially tense. The commander of the forces in British North America, Sir William Fenwick Williams*, made a hurried trip to inspect the virtually non-existent defences west of Kingston. The Executive Council placed Killaly's services at Williams' disposal. The general's aide, Captain Francis W. De Winton, noted Killaly's usefulness to the hero of Kars: "no man knows the country better; he has a strong, clear, practical head." A number of erroneous deployments were made, but fortunately for British rule in North America the crisis cooled.

On 6 Feb. 1862, Lord Charles Stanley Monck* appointed a royal commission to report on a system of fortification and defence. Colonel John William Gordon, R.E., was chairman, the members being Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Lynedoch Gardiner, R.A., and Killaly. Captain William Crossman, R.E., was secretary. Colonel Edward R. Wetherall (Williams' chief of staff) and Captain John Bythesea, R.N., were added on 31 March. Killaly was included because a civilian's presence would, according to the secretary of state for war, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, "be of value in conciliating the feelings of the colonists towards the commission and giving them confidence in its recommendations," the adoption of which (according to the imperial authorities only) "must in the main be matter for consideration and decision of the Provincial Authorities." Besides a fleet of 72 gunboats on Lake Ontario and the St Lawrence, the commission's report of 6 September recommended a new naval base to replace Kingston, 18,000 effectives in Canada East and 47,000 in Canada West, enlargement of canals and an Intercolonial Railway, and so many fortifications that one official asked: "What is the good of all these little forts? They can detain an enemy for a very short time, must eventually fall. Why waste troops to defend them and money to build them?" But the last word ought, perhaps, to be left to J. F. Burgoyne, then inspector-general of fortifications. When he read the Gordon report, Burgoyne concluded that the loss of Canada was certain. Loyally, he did not blame Killaly's canals. His analysis was that "the perpetual bugbear of the invasion of Canada" had induced imperial diplomacy to surrender "the most advantageous military positions" to the United States in order to placate the "arrogant bullying system" of the Americans.

From 1862 until 1874 Killaly seems to have lived in quiet retirement. He sold "his" house on Wellington Place and was making arrangements to build a new residence near Picton in March 1874, when he died and was buried in Toronto. The bane of John Langton*'s life as auditor-general, he was also a vividly remembered personality, a genial gentleman, and a superlative engineer.

Geo. Mainer

PAC, RG 4, B29, 6, 15 Sept. 1861; RG 7, G9, 38, pp.140–41; G19, 31; G21, 74, G. C. Lewis to W. F. Williams, 15, 28 Feb. 1862; 165, T. C. Weir to Sidney Herbert, 11 Feb. 1860, Newcastle to Head, 26 April 1860. PAO, W. H. Merritt papers, 13 May 1843, 1 April 1850. PRO, CO 42/492, 228–29, 230, 243–44, 253, 309; 42/496, 138–40, 202–5, 208–31, 288; 42/498, 1, 37; 42/504, 134; 42/509, 542; 42/524, 187–232; 42/532, 389, 395–405; 42/533, 378; WO 1/540; 55/1/551. [J. F. Burgoyne], Life and correspondence of Field Marshal Sir John Burgoyne, Bart., ed. George Wrottesley (2v., London, 1873), I, 389–90; II, 405–7. Chronicle and Gazette and Weekly Commercial Advertiser (Kingston), 5 March, 31 Aug. 1836; 25 Jan. 1837. Examiner (Peterborough), 22 Jan. 1943. Examiner (Toronto), 16 March 1842. Pilot and Journal of Commerce (Montreal), 22 July 1848. Weekly Dispatch (Peterborough), 7 Oct. 1847. A catalogue of graduates who have proceeded to degrees in the University of Dublin . . . with supplements to December 16, 1868, ed. J. H. Todd (Dublin and London, 1869), 320.

KING, RICHARD, doctor, Arctic explorer, ethnologist, and writer; b. probably in 1810 in London, Eng., son of Richard King; m. in 1857 to Elizabeth Lumley by whom he had at least one son; d. in London on 4 Feb. 1876.

In 1820 Richard King entered St Paul's School in London; in 1824 he began a seven-year apprenticeship with an apothecary. The Society of Apothecaries granted him their licence in 1832. His medical degree is believed to have been granted by the University of St Andrews in Fife, Scotland; however, their records for that period are defective and the supposition cannot be proved. It was as a surgeon and naturalist that King set out in 1833 with Captain George Back's Arctic land expedition in search of Captain John Ross*, then four years absent on a search for a northwest passage.

King, although second in command, was in large part responsible for the success of the expedition. The two men evidently worked well enough together in the field, even though Back created unnecessary difficulties in King's task of collecting natural history specimens. On the outward journey to the northwest, King had charge of the main party and the heavy supplies, while Back hurried ahead in a light canoe to prepare for the exploration of the Great Fish River (Back River). After his return, Back set out as early as possible for England again leaving King in charge of the main party with instructions that were all but impossible to carry out.

Back, of course, wrote the official narrative of the expedition, to which King contributed botanical and meteorological appendices. In addition, King published his own account which is, in many respects, the better book. King showed a deeper understanding of the Indians and, although his share of the work had been far more arduous than Back's, he did not exaggerate, as Back did, the hardships of the journey. He differed from Back on some material geographical points and he made it clear that he thought the expedition might have been better managed and might have accomplished much more – so much more that he had decided, "while yet tented on the shores of the Polar Sea, to form the project of returning to resume the search at the point where Captain Back had terminated his labours. . . ." For 22 years King attempted unsuccessfully to secure support for this project: principally because of Back's persuasive and unfriendly influence in higher places than those to which King had access, he always failed.

King considered the completion of the survey of the northern coast of North America to be the great geographical problem of the time, one that would help to settle the practicability of a northwest passage. In 1836 he proposed to solve the problem of Boothia Isthmus, a feature placed by John Ross on his map of the area on the basis of Eskimo report only. If the isthmus existed, then King thought – rightly, as it turned out – that the land north of it, named North Somerset (now Somerset Island) by Ross, was a part of the northern coast, and that Boothia Peninsula, rather than Melville Peninsula, was the most northeastern point of the continent.

When the colonial secretary refused his proposal, King opened a public subscription for the £1,000 he needed. Response was favourable until the Admiralty decided to send Back in Terror to the northwest coast of Hudson Bay with orders to cross overland to the Gulf of Boothia and explore the unknown territory by boat. At the same time the Hudson's Bay Company refused to support King but sent, instead, their own men, Peter Warren Dease* and Thomas Simpson*, to explore the other two unknown sections of the northern coast, one in Alaska, the other between Coronation Gulf and the Back River. King believed that his own initiative had stimulated both expeditions.

Back's expedition was a failure and he turned home after a winter beset in Hudson Bay. Dease and Simpson, using small parties of the kind King had advocated and with some of the same men he had wished to take, were entirely successful.

In 1842 King again submitted his proposal, still insisting on the importance of the coast between the Back River and Melville Peninsula. With a small expedition in canoes, he planned to work northward from Back River along the east coast of Chantrey Inlet. If Boothia proved to be an island, they would soon reach Fury and Hecla Strait and, by passing through it, quickly complete the northern configuration of the continent. But if the isthmus did exist, he planned to follow the land to its northern limit, to see how it connected with land to the eastward, and, if he found it separated by a sufficient width, to solve at last "the grand problem of a practicable passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific. . . ." Once again, his proposal was refused.

When, in 1845, King first heard of the expedition planned by Sir John Franklin*, he strongly urged that a land party be sent in support of it. And when, in 1847, no word had been received from Franklin, King was one of the first to raise alarm for the expedition's safety. Although his understanding of Franklin's orders was at that time imperfect (they had not yet been made public), he declared without hesitation that Franklin's expedition would be found on "the Western land of North Somerset." He reached the right conclusion, according to the historian R. J. Cyriax, from extremely questionable premises. As better information became available, he argued the same points more firmly, insisting with his own peculiar vehemence that the only efficient means of reaching the lost expedition was by way of Back River. In 1847 he offered to lead an expedition there and to guide Franklin's men to depots of food that he wanted laid down in 1848. He was refused. In 1848 Admiralty sent out three relief expeditions, and many others followed in succeeding years, until nearly the whole Arctic – except where King said the expedition was to be found – had been combed. Among all the Arctic experts, only Sir Edward BELCHER, Frederick William Beechey*, and Lady Franklin (Jane GRIFFIN) supported King's views in any way. In 1850 Lady Franklin sent William Kennedy* in her ship Prince Albert to search near the mouth of the Back River, but he did not fully carry out his orders and the object of his voyage remained unattained. Finally, in 1854, John Rae* unexpectedly learned from Eskimos in Pelly Bay of the death of a large number of white men not far to the west, near the mouth of the Back River.

All this time, King had persistently and noisily urged, as a matter of logic as well as of life and death, the necessity of a search exactly where the tragedy took place. Although the authorities rejected his opinions and proposals, the journals of the day took them up with enthusiastic sympathy. His appeal to the public – a thoroughly ungentlemanly thing to do – increased the animosity felt toward him by officers of the Admiralty, the Royal Geographical Society, and the HBC. In 1855 King reviewed his unwavering position in a book, The Franklin expedition from first to last, and, with a sarcastic wit that was frequently unpleasant, he spared none of his opponents. In 1856 he offered for the fifth time to descend the Back River, this time to search for Franklin's records, and, later in the year, he renewed the offer in a joint plan with Bedford Pim*. It was, however, only in 1859 that Sir Francis Leopold M'Clintock*, sent by Lady Franklin at her own expense on a final search, examined the right place, and it was he who brought home the single record found, together with other evidences of the expedition's final distress. If any of King's many offers had been taken up, it is possible that more records might have been found. However, even if the Admiralty had acted on his first proposal in 1847, it is doubtful whether any of Franklin's men could have been saved. It has even been suggested that it may have been, in part, King's very insistence that discouraged the authorities from looking where he said to search.

The nearest to official acknowledgement that King had for his efforts and for the correctness of his views is an obscure reference in the revised third edition of M'Clintock's The fate of Sir John Franklin: the voyage of the "Fox" ... (1869; first ed., 1859). Sir Roderick Murchison, president of the Royal Geographical Society, observed in a footnote to his preface, "Amidst the various recent publications, it is but rendering justice to Dr. King ... to state that he suggested and always maintained the necessity of a search for the missing navigators at or near the mouth of the Back River."

Although King is chiefly remembered for his share in Back's land expedition, 1833–35, and for his polemical role in the Franklin search, he led an active and useful life in medicine and learned pursuits. In 1842 he issued a prospectus that resulted in the formation of the Ethnological Society of London, of which he was the first secretary. In 1871 the society amalgamated with the Anthropological Society to form what is today the Royal Anthropological Society of Great Britain and Ireland; King remained on the council. He wrote many ethnological and medical papers of considerable value. His two small books on cholera and on the cause of death in still-born infants were important in their time, and he received a number of medical appointments and honours.

ALAN COOKE

[George Back, Narrative of the Arctic land expedition to the mouth of the Great Fish River, and along the shores of the Arctic Ocean, in the years 1833, 1834, and 1835 (London, 1836). Richard King, Narrative of a journey to the shores of the Arctic Ocean, in 1833, 1834, and 1835, under the command of Capt. Back (2v., London, 1836); The Franklin expedition from first to last (London, 1855); "On the industrial arts of the Esquimaux," Ethnological Society of London, Journal, I (1848), 277–300; "On the intellectual character of the Esquimaux," Ethnological Society of London, Journal, I (1848), 127–52; "On the unexplored coast of North America," London, Edinburgh, and Dublin Philosophical Magazine and Journal of Science, 3rd ser., XX (1842), 488–94. F. L. M'Clintock, Fate of Sir John Franklin: the voyage of the "Fox" in the Arctic seas ... (1st ed., London, 1859; 3rd ed., revised and enlarged, London, 1869), vii–xviii.

DNB: the biography of Richard King contains many inaccuracies including a confusion with another man of the same name who served as assistant-surgeon on Resolute during Horatio Thomas Austin*'s 1850–51 expedition, and who won the polar medal. R. J. Cyriax, Sir John Franklin's last Arctic expedition ... a chapter in the history of the Royal Navy (London, 1939). F. J. Woodward, Portrait of Jane: a life of Lady Franklin (London, 1951). R. J. Cyriax, "Sir James Clark Ross and the Franklin expedition," Polar Record (Cambridge, Eng.), III (1942), 528–40. This biography is also based on information supplied to the author by Mr Hugh Wallace from his personal correspondence. A.C.]

KIROUAC, LÉON. See KÉROUAC

KRIEGHOFF (Kreighoff), CORNELIUS, painter; b. 1815 at Amsterdam, Holland, son of Johann Ernst Krieghoff, a coffee-house servant, who in 1811, at Amsterdam, had married Isabella Ludivica Wauters; d. 9 March 1872 at Chicago, Illinois.

Cornelius Krieghoff, the third of four children, learned the rudiments of music and painting from his father. At the age of 16 he was sent to relatives at Schweinfurt, Bavaria, to study painting. He returned to Düsseldorf two years later, where his parents had been living since about 1815–20; he no doubt studied here the works of artists who had been trained at its academy. Under the direction of their professor, Wilhelm von Schadow, these artists devoted themselves to genre painting, and presented similar subjects: card-players, drunkards, tricksters, outings, and children's festivities. At the beginning of 1837 Krieghoff sailed for New York. There he enlisted as a volunteer in the American army, at a time of war against the Seminole Indians of Florida. On 5 May 1840, after three years in uniform as an artist, he was discharged at Burlington, Vermont. His services had earned him the rank of corporal. There is a record of his marriage, at Manhatten, to Louise Gauthier, dit Saint-Germain, a French Canadian. This is about all we know of Krieghoff before his arrival in Canada.

Anything else is a matter of hypothesis. His father, who apparently became a maker of carpets in Düsseldorf and also in Schweinfurt, was interested in arts and music. Young Cornelius is thought to have learned to play the violin, the guitar, the flute, and the piano. After his father's death, he travelled with a friend, probably an artist like himself. Little is known about his travels. He may have spent two years at Rotterdam with his mother's parents, and studied painting there. He was in Austria, Italy, and France, and then returned to Holland. His talents as a musician and painter do not seem to have been great enough to earn him a livelihood in Germany. He sailed for New York. For what reasons? To see his brother Ernst, who was settled at Toronto? To try his luck in America? Love of adventure? No doubt all of these. Unfortunately, the numerous pen and pencil drawings – about 100 – that he made while serving in the American army have been lost, and it is impossible to form an idea of this first artistic work. The circumstances attending his leaving the army and his marriage remain rather obscure. On the very day of his discharge, he rejoined the army, then deserted. The fact of his meeting Louise Gauthier perhaps explains his behaviour. Born at Longueuil, near Montreal, she had worked as a servant in New York. The reaction of her father, a fairly well-to-do farmer, to the announcement of the marriage is not known. Finally, there is no link which would make it possible to determine what influence American genre painting may have had on Krieghoff's work.

The young couple decided to leave the United States and settle in Canada. They went to Toronto. The reasons for their choice, and the length of their stay, are unknown. Ernst Krieghoff no doubt advised his brother to take up residence in Toronto because of its artistic activities. He owned a studio of photography, and was probably acquainted with the possibilities open to a young artist. Cornelius worked as a professional painter, belonged to an art circle, and exhibited at the Toronto Society of Artists in 1847. But all had not gone according to his wishes, since by that date he had already left Toronto for Longueuil; two years later he went to Montreal to live. In five years there he occupied four different dwellings.

Montreal did not bring good fortune any more than had Toronto or New York. His pictures would not sell: he went from door to door and offered his paintings for $5 or $10 each. The merchants and important businessmen had scant interest in painting, and furthermore Krieghoff's subjects held little attraction for them. They could not look too favourably upon scenes, costumes, and dwelling-places that reminded them of their peasant origins. He was expected rather to do paintings of horses imported from England, and signs for banks and stores. In fact Cornelius Krieghoff became more or less a housepainter in order to provide for his wife and their daughter Emily, who had been born in 1841.

The city of Quebec, however, possessed an aristocracy, formed of military men of a certain standing and other officers, who attached some importance to things of the mind. Moreover in the colleges and in society numerous literary, philosophical, and musical circles were being formed. At the Petit Séminaire of Quebec alone, more than seven societies came into being. People liked to meet to discuss literature, hear a play, and also on occasion talk about painting [see Octave CRÉMAZIE]. But this discussion was hardly art criticism; the aesthetic concerns of European art centres were on a quite different level. The English officers liked to send their families a canvas on which was perpetuated some typical scene of the Canadian countryside or its people. The merchant wanted to have his own portrait, a tangible sign of his importance.

In 1851 Krieghoff had an opportunity to make contact with a representative of this society. John Budden, an auctioneer for A. J. Maxham and Company, met him at Montreal and bought some pictures from him. Did Budden make certain proposals to Krieghoff? Did he know him already or was this the first meeting? We do not know. But the pictures must certainly have captivated people in Quebec, for three years later Budden again met Krieghoff at Montreal and brought him to Quebec with his family. This new migration seems to have been carried out without much enthusiasm. Once more the family had to leave an environment to which they had become accustomed, and their relatives. Ernst had come to take up residence at Montreal with his wife and three children, and Cornelius would apparently have liked his brother to follow him to Quebec.

Cornelius Krieghoff resided at Quebec for 11 years: 11 years of intense productivity, 11 years of prosperity. Budden shared his house with the Krieghoff family, and introduced the painter to his friends and acquaintances. The artist met influential people, and was even host to the governor general, Lord Elgin [Bruce*]. Too much importance should not be attached to this visit, but undoubtedly such marks of esteem contributed greatly to the growth of Krieghoff's popularity. With Budden, he took numerous trips around Quebec, to see people and landscapes and to familiarize himself with ways of living. Two schools asked him to give a few hours' teaching: the Quebec School for Young Ladies and Miss Plimsoll's establishment. His teaching seems to have been confined to having his pupils copy his own paintings.

During the year 1854 Krieghoff went to Europe for six or eight months. Little has been discovered about this voyage. We do not know if he went alone, his reasons for going, or the countries he visited. To a desire to see once more the places of his youth were probably added practical reasons, such as the opportunity to make a show of his popularity and to meet the English publishers who had made engravings of his works. He may have stayed two months in Paris, where he sold a collection of Canadian plants assembled during his excursions in the woods. Of his alleged stay in Germany nothing is known. This voyage does not seem to have had great importance from the strictly artistic point of view, for Krieghoff's manner underwent no change during the succeeding years.

The same was apparently not true of his family life. His wife disappeared, but no one knows when or how. Some say that she left Krieghoff, discreetly, after they arrived at Quebec; others assert that she died at Longueuil in 1858 after a short illness. However, the Archives Judiciaires of Quebec and Longueuil possess no death certificate in the name of Louise Gauthier for the year 1858. Krieghoff may have had a second wife, about whom we are ignorant. His life is thus hardly known, and the most important sources of information about Krieghoff are indubitably his paintings.

Krieghoff's art found its inspiration in everyday life and in the countryside surrounding Quebec. No mythological painting came from his studio. Was it through ignorance of the ancient literatures? It does not seem so, for he possessed a well-stocked library and had seen European paintings in museums. There are also no nudes; the one he painted, around 1844, was a cause of some scandal in his entourage. Religious themes are rare too: no Pietà, no Madonna with child, no Vision. He did paint a few religious pictures, but they are really studies of manners with religion a pretext for a subject.

Cornelius Krieghoff was a genre painter. He was interested not in what had happened once at a given spot, but in what was going on every day around him. His characters are not important individuals in themselves; rather they present an image of a particular profession or social group, or of people of a particular age. The humour that breaks through in the majority of his canvases gives to his work an air of gaiety which recalls the great age of genre painting, the Dutch 17th century.

Genre painting in the 19th century is part of a wider phenomenon that René Jullian has rightly called paysannerie. The peasant world did occupy some place in the minds of artists and writers before this period, but it was not a major preoccupation. Even when they became interested in the peasant, they surrounded exact details with an idealized setting, as in the novels of George Sand. In painting, Millet directed his art exclusively towards paysannerie, as we see in "La Barateuse," "The Winnower," and many others. In the same way Courbet wanted "living art" in his "Stonebreakers," "Vendange à Ornans," and "Paysans de Flagey revenant de la foire." Novelists, such as Max Buchon and Balzac, described peasant customs at length, and showed various social groups in opposition. In Spain, Leonardo Alenza y Nieto, an admirable costumbrista, was untiring in his descriptions of the maja, the casuchas, the poor, and all the little people of Madrid. Krieghoff also made peasant life his principal theme. Without seeking to idealize, he depicted numerous scenes showing the customs and landscapes of a given region, and his regionalism thus linked him with this artistic movement of the 19th century. In the same way as Max Buchon and Courbet revealed Franche-Comté, and Alenza portrayed Madrid types, Krieghoff took the inhabitants of Quebec as his theme.

Krieghoff was interested in the imposing natural setting of the town of Quebec, and made it a favourite theme. The main subject of many of his pictures is the landscape. Landscape appeared tardily in Canadian painting with the first efforts of Joseph Légaré*. Krieghoff seems indeed to have been the first to take a constant interest in landscapes. Untiringly, he painted the rich colours of autumn at the moment when the forests are decked with the brightest vermilions, dazzling yellows, and deep greens. Many have taken him to task for using over-bright colours, without being aware of the brilliance of the Quebec forests in the autumn, when, for example, a sheet of water doubles their image. The mother-of-pearl whiteness of winter appealed to his palette just as strongly, and he has given us a great variety of landscapes in which firs and birches share the vast expanses of snow. Mountains pleased him equally, and serve as a backdrop for many compositions whose principal theme is the Canadian farm. Generally his attention was taken by a squalid looking dwelling. He has been reproached for painting tumble-down houses rather than the lavish seigneurial mansions of the Beaupré shore, and admittedly he has not left many pictures representing the aristocracy, but it is useless to hold this against him. His farms are pleasing because of their calm and realistic character. The little house with the pointed roof, the shelter where firewood and tools are to be seen, the shed some distance away, the sleigh pulled by a workhorse, the children playing in the snow: here was the spectacle that the Quebec countryside set before him. Often a stream runs through his paintings, or a lake occupies the centre of the composition. The river motif returns frequently, and he has left images of the Montmorency as well as of the lakes close to Quebec.

Krieghoff observed the work people did, and transposed its picturesque aspects to his canvas. He liked to represent the sugaring-off time, when the whole family shared in gathering the sap of the maple and the mother busied herself boiling the liquid under a shelter of planks. With tireless enthusiasm he repeated hunting scenes in the great forests. Wearing snowshoes and heavily clothed, the hunters pursue the stag and exhaust it in the soft snow before bringing it down. Sometimes it is their conquered victim that is the centre of the composition. He also portrayed trappers at work or workers busy laying in stocks of ice.

But Krieghoff's most engaging theme is perhaps that of people enjoying themselves. The inn scenes show gatherings of jolly fellows who are having a fling, dancing and drinking copiously. The canvas called "Merrymaking" is undoubtedly his greatest success with this group. Other scenes at the Jolifou Inn similarly delight by their spontaneity. The men have gone to get the horses from the stable, and harness them either to a heavy sleigh or to an elegant carriage. Meanwhile, the women are taking their leave on the inn porch or giving their husbands the blankets that have been carefully warmed to protect them from the cold during the journey. Others are adjusting their snow-shoes. The "fiddler" has come out, violin and bottle in hand, and takes the first step of a dance, to the amusement of the people around.

It is well known that at this period the French Canadians valued their horses greatly: the animal's beauty, and his skill and speed, were important to them. On many occasions Krieghoff depicted wild rides on the snow and ice, and the moment when two teams entered into competition. He often represents a low sleigh on which two or three men stand to travel over the countryside. At that time Montmorency Falls drew people of every class because of its varied attractions. The great frozen plain was eminently suitable for drives, and the women of fashion showed off their rich finery. The men guided their elaborate and high-spirited teams with an air of pride. The enormous ice cone at the foot of the falls delighted sliders, who found this place less formal than the slide before the citadel. Drinks were even served in a little room set up in the cone itself. The seminary of Quebec possesses an admirable print of Krieghoff's representing this place, with dozens of small figures enjoying themselves in a fairylike setting. Even the games of children – who are numerous in Krieghoff's work – captured his attention. They are most lively when they are coming out of school: they jostle each other, organize snowball fights, or slide on brightly coloured toboggans.

Travellers often appear in the artist's pictures. A canoe glides silently over the water or passes between banks covered with vegetation. Even in the 19th century the canoe was still a principal means of locomotion. There were portages around rapids and dangerous spots; it might be necessary to risk paddling between blocks of ice, or to hoist the canoe onto a frozen surface and then put it back in the water: all this in icy temperatures. These were the conditions under which the mail was dispatched from Quebec to Lévis and travellers ventured the crossing. Each year the Quebec carnival revives these perilous scenes, which Krieghoff has immortalized. Other kinds of locomotion – horse and snow-shoe – offered material for interesting studies.

Paintings of the fur trade with the Indians and the transporting of pelts give an opportunity to observe men, rough and strong, who resemble the lumbermen of today. The pedlar, the timber merchant, the go-between, even customers of the general store appear in this world of tough, grasping individuals.

Religious scenes are infrequent in Krieghoff's work. The mystical aspect of convent life, the activities of clergy or nuns, interested him little. When he did portray a member of the clergy, Krieghoff sought rather to express a tension between two social groups. One thinks of "Le Carême": the parish priest calls on a family unexpectedly and finds that they are feasting away royally. This is a grave offence against religious precepts and against the priest, who expected every home to take his rigorous teaching seriously.

The Indians, also, are a rich source of inspiration for Krieghoff. No doubt he came into contact with them in the United States, during the expedition to Florida. At Montreal he painted the Indians of Caughnawaga, and at Quebec, those of Lorette. The majority of scenes are situated in the Laurentians, where the Indians are portrayed in habitual dress and their special way of life. He shows their sleighs, their mocassins, their great bright-coloured cloaks. Women place their children near a fire, in a basket made of branches or leather thongs, and prepare a meal, while the men smoke their long pipes. Or else we see Indians with baskets they have made for sale. This social group, still strongly individualized at the time, had in Krieghoff a sympathetic and prolific interpreter.

Krieghoff as a portrait-painter had a period of real celebrity. "He shows us the old Canadien, with keen, clear eye, slightly hooked nose, mat complexion, cheeks ruddy and brightened by the winter cold, and graying side-whiskers, which frame the face of a man wrapped and buttoned up to his neck in his cloak of local cloth." As well as these portraits, in which he reproduced the features of those who lived around him, he did others of important people, for example, Lord Elgin. The McCord Museum at Montreal possesses a fine portrait of this governor. Krieghoff has also left us an interesting portrait of his friend John Budden. Elegantly garbed in check trousers and a golden-brown jacket, he is in a restful pose, nonchalantly seated by a stretch of water. Behind him he has placed his tall hat, his gun, and his game-bag. Krieghoff did not miss the opportunity to recall his subject's partiality towards hunting. The scene stands out against a background of forest and heavy rocks.

Krieghoff painted an enormous number of pictures, and it is at present impossible to determine exactly the extent of his work. From the catalogue of 500 pictures established by Charles-Marius Barbeau*, a number must be removed. On the other hand, many should be added. He seems to have painted some 700 pictures. Nine were destroyed in the chamber of the Legislative Assembly when the parliament of Quebec was burned down in 1881, others have been stolen. A re-evaluation of Krieghoff's art would necessitate a systematic effort to establish an exact catalogue of his works. While this task remains to be done, fresh information may come to light but Krieghoff's work cannot be known in all its complexity.

Krieghoff does not seem to have done any engraving himself, but he may have had works lithographed during 1848, that is during his stay at Montreal. Lithography, a new technique, had been invented in 1796 and had become popular in Europe during the 1820s. In 1848 Krieghoff had four of his paintings lithographed by the firm of Borum in Munich. These lithographs, dedicated to Lord Elgin, were sold by subscription. Then a Philadelphia company published two prints representing beggars: "Pour l'amour du bon Dieu!" and "Va au Diable!" In 1860 John Weals of London published at least two engravings: "Passengers and mail crossing the river," and "Indian chief." The seminary of Quebec possesses an excellent coloured engraving representing "The Ice Cone at the Falls of Montmorency." This print was made by the lithographic studios of Day and Son of London, and published by the Ackermann Company.

Was Krieghoff a prolific sketcher? It seems not, since no known drawing of his now exists. For some years it was thought that an admirable book of 36 sketches, representing several sites at Montreal, was his work, but it has now been proved that these are by James Duncan*. Krieghoff's impulsive temperament was probably ill suited to lengthy study; he painted from life and without the help of preliminary sketches.

Krieghoff is perhaps one of the most controversial Canadian artists. Some praise him to the skies, others cannot find sufficiently uncomplimentary expressions to apply to his work. In the 19th century Krieghoff seems to have been much appreciated, and to have sold his paintings easily. At Quebec, the English officers, who liked to buy souvenirs for their families, were ready purchasers of his pictures, offered at trifling prices. This popularity can be confirmed from the auction sales organized by the firm of Maxham to which Budden belonged.

On 1 Aug. 1861, Le Journal de Québec announced for 7 August a sale of engravings collected by Krieghoff. On 21 December the same paper announced a sale of 100 of his works, mentioning "Divertissement" ["Merrymaking?"] and "The Alchemist." The lot included copies after English and other masters. It was stated that "this is the last and sole opportunity to procure works from the pencil of Mr. Kreighoff, since he is soon leaving for Europe." But the sale seems not to have taken place, for almost the same announcement appeared on 27 March 1862. This time the lot sold fairly well, since on 13 December the firm announced the sale of the remainder of the lot, that is 30 paintings with Canadian subjects and a few engravings. On 13 December also, Le Journal de Québec informed its readers of the sale of his collection of stuffed birds, of coins and Chinese curios, and particularly of his library, made up of 1,200 volumes, historical and scientific as well as classical. His library can therefore be considered among the large private libraries, the majority of which in the first half of the 19th century contained less than 500 volumes. This sale casts new light on the painter's personality. His vast curiosity and his collector's tastes prove indeed that Krieghoff was not the gay dog, the tippler and roisterer, that people have taken pleasure in presenting, by identifying him too readily with certain figures in his paintings.

After Krieghoff left Quebec, works still appeared on the market. Thus, on 18 Oct. 1870, Le Journal de Québec announced a sale of paintings from Europe and "some Canadian, Russian, and English subjects by Krieghoff." There was apparently no auction sale of Krieghoff's works before 1862, but before he left the artist wanted to sell off his works, his collections, and even his furniture. It would therefore be an exaggeration to say that it was the auctioneers of the firm of Maxham who launched Krieghoff, by ordering pictures from him which would fetch a good price thanks to skilful publicity. The truth seems simpler. Krieghoff sold his pleasing, lively canvases regularly to art lovers. On the eve of his departure, his friend Budden helped to sell his collections and works by putting them up for auction.

The announcement of his leaving Quebec in 1862 raises a few problems. The artist does not appear to have gone to Europe. It seems more likely that he rejoined his daughter Emily and lived with her from then on. Her first husband had been Lieutenant Hamilton Burnett, whom she had married at Quebec; her second was Count de Wendt, a Russian who had emigrated to Chicago. At the end of his life, Krieghoff may have visited Quebec and Montreal. On 9 March 1872 he died suddenly at Chicago.

In the 20th century two currents of opinion have formed, while the commercial value of his works continues to soar. In 1893 John George Bourinot* first praised Krieghoff in his volume Our intellectual strength and weakness. He commended him as the first painter to draw attention to the beauty of Canadian scenes, and George Moore Fairchild* corroborated this judgement in 1907. Henri-Arthur Scott exaggerated so grossly the value of this artist that it was easy to foresee an eventual reaction in the opposite direction. Scott, lost in admiration, exclaimed: "We have seen paintings of Krieghoff, sunsets of a brilliancy that truly recalls the marvellous splendours of the western sky, and permits us to affirm that the richness of his palette was in no way inferior to the finest examples of this genre in the museums of Europe. But why then is this painter not known over there, not placed among the great landscape-painters, the Corots, the Courbets, the Ziems, the Théodore Rousseaus? He painted our 'few acres of snow,' and this was not enough to stir up public opinion in Europe." In 1925 Newton McFaul MacTavish*, speaking of Krieghoff's talent for caricaturing the types that he encountered, compared him to William Hogarth.

But from 1922 on another current of opinion was appearing, a current created and fed by French Canadians alone. Pierre-Georges Roy* stated that Krieghoff's painting could not be valued highly as an artistic achievement. If his paintings sold well it was because he was a foreigner, and was the only one to have treated local subjects. These opinions have clashed and contradicted each other particularly since 1934, the year of the publication of Marius Barbeau's romanticized study. Numerous criticisms of Krieghoff have appeared in reviews and journals; some have been openly hostile. Jean Chauvin reproached him with liking "the common people, carousing, noisy merrymaking, and knock-about farce," and with putting his farmers "in huts that looked more like pigsties." Two years later Maurice Hébert derided Krieghoff's characters in violent language. "What Prussian faces they display, or should we say Bavarian or Dutch snouts! One of the men lifts a glass of spirits, rubs his belly, licks his chops, and slobbers, all in a grossly stupid manner." Gérard Morisset* took up these judgements on his own account, and amplified them. According to him, "this painter is a gay dog who does not disdain to souse with his monied clientele; he turns out pictures, as a manufacturer would, which are within everybody's grasp because of the carousing that he depicts, the besotted faces of his figures, the rather crude comedy of his genre scenes, and his autumn landscapes with their violent and loud colours." It is true that his canvases please people. Since 1847 the majority of the exhibitions of traditional Canadian art have included pictures by Krieghoff. The 163 paintings exhibited in 1934 caused a stir of interest around Krieghoff, and the prices of his works have not ceased to rise. His paintings sell now for $8,000, $18,000, and even $45,000.

Misunderstandings have distorted many judgements passed on Krieghoff's art. Certain critics, aristocratic in their taste, wanted grand subjects, noble and worthy themes. Krieghoff, they say, ought to have used a bold brush to paint a complete panorama of French Canadian life in the 19th century. If he had depicted the aristocracy, the rich manor-houses and the stately ceremonies of the period, he would have been pardoned an occasional incursion into less exalted fields. But to devote his entire art to peasants, and to the humble setting in which their undistinguished life unfolded, was unthinkable. He is blamed in addition for not being a truly Canadian artist, and for drawing his inspiration too narrowly from the 17th century Dutch. Are we so certain that Krieghoff always wanted to be a "Canadian" artist? Did not his clientele like to buy "Russian and English" subjects, as we can see from Le Journal de Québec of 18 Oct. 1870? Numerous canvases certainly recall the Dutch, but the attitudes of the characters and the details of the composition are indeed Krieghoff's. Disappointed at not finding in him all the aspects they would like to see, certain people have come to the point of being unable to appreciate his art.

His themes have great interest in themselves and for their historical value. He is one of the first artists to draw his inspiration from the French Canadian milieu. He perpetuates customs and traditions which it would be hard to rediscover in another way. Krieghoff as a genre painter is undeniably pleasing, and his regionalism, far from lessening the value of his art, adds a component to the vast current of ideas centring around the peasant, both in Europe and in America. Certainly he is not a great master, but his technique is good, and his compositions are simple and firm. With deft touches he paints the face of an old man with graying hair, but he is just as adept at grouping several figures on a canvas, as his scenes of merrymaking prove. Thus, brought back to more accurate proportions, Cornelius Krieghoff's work occupies an important place in the evolution of the arts in Canada.

RAYMOND VÉZINA

AJQ, Registre d'état civil, mariage d'Emily Krieghoff. Gazette (Montreal), 23 June 1951; 16 March, 28 Oct. 1957; 19 March, 29 Nov. 1958; 13, 23 April 1959; 4 June 1963. Le Journal de Québec, 1er août 1861 (announcement of a sale of engravings by Krieghoff), 21 déc. 1861; 27 mars, 13 déc. 1862 (lists of paintings sold); 21 mai 1869 (list of paintings exhibited). Montreal Star, 22 May 1958, 12 March 1963, 19 Nov. 1966. La Presse (Montréal), 25 oct., 28 oct., 8 nov. 1957; 12 déc. 1958; 16 mars 1959. Le Soleil (Québec), 10 déc. 1966.

Edwy Cooke, Cornelius Krieghoff, ca 1815–1872 (Fredericton, n.d.). The development of painting in Canada/Le développement de la peinture au Canada, 1665–1945 (Toronto, 1945). Encyclopedia Canadiana, VI, 21. Encyclopedia of Canada, III, 348–49. Exposition rétrospective de l'art au Canada/The arts in French Canada, Gérard Morisset, édit. (Québec, 1952). R. H. Hubbard and J.-R. Ostiguy, Three hundred years of Canadian art: an exhibition arranged in celebration of the centenary of confederation/Exposition organisée à l'occasion du centenaire de la confédération (Ottawa, 1967). Mexico, Museo nacional de arte moderno, Arte Canadiense ([Mexico City?, 1960]). Ottawa, National Gallery, Exhibition of Canadian painting to celebrate the coronation of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II (Ottawa, 1953). Le peintre et le Nouveau Monde; étude sur la peinture de 1564 à 1867 pour souligner le centenaire de la Confédération canadienne/[The painter and the New World]; a survey of painting from 1564 to 1867 marking the founding of Canadian confederation (Montreal, 1967). A. H. Robson, Catalogue of Toronto centennial historical exhibition, paintings by Cornelius Krieghoff ... ([Toronto, 1934]). Toronto, Art Gallery, Painting and sculpture; illustrations of selected paintings and sculpture from the collection (Toronto, [1959]). Treasures from Quebec; an exhibition of paintings assembled from Quebec and its environs/Trésors de Québec; exposition de peintures provenant de Québec et des environs (n.p., [1965]). United States, National Gallery of Art, Canadian painting, an exhibition arranged by the National Gallery of Canada (Washington, 1950). Vancouver, Art Gallery, The arts in French Canada/Les arts au Canada français ([Vancouver], 1959). Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 374–75.

[C.] M. Barbeau, Cornelius Krieghoff, pioneer painter of North America (Toronto, 1934). J. G. Bourinot, Our intellectual strength and weakness; a short historical and critical review of literature, art and education in Canada (Royal Society of Canada series, 1, Montreal, 1893). Canadian painters, from Paul Kane to the Group of Seven, ed. D. W. Buchanan (Oxford and London, 1945). Antonio Drolet, Les bibliothèques canadiennes, 1604–1960 (Ottawa, 1965). G. M. Fairchild, Gleanings from Quebec (Quebec, 1908), 66–74. J. R. Harper, Painting in Canada, a history (Toronto, 1966). R. H. Hubbard, The development of Canadian art (Ottawa, 1963). J.-S. Lesage, Notes et esquisses québecoises; carnet d'un amateur (Québec, 1925), 52–57. N. M. MacTavish, The fine arts in Canada (Toronto, 1925), 15–20. Gérard Morisset, Coup d'œil sur les arts en Nouvelle-France (Québec, 1941), 85–87. A. H. Robson, Cornelius Krieghoff (Canadian artists series, Toronto, 1937). P.-G. Roy, "Les peintures de Krieghoff," in Les petites choses de notre histoire (7v., Lévis, Qué., 1919–44), IV, 168–71. H. A. Scott, Grands anniversaires; souvenirs historiques et pensées utiles (Québec, 1919), 297–99.

[C.] M. Barbeau, "Krieghoff découvre le Canada," RSCT, 3rd ser., XXVIII (1934), sect I, 111–18 and 3 illustrations; "Kreighoff's [sic] early Canadian scenes. Varied, resourceful, embracing," Montreal Daily Star, 17 March 1934. Hébert Budden et al., "Cornelius Kreighoff [sic]," BRH, I (1895), 45–46. Jean Chauvin, "Cornelius Kreighoff [sic] imagier populaire," La Revue populaire (Montréal), juin 1934. William Colgate, "Krieghoff, pictorial historian," Mail and Empire (Toronto), 8 Jan. 1935. E. A. Collard, "Krieghoff's beautiful oil-paintings," Gazette (Montreal), 14 March 1959. A. Ch. de Guttenberg, "Cornelius Krieghoff," Revue de l'université d'Ottawa, XXIV (1954), 90–108. Maurice Hébert, "Quelques livres de chez nous: Cornélius Krieghoff," Le Canada français (Québec), XXIV (1936–37), 162–65. "The Jolifou Inn by Krieghoff," Weekend Magazine (Montreal), V, no.52 (1955). Kay Kritzwiser, "Laing galleries," Globe and Mail (Toronto), 12 Feb. 1966. Michel Lapalme, "Krieghoff à l'encan," Le Magazine Maclean (Toronto), May 1969, 59–61. Gérard Morisset, "Cornelius Krieghoff. Réflexions en marge du livre de Marius Barbeau," Le Canada (Montréal), 19 janv., 21 janv. 1935. "Six Krieghoffs return to Canada," Montreal Star, 23 Nov. 1966.

[The author would like to thank Mr Luke Rombout, Dept. of Fine Arts, York University (Toronto), for information he supplied. R.V.]

L

LABERGE, CHARLES, lawyer, journalist, politician; b. 21 Oct. 1827 at Montreal, L.C., son of Ambroise Laberge, a merchant, and Rose Franchère, sister of the explorer Gabriel Franchère*; d. 3 Aug. 1874 at Montreal, Que.

Charles Laberge's mother, who early became a widow and had only limited means, gave music lessons for some time, in order to meet the needs of four children of tender years. Charles, whose health gave her cause for anxiety, was committed to the care of a farmer at Rivière-des-Prairies, so that the pure country air would strengthen his lungs.

He enrolled at the college of Saint-Hyacinthe in 1838 and completed his classical studies in 1845. All the evidence indicates that young Laberge at once impressed his masters and fellow-students by his intellectual liveliness and an aptitude for assimilating knowledge which won him, as Laurent-Olivier David* wrote, "effortlessly and without work successes that many others labour after in vain."

In the literary and oratorical assignments particularly his gifts showed themselves with the greatest felicity. A journalist in embryo, he founded at the college a journal with the predestined title Le Libéral, in which his waggish pen ran freely at the expense of teachers who displeased the pupils. While speaking one day before Lord Elgin [Bruce*], who was visiting the college, he earned the compliment that he would become a distinguished orator, a forecast which Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU, after his return from exile, said was already realized when he heard him during the literary exercises in 1845. "Frankly, M. Laberge, I have never spoken as well as you have just done; if I have had the title of Speaker, you have the speaker's talent."

At the end of his college years, Charles Laberge studied law at Montreal under René-Auguste-Richard Hubert*. He was called to the bar in 1848 and went into partnership with the lawyer Toussaint-Antoine-Rodolphe Laflamme*, but in 1852 he moved to Saint-Jean-d'Iberville, where in a short time he acquired a large clientele.

While still a law student, Laberge had been intensely active in the Institut Canadien, of which he was a founder. In November 1845 his confrères had elected him corresponding secretary of their association. When L'Avenir began to appear in November 1847 he was one of "thirteen" contributors whose average age was not more than 23. Both on the rostrum of the Institut Canadien and as a journalist, he tackled the most varied subjects, but he insisted above all that it was necessary for Canada to be annexed to the United States. In a series of articles that appeared in L'Avenir from 2 June to 30 Oct. 1849, signed "34 stars," he developed the following thesis: "We have reached the time when Canada must become a republic, when our star must go to take its place in the American sky." With Jean-Baptiste-Éric Dorion*, Joseph Papin*, and Charles Daoust*, some of his friends from the Institut Canadien and L'Avenir, he allowed himself to be carried into active politics in the wake of Louis-Joseph Papineau. In 1854 he was elected member for Iberville County; with 10 of his confrères of the Institut Canadien who had also been returned by their respective counties, he belonged to the constellation of young Liberals, headed by Antoine-Aimé Dorion*, whom two political adversaries, Joseph-Charles Taché* and Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau* under the pseudonym Gaspard Le Mage, endeavoured to ridicule in a pamphlet called La pléiade rouge.

In the house, according to Oscar Dunn*, Laberge "was on his own ground, in the element most suited to his abilities. Not sufficiently wily to be a first rate lawyer, or sufficiently profound to dominate on the bench, he possessed a natural gift of eloquence, a breadth of ideas, an uprightness of character which won him, without effort on his part, an exceptional place in a deliberative assembly." And Dunn added: "He had a fine turn of speech, a French of true quality; in this respect no one in our country was more gifted than he."

When the Conservative ministry fell in 1858, over the question of the seat of government, Laberge agreed to become solicitor general in the cabinet of George BROWN and Antoine-Aimé Dorion, which lasted only two days. Although ephemeral, this alliance with the Scotsman whom French Canada hated was certainly not calculated to increase his stature in his own eyes and in those of his friends.

Be that as it may, in 1860 he decided to leave active politics and devote himself exclusively to his family and his profession. Hence he refused to stand as a candidate in the 1861 general elections. He did allow himself to be appointed a judge at Sorel in 1863 by the Liberal government, but the Conservatives, back in power the following year, lost no time in getting him to return to private life. He accepted this situation philosophically, being thoroughly happy in the home that he had set up on 23 Nov. 1859, when he married Hélène-Olive Turgeon, daughter of the former legislative councillor, Joseph-Ovide Turgeon*.

Journalism always had a keen attraction for him. In 1860, with his friend Félix-Gabriel Marchand*, he established Le Franco-Canadien (Saint-Jean-d'Iberville), to which he contributed from time to time. He did the same for another liberal paper, L'Ordre (Montreal), in which he published articles signed "Liberal but Catholic."

Like the majority of his liberal friends, he took a stand against the projected confederation of the provinces of British North America. In 1865, replying in a public meeting at Montreal to those who said that the opponents of confederation offered no other remedy, he exclaimed: "I do not admit that a change of constitution has become necessary, but supposing it has, can we justifiably accept a political régime which will give us three or four enemies instead of one? If we already have so much difficulty in struggling against Upper Canada, what shall we do when we have to fight three or four other provinces?" He proposed the "separatist" solution: "If the constitution must be changed, let us separate since we cannot agree, and let us have the questions of customs and tariff that concern all the provinces settled by a small congress which will not have the right to deal with anything else."

It was no doubt at the repeated requests of his liberal friends that in 1872 he tore himself away from his little town of Saint-Jean-d'Iberville, where he was keenly appreciated by his fellow-citizens who had twice elected him mayor, to go back to live in Montreal and take on the editorship of Le National. In its first number, on 24 April 1872, this paper broke with the tradition of L'Avenir and Le Pays: "Le National will be a political and not a religious journal, but the special organ of a Catholic population, and, in conformity with the beliefs of those directing the journal, we shall when occasion arises adopt entirely the Catholic viewpoint; we disavow in advance anything which in the rapid compiling of a daily newspaper might slip through by inadvertence, and expressly declare our entire devotion and our filial obedience to the Church." Laberge, his health already seriously affected, was unable to show what he was capable of. His friend Oscar Dunn says that "it was only by dint of truly heroic efforts that he managed to write his articles, while in the grip of the disease that was eating him away." "Poor and burdened with a family, he silenced his tortures in order to accomplish his daily task; and his sense of duty was so developed that he drew from it the strength to master his sickness, so much so that sometimes he deceived his family and gave it fleeting periods of hope."

To physical suffering was added moral suffering. A firm Christian, he had always been distressed by the suspicions of some opponents and even some members of the clergy about his religious beliefs, because he professed himself a liberal. This suffering had been sharpened when the Institut Canadien, after being the object of episcopal censures in three pastoral letters issued by Bishop Ignace Bourget* on 10 March, 30 April, and 31 May 1858, lost some 135 of its members, who broke away to found the Institut Canadien-Français [see CASSIDY]. When in 1867 conservative papers started to revile the members of the Institut Canadien by styling them "excommunicates," Charles Laberge was roused, and in a letter from Saint-Jean dated 16 Aug. 1867 he informed Bishop Bourget that as one of "the founders" of the institute, and because he was "still a member" although he no longer took part in its meetings, he wished to be enlightened in the "cruel embarrassment" in which he found himself with regard to "the positive assertion of excommunication" directed against him and his confrères.

According to him, the differences of opinion that had resulted in the unfortunate scission of 1858 could have been avoided: "When, some years back, difficulties arose, I thought, and I still think, that the same resources and the same energy that founded the Institut Canadien-Français would have been more usefully employed in reshaping the Institut Canadien, and I have several times offered my services in order to achieve this result. It seemed to me that by bringing in a large number of new members one might give the institute a different orientation, and preserve an institution which is prosperous and has reached its 23rd year, a unique occurrence in Lower Canada. I am still ready to employ all my possible influence as founder to arrive at the same result, if it is still desirable."

Laberge had never actually read the pastoral letters of 1858 on the Institut Canadien. When he heard of them, he consulted his confessor, "a distinguished priest, who has since become a bishop, and who told me," wrote Laberge to Bourget, "that, as I was taking no active and public part in the work of the institute, I could without objection remain a member of it, reserving the right to withdraw when it became necessary." This "distinguished priest" was probably Charles LA ROCQUE, parish priest of Saint-Jean-d'Iberville, 1844–66, and third bishop of Saint-Hyacinthe, 1866–75. Indeed, in the Bourget-La Rocque correspondence concerning the members of the Institut Canadien, one can sense how reticent the parish priest of Saint-Jean-d'Iberville and the future bishop of Saint-Hyacinthe was in face of the uncompromising and inflexible attitude adopted by the bishop of Montreal towards them.

Laberge therefore implored Bishop Bourget to extricate him from his perplexity: "Now, My Lord Bishop, I desire to know where I stand, and I am not sufficiently important to be granted the honour of an interview with Your Excellency at Montreal. Although a member of the institute, I continue to receive the sacraments, on the strength of the consultation reported above."

Whatever the bishop of Montreal's reply was – if he replied at all – Charles Laberge, although he ceased to be a member of the Institut Canadien, remained faithful to the last to the position that had made him, according to Oscar Dunn, "with due allowances," "the Montalembert of his party, associating modern ideas on Church and State with solid religious convictions, a democrat as much as a Christian"; "I do not know what the foundation of his liberalism was," Dunn added, "but he had the hopes of the convinced Catholic."

The day after his death, on 3 Aug. 1874, his successor in the office of Le National wrote in the paper that had received the last productions of his pen: "He remains a model politician, and he has always been the living proof that one could be a sincere liberal and a fervent Catholic."

Philippe Sylvain

[The newspapers on which Laberge collaborated, Le Franco-Canadien (Saint-Jean-d'Iberville), Le National (Montréal) and L'Ordre (Montréal), must be consulted for any thorough study of him. See also: L'Avenir (Montréal), 2 juin–30 oct. 1849 and L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 27 août 1874. P.S.]

ACAM, 901.135. Borthwick, Hist. and biog. gazetteer, 220. L.-O. David, Souvenirs et biographies, 1870–1910 (Montréal, 1911), 43–49. Oscar Dunn, Dix ans de journalisme, mélanges (Montréal, 1876), 229–41.

LABRÈCHE-VIGER, LOUIS, journalist and politician; b. 1824 at Terrebonne, L.C., son of Louis Labrèche and Marguerite-Julie Viger; d. 27 April 1872 at Montreal, Que.

Born of parents who were farmers, Louis Labrèche was educated at the college of Montreal, probably thanks to the patronage of Denis-Benjamin Viger*, who persuaded the youthful student to contribute to L'Aurore des Canadas for some months. Out of either gratitude or admiration, Louis seems from then on to have added his protector's name to his own. He spent two years at the seminary of Montreal, left it to study law in the office of Côme-Séraphin Cherrier*, another of Denis-Benjamin Viger's protégés, and was called to the bar at Montreal on 27 April 1848.

It was as a member of the group of young men belonging to the Institut Canadien that Labrèche-Viger began to make himself known. In 1848, when this group started the Association pour le Peuplement des Çantons de l'Est, he acted with Joseph Doutre* as one of its two secretaries. Its aim was to check the movement of emigration to the United States that followed the insurrection, and to open for settlement the undeveloped areas of the Eastern Townships. Then Labrèche-Viger worked as a journalist with L'Avenir until 1851, and for some months in 1852 was editor of Le Pays. This means that at that time he was an annexationist, and one of the most enthusiastic supporters of the liberalism of the Institut Canadien. Later, in 1858, when the institute came into conflict with Bishop Ignace Bourget*, Louis Labrèche-Viger left it and drew up the declaration of the founders of the Institut Canadien-Français [see Cassidy].

Meanwhile, around 1852, he had become a merchant. An employee, then in 1854 a partner of the grocer Ephrem Hudon, he was also a member of the Trust and Loan Company. He entered the political arena again: in 1861 he was elected at Terrebonne by a majority of 30 votes over the outgoing member, Louis-Siméon Morin, and he was re-elected for the same county against the same opponent in 1863. He apparently made himself famous by never making a single speech in the house. However, he consistently voted on the side of the Rouge party. He also contributed to L'Ordre, and along with the editors of this paper he opposed confederation. At the time of the famous vote on 11 March 1865, he was one of the 21 French Canadian assemblymen who voted against the plan.

After 1867 Labrèche-Viger left politics in order to give his attention more and more to metallurgy, and to exploiting iron mines in the Rivière Moisie region [see Molson]. He incorporated a mining company, and became passionately absorbed in a search for the secret of the conversion of iron into steel. After three years of trials and tests, he thought he had found it, and obtained patents in Canada, the United States, and Great Britain. He also wanted to exploit the magnetic sands of the Rivière Moisie, and set up a laboratory on the banks of the Rivière Saint-Charles near Quebec. He died before learning the result of these experiments.

Louis Labrèche-Viger had married in 1852 a sister of Toussaint-Antoine-Rodolphe Laflamme*, Caroline, who bore him a son. According to contemporaries, he was a man of pleasing appearance, with an intelligent countenance and a shrewd mind. He was most affable in his demeanour and was always ready to be of service.

Jacques Monet

PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 8, p.81. L'Avenir (Montréal), 1848–49. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 16 mai 1872. Le Pays (Montréal), 1851. Cornell, Alignment of political groups. L.-O. David, Les gerbes canadiennes (Montréal, 1921), 43–50. Monet, Last cannon shot.

LA BRUÈRE, PIERRE-CLAUDE BOUCHER DE. See Boucher

LA COLOMBIÈRE, MARIE-JULIE-MARGUERITE CÉRÉ DE. See Céré

LACOSTE, LOUIS, notary and politician; b. 3 April 1798 at Boucherville, L.C., son of Louis Lacoste and Joséphine Dubois; d. 26 Nov. 1878 at Boucherville, Que.

A descendant of Alexandre Lacoste, who came originally from the Department of Gard (France), Louis Lacoste received his secondary education at the college of Montreal, then studied law, and on 19 March 1821 was commissioned as a notary. He practised at Boucherville.

In 1834 he decided to launch out into politics. He was chosen as member for Chambly County in the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, a position he kept until the constitution was suspended in 1838. He was an ardent supporter of Louis-Joseph Papineau, and on 23 Oct. 1837 took part in the assembly of the six counties held at Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu. He delivered a violent speech there, and even proposed a resolution in which was stressed the urgency of replacing officers who had been appointed by an "administration hostile to the country" by trustworthy men. Therefore "all the parishes of the six counties are simultaneously invited, between the first of December and the first of January following, to elect justices of the peace, arbitrators, and officers of the militia." It was not long before this unequivocal commitment in the fight against the government brought reprisals upon him: on 8 Dec. 1837 a warrant of arrest was issued against him. He gave himself up to the sheriff, was put in prison in Montreal, and was not freed until 7 July 1838, on bail of £1,000.

Once the storm was over, Louis Lacoste returned to his profession, of which he was one of the most brilliant representatives. On 23 Oct. 1843 he was again elected MLA for Chambly, and remained its member until 6 Dec. 1847 (Ægidius Fauteux* states, however, in his work Patriotes de 1837–1838 that Lacoste did not return to public life until 1849). He again represented the same county from 25 Sept. 1849 to 23 June 1854. After an absence of four years, he returned to parliament for the period 1858 to 1861. With George-Étienne Cartier, Joseph-Édouard Cauchon*, and Joseph-Édouard Turcotte*, he was one of the last of the members who had been elected to the first parliaments of the Union. These liberals had evolved under Cartier's leadership, and around 1856 they were referred to as the Bleus, by contrast with the Rouges, or radical liberals. When the Legislative Council became elective, Louis Lacoste resigned as a member of the assembly and was elected legislative councillor for the division of Montarville, a post he held until confederation. In 1867 he was appointed a senator, and remained in the Senate until his death.

Louis Lacoste was called upon to play an important role in the field of education. On 22 Feb. 1853 the government set up a select committee "to inquire into the state of education in Lower Canada." This committee was presided over by Louis-Victor Sicotte*, MLA for Saint-Hyacinthe; Lewis Thomas Drummond*, William Badgley*, Cartier, Antoine Polette, Louis Lacoste, John Sewell Sanborn, Jean-Charles Chapais*, and Robert Christie* were assigned to assist him. The inquiry was made necessary by the sharp criticisms levelled against the school system in Lower Canada and by the friction which disturbed Dr Jean-Baptiste Meilleur's administration. The committee prepared a questionnaire which was addressed to all the parish priests or Protestant ministers, and to the secretary-treasurers of the municipalities. More than 400 persons replied, in particular Jacques Crémazie, lawyer and member of the Quebec Board of Examiners. The report of the inquiry had no immediate results: the principal consequence of the recommendations of the Sicotte commission was Dr Meilleur's resignation on 19 June 1855, and his replacement by Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau*, who thus became the second superintendent of education in Lower Canada. In the following year two important school laws were passed by the parliament of Canada, with Lower Canada expressly in mind: these laws set up a Council of Public Instruction, a Journal de l'Instruction publique (in both languages), and three normal schools. They were the logical outcome of the work of the Sicotte commission.

On 14 July 1823 Louis Lacoste had married Catherine-Renée Boucher de La Bruère, who died on 23 Aug. 1832. One son, Louis-René, was born of this marriage. A notary, he died at the age of 31, when he was showing great promise. On 28 Sept. 1836 Louis Lacoste married Charlotte Magenty Mount, but soon afterwards became a widower a second time. He took as his third wife Marie-Antoinette-Thaïs Proulx, on 17 Nov. 1838. Of this third marriage Alexandre Lacoste*, a chief justice of the province of Quebec, was born.

The historian of Boucherville, Father Louis Lalande*, wrote of Louis Lacoste that "he was the man who spoke for his country. For 50 years, in all the great events affecting his people, he was the guiding spirit of the large population spread out between the St Lawrence and the Richelieu and extending as far as the Chambly basin."

Louis-Philippe Audet

JALPC, 1852–1853, app. J.J., "Rapport du comité spécial de l'Assemblée législative nommé pour s'enquérir de l'état de l'éducation et du fonctionnement de la loi des écoles dans le Bas-Canada." Dom. ann. reg., 1878. Le Jeune, Dictionnaire, II, 21–22. Political appointments, 1841–1865 (J.-O. Coté). P.-G. Roy, Les juges de la province de Québec, 283. Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 249.

L.-P. Audet, Histoire du conseil de l'Instruction

publique, 15–24. Dent, Last forty years. Fauteux, Patriotes, 280–81. Louis Lalande, Une vieille seigneurie Boucherville; chroniques, portraits et souvenirs (Montréal, 1890), 211–20. J.-E. Roy, Histoire du notariat, III. J.-J. Lefebvre, "Les députés de Chambly, 1792–1967," BRH, LXX (1968), 16–18.

LAGEMODIÈRE, MARIE-ANNE. See GABOURY

LAGIER, LUCIEN-ANTOINE, priest, Oblate of Mary Immaculate, preacher; b. 4 Oct. 1814 at Saint-André-d'Embrun, Hautes-Alpes, France, son of André Lagier and Marie-Madeleine David; d. 28 Feb. 1874 at Isle-Verte, Rivière-du-Loup County, Que.

After receiving a classical education at the "juniorate" of Notre-Dame-de-Lumières, Vaucluse, and at the Petit Séminaire of Embrun, Lucien-Antoine Lagier followed his brother Jean-Marie and on 14 Aug. 1834 entered the noviciate of the Oblates at Saint-Just, near Marseilles. On 25 May 1839, his theological studies completed, he was ordained priest there by Charles-Joseph-Eugène de Mazenod, bishop of Marseilles and founder of the Oblate fathers.

Lagier worked for two years in France, then joined the first group of Oblates to land at Montreal, on 2 Dec. 1841. He became the curate at Saint-Hilaire-de-Rouville and guardian of the cross that had been erected on Mount Beloeil (Saint-Hilaire) in memory of the great retreat preached by Bishop Charles-Auguste-Marie-Joseph de Forbin-Janson*, which was destined to become a place of pilgrimage. At the same time he continued his ministry in the Eastern Townships, where he served until 1843.

Father Lagier, who had been a preacher since his arrival, then spent some years at Longueuil, and after that resided at Montreal; in 1847 he stayed some time at Bytown (Ottawa) to give a helping hand to his confrères during the typhus epidemic. In 1853 he went to Detroit, Michigan, to found a residence there, but returned to Canada shortly afterwards. In 1858, at the request of Anthony O'Reagan, bishop of Chicago, he worked in association with Father Augustin-Albert Brunet in the region of Kankakee, Illinois, to combat the heresy that Charles-Paschal-Télesphore Chiniquy* was spreading there. As a result of the preaching done by the two Oblates, about 150 schismatics returned to the practice of the Catholic religion. On his return to Canada, Lagier continued his preaching and lived at Quebec from 1863 to 1868. In that year he helped to found the first French parish of Lowell, Mass.

His ministry was always sought after, for he was prudent, a good judge of men, and a preacher of distinction. During his 32 years in the missions he conducted more than 1,000 retreats. His death occurred during a mission at Isle-Verte; he was the only one of the first group of Oblates to die in Canada.

GASTON CARRIÈRE

Archives générales O.M.I. (Rome), Dossier Lucien Lagier (copy in AHO). Archives paroissiales de Saint-Sauveur (Québec), Codex historicus (copy in AHO). Archives provinciales O.M.I. (Montréal), Codex historicus; Dossier Lucien Lagier; Dossier Québec (copies in AHO). Notices nécrologiques des O.M.I., III, 181–206. Carrière, Histoire des O.M.I., I, III, IV, V, VI; "Une mission tragique aux Illinois; Chiniquy et les oblats," RHAF, VIII (1954–55), 518–55.

LAIRD, ALEXANDER, farmer, shipbuilder, and politician; b. in 1797, probably in Stirling, Renfrewshire, Scotland; d. 15 April 1873 at New Glasgow, P.E.I.

Alexander Laird immigrated to Prince Edward Island in 1819 as a member of a colonization party organized by William Epps Cormack*, a prosperous landlord in the New Glasgow area. While aboard ship, Laird met Janet Orr, whom he married; they had two daughters and six sons of whom Alexander* and David* were to become prominent public figures. Upon arrival on the Island, Laird bought a farm in New Glasgow where he continued to live for the rest of his life. A progressive farmer, he was a long-time member of the Royal Agricultural Society of Prince Edward Island.

Laird entered politics in 1850 when he successfully contested Queens County, First District, as a running mate of the Reform leader, George COLES. Both men lost their seats in the defeat of the Liberal government in July 1853 but were returned to the assembly in an election in June 1854. Although he was known to hold certain radical views, Laird acted as a loyal Liberal backbencher until the session of 1855 when, with escheators William Cooper and John Macintosh*, he began to assume an independent position on the land question. Specifically, he opposed the Coles government for purchasing the Worrell estate from William Henry POPE and his associates. Laird felt that the title of the estate should have been investigated in the hope of finding that at one time or another the landowners had failed to fulfil the requirements of the original grant. If they had so failed, the land could then have been escheated or returned to the crown by default rather than purchase.

As the struggle over the use of the Bible in the public schools developed in the late 1850s, Laird became increasingly immune to the discipline of the Liberal caucus. A prominent Presbyterian layman, he was disturbed by the government's apparent indifference about the place of the scriptures in the schools. By 1858 he had become so disenchanted with his former colleagues that he ran in Queens County, Second District, as a Tory. He was successful and, when the Tories under Edward Palmer* formed an administration in 1859, Laird was named to the Executive Council. Despite the fact that he was dropped from the cabinet in 1863, Laird remained with the Tories until his retirement in 1866. After withdrawing from politics he lived quietly on his farm.

Although Laird began his career as a Reformer and concluded it as a Tory regular, he was widely credited with basic integrity. Unlike other politicians, who were accused of capitalizing on the dispute over the Bible for reasons of political gain, Laird seems to have been sincere in his position.

D. B. Boylan

PAPEI, Prince Edward Island, Executive Council, Minutes, 1857–62. Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Debates, 1855, 57–58, 66, 69; 1860, 11; 1861, 25; 1864, 23; Journals, 1850–67. Examiner (Charlottetown), 28 June 1858, 11 April 1859. Islander (Charlottetown), 19 Nov. 1851, 10 Sept. 1858. Patriot (Charlottetown), 17 April 1873. Royal Gazette (Charlottetown), 23 Feb., 8, 15 March 1852. Can. parl. comp., 1876. Bolger, PEI and confederation. Frank MacKinnon, Government of PEI; "David Laird of Prince Edward Island," Dal. Rev., XXVI (1946–47), 405–21.

LANCTÔT, MAGLOIRE, lawyer and judge; b. 4 March 1823 at Saint-Constant de Laprairie, L.C., of the marriage of Alexis Lanctôt and Agnès Boire; d. 18 April 1877 at Saint-Hyacinthe, Que.

On his father's death in 1834, Magloire Lanctôt was adopted by his uncle, the notary Pierre Lanctôt, who had him educated at the college of Montreal. He was admitted to the bar in 1847 and first practised at Montreal, where he specialized in criminal law – a field in which few French-Canadian jurists were interested at that time. In 1849 he was one of the signatories to the Annexation Manifesto, which proposed union with the United States as a solution to the economic and political problems of Canada. He was mayor of Laprairie from 1858 to 1862. In 1863 he took up residence at Saint-Hyacinthe, an important legal and political centre, and shared in the legal practice directed by Louis-Victor Sicotte*, who was head of the government of the Province of Canada with John Sandfield Macdonald in 1862 and 1863. In the provincial elections of 1867 Lanctôt stood as Conservative candidate for Saint-Hyacinthe. He campaigned in support of confederation, which had just come into being, and was defeated by Pierre Bachand, one of the few Liberal candidates elected to the Legislative Assembly of Quebec, thanks to his great popularity. Lanctôt was crown attorney for the districts of Saint-Hyacinthe and Bedford and on 4 Nov. 1870 was appointed magistrate at Saint-Hyacinthe by the government of Quebec.

In 1874, at Montreal, Magloire Lanctôt published Le livre du magistrat, which was republished in 1896 by Benjamin-Antoine Testard* de Montigny. It describes the details of legal procedure and of the rules of evidence in criminal matters. An orator loved by the crowds, Lanctôt gave several speeches on official occasions, particularly at the festival of Saint-Jean-Baptiste. He died on 18 April 1877 at Saint-Hyacinthe. The same day, the members of the bar of Saint-Hyacinthe assembled to testify "that by his integrity, intelligence, and urbanity, M. Lanctôt [had] performed his judicial duties in the district with honour to himself and in the best interest of the public."

In 1850 Magloir Lanctôt had married Angélique Raymond, daughter of Jean-Moïse Raymond, member of the assembly for Laprairie from 1824 to 1838. They had several children.

J.-C. Bonenfant

Magloire Lanctôt, Le livre du magistrat (1re éd., Montréal, 1874).

Le Courrier de Saint-Hyacinthe, 19 avril 1877. La Minerve (Montréal), 20 avril 1877. Chapais, Histoire du Canada, VI, 307–25. Joseph Chevalier, Laprairie; notes historiques à l'occasion du centenaire de la consécration de l'église (s.l., [1941]). C.-P. Choquette, Histoire de la ville de Saint-Hyacinthe (Saint-Hyacinthe, Qué., 1930). Philippe Constant [J.-J. Lefebvre], "Famille Lanctot," SGCF Mémoires, X (1959), 27–48.

LANCTOT, MÉDÉRIC, lawyer, journalist, and politician; b. 7 Dec. 1838 at Montreal, L.C., son of Hippolyte Lanctot and Mary Miller; d. 30 July 1877 at Lucerne (Gatineau County), and buried 2 August in the cemetery at Côte-des-Neiges (Montreal), Que.

Médéric Lanctot was born when the turmoil of revolution was at its height. His father, a notary in the village of Saint-Rémi (Napierville County), had been stagnating in the prison at Pied-du-Courant since 14 November. He had been put behind bars for having stirred up rebellion in the Richelieu valley and taking part in the fight at Odelltown as a lieutenant under Charles Hindenlang*, commander of the rebels' right wing. On 19 March 1839 he was found guilty of high treason, and, in September of that year, deported to Australia. He did not return to Canada until January 1845.

This incident profoundly affected the personality of young Médéric, who until the age of six was brought up by his mother. It has been said, although without proof, that she was a descendant of the French family of Janson, to which belonged Charles-Auguste-Marie-Joseph de Forbin-Janson*, bishop of Nancy, famous in the history of Quebec for the religious lectures that he delivered in the 1840s. It is not possible to follow the Lanctot family during the father's exile. Laurent-Olivier David*, who knew the Lanctots well, says that Mme Lanctot lived with her children at Montreal.

On his return in 1845, Hippolyte installed his family at Saint-Édouard, an agricultural parish in the Richelieu valley, and devoted himself to his profession. A courteous and hospitable gentleman, he deeply resented his years of exile, which had not shaken his convictions. He remained a democrat, a republican, and a nationalist. When Médéric and his brothers came home from school, their father's memories completed their history lessons. Médéric grew up in the "mystique of 1837–38." Later, he explained his political commitment by reference to his youthful memories: "I had only to follow my inclinations, and the feelings inspired by a political education drawn directly from the unshakeable patriotism of an exile who had returned to the family hearth."

Lucky speculations, the post of clerk of the Commissioners' Court, and his professional activities, gave Hippolyte Lanctot a comfortable income. In September 1849 he sent his two sons, Médéric and Edmond, to the college of Saint-Hyacinthe. They entered the third year of the classical course. Médéric was not yet 11 years old. He was said to be brilliant, but inattentive and refractory. Laurent-Olivier David reported that he was "in all the plots, all the revolts against authority, all the pranks against an unpopular teacher." Bishop Charles-Philippe Choquette*, historian of the college of Saint-Hyacinthe, numbered him among the four pupils who plotted to set fire to the institution in January 1851. It is difficult here to distinguish between history and legend, for the seminary's archives contain little about Médéric, except that he was a mediocre student, passionately interested in history and French. He was informed at the end of the fifth year of his classical course that he would have to repeat his year "until he had given satisfactory answers in Latin grammar." Médéric did not register at the beginning of the next school year. Presumably, therefore, he left the college in the summer of 1852.

Médéric was then faced with the dilemma of thousands of young men of his age: in what direction should he turn? There was no system of specialized or professional schools for those who, on leaving college, wanted to take up a trade, a profession, or some kind of artistic career. The schools of medicine at Quebec and Montreal were the only institutions of this type. Apprenticeship was the sole means of entry into the arts and trades. Médéric's father, who had connections in business and political circles, asked Augustin Cuvillier*, an influential financier of Montreal, to take his son as a clerk.

Médéric therefore moved to Montreal. Like the majority of apprentices of the period, he probably received board and lodging from his master, who undertook to initiate him into the mysteries of his calling. Médéric lived with the Cuvilliers for three years. This phase of his life is obscure. One may suppose that he spent his leisure time reading, and mingling with those of his own age who shared his liking for things of the mind and for politics. These young men had a meeting place: the Institut Canadien, which from its foundation on 17 Dec. 1844 had been called a "rallying-point for youth." The pleiad of well-known and distinguished men who frequented the institute attracted the young Médéric, steeped in the liberal and nationalist mystique. He was a reader and a diligent listener at the institute. Joseph Doutre*, a lawyer and journalist, and president of the institute, soon advised him to seek work with the Courrier de Saint-Hyacinthe, which had been started in February 1853.

It is difficult to give a date for Médéric's arrival at Saint-Hyacinthe, and to state precisely the role he played in the newspaper. It is said that he was assigned his new duties in the autumn of 1855. As journalists did not sign their articles at this time, it has not been possible to determine with certainty what was written by Médéric. Once more David must be trusted: "For two years he polemized in this newspaper with a vigour and skill which caused him to be thought of as a rising star of the Liberal party."

The period at Saint-Hyacinthe was only an interlude in Lanctot's life. Montreal, the centre of the principal ideological and political movements, attracted him. He returned there in 1858 to undertake the study of law. His friends of the institute, Joseph Doutre and Charles Daoust*, who had their office on Rue Saint-Gabriel, accepted him as a clerk to study law.

Médéric resumed his activities at the Institut Canadien at the time when Bishop Ignace Bourget* declared war on rougisme. He lost no time in making his presence known by creating an uproar. Around 3 o'clock in the night of 8–9 April, together with Guillaume-Ernest Roy, a medical student, he shattered the windows of the Oeuvre des Bons Livres, on Rue Saint-Joseph. This library, organized by Bishop Bourget, made pious and edifying literature available to the public [see Jacques-Victor ARRAUD]. The affair gave rise to a law suit. Joseph Papin*, a prominent member of the Rouge party, defended the young fanatic. Judge Charles-Joseph Coursol* sentenced Médéric and his accomplice to a fine of $20, or, failing payment, to two months of hard labour in a reformatory. Médéric was quickly to forget that he had a judicial record; the Conservatives, on the other hand, remembered it.

Bishop Bourget's fulminations did not shake Médéric, who took part in all the institute's activities and gained a reputation as an eloquent lecturer and a skilful dialectician. He was invited to give a number of public lectures before the élite of Montreal. During the winter of 1859 he read an essay on electoral reform in England, and another on that country's social and political situation. On 2 May, thanks to the intellectual qualities and untiring energy that he placed at the service of the institute, he was elected its corresponding secretary. He was also asked to contribute to Le Pays, the institute's newspaper.

On 7 May 1860, with 11 other candidates, Médéric was authorized by the Montreal bar to practise law. His years of training were therefore over. Physically of small stature, thin and muscular, he had black, piercing eyes that reflected a tenacious will-power and a lively intelligence. His fertile imagination, ceaselessly in ferment, formed grandiose visions, devised expedients, and formulated syllogisms, which kept the writer and orator well primed. He derived his ideas from family tradition, the institute's library, L'Avenir, and Le Pays. English history revealed to him the social problems that sprang from the industrial revolution, and gave him a deep-rooted respect for individual rights. From the time of his birth he had thus lived in an atmosphere in which two ideological currents prevailed: nationalism and liberalism. Would he be able, having reached manhood, to make of them a fruitful synthesis, on which coherent and sustained action could be based?

The new lawyer set up his office first at 7 Rue Sainte-Thérèse, then around 1862 at 126 Rue Notre-Dame. He had specialized in no particular area, and accepted all the cases that came his way. His professional activities did not lessen his participation in the work of the Institut Canadien, but this feverish existence began to undermine his health, and he felt a need for rest. On 11 July 1862 he boarded a steamer for Liverpool. A maze of conjecture surrounds Lanctot's travels in Europe. From his later writings it can be deduced that he visited England, France, and the adjoining countries. On 16 Oct. 1862 Le Pays announced his return, and stated that he "has arrived from Europe in good health."

This voyage gave Lanctot an opportunity to determine where he stood. As a frequenter of the Institut Canadien he was in close touch with the Doutre family, particularly with Joseph, who seems to have been his counsellor at important moments of his life. At 16 Rue Saint-Gabriel, where Lanctot lived, Joseph Doutre also had his residence and here too was the office of the lawyers Doutre and Daoust. It was perhaps there that Lanctot made the acquaintance of Agnès, the sister of Joseph, Léon, and GONZALVE Doutre. He returned from Europe determined to make Agnès his life's companion. The marriage took place on 28 Oct. 1862.

The decision to marry was not the only one made during his stay in Europe. Because of his spirited and excitable nature, he felt too hampered within the confines of the courts, and decided to become a crusading journalist. Together with Toussaint Thompson and C.-E.-E. Bouthillier he acquired the printing-shop of M. de Montigny, probably during the autumn of 1862. On 15 Sept. 1863 he issued the prospectus of a new newspaper, La Presse, which began to appear regularly on 5 October. He was its editor. The paper had original features: it was a daily and was independent of parties. This was a difficult challenge to maintain, for the cheap press financed by subscriptions and advertising did not yet exist. The majority of the papers of the time were party organs supported by party funds. Not only was La Presse independent of parties, it wanted them to disappear. It advocated a new formula: the union of all French Canadians within a national party. Claiming kinship with the Patriotes of 1837 and the intellectuals of the institute, La Presse was a nationalist organ.

The birth of La Presse occurred at a turning-point in Canadian history. In June 1864 John A. Macdonald*, George-Étienne CARTIER, and George BROWN announced the formation of a great coalition, aimed at bringing about a federal union of the colonies of British North America. Only the Rouges of the institute remained aloof from the coalition. Lanctot was dumbfounded by this news, for in his view federal union would endanger the future of the French Canadian people. Throughout the summer of 1864, he fired shafts against the coalition group in his paper. A few young Conservatives, such as Laurent-Olivier David and Joseph Leblanc, and some young Liberals, among whom were Louis-Amable Jetté*, Wilfrid Laurier*, and Narcisse Valois, rallied to Lanctot to organize the struggle against the project of confederation. In August they formed a national committee and published a manifesto signed by 46 adherents, and on 3 September they launched the first number of a new journal, L'Union nationale, which replaced La Presse.

The young nationalists set in motion a vigorous press campaign against the plan of confederation and against the old parties. They favoured setting up an independent state of Quebec. Side by side with this press campaign, Lanctot organized a campaign of political agitation, which, conducted at a brisk pace by the team of L'Union nationale, took on the appearance of a crusade. Two phases can be distinguished. From August to November, the young nationalists held public meetings which brought together some hundreds of people; there they denounced the principle of confederation, then got resolutions passed condemning the plans of the coalition. From November on, they demanded an appeal to the people, and got petitions signed to this effect. They had the support of two liberal papers: L'Ordre and Le Pays.

The press campaign and the political agitation did not prevent the politicians from pursuing the plan of confederation. But while Cartier, one of the principal architects of confederation, was advancing towards a triumph on the parliamentary scene, Lanctot hoped to humiliate him electorally in Montreal East. Although in the winter of 1866 Médéric was only 28 years old, he had considerable prestige in Montreal. He was the leader of a group of young nationalists and he could count on numerous supporters in working-class circles, whom he defended unceasingly against employers, in particular the Canadian Grand Trunk, whose lawyer Cartier was. His gifts as a demagogue, his indomitable energy, and his ability for organization made him a dangerous opponent. He was thus a formidable political force in Montreal, and he was eager to tackle Cartier.

In February 1866, municipal elections gave him the opportunity to take the measure of his opponents. He stood in Montreal East against Alexis Dubord, Cartier's man of straw. He had a programme: installation of sewers, improvements to the Place Jacques-Cartier, and utilization of waste ground. Cartier himself came to Montreal to direct Dubord's campaign. It was to no purpose, since on 28 February Lanctot was elected by a majority of eight votes.

This victory filled him with wild enthusiasm, and convinced him that even in an election against Cartier himself he would win. However, he could leave nothing to chance. All his political activity from then on was directed towards the duel he would one day fight with Cartier. He utilized his post as councillor to undermine the prestige which the latter enjoyed with the city council. The riposte was not slow in coming: Alexis Dubord challenged the election of Lanctot, on the grounds that he did not fulfil the necessary property qualifications to sit in city hall. The hearing of the case took place at the end of November. Lanctot faced an annulment of the election, but he did not slow up his activities in any way. He began to draft a pamphlet in support of independence.

At the beginning of 1867 a great dream took shape: the union of all workers in one powerful association. Intuitively, Lanctot believed that national liberation would bring the improvement of the lot of the working classes. On 5 February his newspaper proclaimed: "Association is the salvation of the French Canadian nationality." On 27 March Lanctot summoned all workers to the Champ de Mars, and there, before 5,000 persons, he delivered a speech lasting several hours. The assembly formed a committee to prepare the founding of the Grande Association de Protection des Ouvriers du Canada. Each evening Lanctot held meetings in the working class districts. On 6 April he received the reward for his toil: in the great hall of Bonsecours Market 3,000 persons voted on statutes and rules. The Grande Association was born. Conceived as an instrument for the liberation of the working classes, the Grande Association, in the heat of action, became a political instrument for achieving the union of all French Canadians. The association was a federation of trade organizations. It was directed by a commission on which sat about 200 representatives of the various organizations, representation being proportionate to the numbers of their members. Each adherent paid a subscription of 10 cents a month to finance the movement. The founders established a triple function for the Grande Association: to ensure harmony between capital and labour, to improve the well-being of its members, and to stop emigration to the United States. On 9 May the commission elected an executive and appointed Lanctot to the presidency.

The new president made use of all his prestige to settle a conflict over wages and hours of work that divided the master bakers and their employees. He opened low-price bakeries to provide for the needy, asked people to buy bread only from the bakers who had negotiated with their employees, and on 10 June organized a great popular demonstration. That evening more than 8,000 workers, grouped by their trade associations, marched on the Champ de Mars, chanting slogans and holding aloft the green, white, and red flag of 1837–38.

Lanctot was at his zenith. Praised, greeted with cheers, he seemed to be advancing towards a resounding political victory, even though his opponents did not give up. Judge Samuel Cornwallis Monk* handed down a judgement in favour of Alexis Dubord on 10 June 1867, but this slap in the face was a stimulus to Lanctot, who was actively preparing his electoral campaign against Cartier in Montreal East.

The poll was to take place on 5 Sept. 1867. All summer long, Lanctot held public meetings. He experienced some difficulty, however, in maintaining the enthusiasm of 10 June, for the people's bakeries and consumers' cooperatives he had set up had gone bankrupt. These disappointments worked to the advantage of the Conservatives, who on 21 August, through the intermediary of La Minerve, launched a smear campaign against Lanctot. He was called "a breaker of windows, a Fenian, a violent anticlerical, an annexationist, an excommunicate, a revolutionary, a plague of Egypt, etc." La Minerve closed its campaign with a piece of scandal: Alderman Lanctot, it reported, had degraded himself by associating with a certain Jérémie Sinotte in order to obtain contracts from the municipality. On the evening of 6 September, Cartier was victorious by a majority of 348 votes.

Lanctot did not accept defeat. He was convinced that Cartier had "stolen the election." He began to busy himself again, hoping to stir up violent protest in working class districts. He held public meetings, had petitions circulated, and thundered in L'Union nationale against the priests who had supported Cartier and confederation. This agitation worried the Rouges, who felt uncomfortable in his company. Lanctot isolated himself by his excessive behaviour. He never recovered from the defeat that Cartier had just inflicted on him.

By the end of September 1867 Lanctot no longer had friends or political allies. He returned to his law practice to meet the needs of his family. The massive support of the parish priests for confederation led him to question his faith. He ceased to publish L'Union nationale; it no longer paid its way. But these difficulties did not prevent him from forming new plans, and from preparing a counterstroke.

On 15 Feb. 1868 Lanctot issued a prospectus for a new newspaper, L'Indépendance canadienne, the first number of which appeared on 22 April. He had found a new cause: the independence of Canada from England and annexation to the United States. According to him, confederation was a provisional situation. It would evolve towards a legislative union or a federation of states within a zollverein, or annexation to the United States. Canadians must therefore prepare themselves from now on to adopt one of these three options. He proposed annexation. Lanctot's appeal aroused no enthusiasm among French Canadians, and it irritated English Canadians. When in August he tried to organize an independence league, he received only gibes.

Ruined financially and politically, he decided to go to the United States where he hoped to find among Franco-Americans a more open mind about the annexation of Canada. He arrived at Detroit on 10 Sept. 1868. The Club Démocratique Français gave him a warm welcome. On the 22nd he gave a speech which was a manifesto, designed to launch "L'Association de l'Indépendance pacifique du Canada." Encouraged by his first success, he then went to New England, where he encountered nothing but indifference. In the spring of 1869, at Burlington, he started L'Idée nouvelle to propagate his movement, then, at Worcester, he launched L'Impartial. These papers touched off no response among Franco-Americans and went bankrupt.

In the autumn of 1869 Lanctot returned to Detroit, where on 13 October a Franco-American convention was held. He succeeded temporarily in setting up cells among the delegates and in getting his campaign for the independence of Canada endorsed by a majority. On 20 November he again began to publish L'Impartial, in which he idealized American society. A fleeting victory, obtained by intrigues at a convention! The content and tone of L'Impartial were displeasing. For want of money, Lanctot had to abandon publication of his paper with the tenth number.

The failure of L'Impartial meant the end of another dream for Lanctot. It gave rise to an internal crisis, about which little evidence exists. In a moment of despair and revolt, he rejected the faith of his forefathers and became a Baptist. Perhaps he hoped he had found a means of acquiring celebrity in the American republic, where it was good form, in certain circles, to attack Catholicism. In the defence of his new cause he displayed the ardour of a neophyte. He published a pamphlet whose very title was a declaration of war, Rome, the great usurper. . . . In March he began at Detroit the publication of a paper, the Anti-Roman Advocate, in which he denounced "the despotism, superstition and ignorance" of the Catholic Church. The Baptist religion awakened no response among Franco-Americans, any more than annexation had. The Anti-Roman Advocate foundered, swamped by debts if not by ridicule, barely five months after its first number appeared.

Ruined and discredited, Lanctot returned to Montreal in the autumn of 1870. He took up the practice of law again, in partnership with his brother Philéas. He waited for an opening. It occurred at the time of the provincial elections in the spring of 1871. Lanctot stood for Montreal East. He counted on the support of the Knights of St Crispin, a secret association that grouped workers of the boot and shoe industry, and that the church had denounced. The loyalty of these workers did not spare him a humiliating defeat. Lanctot did not give up. He hung on to the workers and attempted to revive the Grande Association. In March or April 1872 he published a 46-page pamphlet, Association du capital et du travail, in which he demonstrated that workers should share in entrepreneurial revenues by a system of dividends. In the federal elections of autumn 1872, Cartier, in difficulties in Montreal East because of the ultramontanist opposition, gambled on the working class issue, and made use of Lanctot's talents. The latter's about-face is largely explicable by his financial needs, even if he did try to justify it by the interest Cartier was beginning to take in the working class. This strategy profited neither Cartier nor Lanctot. The former was beaten in Montreal East, and the second, who had repudiated the ideas of his youth, was now merely "a dead leaf at the mercy of every wind."

Lanctot no longer had any following at Montreal. His lawyer's office was deserted. He learned what destitution was. David places his return to the bosom of the Catholic Church during these difficult months. Did Lanctot yield to popular pressure? Did he truly rediscover the faith of his forefathers? Had he even lost it? It would be fruitless to elaborate, for Lanctot entrusted his secret to no one.

Lanctot's life, from then on, was a succession of rebuffs. In 1873 or 1874 he tried in vain to make a new life for himself in the United States. In January 1875 his friend Alphonse Lusignan* got for him the post of editor of the Courrier de l'Outaouais, and a few months later that of stenographer in the House of Commons. Lanctot bought the Courrier de l'Outaouais in June 1875, and moved it to Hull. He launched out into municipal politics, and played the role of defender of the people. For a while he seemed to have struck a lucky vein. He was appointed lawyer of the town of Hull, and published a sort of unofficial paper of the town council, called L'Écho de Hull. But he misused his prestige, and revealed his personal interest too clearly. His supporters deserted him, and in their turn his enemies, once back in power, ostracized him. Exhausted, worn out physically, he already needed, at 38 years of age, to retire to a quiet place to recover his health. In the spring of 1877 he went to live on a farm at Lucerne. He died during the night of 30 July.

Lanctot belonged to his time. In more than one respect he was an embodiment of the French Canadians, ceaselessly torn between their admiration for British institutions and their situation as members of a colony, between their French origin and their North American environment. In particular, he was the embodiment of a city, Montreal, where in the second half of the 19th century problems were of two kinds: those related to national considerations and those related to social considerations. He was one of the first French Canadian ideologists to make a tentative beginning at a synthesis of them.

Lanctot left five daughters and one son. Two children had died in infancy. His wife, Agnès Doutre, survived him by less than two years. She died on 9 May 1879 and was buried in the cemetery at Côte-des-Neiges.

JEAN HAMELIN

[Lanctot's private papers have disappeared. To follow his intellectual development we must fall back on his printed writings, which are numerous: La Presse (Montréal), 5 oct. 1863 – 5 sept. 1864; L'Union nationale (Montréal), 3 sept. 1864 – 7 nov. 1867; L'Indépendance canadienne (Montréal), 22 avril – 3 août 1868; Association du capital et du travail ([1872]). Other works by Lanctot are known to have been published, but could not be consulted, usually because they no longer exist: L'Idée nouvelle (Burlington, Vt., et Worcester, Mass.), spring 1869; L'Impartial (Worcester, Mass., et Detroit, Mich.), autumn 1869; Rome, the great usurper . . . church and man ([1870]); The Anti-Roman Advocate (Detroit, Mich.), March – August 1870; Le Courrier de l'Outaouais (Hull), janv. 1875 – avril 1876; L'Écho de Hull, 1876.

No one was indifferent to Lanctot; his enemies replied to his words. For this reason La Minerve (Montréal), Cartier's mouthpiece, Le Pays (Montréal), the Rouge party's organ, L'Ordre (Montréal), paper of the moderate liberals, Le Nouveau Monde (Montréal), the ultramontane tribune, L'Opinion publique (Montréal), the nationalist paper, provide further information.

Laurent-Olivier David, who knew the Lanctot family well, published a biography of Lanctot in L'Opinion publique on 23 Aug. 1877. Stripped of its romanticism, David's study remains a valuable source, which is full of details. In March 1968, Gaétan Gervais presented at the University of Ottawa a thesis entitled, "Médéric Lanctot et l'Union nationale," which analyses in depth Lanctot's political thought from 1864 to 1867. Philippe Constant [J.-J. Lefebvre] published a genealogy of the Lanctot family in SGCF, Mémoires, X (1959), 27–48.

Some references to Lanctot are found in the following more general works: Alexandre Belisle, Histoire de la presse franco-américaine; comprenant l'historique de l'émigration de Canadiens français aux États-Unis, leur développement et leurs progrès (Worcester, Mass., 1911), 21–77. J.-C. Bonenfant, La naissance de la

Confédération (Montréal, 1969), 136–43. Silas Farmer, The history of Detroit and Michigan; or the metropolis illustrated; a chronological cyclopædia of the past and present, including a full record of territorial days in Michigan and the annals of Wayne County (Detroit, 1884), 678. Fauteux, Patriotes, 284–85. Télesphore St-Pierre, Histoire des Canadiens du Michigan et du comté d'Essex, Ontario (Montréal, 1895), 234–49, 325–39. "Biographie de Médéric Lanctot," La Minerve (Montréal), 1^er^ août 1877. Gustave Lanctot, "La fin d'une légende," Revue franco-américaine (Montréal), X (1912–13), 282–91. Télesphore St-Pierre, "Les sociétés et les conventions canadiennes aux États-Unis," Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste de Québec, Annales, IV (1902), 466–69. J.H.]

LANDRY, AMAND, farmer, teacher, and politician; b. 8 Dec. 1805 at Memramcook, Westmorland County, N.B., son of Allain Landry and Anastasie Dupuis (Dupuy), a descendant of Charles de Saint-Étienne* de La Tour; d. 12 July 1877 at Memramcook.

Amand Landry was educated at the Memramcook Public School; he taught school for a short time and then became a prosperous farmer and respected leader of the Acadian community of Westmorland County. In 1839 he married Pélagie Caissie (Casey) of Memramcook by whom he had seven children. The eldest son, Pierre-Amand Landry*, was an MLA in New Brunswick, a federal MP, and a judge of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick.

Amand Landry had a long career in New Brunswick politics. He was first elected to the assembly in 1846; in 1850 he was defeated by William Crane* but in 1853 he won a by-election called to fill the vacancy caused by Crane's death. He won re-election in 1854 and in 1856, was defeated in 1857, but returned to the house in 1861 and remained a member until 1870, when he retired from politics. Landry has been described as a Liberal; however, he had a mind of his own and always voted for what he considered to be the best interests of the Acadian people. He was a strong opponent of railway construction both in 1847 and in 1868 because he felt that the proposed line between St Andrews and Woodstock and the Woodstock branch railway would do nothing to benefit the Acadians.

Landry was a strong anti-confederate, and supported Albert James Smith* in the elections of 1865 and 1866. In the latter, which saw the defeat of Smith's government, Landry was one of the eight anti-confederates returned; of these, six came from constituencies with a large French population. In opposing confederation Landry expressed the fears of the Acadian community, which did not wish to be absorbed into a larger political entity. Anxious not to lose their identity and individuality, they were suspicious not only of English-speaking Canadians but also of French Canadians and spurned attempts by Roman Catholic officials sent from Quebec to persuade them to vote for confederation.

Amand Landry was the first Acadian political figure of any importance in New Brunswick. He understood the Acadians' problems, he spoke their language, and they, in turn, trusted him.

W. A. SPRAY

Archives paroissiales de Saint-Thomas (Memramcook, N.B.), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures. University of New Brunswick, Graves (New Brunswick) MSS, Westmorland County. Chignecto Post (Sackville, N.B.), 19 July 1877. Le Moniteur Acadien (Shediac, N.B.), 19 July 1877. Morning News (Saint John, N.B.), 21 June 1861. Hannay, History of New Brunswick, II, 107. MacNutt, New Brunswick, 354–55, 453–54.

LANE, RICHARD, HBC clerk, lawyer, and territorial official in Oregon and Washington; b.c. 1816 at Sandgate, Kent; d. 20 Feb. 1877 at The Dalles, Oregon.

Richard Lane was appointed apprentice clerk in the Northern Department by the Hudson's Bay Company in December 1837; the following June he sailed for York Factory aboard the company ship Prince Rupert. Lane moved to the Red River District in September 1838, where he served as accountant until 11 June 1845 when Governor Sir George Simpson* ordered his transfer to the Columbia Department. Four days later Lane departed for Fort Vancouver with Peter Skene Odgen* and Lieutenants Henry James Warre* and Mervin Vavasour*. The party reached its destination on 26 August, and Lane, whose original instructions were to take charge of a post to be established at Cape Disappointment at the mouth of the Columbia River, was made accountant at Fort Vancouver, replacing Dugald MACTAVISH. To protect the company's lands and improvements at Fort Vancouver, Lane was employed during the later summer in marking out the nine-mile-square claims around the fort which were then recorded with the Oregon provisional government. Lane himself took a claim beginning one-and-a-half miles west of the fort. The claims were abandoned on 4 April 1849 at the request of James DOUGLAS.

Simpson had promised Lane that he could return to Red River in 1846, and he accompanied Warre and Vavasour with the York Factory Express when it departed from Fort Vancouver on 25 March. Lane took with him the annual accounts of the Columbia Department, but his real purpose for making the trip was personal. The express arrived at Fort Garry (Winnipeg) on 7 June, and on 13 June Lane married Mary McDermot, the "country-born" daughter of Andrew McDermot*. Accompanied by his bride and the artist Paul KANE, Lane took charge of the returning express, arriving at Fort Vancouver on 8 Dec. 1846 with confirmation of the final settlement of the Oregon boundary dispute, which had been concluded at Washington, D.C., in June.

The Oregon provisional government had organized the area north of the Columbia River as Vancouver County, and, on 16 Jan. 1847, Governor George Abernethy appointed Lane to the county judgeship which Dugald Mactavish had resigned. A change in the laws of the provisional government in 1846 required that justices of the peace or judges be elected, and on 7 June 1847 Lane was one of three justices elected for Vancouver County, but he did not stand again in 1848.

Although he evidently did not resign from the HBC until 1851, Lane moved to Oregon City in 1850 and became a merchant. At the same time he served, for about a year after his retirement, as the company's agent at Champoeg, where it had a granary and store. Lane seems to have conducted the business at Champoeg "most shamefully," and his operations were said "to savour of fraud" because of losses and bad debts. In the 1850 census Lane's personal real estate in Oregon City was valued at $20,000.

Mary McDermot Lane died at Oregon City after a long and painful illness on 10 May 1851, leaving Lane with two small children. He sent the children back to Red River where they were raised by Andrew McDermot. Early in 1853 Lane cleared land for a farm near Fort Vancouver, but in 1855 he was back in Oregon where he ran unsuccessfully for justice of the peace in Milton Precinct, Columbia County. During the Yakima Indian war (1855–58) he enlisted for nine months in the Lewis River Mounted Rangers. Following this service he moved to Olympia, capital of the Washington Territory, and in November 1857 he was appointed instructor for the Squaxin Indian Reservation and taught there until July 1858. That same month Lane returned to Olympia where he was elected auditor of Thurston County, an office which he held until 1862 and again from 1864 to 1866. Thereafter Lane was a servant of the territorial, county, and city governments until 1870, sometimes holding offices at all three levels concurrently. However there was small remuneration from such offices, and public office-seeking was uncertain, particularly in a time when the Democrats, who had long held a virtual monopoly of territorial offices, were being replaced by Republican appointees and candidates. With his years of experience as a justice of the peace and a clerk of the courts, Lane moved to the other side of the bench. On 20 May 1865 the Washington Standard announced that Lane, a "well qualified" and "affable gentleman," had been admitted to practise as an attorney. Lane was evidently too reticent to be a successful lawyer, and his habits and attitudes remained those of a competent, amiable, and meticulous clerk.

On 25 March 1873, Lane was declared "dangerous to himself and the community at large" because of "mental derangement produced by long continued use of alcoholic liquors." Judged insane, he was committed to the Territorial Asylum at Steilacoom for treatment which was expected to take two or three months, and his affairs were placed in trusteeship. Following his release from the asylum, Lane returned to Olympia and his law practice. But his affairs continued to decline. He had married Mrs Anna Gardiner on 9 Dec. 1858, but by 1875 he was listed in the county census as unmarried. In the late winter of 1877 he set out from Olympia en route for Yakima on legal business. Stopping in The Dalles, Oregon, he evidently became despondent and purchased ten grains of morphine. He was found dead in his bed on 20 February, and following a coroner's inquest which returned a verdict of suicide, he was buried at county expense as he had neither baggage nor funds.

WILLIAM R. SAMPSON

PABC, Thomas Lowe journal, 1843–50. "Documents relative to Warre and Vavasour's military reconnaissance in Oregon, 1845–6," ed. Joseph Schafer, Oregon Hist. Q. (Portland, Ore.), X (1909), 1–99. HBRS, VII (Rich). United States, Office of Indian Affairs, Report of the commissioner of Indian affairs, accompanying the annual report of the secretary of the interior, for the year 1858 (Washington, 1858). Daily Pacific Tribune (Seattle, Wash.), 1 March 1877. Pioneer and Democrat (Olympia, Wash.), 10 Dec. 1858. Washington Standard (Olympia, Wash.), 29 March, 19 April 1873; 3 March 1877. H. H. Bancroft, History of Oregon (2v., San Francisco, 1886–88); History of Washington, Idaho, and Montana, 1845–1889 (San Francisco, 1890). Mrs G. E. Blankenship [Georgiana Mitchell], Early history of Thurston County, Washington, together with biographies and reminiscences of those identified with pioneer days (Olympia, Wash., 1914). G. R. Newell, So fair a dwelling place (Olympia, Wash., 1950). J. C. Rathbun, History of Thurston County, Washington (Olympia, Wash., 1895). T. C. Elliott, "Peter Skene Ogden, fur trader," Oregon Hist. Q. (Portland, Ore.), XI (1910), 229–78.

LA ROCQUE (Larocque), CHARLES, Catholic priest, third bishop of Saint-Hyacinthe; b. 15 Nov.

1809 at Chambly-sur-Richelieu, L.C., eldest son of Henri La Rocque and Sophie Robert; d. 15 July 1875 at Saint-Hyacinthe, Que.

Charles La Rocque was still a child when the parish priest of Chambly, Abbé Pierre-Marie Mignault, detected in him aptitudes which he resolved to nurture. Charles' cousin, Joseph La Rocque*, who was to precede him in the episcopal see of Saint-Hyacinthe, was also noticed.

On 1 March 1821, at the initiative of Charles-Louis-Roch de Saint-Ours*, legislative councillor, an association to improve educational opportunities in the Chambly River area had been established. Its aim was to obtain – for gifted but poor children of the region – scholarships which would allow them to receive their full classical education at the college of Saint-Hyacinthe. Charles and Joseph La Rocque were chosen by Father Mignault to be among the first of the 30 students to receive the association's bursaries. The two La Rocque cousins vied with each other and were formidable rivals. Later Charles readily recalled these eager struggles, and added: "nature made us relatives, the college made us friends, and we have always cultivated our friendship as being one of the sweetest pleasures of life."

His classical education finished, Charles La Rocque donned the cassock, and in 1828 began to study theology. While preparing himself for the priesthood, he taught humanities at the college of Saint-Hyacinthe, of which the authoritarian Abbé Thomas Maguire* had been director since 1827. In the middle of 1831, Bishop Jean-Jacques Lartigue* summoned La Rocque to Montreal to complete his theological studies at the seminary of Saint-Jacques, which was established in the first floor of the bishop's residence. It was no doubt there that Abbé La Rocque was introduced to the propositions of ultramontanism, of which Bishop Lartigue was a firm supporter, and particularly to the doctrine of papal infallibility, which he was to see confirmed with great ceremony when he took part in the Vatican Council in 1870.

La Rocque, curate since 1832, was summoned to his native parish in 1835 to assume the direction of the classical college of Saint-Pierre, established ten years before by his childhood benefactor, the parish priest Mignault. The following year he began his own career as a parish priest at Saint-Pie (Bagot County), where he spent four years. In 1840 he became the sixth parish priest of L'Acadie (Saint-Jean County), and the first priest of this parish to be appointed by the bishop of Montreal.

It was at L'Acadie that Abbé La Rocque first encountered the Protestants of Swiss origin who were waging an intense campaign of proselytism in the region. These Protestants originally included Henriette Odin* Feller and the pastor Louis Roussy; they had taken up residence at Grande-Ligne in 1835, and were joined there, in 1840, by four ministers who were compatriots. One of La Rocque's confrères, Abbé Louis Normandeau*, whom he was lodging out of charity, even left him to take refuge among them and become a Baptist minister.

In 1844 Abbé La Rocque was transferred to the parish of Saint-Jean-l'Évangéliste (Saint-Jean). This parish formed part of the barony of Longueuil, of which Charles William Grant, 5th Baron of Longueuil, had held the title since 1841. A shipping and rail terminal, and a large commercial entrepôt between New York and Montreal, Saint-Jean was to see its population grow from 1,315 inhabitants in 1841 to 4,500 in 1858. Thanks to this growth, and to its commercial and industrial activity, Saint-Jean received its charter as a municipality on 15 Sept. 1856. The Civil War still further increased its prosperity, through the extensive growth of transit trade and the export of grain, hay, and manufactured products.

According to the 1851 census, out of a total of 3,215 persons there were 2,577 Catholics to constitute the flock under the care of La Rocque, who displayed the qualities of a born administrator in this rapidly expanding parish. In the spring of 1845 the church, whose construction had been finished in 1828, was provided with an organ built by Joseph Casavant. The financial state of the parish council was a thriving one. In 1848 La Rocque had a convent built for the sisters of the Congregation of Notre-Dame. Two years later he asked the college of Saint-Hyacinthe to set up a branch in his parish. In 1864 he renewed his request. This time the offer was accepted. On 29 September of that year, a teacher from Saint-Hyacinthe, two seminarists, and 85 pupils inaugurated the college of Saint-Jean, with a programme of two distinct courses, one commercial and the other classical.

La Rocque did not always have an easy time as the parish priest of Saint-Jean. He had had apprehensions about going there because of a population in which Catholics mingled with Protestants, and because the events of 1837–38 had left some open wounds. Indeed at Saint-Jean he encountered once more the "Swiss" who had greatly worried him at L'Acadie. Despite his pacific intentions – he wrote that "no bitter word" had ever left his mouth to "attack a Protestant of any denomination, because of his religious opinions" – he perforce engaged in polemics when in 1852 he published a controversial book which drew much attention at the time, and in which he deplored "the setting up of this Branch of the Bible Society specifically for Saint-Jean and Saint-Athanase, in the midst of a completely Catholic population, and with the firm intention of doing violence to their principles and conscience." In particular he blamed Normandeau, who had been sent to Saint-Jean "with the express purpose of having him preach there for my parishioners," Normandeau, "a poor wretched Canadian priest" who had "passed from the Catholic church to Protestantism by such a sorry path."

One of his own parishioners, the notary Pierre-Paul Desmaray, gave Abbé La Rocque no less trouble. Desmaray had drawn attention to himself during the rebellion by his zeal for the cause of Louis-Joseph Papineau and had been one of the first to be arrested, on 17 Nov. 1837, with Dr Joseph-François Davignon. Some years later Desmaray had returned to Canada from the United States, and had taken up his profession again at Saint-Jean. He had not forgiven the clergy for its attitude towards the events of 1837, and contrived to harass La Rocque continually. On 7 Jan. 1844 he transmitted to him a petition to have the position of the pulpit changed, and the appointments of churchwardens made in future by a general meeting of the property owners resident in the parish. However, the affair of the seigneurial pew gave Desmaray the chance to flout the parish priest and the council even more effectively.

The seigneurial pew was reserved for the Baron de Longueuil. As the seigneur was a Protestant, the pew was left at the disposal of his representative, the notary Desmaray, who occupied it for nothing, thus getting out of paying the pew rent to which all other parishioners were liable. This awkward situation, which lasted for five years, ended with Desmaray's death on 17 Sept. 1854.

Abbé La Rocque maintained cordial relations with his bishop, Ignace Bourget*. The latter had requested him to pronounce Bishop Lartigue's funeral oration at the memorial service celebrated at the church of St James on 29 April 1841, and La Rocque had accompanied Bourget on his voyage to Rome in 1854, to be present at the proclamation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. But despite these relations, La Rocque kept his distance, for the bishop's intransigent ultramontanism sometimes clashed with La Rocque's sense of what was possible and his concern for pacifying by compromise. In 1857, when the Roman liturgy was adopted in the diocese of Montreal, La Rocque did not conceal from the bishop that he disagreed about the application of certain points of this liturgy. The bishop was obliged to admit the cogency of the reasons put forward by the parish priest of Saint-Jean, although holding firmly to his own line of conduct: "In one liturgy as in another," he replied to La Rocque on 22 May 1857, "there are questions on which differences of opinion are permitted. . . . By consulting very skilful masters of ceremonies in Rome, I reached the conviction that all questions of liturgy were not yet clearly decided, at least for them. It must not appear surprising, therefore, that in a country like ours we should still find ourselves perplexed. Yet one must not remain in a state of indefiniteness, the worst state of all. But while settling many undecided cases, I conceived it my duty to leave to the discriminating conscience of good priests a way of avoiding needless worry."

Charles La Rocque had been parish priest of Saint-Jean for 22 years when, on the resignation of the second bishop of Saint-Hyacinthe, his cousin Joseph La Rocque, he was persuaded to agree to succeed him. Out of affection for his parishioners, he decided to receive the episcopal consecration in the new church of Saint-Jean, the building of which had been the object of his attentions since 1857 and which had scarcely been completed. On 29 July 1866 he was consecrated by Bishop Charles-François Baillargeon*, administrator of the archdiocese of Quebec, who was assisted by Bishop Bourget and Joseph-Bruno Guigues, bishop of Ottawa. One of those present in the congregation was George-Étienne Cartier, who wanted to indicate by this gesture the friendship between himself and the new bishop.

It was not without distress that on 20 March 1866 La Rocque had agreed, at the request of the bishops of the ecclesiastical province, to be appointed by Pius IX bishop of Saint-Hyacinthe. He foresaw the financial difficulties and the political-religious conflicts in which he would wear out his health prematurely, and he is said to have confessed at that time to one of his close associates: "I accept this high position, because it is a veritable sacrifice that is imposed on me. I must not now expect to reach the age of my worthy old mother. This will give me 10 years, certainly not 15."

Indeed, the episcopal corporation was encumbered with a debt of $44,000, an enormous sum for the period. But the dissensions that split the town and the diocese were far more disturbing. Saint-Hyacinthe was probably at that time, after Montreal, the town of Canada East where partisan struggles were most bitter: the Papineau and Dessaulles families had their roots there; the college, whose superior was the vicar general Joseph-Sabin Raymond*, had been a target for the violent attacks of Louis-Antoine Dessaulles* ever since the Bleu candidate, Rémi Raymond, had won against Augustin-Cyrille Papineau, Dessaulles' cousin, in the 1863 elections. The first six months of 1867 were to see the opponents Sabin

Raymond and Dessaulles waging a savage paper war; each man put together some 20 interminable letters, Raymond's prose being reproduced by Le Courrier de Saint-Hyacinthe, which was edited by Oscar Dunn*, a brilliant former pupil of the college and an ardent supporter of Louis Veuillot into the bargain, and that of Dessaulles appearing in Le Journal de Saint-Hyacinthe and Le Pays of Montreal.

Bishop La Rocque therefore arrived in a diocese that was in complete ferment. His attitude towards confederation, an "occurrence of immense significance," an "achievement without parallel in the annals of our history," as he wrote in a pastoral letter of 18 June 1867, was not calculated to induce calm, as can easily be imagined. He acknowledged that through his letter he would show himself to be more a patriot than a bishop, for he feared above all annexation to the United States, which according to him would amount to the death of the French Canadian nation. At this time too Alexandre Dufresne, the MLA for Iberville, had introduced into his county a branch of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste, a centre of resistance to confederation, but also, to some extent, a secret society, and as such an object of suspicion to the church. In March 1867 Dufresne published a pamphlet reproducing his stormy correspondence with Bishop La Rocque; after his defeat Dufresne passed to Alphonse Lusignan*, editor of Le Pays, the documents relative to his quarrel with the bishop, and Lusignan gave them a wide publicity in the issues of Le Pays of 24 and 29 Oct. 1867.

To the vexations that his stand on political-religious matters brought him were added the financial straits of the diocese. To meet the debt and gradually pay it off, La Rocque appealed to each of his priests through a plan which he outlined in circular letters of 19 Sept. and 27 Dec. 1866, and expanded on in a pastoral letter of 11 May 1867. Abbé Isaac Lesieur-Desaulniers, on whom he conferred the title of vicar general, beggared himself for his bishop's sake. La Rocque reduced his own expenses by departing from Saint-Hyacinthe and going to live in the parish of Beloeil, leaving as locum tenens his secretary, Abbé Louis-Zéphirin Moreau*, who disposed of current business. After seven years of absence La Rocque returned to his bishopric, with the satisfaction of having liquidated by the beginning of 1875 the debt that had so concerned him at the start of his episcopate.

In 1870 he attended the Vatican Council. Unfortunately a serious illness forced him to leave Rome, "at the moment when the doctrine [of infallibility]," which he had advocated all his life, "was about to be made an article of faith by a solemn definition," as he wrote, on his return, in a pastoral letter of 15 Nov. 1870.

The following year, in a circular letter dated 28 April 1871 from Beloeil, he declared himself on the side of the archbishop of Quebec, Elzéar-Alexandre Taschereau*, and the bishop of Rimouski, Jean-Pierre-François Laforce* Langevin, who had just disavowed the Programme catholique – an ultramontane political programme – as having been "formulated without any participation by the episcopate." Taking an increasingly independent stand in relation to Bishop Bourget, La Rocque intervened in the affair of the keeping of the civil registers, when Le Nouveau Monde, semi-official organ of the bishopric of Montreal, was leading a ruthless campaign against the "gallican" George-Étienne Cartier. In a circular letter of 23 Jan. 1871 to his clergy, La Rocque exhorted his subordinates "to bless and praise God for the independence, the liberty, and the most ample and wide privileges enjoyed by our modest Church of the Province of Quebec, perhaps better endowed in this respect than any other Church in the world." These lines and many others in Bishop La Rocque's circular letter startled Bishop Bourget, who was struggling relentlessly "against the encroachments of civil law," and who, as he wrote to the bishop of Saint-Hyacinthe on 11 Feb. 1871, was "preparing to ask for the reform of the civil code at those points that are at variance with canon law and the authority of the Holy See." Bishop Bourget concontinued: ". . . that you should have rendered your circular letter public in the present circumstances, by placing it in the hands of your clergy, is in my opinion a great scandal. For the world will not fail to conclude that you are a slavish supporter of the secular authority; and that, to serve the cause of a few friends belonging to the world, who consider you their defender, you are turning your back on your colleagues and being evasive over principles that we are responsible for upholding at all costs."

Other incidents revealed to the public at large that the spiritual heads of the diocese of Saint-Hyacinthe did not concur with the extravagant arguments of Bishop Bourget and his friends. The one that created the most stir was probably the Raymond-Pinsonnault dispute. Bishop Joseph-Sabin Raymond stated in a lecture in 1872 that there were neither liberals nor gallicans in Canada in the religious sense of the term; Bishop Pierre-Adolphe Pinsonnault*, who had been attached to the bishopric of Montreal after a stay in the United States, his deafness and administrative follies having obliged him to resign as bishop of Sandwich, retorted that Bishop Raymond was precisely one of those Catholic liberals that Pius IX had condemned. The dispute was turning into a dialogue of the deaf!

Bishop La Rocque thought it advisable to set aside these polemics, in order to devote himself to more useful projects. In October 1873 he had the joy of welcoming to his episcopal town four French Dominicans, the forerunners of a permanent establishment; he had overcome the prejudices of the prior of the Dominican province of France, Father Bernard Chocarne, who after a first visit to Canada in 1868 had scoffed at those "half-savage Canadians, backward in politics, in philosophy, in literature, out and out preservers of a past that all peoples truly worthy of liberty and progress consider done away with." From Bishop La Rocque too came the plan of starting a new episcopal see in the Eastern Townships, using a part of the dioceses of Quebec and Trois-Rivières. He argued convincingly for this plan during the fifth provincial council of Quebec. At the request of the priests on this council, Pius IX created the diocese of Sherbrooke by a brief dated 28 Aug. 1874.

Exhausted by the opposition that had beset him, and by the work he had imposed upon himself during nine years of an episcopate notable, in addition to the achievements already described, for the founding of two missions, the erection of seven parishes, and the ordination of 55 priests, grievously distressed also by the death of his mother in the spring of 1875, Bishop La Rocque passed away on 15 July 1875 at the Hôtel-Dieu of Saint-Hyacinthe. His body was placed in the vault of this establishment, near his mother's.

Tall in stature, with regular features and a florid complexion, alert, searching eyes, a well-shaped, usually smiling mouth, and distinguished bearing, he was nicknamed "handsome La Rocque." To this impressive physique corresponded qualities of the heart, the chief of which was probably his capacity for warmth and understanding. The balance he maintained in the midst of the furious discords that troubled the second part of the 19th century made his role by no means a negligible one. We may conclude with Abbé Élie-Joseph-Arthur Auclair* that Bishop La Rocque "was an outstanding man of action, a zealous priest, devoted to his flock, a bishop of great distinction, a true leader of the Church."

PHILIPPE SYLVAIN

[Charles La Rocque], Une autre récompense de 1 600 louis ou réponse au défi de Mr Atkinson avec la preuve des dogmes catholiques attaqués dans ce défi (Montréal, 1852).

ACAM, RLB, 10, pp.109–10; RLB, 19, pp.306–12. Mandements, lettres pastorales et circulaires des évêques de Saint-Hyacinthe, A.-X. Bernard, édit. (8v., Montréal, 1888–98), II, 313–27. Le Courrier de Saint-Hyacinthe, 16 juill. 1875. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 22 juill. 1875. J.-P. Bernard, "La pensée et l'influence des Rouges (1848–1867)," unpublished PHD thesis, Université de Montréal, 1968, 343ss. J.-D. Brosseau, Saint-Jean-de-Québec; origine et développements (Saint-Jean, Qué., [1937]), 213–15. S.-A. Moreau, Histoire de L'Acadie, province de Québec (Montréal, 1908), 71–74. É.-J. Auclair, "Les trois évêques Larocque," SCHÉC Rapport, 1945–46, 11–17. Robert [Philippe] Sylvain, "Aperçu sur le prosélytisme protestant au Canada français," RSCT, LV (1962), 3rd ser., sect.I, 69–72. Armand Yon, "Les Canadiens français jugés par les Français de France, 1830–1939," RHAF, XIX (1965–66), 578.

LATERRIÈRE, MARC-PASCAL DE SALES, doctor, seigneur, and politician; b. 25 March 1792 at Baie-du-Febvre (Baieville, Yamaska County), L.C., son of Pierre Fabre*, dit Laterrière, and Catherine Delzenne; married Eulalie-Antoinette, daughter of Claude Dénéchaud*, who bore him four boys and two girls; d. 29 March 1872 at Les Éboulements, Que.

Originally from Languedoc, Marc-Pascal's father adopted the name of Jean-Pierre de Sales Laterrière after his arrival in Canada in 1766. Jean-Pierre practised medicine, engaged in commerce, and directed the ironworks at Saint-Maurice, before becoming seigneur of Les Éboulements. Concerned about his sons' education, he obtained admission for them to the Petit Séminaire of Quebec. When Marc-Pascal left this institution, in 1807, he studied medicine at Philadelphia. He was back in Canada in 1812 and took up residence at Quebec; when the war came, he served as surgeon of the 6th Battalion of militia of Lower Canada. After the war he carried on his profession in Lower Town, Quebec, until he received from his mother, in 1816, half of the seigneury of Les Éboulements; in 1829 he acquired the whole of it. His manor-house was situated in Northumberland County, which Laterrière represented in the House of Assembly from 1824 to 1830. He then became the member for Saguenay County. He was not identified with the members of the Tory party, but was rather considered as a politician sympathetic to the claims of the Parti Canadien. In 1832 he entered the Legislative Council, and from 1838 to 1841 was part of the Special Council, but attended none of its meetings.

From then until 1845 he kept apart from political life. "I am against Union," he explained to Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* on 29 Oct. 1842, "even with all the modifications that our enemies are today forced to concede." He had no faith "in that problematic justice" that the French-speaking leader sought to establish. Notwithstanding his opposition to union, he returned to the political arena in 1845 as MLA for Saguenay County. The debates on the seigneurial régime might have prompted him to take this decision. In 1851 he sat on the parliamentary committee responsible for defining the terms and conditions governing the abolition of seigneurial tenure in Canada East. Laterrière abandoned politics again during the period 1854 to 1856. In the latter year he was elected legislative councillor for the Laurentians. He was an anti-confederate candidate in the federal elections of 1867, and was defeated.

Laterrière showed less interest in military life than in political life. In 1830 he refused an appointmen as major in the militia of Lower Canada, for fear that the obedience due to a superior might endanger the "great privileges" inherent in the profession of doctor. In 1848 he accepted the position of adjutant-general of the militia of Lower Canada, but rapidly dissociated himself from it.

He led a peaceful existence on his seigneury of Les Éboulements, and played a rather unobtrusive role in politics. The rare sources that make mention of his career do, however, give an indication of his nationalist convictions.

JEAN-PIERRE GAGNON

BNQ, Société historique de Montréal, Collection La Fontaine, Lettres, 212, 707, 710, 717 (copies in PAC). PAC, RG 1, L1, 43, p.644; L3^L, 121, pp.59135–36, 59138; RG 4, A1, 131, pp.41955–57; 190/2, p.108; 216, p.26; 247, p.1; 248, pp.114, 133; 266 (1831), pp.121–125A; 275/1 (1832), p.35; 392, p.396; 399, p.4; 410, p.26. Journaux du Conseil spécial de la province du Bas-Canada, 1838–1840. Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 233–34. Ahern, Notes pour l'histoire de la médecine, 351–52. H.-R. Casgrain, La famille de Sales Laterrière (Québec, 1870). Gérard Malchelosse, "Mémoires romancés," Cahiers des Dix, XXV (1960), 103–46.

LAVERDIÈRE (Cauchon, dit Laverdière), CHARLES-HONORÉ, priest, teacher, librarian, and historian; b. 23 Oct. 1826 at Château-Richer (Montmorency County), L.C., son of Charles Cauchon, dit Laverdière, farmer, and of Théotiste Cauchon; d. 11 March 1873 at Quebec.

Charles-Honoré Laverdière entered the Petit Séminaire of Quebec in the autumn of 1840 and proved to be a brilliant student; he notes himself that his name regularly appeared on the annual prize list. In September 1848 he was appointed assistant teacher at the seminary and taught physics until 1850, after which he completed his theological studies and was ordained a priest on 3 Aug. 1851.

After his ordination he was again appointed a teacher at the seminary, possibly through the influence of Thomas-Étienne Hamel*, who was one of the familiars of the superior, Abbé Louis-Jacques Casault*. Indeed, Hamel wrote to Laverdière on 1 Sept. 1851: "Your affair is settled. You remain at the seminary." From then on Laverdière held no further office as vicar or parish priest. On 8 May 1855, when he asked the superior for membership in the seminary, which he was to receive a month later, he explained that he felt himself called more strongly to a community life than to the discharge of the duties of the ministry. He first taught mathematics, and in 1854 history. Thirteen years later he succeeded Jean-Baptiste-Antoine Ferland* in the chair of history at the Faculty of Arts of the Université Laval.

From 1851 on, while continuing to teach, Laverdière occupied semi-officially the post of deputy to the librarian of the seminary. In 1858 he was appointed librarian of the university; on 13 June 1856, the Congregation of the Index had allowed him to read and keep censured books.

As well as discharging his duties as professor and librarian, Laverdière published several collections of profane and religious canticles, and in the field of history his name is attached as collaborator or editor to works important not because of their quantity but because of their quality. While he was studying at the Petit Séminaire he had taken part in the founding of L'Abeille, a students' journal to which he contributed until his death. In 1859 he brought out 26 successive instalments of hitherto unpublished documents on the history of Canada. In 1858, he had had a share in the publication of the Relations des Jésuites, which was edited under the direction of Abbé Édouard-Gabriel Plante and Abbé Ferland, by setting up the "table of contents"; Antoine Gérin-Lajoie* wrote to congratulate him, saying that his contribution "admirably completed the entire work." Furthermore, in 1869 he published his Histoire du Canada, a text which classical colleges were still using at the beginning of the 20th century. "This competent work," writes Pierre Savard, "which is very accurate in relation to the historical knowledge of the time, has been severely judged from a pedagogical and literary point of view."

In 1870 the first Canadian edition of the Œeuvres de Champlain appeared. This edition, which Laverdière had been shaping and recasting since 1864, was according to Narcisse-Henri-Édouard Faucher* de Saint-Maurice a "masterpiece of Canadian typography"; moreover, it was one of the historical works of the period that attracted most attention. Its scientific value is still acknowledged today, despite reservations expressed by the Jesuits, whom Laverdière accused, wrongly according to Lucien Campeau, of having falsified those writings of Samuel de Champlain* that were first published in 1632. Finally, in 1871, in collaboration with Abbé Henri-Raymond Casgrain*, Laverdière edited the Journal des Jésuites.

His career ended abruptly in 1873, in a place predestined by his veneration for the published word: on 10 March he was stricken with an attack of apoplexy in a printing house at Quebec when he was giving directions for a new publication. He died the next day, intestate. His creditors had difficulty in obtaining a settlement: to meet their credit of $1,640 there was only the sum of $503.

This man "of medium height, with keen black eyes, tanned complexion and square shoulders," was a tireless worker to whom his edition of the Œuvres de Champlain, his other historical publications, and an entire life devoted to the cause of the printed book bear eloquent testimony. Laverdière strove for scientific rigour; he would check the slightest details to make sure that the facts were exact. His works, like those of Louis-Philippe TURCOTTE, Benjamin Sulte*, Narcisse-Eutrope Dionne*, and Cyprien Tanguay*, marked the revival of an interest in history that characterized the years 1860–80.

MICHEL PAQUIN

[For additional bibliographic information on Laverdière's main publications see DCB, I, 199, 455–56, 694, 698, 702.]

ASQ, Carton Laverdière; MSS, 26, 175; MSS, 626; MSS, 627; MSS, 676, 38, 573–74; Polygraphie, V, 57; Polygraphie, XIII, 63, 79, 90; Polygraphie, XX, 8; Séminaire, IX, 34; Séminaire, CXI, 22, 72. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 27 mars 1873. Le Jeune, Dictionnaire, II, 116. Provost, Le séminaire de Québec: documents et biographies, 476. Lucien Campeau, "Les Jésuites ont-ils retouché les écrits de Champlain?" RHAF, V (1951–52), 340–61. Auguste Gosselin, "Le vrai monument de Champlain: ses œuvres éditées par Laverdière," RSCT, 3rd ser., II (1908), sect.I, 3–23. Pierre Savard, "Les débuts de l'enseignement de l'histoire et de la géographie au Petit Séminaire de Québec (1765–1880)," RHAF, XVI (1962–63), 201.

LAW, ROBERT, army officer and colonial administrator; b.c. 1788 in England; d. 16 May 1874 in England.

When Robert Law was 20 years old he joined the British army in Spain as a volunteer just in time to take part in Sir John Moore's action at Lugo and the retreat from Corunna. He returned to Spain and until 1814 fought in numerous campaigns, receiving several serious wounds. In July 1814 he was embarked for New Orleans, but was recalled and sent to Belgium where he served in the campaigns of 1815. He fought at Waterloo as a lieutenant in Sir Frederick Adair's brigade, was again seriously wounded, and was awarded the Waterloo Medal. Law remained in France with the army of occupation until 1818, and subsequently served 15 years in the colonies, including the West Indies, before being sent to Newfoundland. He became a captain in October 1821, a major in August 1834, and was promoted lieutenant-colonel in 1844.

Robert Law probably came to Newfoundland in 1834, the same year as Governor Henry PRESCOTT, for he was reported to have held the post of commandant of the garrison for 25 years when he departed in 1859. Regular troops had been withdrawn from Newfoundland in 1825 following the arrival of replacements in November 1824. These replacements were the Royal Veteran Companies formed in 1824 from former servicemen – outpatients of the Royal Hospital for Invalid Soldiers at Chelsea. In 1827 they were renamed the Royal Newfoundland Veteran Companies and, in 1843, the Royal Newfoundland Companies. The main duties of the garrison were to bring some pomp and ceremony to the colony – especially under the governorship of Sir Thomas COCHRANE – and to assist the civil power. This assistance was most essential before the establishment of an armed police force in the colony in 1871. Troops were called out to protect the court house in 1835 at the height of a political crisis relating to Chief Justice Henry John Boulton*. They were often in demand during elections to quell riots, such as at St John's in 1836 and during a by-election in Carbonear in 1840. In 1846 Law was commended for the part he and his men played in fighting the disastrous fire in St John's and for their later work of reconstruction and maintaining law and order in the stricken community. The fire, which began at 8:30 AM on 9 June in the east end of the town at a cabinet maker's shop, had by evening moved westward to destroy over one mile of shops, houses, and public buildings on the two main streets. The total loss was estimated at £890,000, and D. W. Prowse* considered it the worst of the great fires which devastated British North American towns such as Quebec and Saint John, N.B., during the period.

Apart from his military duties, which were only occasionally onerous, Law participated in the political life of the colony during different periods. When Governor Sir John Harvey* was transferred to Nova Scotia in August 1846, Law assumed the duties of administrator until the arrival of Sir John Gaspard LE MARCHANT in April 1847. Almost all of his tenure was taken up by the administration of relief. The problems of assistance and reconstruction after the June 1846 fire were compounded by a severe and destructive storm in September and by the blight that affected the potato harvest. Hence Law's political duties were made increasingly difficult because of social and economic distress.

Law was disturbed by the unseemly competition for the £102,500 granted from outside Newfoundland to relieve the fire victims. In November 1846 he reported to the Colonial Office that the principal uninsured sufferers had now received almost the whole amount of their losses, and advised against continuing direct relief which, he believed, was having a demoralizing effect upon the recipients. The balance of the fund ought to be retained and administered by the secretary of state; a portion should be set aside to rebuild the Church of England Cathedral, otherwise the cost of this project would fall mainly on the shopkeepers and merchants of the city who had not been reimbursed for the full amount of their fire losses. By and large these recommendations were followed by Lord Grey, but not without a great deal of grumbling among those adversely affected. In December Law called the Amalgamated Legislature [see Prescott] into its final session to pass a loan bill for the relief of outport fishermen and to ease the financial burden of the Rebuilding Act. This act, passed by a special session of the Amalgamated Legislature in 1846, provided for the rebuilding of St John's with the cost to be met by the legislature and the merchants and householders of the city. Subsequently, by the royal instructions of 19 July 1848, pertaining to another new constitution, Law was created president of the Legislative Council, which office he held until 1850, and again from 1853 to 1854.

On his promotion to major-general in 1859 Law was obliged to relinquish his command, and he returned to England. A subscription of £100 sterling was raised for a piece of plate which was presented to him by a group of prominent citizens with a commendation for his services to the colony. He was elevated to lieutenant-general in 1868.

Frederic F. Thompson

PRO, CO 194/126. Royal Gazette (St John's), 1834–59. Hart, New army lists, 1840–74. H. G. Grey, The colonial policy of Lord John Russell's administration (2v., London, 1853; 2nd ed., with additions, 2v., London, 1853). I. Gunn, Political history of Nfld. Prowse, History of Nfld.

LAWSON, WILLIAM, lay preacher and merchant; b. 27 Nov. 1793, at Wallholme, near Brampton, Cumberland, Eng., second son of William Lawson, a tailor, and Frances Bell; m. 25 June 1814 Ann Atkinson of Brampton, a bonnet-maker, by whom he had 11 children; d. 19 Feb. 1875 at Hamilton, Ont.

After a rudimentary education William Lawson entered his father's trade, but suffered financial losses and in 1829 emigrated to Canada with his family. He opened a shop in York (Toronto) as a tailor, draper, and hat-maker, and was joined by his former apprentice, Robert Walker, who bought the business in 1834. Lawson moved to Brampton, Upper Canada, then returned to Toronto, and finally settled in Hamilton in 1847.

Lawson's importance is not as a merchant but as a Primitive Methodist. His family belonged to the Church of England, but in 1813 he joined the Methodists and began preaching around Brampton. Although lacking formal training he was obviously a gifted preacher, arousing great feeling. He complained of the lukewarm attitudes of many Wesleyans, and in 1822 joined the Primitive Methodists, attracted by their enthusiasm and democratic organization, in which lay preachers played an important role.

Through Lawson's efforts the first Primitive Methodist congregation in Canada was formed at York in 1830. Toronto remained the centre of Canadian Primitive Methodism, which spread mainly into western Ontario. At its peak in 1882 there were 8,200 members; in 1884 the Primitive Methodists united with other Methodist bodies to form the Methodist Church of Canada. Besides his preaching, Lawson served his church as missionary secretary for many years, and in 1853 attended its English conference as the special delegate from Canada. He holds a pre-eminent place in the history of Canadian Primitive Methodism.

Edith Firth

UCA Primitive Methodist Church (York), minute book. Christian Journal (Toronto), 26 March 1875. William Lawson, The life of William Lawson, J.P., one of the builders of Canada . . ., [ed. J. D. Lawson] (n.p., 1917). Jane Hopper, Old-time Primitive Methodism in Canada, [1829–1884] (Toronto, 1904).

LEBLANC, CHARLES-ANDRÉ, lawyer, civil servant; b. 18 Aug. 1816 at Montreal, L.C., of the marriage of Charles Leblanc, craftsman, and Louise Brien-Desrochers; d. 16 Aug. 1877 at Montreal.

Charles-André Leblanc was educated at the old college of Montreal, and had as fellow-students George-Étienne Cartier, Joseph-Amable Berthelot*, and Joseph-Ubalde Beaudry; he studied law, and received his legal training under Pierre Moreau. During the troubled days of 1837, when he was 21 years old, he became the youngest member of the Fils de la Liberté. This association, set up on 5 Sept. 1837, comprised more than 700 young men of Montreal. Half civilian and half military, it had two sections which were to work, "one through speech and writing, the other by force of arms if necessary, for the progress and triumph of the people's cause." In November 1837 Leblanc was put in prison on a charge of high treason and spent the winter in jail, which did not prevent him from being called to the bar on 30 Sept. 1839.

As a partner first of his original employer Pierre Moreau, later of Francis CASSIDY who had become mayor of Montreal, and finally of Alexandre Lacoste*, Charles-André Leblanc had extensive experience at the bar. For 35 years he pleaded before all the courts in Montreal. He was one of the firm supporters of George-Étienne Cartier. Leblanc was a member of the Montreal council of the bar in 1855, syndic in 1858, examiner of candidates for admission to the profession in 1859, bâtonnier in 1863; he was also president of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste of Montreal in 1867, and churchwarden of the charitable organization and council of the parish (Notre-Dame) of Montreal, which before the subdivisions made in 1873 numbered nearly 100,000, that is, the entire Catholic population of the town.

Charles-André Leblanc had advocated the opening of a colonization road to the north of Montreal and, as representative of the provincial government, was one of its administrators. He contributed to the founding of the Reform School at Montreal, and also was a member of the Council of Public Instruction. In November 1872, towards the end of his life, he became sheriff of the district of Montreal, an office which consisted principally of seeing to the enforcement of summonses and writs of execution, safeguarding goods and possessions under distraint, having charge of the prisons of his district, and being present at executions. He still held this office when he passed away on 16 Aug. 1877 at Montreal.

In January 1837, at Montreal, while still in training, Charles-André Leblanc had married Julie Dumont, daughter of Philippe Dumont and Julie Valière. They had eight children; one, Elmire, married Mathias-Charles Desnoyers in 1865; another, Mathilde, became the wife of Oscar Dunn*, writer and journalist. Charles-André Leblanc married again, his second wife being Marguerite Wilson, Jean-Baptiste-Alexandre Couillard's widow.

JEAN-JACQUES LEFEBVRE

PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 18, pp.71–77. La Minerve (Montréal), 17 août 1877. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 23 août 1877. Fauteux, Patriotes, 291–92. Pierre Beullac et É.-F. Surveyer, Le centenaire du Barreau de Montréal, 1849–1949 (Montréal, 1949), 61–64. Borthwick, Hist. and biog. gazetteer, 402–3.

LE BOUTILLIER (Le Bouthillier), JOHN, businessman and politician; b. 1797 in the family home at La Chasse, on the Isle of Jersey; d. 31 July 1872 at Gaspé, Que.

After his arrival in the Gaspé peninsula, around 1815, John Le Boutillier worked for Charles Robin and Company, traders in fish, first as a clerk, then as a manager at Paspébiac and Percé. In 1830 he left the Robins to open his own business under the name of John Le Boutillier and Company. At the same period, he took up residence at Gaspé, where he was to spend the rest of his life.

His commercial activities consisted chiefly of exporting dried cod to different countries of Europe, the West Indies, and Brazil. He possessed establishments along the whole Gaspesian coast, from Paspébiac to Sainte-Anne-des Monts; in 1861 he owned 12 ships and 169 fishing boats, and had 2,500 employees settled along the coast. Soon after his death in 1872, his firm was, however, taken over by Charles Robin and Company.

John Le Boutillier devoted part of his life to politics. He represented Gaspé in the assembly from 1833 to 1838, and was then MLA for Bonaventure County from 1844 to 1847 and for Gaspé County from 1854 to 1867. On 2 Nov. 1867 he was appointed legislative councillor for the division of the Gulf, and continued a councillor until his death.

A Protestant, but married to a Catholic, Elizabeth Robin, the daughter of one of his former employers, Le Boutillier was converted to Catholicism shortly before his death. He was survived by four children.

ULRIC LÉVESQUE

Archives paroissiales de Saint-Albert-de-Gaspé (Qué.), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures, 2 août 1872. Private Archives, Mlle Gertrude Sutton–Le Boutillier (Gaspé, Qué.), Papiers Charles Sutton–Le Boutillier. PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 18, pp.130–32. Desjardins, Guide parlementaire. H. A. Innis, The cod fisheries; the history of an international economy (The relations of Canada and the United States series, New Haven, Toronto, and London, 1940). C.-E. Roy et Lucien Brault, Gaspé depuis Cartier (Québec, 1934). Firmin Létourneau, "La Côte Nord de Gaspé," Revue d'histoire de la Gaspésie (Gaspé, Qué.), III (1965), 192, 203–4.

LEE, WILLIAM HENRY, civil servant; b. at Trois-Rivières, L.C., 26 June 1799, son of Dr William Lee, from Ireland, who was on the army medical staff in Upper Canada; d. Ottawa, Ont., 11 Sept. 1878.

William Henry Lee was educated in Montreal. In May 1821 he was appointed extra clerk in the office of the Executive Council of Upper Canada, and then junior (1828) and senior (1831) clerk. He became acting clerk of the Executive Council in 1839, and had the same position in the Province of Canada in 1841. In 1844 he married Harriet Louisa, daughter of Samuel Smith*, a leading Upper Canadian politician. Lee was made clerk of the Executive Council in 1853 and was clerk of the Privy Council from 1 July 1867 until his superannuation at his own request in 1872. Lee held several minor appointments connected with his regular work (for example, clerk to the Heir and Devisee Commission, 1839–53, and commissioner for sundry official purposes). Official papers were his only writing.

Lee's successor as clerk of the Privy Council was William Alfred Himsworth. Born 28 Aug. 1820 at Trois-Rivières, he had been educated at the college of Montreal and was called to the bar of Lower Canada in 1841; he had then practised law briefly at Aylmer (Gatineau County), until he entered government service. He was sessional clerk of the Legislative Assembly, Province of Canada, 1842–43, and became a full-time clerk in the office of the Executive Council in 1843. Thereafter he rose to be assistant clerk of the Executive Council, 1851; assistant clerk of the Privy Council for Canada from 2 July 1867; clerk from 1 July 1872 to 1880. He died in 1880, in Ottawa. He had married Louisa Morrison on 31 Dec. 1844, by whom he had one son.

Himsworth, like Lee, held a number of minor appointments supplementary to his major position (for example, as a deputy for signing money warrants, and commissioner for signing commitments under a habeas corpus suspension act) and was appointed justice of the peace for Carleton County on 6 Nov. 1875. The only literary work connected with his name is a doubtful attribution: he may have been the youthful author of a brochure, La crise ministérielle, published in 1844 under the name of Denis-Benjamin Viger*.

The duties of Lee and Himsworth throughout their careers were mainly secretarial. In their junior days (when both would travel with the peripatetic government of the Province of Canada) their clerical tasks included anything that might be assigned to them. As they rose in rank, they were increasingly concerned with the routine preparation of business for the cabinet, including receiving departmental applications which had to be passed on for executive decision, and the subsequent communication of decisions back to the departments. The duties have been authoritatively described as "menial," and they allowed for little initiative; the largest staff either ever supervised rarely exceeded a dozen clerks.

That both Lee and Himsworth served under more than one constitution and numerous governments, at a time when appointment and promotion depended on political superiors, is a mark of their capacity and integrity; but longevity in the public service was common even then, and no great significance can be attached to longevity alone. Both were held in high regard by their associates and Lee, who at his retirement was the dean of the public service, was honoured by a presentation from the cabinet.

NORMAN WARD

PAC, MG 24, I9 (Hill collection), 25, pp.6399–6400; MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 82, pp.13184–85, 39678, 39679, 77048–49; RG 1, E14, 8–40. Queen's University Archives, Alexander Mackenzie papers, pp.327–28, 329–30, 851–54. Can. parl. comp., 1872; 1874. Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81, 411. Hodgetts, Pioneer public service, 52, 86–87, 94, 271.

LEEMING, RALPH, Church of England clergyman; b. 27 Jan. 1788, Blackburn, Lancashire, Eng.; d. 13 March 1872 at Dundas, Ont.

Ralph Leeming was educated at St Bees College in Cumberland and was ordained in 1812. He served two curacies and an endowed school in the diocese of Rochester, before asking, in 1816, to be sent as a missionary to the diocese of Quebec. His application was welcomed by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel: at that time there were but six clergymen of the Church of England in all of Upper and Lower Canada, a situation created in part by the "higher advantages" offered by the older and more settled colony of Nova Scotia.

The SPG in September 1816 appointed Leeming the first resident clergyman of Ancaster Township, a "neat and rising" community of some 1,000 inhabitants (only 200 of whom, by Leeming's count, were members of the Church of England). The appointment, which reflected the growing promise of the upper colony after the War of 1812, also included "Barton and adjacent parts," a territory embracing most of what is now Wentworth County at the head of Lake Ontario. Four years after his arrival in the district Leeming married Susan, the daughter of Richard Hatt*, a prominent miller and supporter of the church in the village of Dundas.

Early in 1818, at the urgent request of the Reverend Robert Addison* of Niagara, Leeming broadened his activities by taking over from Addison the duties of serving the Mohawks and other converted members of the Six Nations Confederacy, who occupied lands granted them in 1784 on the Grand River. For nearly ten years Leeming periodically ministered to the spiritual and educational needs of these otherwise neglected Indian communicants. In the fall of 1818 he endowed a school in the Tuscarora village and over the next few years supported the educational work conducted by the SPG among the Mohawks. Following the appointment in 1827 of the Reverend Robert Lugger* by the New England Company as the Iroquois' resident clergyman, Leeming confined his attention to white communicants in his constituency. By that time, St John's Church, the headquarters of his mission, had been completed in the village of Ancaster.

In 1830, complaining of failing health, Leeming resigned his charge and sought lighter duties elsewhere. After briefly considering an English parish, he decided to remain with the society and move to a newly organized mission in the township of March, about 14 miles above Bytown (Ottawa) on the Ottawa River. He was appointed in 1833 to another mission in the township of Hamilton, but again ill health forced him after a brief tenure to resign this, his last living. In spite of his physical frailties, however, he lived a long life, travelling extensively for some years and apparently residing latterly in the Ancaster and Dundas area. He died in 1872, having survived both his wife and his missionary brother, the Reverend William Leeming, of Chippawa.

C. M. Johnston

PAC, MG 19, F1 (Claus papers), 12; RG 5, A1, 44; RG 10, A1, 5. USPG, Journal of SPG, 31–37, 40–41. Robert Gourlay, Statistical account of Upper Canada, compiled with a view to a grand system of emigration (2v., London, 1822), I, 389ff. John Howison, Sketches of Upper Canada, domestic, local, and characteristic: to which are added practical details for the information of emigrants of every class; and some recollections of the United States of America (Edinburgh, 1821), 161–64. John West, A journal of a mission to the Indians of the British provinces of New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, and the Mohawks, on the Ouse, or Grand River, Upper Canada (London, 1827), 276–89. Church Herald (Toronto), 21 March, 18 April 1872. Gore Gazette (Ancaster), 3 March, 14 April 1827. "Rev. Ralph Leeming; an address from his parishioners and friends," Wentworth Hist. Soc., Papers and Records (Hamilton), VIII (1919), 59–61. T. D. J. Farmer, A history of the parish of St John's Church, Ancaster . . . (Guelph, Ont., 1924), 53–61. W. B. and A. B. Kerr, "The Reverend William Leeming, first rector of Trinity Church, Chippawa," Ont. Hist., XXXI (1936), 135–54.

LÉGARÉ, ANTOINE, teacher; b. 2 Oct. 1799 at Saint-Roch de Québec, son of Ignace Légaré, a tanner, and Marie Parant; d. 7 March 1873 at Saint-Roch de Québec.

After completing his senior class at the seminary of Quebec in 1820, Antoine Légaré took up a teaching career. He was the first layman, in Lower Canada, to devote himself to elementary teaching after having gone so far in his classical studies. At that period, a schoolteacher was regarded as an unfortunate person who had not succeeded in other professions, and who had turned towards teaching while waiting for better things. Even in the last years of Légaré's career, a teacher who earned $300 a year was considered to be very well paid. In the same period a coachman drew an identical salary, but received his board and lodging in addition. In 1872, Légaré received a pension of $35.

For Légaré and those like him, teaching was therefore a veritable vocation: he devoted all his talent and his whole life to it. In 1822 he started the first elementary school in the parish of Saint-Roch de Québec, where he taught for 50 years. Meanwhile a few courageous inhabitants of Quebec had followed in this pioneer's footsteps, and in 1845 they met, under Légaré's presidency, to form a school-teachers' association. Légaré was then chosen as vice-president of the first board of directors. Five years later the new society was incorporated under the name of the Association de la Bibliothèque des Instituteurs du district de Québec.

In 1846 Antoine Légaré had been appointed by the cabinet a member of the Catholic Board of Examiners of the district of Quebec City. This board preceded the founding of the normal schools, and its aim was to eliminate incompetent teachers. Légaré worked on it until 3 Jan. 1851.

Antoine Légaré's confrères, who considered him their model and dean, on 12 June 1872 celebrated his fiftieth year as a teacher. On this occasion, they entertained him at a banquet and literary meeting among the population of Saint-Roch whom he had loved so well; he had taught 4,000 children there.

Less than a year later he died, a bachelor, at Saint-Roch de Québec, after an illness of some weeks which he bore with resignation.

Béatrice Chassé

ASQ, Lettres, Y, 113. JIP, 1872, 92–125; mars 1873, 35. La Gazette des familles canadiennes et acadiennes (Québec), 31 mars 1873. P.-G. Roy, Fils de Québec, III, 103–5.

LEMAIRE, FÉLIX-HYACINTHE, notary, legislative councillor; b. 14 March 1808 at the mission of Lac-des-Deux-Montagnes (which became the parish of Oka in 1910), L.C., son of Ignace Lemaire and Louise Gastonguay; d. 17 Dec. 1879 at Saint-Benoît (Deux-Montagnes County), Que.

Félix-Hyacinthe Lemaire became a notary in January 1836, and practised his profession until the last month of his life; he signed some 6,000 acts. His principal client was the seminary of Saint-Sulpice in Montreal (the Sulpicians were the seigneurs of the region); he was its agent for more than 30 years after 1842. As agent his chief duty was to collect seigneurial dues from the farmers. Félix-Hyacinthe Lemaire was a major in the militia battalion of Deux-Montagnes, and also clerk of the Circuit Court there.

In November 1867 he was appointed to the Legislative Council as representative for the division of Mille-Isles, which comprised Terrebonne and Deux-Montagnes counties. In September 1874, in his capacity as president of the Legislative Council, he was sworn in as a member of the Executive Council of the province in Charles-Eugène Boucher* de Boucherville's cabinet. The obtaining of this appointment was no doubt facilitated by the friendship between Boucher de Boucherville and himself. Less than two years later the state of his health obliged him to resign.

Félix-Hyacinthe Lemaire died in his village of Saint-Benoît, where he was buried. La Minerve of Montreal stressed that he had "a high sense of his family traditions, a lofty intelligence, a firm character allied to a strong underlying sense of moderation."

In January 1837, at Sainte-Scholastique, Lemaire had married Luce Barcelo, who survived him. She was the daughter of Jacob Barcelo, a merchant and Patriote of 1837, and of Luce Dorion. They had one son and one daughter.

JEAN-JACQUES LEFEBVRE

Archives judiciaires de Terrebonne (Saint-Jérôme, Qué.), greffe de Félix-Hyacinthe Lemaire. La Minerve (Montréal), 18 déc. 1879. Can. parl. comp., 1877, 289. Rosario Gauthier, "Les mariages du comté de Deux-Montagnes" (manuscript in the possession of the author). Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 242. Fauteux, Patriotes, 96. Rumilly, Hist. de la prov. de Québec, I, 123.

LE MARCHANT, Sir JOHN GASPARD, army officer and colonial administrator; b. in England in 1803, third son of John Gaspard Le Marchant and Mary Cary; m. 28 May 1839 to Margaret Anne Taylor by whom he had several children; d. in London, Eng., 6 Feb. 1874.

John Gaspard Le Marchant was a member of a distinguished Guernsey family. He entered the army at the age of 17 as an ensign, and made a series of moves upward, all by purchase. Within a dozen years he was a major serving in Cape Colony. In all he spent £10,000 to purchase commissions and was one of the youngest officers in the British army to command a regiment.

In 1846 he was, according to his own account, "unexpectedly" offered the lieutenant governorship of Newfoundland. Perhaps the influence of his brother, Denis Le Marchant, a prominent Whig who was appointed under-secretary of the Board of Trade by Lord John Russell's government in 1847, prompted the offer. John Gaspard Le Marchant had loved soldiering and left it only after positive assurance from the Duke of Wellington that the acceptance of the civil position would promote his prospects in the army. Le Marchant's appointment became official in February 1847 and he arrived in St John's in April succeeding Sir John Harvey*. Unlike Harvey, Le Marchant was devoid of experience in administering a government. He came at a difficult time. St John's had been devastated, on 9 June 1846, by a great fire that rendered 12,000 of its 19,000 people homeless. The potato crops of 1846 and 1847 were badly affected by the same blight that wrought such havoc in Ireland.

After these difficulties, Le Marchant, and Newfoundland, had a short run of good luck. By the end of 1849 he was able to report that political activity, the bane of the colony, as he believed, was at a low ebb. This subsidence did not last long. The Liberals, who were mainly Roman Catholics, produced a rancorous agitation for responsible government, something which the commercial classes of the colony, heavily Protestant, Le Marchant himself, and the colonial secretary in London all opposed.

Le Marchant deplored many local habits: those of the merchant princes wont to retire to England with their profits, those of improvident fishermen. The merchants devised ingenious schemes for dodging taxes, and the fishermen sought whatever forms of relief the government would provide. So great were the prejudices against direct taxation that the legislature was afraid to establish municipal organizations to raise money through rates for local charges.

In the summer of 1852 Le Marchant went to Nova Scotia as lieutenant governor. There, with James Boyle Uniacke*, William Young*, and Joseph HOWE leading a responsible ministry, the lieutenant governor's position was different. Le Marchant's governorship was much less controversial than his tenure in Newfoundland; but impartiality, which was now the lieutenant governor's role, did not prevent his being criticized by those who were out of office and wanted to be in. The change of government from Liberal to Tory in 1857 was effected with some party bitterness; but when Le Marchant was finally to leave Nova Scotia, in February 1858, he was praised by Conservative papers for his judiciousness. The Liberals tended to be more critical (they were now out of office), but even they felt compelled to avoid acrimony. Le Marchant himself believed, or at least on 7 March 1856 he told Henry Labouchere, the secretary of state for the colonies, that in both Newfoundland and Nova Scotia he had lived "in the most perfect harmony, both with my Executive Councillors, as well as the two Houses of the Legislature. . . . At the present moment they [Nova Scotian affairs] are in every sense most satisfactory."

Le Marchant was governor of Malta from 1859 to 1864, and was commander-in-chief of Madras, 1865–68, after which he retired to England. He was given a KCB in 1865. He was an enthusiastic horseman and agriculturalist, who sought to encourage good farming practices in both Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. He was never a man to stay put in government house, but sought an over-all view of his constituency. Le Marchant also believed that a successful governor in British North America had to entertain frequently and liberally, even lavishly. Over and above his £3,000 income he spent some £4,000 to £5,000 outfitting himself for his North American missions and another £5,000 from his private purse for dinners and parties in the colonies.

It is fair to add that the Duke of Wellington's views were not justified in the event. The Crimean War saw Le Marchant left on the shelf in Nova Scotia, while officers who had been his contemporaries in the army went gloriously to war and became major generals, to Le Marchant's almost daily mortification.

P. B. WAITE

[There are a few interesting private letters from John Gaspard Le Marchant to Henry Labouchere, secretary of state for the colonies, in a small private collection owned by Professor R. L. Raymond of Dalhousie University (Halifax). Especially useful here were letters of 7 March 1856 (private and confidential) and 18 Dec. 1857 (private). I am grateful to Professor Raymond for placing these papers unreservedly at my disposal. P.B.W.]

Le Marchant's dispatches from Newfoundland are in PRO, CO 194/127–194/136; from Nova Scotia, PRO, CO 217/122–217/124. Secondary sources are: Burke's peerage (1967). DNB. Gunn, Political history of Nfld.

LÉPINE, JEAN-BAPTISTE, Métis leader, fl. 1869–71.

Jean-Baptiste Lépine was probably the son of Jean-Baptiste Lépine (1792–1876) and Julie Henry. In July 1869 he was appointed by a group of Métis in the Red River Settlement to organize with Baptiste Tourond a patrol whose duty was to scrutinize the movements of Canadians in the settlement and to warn of strangers suspected of designs on Métis lands. In March 1870 he was a member of the military council presided over by his brother Ambroise-Dydime*, which condemned Thomas Scott* to death for insubordination to Louis Riel*'s provisional government. Lépine was one of two members of the council of seven who opposed the death penalty.

At the time of the threatened Fenian invasion of the province of Manitoba in the autumn of 1871, the Métis leaders held a number of meetings at which Lépine was present. The purpose of these was to determine what action the Métis should take if the invasion materialized. At a meeting of 4 October Louis Riel reported that a messenger had come from William Bernard O'DONOGHUE, an associate of Riel in 1869–70, asking the Métis leaders to meet him at Pembina on the American side of the border. All of the leaders, Riel stated later, had refused to go with the exception of Lépine and André Nault*. These two, he said, had "gone in their own right" to determine what O'Donoghue wanted. On 6 October Lépine and Nault reported that O'Donoghue planned to seize the Hudson's Bay Company post at the border and wanted the Métis to join him in the invasion. The Métis leaders decided to hold meetings in all the French parishes of the settlement in order to decide what attitude to take. Lépine presided at a meeting at Pointe-Coupée (near present-day Sainte-Agathe) on 7 October at which it was resolved that the Métis would respond to the call to arms of the lieutenant governor, Adams George Archibald*, to repel the invaders. The same day Riel offered the lieutenant governor the services of his Métis followers, The Fenians were easily rounded up and returned to the United States without any force from the province, English or French, being required. Nothing is known of Lépine after 1871.

Jean-Baptiste Lépine had been closely associated with the Métis supporters of Riel, but in this role he was obviously overshadowed by his brother, Ambroise-Dydime.

HARTWELL BOWSFIELD

Morice, Dict. hist. Can. et Métis, 183. Begg, Hist. of North-West, II, 68–71. Stanley, Louis Riel, 55, 173. J. P. Pritchett, "The origin of the so-called Fenian Raid on Manitoba in 1871," CHR, X (1929), 23–42. A.-H. de Trémaudan, "Louis Riel and the Fenian Raid of 1871," CHR, IV (1923), 132–44.

LEPROHON, ROSANNA ELEANORA. See MULLINS

LÉRY, ALEXANDRE-RENÉ CHAUSSEGROS DE. See CHAUSSEGROS

LESLIE, JAMES, merchant and politician; b. 4 Sept. 1786 at Kair, Kincardine, Scotland, son of Captain James Leslie, James Wolfe*'s deputy quartermaster at Quebec in 1759; m. in 1815 Julia, daughter of Patrick Langan, seigneur of Bourchemin and Ramesay; d. 6 Dec. 1873 at Montreal, Que.

Before emigrating to Canada in 1804, James Leslie completed his studies at Marischal College and at the University of Aberdeen. As owner of the firm of James Leslie and Company, which was set up at Montreal in May 1809 and which specialized in the wholesale trade in foodstuffs, James Leslie met with rapid success. The doors of the business world were open to him, and he contributed to the formation of one of the most important financial institutions of the time, the Bank of Montreal, of which he proved to be an energetic director from 1817 to 1829. With George Moffatt*, Horatio Gates*, and Thomas Torrance*, he formed part of the group that promoted strict business procedures and that did not consider the administration of the bank as a family undertaking.

Like the majority of the businessmen of his period, Leslie divided his other activities between his seigneuries of Bourchemin, Ramesay, and Lake Matapédia, and political life: from 1824 until the constitution of Lower Canada was suspended in 1838, he represented the county of Montreal East in the Legislative Assembly of that province. Increasingly he identified himself with the moderate wing of the Patriote party, and he was out of sympathy with the English merchants around him because of his support of this party. In December 1837, before the outbreak of armed disturbances, Leslie accompanied Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* to Quebec to ask the governor, Lord Gosford [Acheson*], to convene the houses of parliament, in the hope of avoiding recourse to other than constitutional means. Immediately after the failure of the 1837 rebellion, Leslie began to look favourably upon the possibility of a union of the two Canadas: ". . . a union of the Canadas will probably be proposed," he wrote to La Fontaine on 6 Jan. 1838, "if on fair and equitable principles, I see no serious objection to it"; but he added: "Care however must be taken that the representation is based upon population and that the heavy public debt of the Upper is not saddled upon the Lower Province. . . ."

Since the Act of Union went against these two principles, James Leslie stood as an anti-unionist candidate, and he met defeat in the county of Montreal at the first general election under the Union. A by-election in December 1841 enabled him to join the Reformers again in the following session, as MLA for Verchères. He was re-elected in the same county in 1844 and 1847, and from 1848 to 1851 formed part of the ministry of Robert Baldwin* and La Fontaine; he was president of the Executive Council from 11 March to 14 Sept. 1848, then became provincial secretary on 15 September and kept this post until 27 Oct. 1851. He was appointed legislative councillor on 23 May 1848, and kept his seat until confederation; he was then called to the Canadian Senate, where he sat until his death.

ANDRÉ GARON

BNQ, Société historique de Montréal, Collection La Fontaine, Lettres, 39 (copies in PAC). F.-J. Audet, Les députés de Montréal, 105–6. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson), 336. Can. parl. comp., 1872, 63–65. Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 145. Denison, Canada's first bank, I.

LEVESCONTE, ISAAC, merchant and legislator; son of Peter LeVesconte and Jane Malzard, b. at St Aubin's, Jersey, 12 Aug. 1822; educated at the Parsonage House Academy, St Helier, Jersey; m. Caroline Susan Jean, and had a daughter, Caroline; d. at Arichat, N.S., 26 Oct. 1879.

For many years the North Atlantic fishery had attracted the attention of the commercial and fishing interests of the Channel Islands. When he was 12, Isaac LeVesconte emigrated from Jersey to Arichat, Isle Madame, on the Strait of Canso, a centre for this trade, to work for the family firm of DeCarteret and LeVesconte. This firm shipped fishery supplies, salt, clothing, and manufactured goods from Europe for the use of the fishermen and families, exported dry fish to Brazil and the West Indies in the firm's own vessels, brought return cargoes of wines from Brazil to England, and carried molasses, sugar, and rum from the West Indies to Nova Scotia. When he was 17, LeVesconte captained one of the firm's ships to Puerto Rico. About 1855, when Peter DeCarteret returned to Jersey, Isaac LeVesconte was placed in charge of the business at Arichat.

Because of his business acumen and his knowledge of the Bible and the law, LeVesconte was often consulted by the fishermen of Arichat. He was elected as a Conservative to the Legislative Assembly in 1863 representing Richmond County. For a brief period (June 1863–December 1864) he held office as financial secretary in the James W. JOHNSTON–Charles Tupper* administration. LeVesconte, who was a Protestant representing a county with a majority of Roman Catholic voters, played a prominent part in the legislative debate on free schools in 1864, and in 1865 moved an unsuccessful amendment calling for the establishment of separate schools.

On 7 Dec. 1865 LeVesconte and his successor as financial secretary, James MacDonald*, were appointed to represent Nova Scotia on a commission sent by the British North American colonies to open trade relations with the West Indies, Mexico, and Brazil. The report of the commission called for increased trade and improvement in communications with these areas; however, little was accomplished until after confederation. Elected to the House of Commons as member for Richmond in a by-election in April 1869, LeVesconte continued to represent this constituency until his retirement prior to the general election of 1874. He left no great mark in the annals of commons debates, but did prompt Joseph Howe to comment that "he was a queer fish who drank too much." Later his grandson, Isaac Duncan MacDougall, served for ten years as federal member of parliament for Inverness.

WILLIAM B. HAMILTON

PAC, MG 24, B29 (Howe papers), 4, pp.787–89; 40, pp.21–22 (Joseph Howe to A. Campbell, 29 Jan. 1870). Canada, Province of, Sessional papers, XXVI (1866), pt.4, no.43, pp.1–180. Nova Scotia, House of Assembly, Debates and proceedings, 1864–65, 163–65; Journals and proceedings, 1866, app.9. Saunders, Three premiers of N.S. Sister Francis Xavier, "Educational legislation in Nova Scotia and the Catholics," CCHA Report, 1957, 63–74.

LEWIS, JOHN BOWER, lawyer, politician, and land speculator; b. in France, 18 March 1817, son of Captain J. B. Lewis of the 88th Light Infantry; he was married three times, to Anna Eccles in 1840, to Helen Street in 1843, and to Elizabeth Susan Wilson in 1856, and had 11 children; d. in Ottawa, Ont., 24 Jan. 1874.

John Bower Lewis came to Canada with his parents and they settled near Bytown (Ottawa) in 1820. He studied law in Toronto with James Boulton, was admitted to the bar in 1839, and became a QC in 1867 and a bencher in the Law Society of Upper Canada in 1871. He practised law in Bytown and also bought and sold land in the area.

Lewis entered politics in 1847 when he was elected to the council of the district of Dalhousie (corresponding to the present county of Carleton) and to the first municipal council for Bytown. He contested the seat of Carleton unsuccessfully in the 1847–48 election for the Legislative Assembly but was later chosen as Bytown's second mayor, for 1848–49. Bytown became the city of Ottawa in 1854 and Lewis was chosen its first mayor in 1855. He was also appointed police magistrate in 1855 and served as city recorder from 1855 to 1869. He was appointed police commissioner in 1863 and was the city solicitor when he died.

John Lewis was normally a Conservative but placed community above party interests. Thus he braved Sir John A. Macdonald*'s wrath and supported the entry of Richard William Scott*, a powerful Ottawa Catholic, into Edward Blake*'s provincial Liberal government of 1871. In 1872 Lewis and Joseph Merrill Currier* both entered parliament following election by acclamation for the two-member seat of Ottawa. In 1873 he was considered a possible successor to Sir Francis Hincks*, minister of finance, but he left his party over the Pacific Scandal later in the same year. He indicated firmly, however reluctantly, that he would oppose Macdonald's government. Lewis either found the government's actions unacceptable in principle or he wished to protect the interests of the Ottawa valley, for, as Richard Cartwright* pointed out, "the Ottawa country . . . goes with the tide." In 1874, J. B. Lewis was again nominated for Ottawa, as an "Independent" but with Liberal support. He died during the campaign.

DONALD SWAINSON

PAC, MG 24, B40 (Brown papers), 8; MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 194, 301; MG 27, II, D14 (R. W. Scott papers), 3–5. PAM, Alexander Morris papers, Ketcheson collection, Alexander Campbell to Alexander Morris, 29 Nov. 1873. PAO, Edward Blake papers; Cartwright family papers; Alexander Morris papers. Globe (Toronto), 1874. Ottawa Citizen, 1855–74. Packet (Bytown), 1847–49. PANS, Report, 1952, app.B. Can. biog. dict., I. Can. parl. comp., 1873; 1875. A. H. D. Ross, Ottawa, past and present (Toronto, 1927). Swainson, "Personnel of politics."

LIDDELL (Liddle), THOMAS, Presbyterian minister and educator; b. St Ninian, Stirlingshire, Scotland, 18 Oct. 1800, son of John Liddell and Janet Martin; m. Susan Anne Jane Stewart, by whom he had two daughters; d. Edinburgh, 11 June 1880.

Thomas Liddell was educated at the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh (receiving from the latter the honorary degree of DD in 1841). He was licensed to preach in 1827 and ordained two years later. In 1831 he became assistant minister, later minister, of Lady Glenorchy's Church, Edinburgh.

On 27 Oct. 1841 Liddell was nominated by the colonial committee of the Church of Scotland as principal of Queen's College at Kingston, Canada West. This Presbyterian foundation, established to break the monopoly of the Church of England in higher education in Canada West, was granted, by royal charter in 1841, full university powers as a liberal arts college and would be open to students of all denominations. Liddell's appointment was confirmed by the Board of Trustees of the college in Kingston at a salary of £400 per annum and he arrived in December 1841. He found, however, that no provision had been made for opening the new college and he was obliged to canvass presbyteries near Kingston for funds and students. The college opened on 7 March 1842 with one other professor, Peter Colin Campbell, later principal of the University of Aberdeen, and 12 students; Liddell himself taught Hebrew, church history, theology, logic, mathematics, and moral philosophy.

In 1842 Liddell conferred with Egerton Ryerson*, then principal of the Methodist Victoria College in Cobourg, about a plan to transform King's College, Toronto (due to open in 1843 after having obtained its charter in 1827) into a "University of Toronto" with Queen's, Victoria, and Regiopolis (the Roman Catholic college in Kingston) as affiliated theological colleges. These would be located in Toronto and would be represented on the council of the university. Canada West, Liddell argued, could support only one arts college, which should be open to all denominations each sharing in the endowment. Ryerson agreed that King's endowment should be shared, but would not consider moving to Toronto, and was not, in the end, willing to confine instruction at Victoria to theology. Bishop John Strachan* of the Church of England and president of King's College vehemently opposed any alteration in King's charter, and Regiopolis, not yet operating above the secondary school level, was unenthusiastic. Nevertheless, Liddell persuaded the trustees of Queen's and the synod of the Presbyterian Church in Canada to petition the government to alter the structure of King's College. A modified form of the plan was incorporated in Robert Baldwin*'s university bill of 1843, despite objections by Strachan, but Baldwin resigned before it came to a vote. When William Henry DRAPER's university bill was being prepared by the new government in 1845, Liddell renewed his agitation and tried in vain in a series of letters to Ryerson to win the support of Victoria College.

The defeat of Draper's bill was a disappointment to Liddell. In addition, his health had suffered following the death of an infant daughter in 1842, and he was unhappy with the slow progress of Queen's College. To make matters worse, the Free Church party in Scotland sent to Canada as an emissary the Reverend Dr Robert Burns* of Paisley, Scotland, who proceeded to disrupt the Church of Scotland in Canada. Although Dr John Machar*, incumbent of St Andrew's Church in Kingston, refused him the pulpit of the church, Burns so swayed the Presbyterians from Methodist pulpits in Kingston that Queen's College lost two-thirds of her students and supporters, including ten trustees. Liddell took up the challenge and preached against the secessionists, but his sermons were said to have been "especially noted for their length." The Free Church movement prospered and plans were laid to open a rival theological institution, Knox College, in Toronto. Adding insult to injury, Burns had accused Liddell of failure to acknowledge gifts of books to Queen's which he and a prominent benefactress in Edinburgh had made; he now threatened legal action to recover the books for Knox College.

Dissident students had departed and Liddell's class in divinity was reduced to one pupil. Utterly discouraged and pessimistic about the future, he resigned, 13 July 1846, and returned to Scotland, despite a plea from the moderator of the synod, George Romanes, that he reconsider. Machar was immediately appointed principal pro tem. At the end of the following academic year, the trustees invited Liddell to resume his duties but he replied that he saw no reason for changing his mind.

In 1849, when the fortunes of Queen's had somewhat improved, Liddell was again offered the principalship. By this time a third university bill had finally been passed, setting up the University of Toronto as a non-religious institution. Liddell strongly opposed this solution and agreed to return to exert all his influence in demonstrating the necessary connection between religion and higher education. His only conditions were that he should have at least six divinity students and the same salary as before. By the time negotiations were concluded, the last ship had sailed for Montreal. Liddell hoped to get a passage to Halifax and arrive in Kingston by late October. He failed to appear. Finally, in March 1850, after learning that only four students had registered for divinity and following the death of his father, he wrote to the chairman of the Board of Trustees announcing his decision to sever all connection with Queen's College. Before the end of the month, he had taken up an appointment at Lochmaben, Scotland, where he served acceptably but without distinction until his death.

As principal of Queen's College, Liddell was described by Machar as "a pious man possessing much energy, serious character, and practical wisdom and [he] seems zealously devoted to the work. . . . one better fitted to his office with all its difficulties and discouragements could not have been found." The portrait of Thomas Liddell gives the impression of an intellectual rather than a man of action, a character which Liddell's career in Canada and in Scotland would appear to sustain.

H. P. GUNDY

Queen's University Archives, Queen's University Records, correspondence series 1, Liddell correspondence; James Williamson papers. Chronicle and Gazette (Kingston), 1 Dec. 1841; 24 Apr. 1844; 5, 15, 19 March, 21 May, 3 Aug. 1845. Documentary history of education in Upper Canada (Hodgins), V, 4–9, 12–17; VI, 29. Report of the discussion on the late disruption in the Presbyterian Church, which took place in St Andrew's Church, Galt between the Rev. Principal Liddell . . . and the Rev. John Bayne (Galt, C. W., 1845). Hew Scott, Fasti ecclesiae Scoticanae, the succession of ministers in the Church of Scotland from the Reformation (new ed., 9v., Edinburgh, 1915–61), II, 215. D. D. Calvin, Queen's University at Kingston: the first century of a Scottish-Canadian foundation, 1841–1941 (Kingston, 1941). [John Machar], Memorials of the life and ministry of the Reverend John Machar, D.D., late minister of St Andrew's Church, Kingston (Toronto, 1873). C. B. Sissons, A history of Victoria University (Toronto, 1952).

LINDSAY, Sir JAMES ALEXANDER, soldier; b. 25 Aug. 1815 at Muncaster Castle, Cumberland, Eng., second son of James Lindsay, 7th Earl of Balcarres and 24th Earl of Crawford, and of the Hon. Maria Margaret Frances Pennington, daughter of John Pennington, 1st Baron Muncaster; d. 13 Aug. 1874, at Mitcham, Surrey, Eng.

James Alexander Lindsay was educated at Eton College and entered the Grenadier Guards by purchase on 16 March 1832. He advanced by purchase to the rank of lieutenant and captain in 1836 and then to captain and lieutenant-colonel in 1846. From 1838 to 1842 he was adjutant of the 3rd battalion of his regiment in Canada.

In 1845, James Lindsay entered parliament for the borough of Wigan, where the family seat was located. He supported Sir Robert Peel on free trade but remained a Conservative until he gave up his seat in 1865. Meanwhile, he rose steadily in rank, becoming lieutenant-colonel of the Grenadier Guards in 1860 and, on 12 March 1861, being promoted major-general. Advancement came apparently without his hearing a shot fired in anger. On 6 Nov. 1845, Lindsay married Lady Sarah Elizabeth Savile, daughter of John, 3rd Earl of Mexborough. Two sons died in infancy but three daughters survived. Lady Sarah became woman of the bedchamber to Queen Victoria.

In 1861, with the United States and Britain on the brink of war, General Lindsay accompanied the reinforcements rushed to the British garrison in Canada. He was given command of the troops in the lower province (Canada East). Colonel Garnet Joseph Wolseley*, then a staff officer at Montreal, remembered Lindsay as "an able, energetic soldier, whose heart was in his work, and one of the most charming men I ever knew," adding that he was "as great a favourite with the Canadians as he was with the troops."

In 1866 Lindsay returned to England, taking command of the battalions of foot guards in London and then receiving the appointment of inspector general of reserve forces. William Ewart Gladstone's government took office in England in 1868, and its secretary of state for war, Edward Cardwell, was bent on eliminating British garrisons in self-governing colonies. The task of dismantling more than a century of unbroken British military presence in Canada proved too much for the lieutenant-general commanding in British North America, Sir Charles Ash Windham*, who died on 2 Feb. 1870. Command devolved on Major-General Sir Charles Hastings Doyle*, the British commander at Halifax, but the War Office decided to send another officer to wind up the British garrisons in central Canada.

Lindsay accepted the task, was given local rank as lieutenant-general, and on 5 April 1870 arrived in Montreal to take command of the remaining troops in Ontario and Quebec. His first task, according to his instructions, was to cooperate with the Canadian government in providing a force to secure the transfer of the Red River colony to the dominion. The Canadians arranged supplies and transport, raised two battalions of militia, and paid three-quarters of the cost; Lindsay chose the commander, Colonel Garnet Wolseley, gave him his orders, and oversaw the arrangements. "I felt from the first," he explained to Cardwell, "that the Force, though mixed, was an Imperial one and that I was responsible for everything connected with it." The assumption led to friction with the Canadian authorities and to complaints from Lindsay of Canadian mismanagement and political interference, particularly in relation to the recruiting of a Quebec rifle battalion and the failure to make arrangements for transportation to Lake Superior.

Lindsay was also instructed to help the Canadians develop their own military institutions. He advanced a number of practical suggestions to the Canadian ministers: they could hire a British regiment; they could recruit their own force from disbanded British soldiers; they could organize mounted patrols and man gunboats to prevent Fenian attacks. Looking beyond the immediate problem, Lindsay wanted to guarantee that Canadian forces "would be organized upon the same system as those of the United Kingdom." His most insistent recommendation was the appointment of a British general to command the Canadian militia. Canadian ministers took little heed of Lindsay's advice, though many of his proposals were eventually adopted.

At the end of May 1870 the long-heralded Fenian threat manifested itself in two feeble thrusts across the Quebec border [see John O'NEILL]. Though the Fenians were easily repelled, 13,489 Canadian militiamen were mobilized and placed at Lindsay's disposal.

By September Lindsay had closed most of the British military establishments in central Canada and had concentrated the remnants at Quebec. The British troops in the Red River expedition were returning from Fort Garry (Winnipeg). On 24 September, Lindsay's appointment ended with the closing of the British military headquarters at Montreal. The War Office was now anxious for him to return to his duties with the reserve forces. Both Cardwell and the colonial secretary, John Wodehouse, 1st Earl of Kimberley, were pleased with his service in Canada, and their satisfaction was demonstrated by a knighthood in the new order of St Michael and St George, confirmation in the rank of lieutenant-general, and the colonelcy of the 3rd Foot (The Buffs). Lindsay was still holding the appointment of inspector general of reserve forces when he died.

DESMOND MORTON

PAC, RG 8, I, A2, 1287, pp.419–503. PRO, CO 42/693, pp.230ff.; WO 32/813/058/316. Returns of addresses of the Senate and House of Commons, relative to the withdrawal of the troops from the dominion and of the defence of the country and Honorable Mr Campbell's report (Ottawa, 1871). Kenneth Bourne, Britain and the balance of power in North America, 1815–1871 (London, 1967), 295–302. J. M. Hitsman, Safeguarding Canada, 1763–1871 (Toronto, 1968), 133–43, 208–23. Desmond Morton, Ministers and generals; politics and the Canadian militia, 1868–1904 (Toronto, 1970). C. P. Stacey, Canada and the British Army, 1846–1871 (2nd ed., Toronto, 1963), 204–63. Desmond Morton, "French Canada and the Canadian militia," SH, no.3 (1969), 36.

LISGAR, Baron. See YOUNG

LITTLE CHIEF. See HUNKAJUKA

LITTLE SOLDIER. See HUNKAJUKA

LOGAN, Sir WILLIAM EDMOND, geologist and geological cartographer, founder and first director of the Geological Survey of Canada; b. 20 April 1798 at Montreal, L.C., third son of William Logan, a baker and owner of real estate, and of Janet Edmond, both from Scotland; d. 22 June 1875 at Cilgerran, Pembrokeshire, Wales.

William Edmond Logan's education was begun in Mr Alexander Skakel*'s school in Montreal, but at the age of 16 he was sent with his older brother Hart to high school in Edinburgh. In 1816 he registered as a medical student at Edinburgh University where his subjects included logic, mathematics, and chemistry. Although he may not have been impressed at the time, his lectures in chemistry probably provided his first exposure to theories on the formation of rocks and minerals: the professor of chemistry, Dr Thomas Charles Hope, was an ardent supporter of the Neptunian theory of rock formation – that all stratified rocks were formed in water.

Logan left the university at the end of his first year, even though his scholastic achievement was high, to enter the London business establishment of his uncle, Hart Logan, for whom he worked for over 20 years. The systematic procedures of accountancy undoubtedly were a training which influenced William's geological field measurements in later years; his geological maps and geological sections were drawn with a skill and accuracy far superior to those of his contemporaries. Logan probably became interested in geology because mining activity and construction materials such as building stone may have been a principal part of his uncle's business. After 1827 the management of the business was left to Logan, who devoted days and many evenings to his work. The social contacts with "much company, rich food, and rich wine" were not particularly palatable and were considered prejudicial to his health. During this period he took lessons in art and languages, and continued the study of mathematics. In 1829 he went to Italy, possibly as a tourist, for his diary records descriptions of numerous churches, palaces, gates, bridges, and other buildings; he was also most diligent in recording the types of rock in columns and other parts of the great edifices.

In 1831 Logan moved to Swansea, Wales, where he was appointed manager at the Forest Copper Works, Morriston, a copper smelting and coal mining establishment in which his uncle had invested a substantial sum of money. His prime task was to set up a proper system of accounts but Logan soon realized that a continuous supply of coal for the smelters had to be guaranteed, and that this could only be done with the help of accurate maps of coal seams from which reserves could be determined. Existing geological maps of Wales were highly generalized with too little detail to make them useful. Logan therefore set out to make field observations and to plot them on the available topographic maps of South Wales, recording the continuity of seams and the succession of rocks. A high degree of accuracy was obtained by using surveying instruments such as a compass, a theodolite, and probably barometers. His data included subsurface information from miners, and subsequently from drill cores. By these means he constructed, for the first time, true-scale horizontal cross-sections upon which the underground occurrence of the coal seams was mapped. The results allowed predictions about the depths of mines and the discovery of coal seams that were not exposed at the surface. In 1835 the Geological Survey of Great Britain was initiated and when its first director, Sir Henry Thomas de la Beche, saw Logan's maps for South Wales he adopted them, because "the work on this district [was] of an order so greatly superior to that usual with geologists." Logan's contribution is still recognized in that modern revisions of the geological maps for South Wales bear his name as an original co-author.

Geology had become a popular science in the early decades of the century, with the formation of the Geological Society of London in 1807, the publication of a geological map of England and Wales in 1815 by William Smith, and of a book on the geology of England and Wales by William Daniel Conybeare and John Phillips in 1822. In 1834, while on a business trip in France and Spain, Logan mentions in his diary the works of Charles Lyell who, at that time, was one of the principal authors in the field of geology. On such trips Logan carried painting supplies; some of his watercolours and sepias are held today in trust by the Geological Association of Canada. Logan helped to organize the Swansea Philosophical and Literary Institute in 1835 in order to encourage study of natural history and preservation of antiquities. Between 1836 and 1842, as honorary secretary of the institute and curator for geology, he organized an extensive collection of specimens, well labelled and displayed, including two fossil tree trunks which are still in the grounds of the institute's building in Swansea. He was elected to the Geological Society of London in 1837, and in 1840 presented to it a paper outlining his concept of the origin of coal. The rock succession, including the coal seams, in South Wales suggested that coal had accumulated in situ: below every bed, he found, there occurred persistently an underclay with numerous fossil tree stumps Stigmaria. He was further convinced of the theory's validity by finding later the same association of underclay and stumps at the bottom of coal beds in Pennsylvania, Nova Scotia, and Scotland. Logan's concept of the in situ formation of coal is still considered to be generally valid.

Logan's employment in Swansea ended in 1838 with his uncle's death but he continued to live there and to make geological maps of South Wales. In July 1841 the Natural History Society of Montreal and the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec petitioned the first united parliament of Upper and Lower Canada to allocate an amount not exceeding £1,500 sterling to defray the probable expense of carrying out a geological survey of Canada. Logan was immediately interested in the position of provincial geologist and requested the support of several eminent British geologists in his application. Canadian friends, principally in the Montreal and Quebec societies, also placed his name before the governor of the province. The reputation Logan had acquired from his skilful mapping of the geology of South Wales, and the fact that he was a native Canadian, obtained him the appointment in the spring of 1842 at an annual salary of £500, just half of what he had been receiving in Wales.

The task of the new Geological Survey was to furnish "a full and scientific description of the country's rocks, soils, and minerals, to prepare maps, diagrams, and drawings, and to collect specimens to illustrate the occurrences." These fundamental objectives were initiated by Logan in such a way that the Geological Survey still continues its work within a similar framework and on a similar pattern.

Logan recognized that a proper geological survey of the vast wilderness of Canada would require a permanent institution. At the same time he realized that the politicians who would have to provide money for his organization would only be impressed by practical results and by indications of both actual and potential mineral occurrences from which the country would benefit economically. His task was going to be a difficult one, and capable assistants would be required. Geological mapping would be hindered by the fact that topographic base maps were not available; Alexander Murray*, a retired naval officer with no previous geological experience, proved, however, to be a most able field mapper. Rock and soil specimens would need chemical analyses; the first chemist Logan engaged, Édouard-Sylvestre, Comte de Rottermond*, proved to be incompetent (and subsequently a considerable nuisance), but after 1847 a self-taught chemist and mineralogist named Thomas Sterry Hunt* pursued chemical investigations which gave him a world-wide reputation and added to the eminence of the Geological Survey. During his tenure as director, Logan was to engage capable field and laboratory assistants, such as James Richardson*, Robert Bell*, Edward Hartley, Thomas Macfarlane*, Charles Robb, and Henry George Vennor*. He recognized that Professor James Hall, of the New York Geological Survey, Albany, a renowned paleontologist, would provide valuable advice on the geology of Canada. Hall declined an offer to join the survey in 1854 and so Elkanah BILLINGS, a lawyer and newspaper editor, became the survey's paleontologist. One of Logan's close associates in Montreal, and a leading authority on the geology of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, was the influential John William Dawson*, principal of McGill University.

The first "office" of the Geological Survey was set up in the autumn of 1843 in a Montreal warehouse provided by Logan's brother. By the end of the year Logan was seeking continuance of the survey and urging government leaders to establish a more satisfactory and definite fiscal arrangement. He realized that if the results of his work were made obvious, they could have an influence on politicians and the public. He therefore rented a house in the spring of 1844 on Great St James Street, Montreal, to display his collections as well as for offices and laboratory. In April 1844 his "Report of progress for the year 1843" was submitted to the legislature, the first of a yearly series. He also took great care to talk and write to legislators and perform small tasks on their behalf. By 1845 Logan could demonstrate notable achievements in return for the original £1,500 grant, although he had spent an additional £800 from his own pocket. The Legislative Assembly in that year quickly passed a bill, which Logan himself had drafted, and £2,000 per annum became available for a period of five years.

The act of 1850 experienced opposition, and to ensure its passage Logan had to spend time reluctantly in Toronto, then the seat of government, and away from his field work. After some delay, the same financial support was provided for an additional five years. In 1854, however, the government created a select committee on the Geological Survey. It received evidence from Logan and Hunt along with numerous distinguished individuals including Professor James Hall, Albany, Professor Edward John Chapman*, Toronto, Alexander Jamieson Russell*, Quebec, and the Reverend Andrew Bell, L'Orignal. The select committee was sufficiently impressed to recommend an increase in the survey's facilities, the republication of all reports, and the compilation of a coloured map of Canada. In 1855 the legislature granted Logan $20,000 per year for five years along with $8,000 for reports and maps. From 1861 to 1863 annual appropriations were made. By January 1864 he had advanced $10,000 from his own resources to cover salaries and publication costs. During the spring the government changed, and a sympathetic legislature provided an annual grant for another five years.

Geological mapping of the Canadian provinces, in which Logan himself participated actively, could be done in the mid-19th century only by a person with considerable physical strength and stamina, perseverance, unrelenting resourcefulness, and untiring enthusiasm. (The same qualities were necessary to obtain funds from a succession of governments which remained sceptical of the survey's worth.) Travel around the provinces was difficult. There were steamships on the Great Lakes and the Rideau Canal had been built between Bytown (Ottawa) and Kingston; but in the early years of the survey travel from Montreal to Canada West was by stage coach through the United States. Geological traverses were made by walking, with distances determined by counting paces, establishing lines laid out by compass. In the field, where he had an Indian guide, John Basque, Logan's tent was a blanket held up by two poles. He describes conditions as "living the life of a savage, sleeping on the beach in a blanket sack with my feet to the fire, seldom taking my clothes off, eating salt pork and ships biscuit, occasionally tormented by mosquitoes." More than once local inhabitants wondered about the sanity of this red-bearded individual dressed in a tattered and streaked jacket and patched grey trousers stuffed into large, torn, and roughened field boots, his hair matted with spruce gum, his spectacles cracked. The impression was heightened by his seemingly continuous mutterings, wanderings in a zig-zag fashion, and hammering on the rocks to obtain chips which he wrapped in paper with great care. In the field, Logan usually started at dawn and continued throughout the day and into the evening until he could no longer see distinctly. By the light of the campfire he would work until a late hour to ink-over the pencilled notes and figures made during the day and plot on field maps all the measurements and dimensions which had been recorded. His geological observations were authenticated by pen and ink sketches which clearly reveal his artistic talents. His note books, held by the Geological Survey, are exemplary models for recording field data.

By the end of the field season of 1843, Logan and Murray had established that the united Province of Canada could be divided into three well-defined geological areas. A division of folded rocks extended through the Eastern Townships and the Gaspé Peninsula. Between Montreal and the Detroit River were Paleozoic rocks, flat-lying but broken into two parts by a band of metamorphic gneisses and schists extending for several miles east of Lake Ontario. A northern division of complex metamorphic rocks would present a formidable task of understanding.

In order to justify the continued existence of the survey, Logan immediately started a search for an obviously valuable mineral resource, coal. In the summer of 1843 he compiled for use in comparison a detailed section of the coal-bearing strata near Joggins, Nova Scotia. Subsequently he traversed the north and south shores of Chaleur Bay but he soon recognized that the exposed strata are geologically older than the Carboniferous strata, such as at Joggins, in which beds of coal occur. In the summer of 1844, Logan with Murray traversed the north shore of Gaspé, then went up the Cap Chat River to its headwaters and down the Cascapédia River to Chaleur Bay; the highest peak located on this traverse was named Mount Logan – against his wishes! The expedition, which provided both topographic and geological information, established that coal would not be found in the area.

In 1845 Logan made the first of several expeditions across the ancient rocks north of Montreal. He found evidence of glaciation in polished, scratched, and grooved rock surfaces. He commented on the numerous veins and dikes and especially the occurrences of metallic minerals which would provide an impetus for the development of a mining industry. His report included observations on iron, lead, and copper, and such building stones as marble and slate. The next year he examined the north shore of Lake Superior specifically for occurrences of copper, within a rock sequence he named the Upper Copper-bearing Series, a major discovery having been made on the south shore. In 1847 and 1848 additional occurrences, like that being mined at the Bruce Mines copper deposit, were sought along the north shore of Lake Huron. For each prospect he wrote a cautious report presenting factual observations in a carefully worded style. He pointed out that the high cost of transportation, machinery, and labour would make only the richest deposits suitable for economic development. His objective reports did not, of course, have a kind reception from mining promoters. (On several occasions during his tenure as director of the survey he was called upon to evaluate mineral occurrences. Whenever evidence of fraud by citizens became obvious, his reaction was dismissal of the perpetrators from his office bluntly and swiftly.) Apparently Logan did not observe any evidence of the deposits of silver near Cobalt, of nickel at Sudbury, and of uranium north of Blind River.

From 1847 to 1851 Logan turned his attention to the complex formations of the Eastern Townships, eventually tracing the geology from New York State nearly to the tip of the Gaspé Peninsula. He examined closely the copper occurrences in the vicinity of Sherbrooke, and the alluvial gold deposits of the Chaudière River. Deposits of serpentine found in the area would have had commercial value as a decorative stone except that the occurrences of asbestos, then considered a mineralogical curiosity, made it unusable. In 1860, near Quebec City, he recognized a major geological phenomenon when he realized, on the basis of fossils identified by Billings, that the folded rocks had been faulted and great masses had been thrust northward up and over younger formations. This break, which separates the folded rocks to the south from the flat-lying rocks to the north, is still known as Logan's Line.

In 1851 and subsequent years Logan's main attention was turned to the rocks north of the St Lawrence River primarily in the vicinity of Grenville, Quebec. In 1863 he defined the Grenville Series as a succession of gneisses and crystalline limestones intruded by dikes and granites. The limestones contain distinctive layerings and internal tubular structures which he concluded were the remains of fossils, and to them his friend J. W. Dawson applied the name Eozoon Canadense. To Logan these structures provided a strong argument for the occurrence of life in these very ancient rocks. Subsequent study has demonstrated that similar features can be formed by inorganic processes but other evidence for abundant life in the rocks of the Precambrian is now well established.

To the generally flat-lying rocks north of Lake Huron, resting on the Grenville Series, Logan in 1855 applied the name Huronian. In 1863 he applied the name Laurentian to the seemingly more ancient rocks north of the Ottawa River and in the Adirondack Mountains of New York; he considered them the oldest rocks in North America, perhaps influenced by the then accepted theory that granitic rocks formed the original crust of the earth. Modern scientific methods have proven his interpretation wrong but his names are still used though in a different sense.

In 1841 Logan became the first to recognize in North America the tracks of Carboniferous vertebrate animals in rocks at Horton Bluff, Nova Scotia. He found in 1851 distinctive trails of invertebrate animals in Cambrian rocks near Beauharnois, Quebec. His description in 1846 of the St Lawrence River ice pack near Montreal causing damage to buildings along the shore was subsequently used in the designing of the Victoria Bridge [see James Hodges]. He also was the first to give a scientific explanation of land slippages in clays along the St Lawrence River. Such failures still occur to this day.

The government of Canada was asked to participate in the Exhibition of the Industries of All Nations in London in 1851 and Logan organized an extensive collection of Canadian minerals along with a geological map. The display was described as "superior . . . to all countries that have forwarded their products to the exhibition." It did not receive an award primarily because Logan himself had acted as a juror in mineralogy and metallurgy, for which he received a medal from the Prince Consort. At the Paris Exposition of 1855 the collection of minerals displayed by Logan was awarded the Grand Medal of Honour and the emperor of France, Napoleon III, presented Logan with the Cross of the Legion of Honour. In 1862 Logan was again called upon to display Canadian materials at the International Exhibition in London. Although the collection was of high quality, Logan, because of administrative and publication problems within the Geological Survey, and his participation as a juror at the exhibition, responded with less than his normal enthusiasm. He was now 64 years old.

Logan's contributions to the geological literature are not particularly extensive, despite his diligence in assembling accurate data. The culmination of his years as director of the survey was, however, the publication in 1863 of the Geology of Canada, a volume of 983 pages with Murray, Hunt, and Billings as co-authors, which even to this day is a basic reference for geological work. The volume was followed in 1865 by an atlas of coloured geological maps covering the entire area from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia to the central United States and Canada. The publication of a larger geological map of Canada in 1869 required such diligent attention that it is said Logan's eyesight was impaired.

Logan's first major honour was election in 1851 as a fellow of the Royal Society; he was the first native Canadian so honoured for work in Canada. Queen Victoria bestowed a knighthood upon him in 1856; only two other Canadians had been distinguished in this manner. At the same time the Geological Society of London awarded him its distinguished Wollaston Medal. Upon his return to Canada after receiving these honours, McGill University conferred on him the degree of LLD. The Canadian Institute, which had been founded in 1850 with Logan elected its first president, gave a public reception in Toronto and commissioned his portrait in oil. The Natural History Society of Montreal gave a soirée in his honour. In anticipation of having to make a public address, he wrote "if speech-making is to become the consequence of distinction, I shall soon wish distinction far off." His contribution to the geological sciences was again recognized in 1867 when the Royal Society of London awarded him the Royal Gold Medal with specific reference to his geological map of Canada.

Sir William Edmond Logan was indeed an extraordinary man. Starting a major career at the age of 44, he organized, directed, and contributed in a substantial way for more than a quarter of a century to the Geological Survey of Canada. Logan stated: "The object of the Survey is to ascertain the mineral resources of the country," and the survey still operates on this principle. Subsequent to 1855 he saw the development of a major copper-producing area in the Eastern Townships, where the Acton Mine was said to be the largest copper mine in the world in its time. The Geological Survey's greatest contribution during Logan's tenure as director was producing reports and maps, which established the fundamentals of Canadian geology; especially important were those for the north shore of Lake Huron and Lake Superior where rich beds of copper, nickel, uranium, iron, platinum, and other metals occur in the ancient rocks of the Precambrian.

During the middle part of the 19th century, the rigours of field work in the Canadian wilderness demanded exceptional physical strength and endurance, and the administrative problems of a government organization along with the arrangement of international exhibitions demanded political skill and a sense of dedication to profession and country. So determined was Logan to continue the Geological Survey that he was willing to provide financial support from his own funds when government money was not immediately available. He was a benefactor of the discipline of geology and McGill University in providing the bulk of an endowment of $20,000 for a chair in geology and a medal for the geology student with the highest academic standing. With all this he seems to have been a shy person, even an introvert, and was most uncomfortable at social gatherings. The diligent and strenuous effort he made as director of the Geological Survey placed him in the limelight and he was apparently prepared to endure some personal discomfort in it because he drew satisfaction from acquiring national and international recognition for Canada.

Sir William officially retired from the Geological Survey on 30 Nov. 1869, to be replaced as director by Alfred Richard Cecil Selwyn* who had previously directed the Geological Survey of Australia. Sir William took up residence with his sister, Elizabeth Gower, at Castle Malgwyn at Llechryd, Wales. He returned to Canada several times, however, and for a few months in 1871 assumed temporary directorship of the survey while Selwyn was in British Columbia doing field work. During the summer of 1874 Logan spent several weeks in the Eastern Townships and made plans for some further subsurface drilling in order to demonstrate that his geological interpretation of the complex structure was correct. But in the spring of 1875 his health was failing noticeably. He died on 22 June 1875 in Wales and is buried in the yard of the church of St Llawddog at Cilgerran, Pembrokeshire, Wales. Sir William had not married and had devoted long periods to geological field work as well as to being principal administrative officer of Canada's first government scientific organization; his life of loneliness, to some degree self-imposed, was culminated by burial remote from the land for which he had worked so diligently.

C. Gordon Winder

Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1844–45, app.W, "Geological Survey: Report of progress for the year 1843." [Logan et al.], Geology of Canada. F. J. Alcock, A century in the history of the Geological Survey of Canada (Ottawa, 1947), 11–25. Robert Bell, Sir William E. Logan and the Geological Survey of Canada (Ottawa and Montreal, [1907]). B. J. Harrington, Life of Sir William E. Logan, Kt., first director of the Geological Survey of Canada (Montreal, 1883); "Sir William Edmond Logan," American Journal of Science (New Haven, Conn.), 3rd ser., XI (1876), no.61, 81–93. J. M. Harrison and E. Hall, "William Edmond Logan," Geological Association of Canada, Proceedings (Toronto), XV (1963), 33–42. A. H. Lang, "Sir William Logan and the economic development of Canada," Canadian Public Administration (Toronto), XII (1969), 551–65. C. G. Winder, "Logan and South Wales," Geological Association of Canada, Proceedings, XVI (1965), 103–24; "Where is Logan's silver fountain?" Geological Association of Canada, Proceedings, XVIII (1967), 115–18.

LORD, JOHN KEAST, veterinarian, naturalist, and author; b. 1818; d. a bachelor, 9 Dec. 1872, at Brighton, Sussex, Eng.

John Keast Lord, who was brought up in Tavistock, Devon, received his diploma from the Royal Veterinary College, London, in 1844, and returned to Tavistock to practise his profession, but his "convivial tastes led him astray" and he disappeared suddenly. No connected record of his subsequent movements can be formed, but his writings mention, among other experiences, a winter spent at the Bruce copper mines of Ontario, living and wandering with Indians "over the fur countries east of the Rocky Mountains," and "rambling about" in Arkansas.

After service as a veterinary surgeon in the Osmanli Horse Artillery during part of the Crimean War (1854–56), Lord became veterinary surgeon and assistant naturalist to the British North American Land Boundary Commission which, during 1858–62, surveyed and marked the 49th parallel between the mainland of British Columbia and the United States. Lord's work of caring for the animals and arranging the transport of supplies, his journey to California in 1860 to buy pack-mules (which he drove 1,000 miles overland to the Columbia River), and his zeal in collecting zoological and other specimens, both when in the field and from winter quarters on Vancouver Island (1858–59 and 1859–60), earned high praise from the commissioner, Colonel John Summerfield Hawkins, Royal Engineers.

In 1863 Lord gave a series of lectures based on his experiences with the commission at the Egyptian Hall, London, and following a meeting there with the naturalist Francis T. Buckland, he became a frequent contributor to the Field, to Land and Water (established by Buckland in 1866), and to other periodicals. His travels in northwest America and California were also reported in The naturalist in Vancouver Island and British Columbia (1866) with interesting descriptions of animals and birds and a list of his zoological collections. At home in the wilderness (1867) contains "practical hints" based on Lord's experience in his wanderings: "I have . . . lived in a Sibley tent in North-west America, in a Bell-tent in the Crimea, in a Turkish tent with eight sides in Asia Minor, in a Bedouin Arab's tent, in Indian wigwams east and west of the Rocky Mountains, and in Palmetto shantees in the tropical world. . . ."

Lord spent 1868–69 carrying out scientific researches in Egypt, along the African shore of the Red Sea, and in Arabia, on behalf of the viceroy of Egypt. After his return to England he became the first manager of Brighton Aquarium, but he was already a sick man when it was officially opened in August 1872, and he died from "chronic disease of the brain" on 9 December.

Alice M. Johnson

[The DNB called him William Keast Lord in the 1893 ed.; the name was corrected in the 1909 ed. A.M.J.]

PRO, FO 5/811, ff.1–377. Royal Veterinary College (University of London), Register of students, 1844. J. K. Lord, "Furs how trapped and traded," Land and Water (London), III (1867); At home in the wilderness by "The Wanderer" (J.K.L.) (London, 1867; 3rd ed., 1876); List of coleoptera collected by J. K. Lord, Esq. in Egypt, Arabia and near the Arabian shore of the Red Sea, with characters of the undescribed species by Francis Walker (London, 1871); A list of hymenoptera collected by J. K. Lord in Egypt, in the neighbourhood of the Red Sea, and in Arabia, with descriptions of the new species by Francis Walker (London, 1871); The naturalist in Vancouver Island and British Columbia (2v., London, 1866); "The traveller. The viceroy of Egypt's exploring expedition," Land and Water (London), V (1868).

"The Brighton Aquarium, death of the manager," Brighton Daily News and Sussex Gazette, 12 Dec. 1872. F. T. Buckland, "Practical natural history. The late John Keast Lord," Land and Water (London), 14 Dec. 1872, 395. "Obituary," Land and Water (London), 14 Dec. 1872, 387. Times (London), 1863, 1872.

LYMAN, BENJAMIN, chemist, drug wholesaler, and manufacturer; b. in Derby, Vermont, 11 June 1810, son of Elisha Lyman, a farmer and tavern-keeper, and Hannah Stiles; d. at Toronto, Ont., 5 Dec. 1878.

The Lymans were a New England family descended from Richard Lyman of Essex County, England, who crossed the Atlantic in 1631. About 1816 Elisha Lyman moved to Montreal, where one of his brothers, Lewis, had founded a Montreal drug firm with George Wadsworth about 1800. This partnership, Wadsworth and Lyman, was the first of many drug businesses that were to be carried on in Montreal and Toronto by various branches of the Lyman family.

In 1819 Lewis Lyman moved to Syracuse, New York, and his store in Montreal passed to Benjamin's uncle, Samuel Hedge, and to his older brother William* (1794–1857), as Hedge and Lyman. In 1827 and 1829 respectively, Benjamin and his younger brother Henry* (1813–97) entered the firm, and in 1836 the partnership was reorganized; until William retired in 1855 the three brothers were proprietors, operating under the name William Lyman and Company. Alfred Savage then joined the firm, which became Lymans, Savage and Company until his retirement in 1860, when William H. Clare replaced him and the name was changed to Lymans, Clare and Company. Just before Benjamin's death his son Charles and Henry's son Roswell Corse were associated. In 1879 the name was changed to Lyman, Sons and Company, and in 1908 it became Lymans Limited; today the corporation is a division of the National Drug and Chemical Company Ltd.

The main operations of the firm as chemists and druggists were located on St Paul Street, where extensive premises were erected in 1855 (burnt 1888). Both wholesale and retail operations were carried on until about confederation, when the retail side was dropped. Manufacturing of pharmaceutical products, linseed oil, paints, and oils took place at a separate location on the south side of the Lachine Canal basin. These products won medals at several exhibitions including those in Paris in 1855 and 1878. In addition the Lymans were importers of drugs, seeds, oils, dye stuffs, and painters' colours.

In York (Toronto) the partnership opened a branch under J. W. Brent in 1832, which became Lyman, Farr and Company about 1835 with Timothy J. Farr as a partner. By that year a subsidiary had also been opened in London under the same name. This became Lyman, Moore and Company by 1840; the business apparently did not last long, but it was the first drugstore in that area of Upper Canada. There was also a Bytown (Ottawa) branch. In Toronto, the firm, which was kept separate from the Montreal business, underwent several changes in partnership: in 1850 it was operated with Richard Kneeshaw as Lyman, Kneeshaw and Company, then became Lyman Brothers and Company, and in 1855 Benjamin, who continued to live in Montreal, formed a partnership with William Elliot, as Lyman, Elliot and Company. Finally, in 1870, the Lymans bought out the Elliot family and again assumed the name Lyman Brothers and Company. As in Montreal separate manufacturing and warehousing operations were maintained. The firm had travellers in Ontario, Manitoba, and the western districts. At the time of Benjamin Lyman's death, in 1878, it was the largest wholesale drug company in Toronto and the estate valuation of the Ontario operation alone was $115,000. In the same year Bradstreet estimated the firm's total value at Toronto and Montreal as $250,000 to $300,000.

Benjamin Lyman demonstrated a great interest in improving the standards of the drug business generally. He was particularly active in this respect in Ontario, where he helped establish the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association in 1867; after it became the Ontario College of Pharmacy, he was elected president in 1873, holding that office for several years. He was also one of the founders of the Canadian Pharmaceutical Journal, designed to raise the level of the profession, in 1868. During the same period he helped form the Montreal Chemists' Association (1870), and attempted to found a Toronto pharmaceutical association (1872). In Ontario, at least, his firm was the first to use a bright red label to mark all dangerous preparations.

Lyman was also interested in manufacturing associations generally, attending an 1858 meeting at St Lawrence Hall, Toronto, to promote Canadian industry and being elected first vice-president of the Manufacturers' Association of Ontario (now the Canadian Manufacturers' Association) in 1875. He was a member of both the Montreal and the Toronto Boards of Trade and was a "strong advocate of protection for the industries of Canada." In addition he had financial interests: he was a director of the Federal Bank of Canada (organized 1872–74) and one of the incorporators of the Royal Canadian Insurance Company in 1873.

When the second rebellion had broken out in Lower Canada in 1838, Lyman had been commissioned captain commanding the 5th Company of Montreal Rifles, "The Cold Water Company," on 5 November and remained on active duty with the militia for six months. He retained his captaincy in the company until 1847 when he transferred to the Montreal Fire Battalion on its formation. Like most of the leading Montreal merchants, however, he was one of the initial signatories of the Annexation Manifesto of 1849 and was briefly deprived of his commission in 1850. Reinstated, in 1854 he was promoted major and retired from the militia in 1862. In the municipal sphere he and his brother Henry organized in Montreal the volunteer Union Fire Company in 1840 and Benjamin became its captain. He also was a councillor of Montreal in 1845, 1847, and 1848, and an alderman in 1846, 1849, and 1850. In 1863 he was appointed warden of Trinity House at Montreal.

A trustee and elder of the American Presbyterian Church in Montreal, he laid the corner stone of the new church on Dorchester Street in 1865. As the Montreal Daily Witness stated in his obituary, he was "active in the promotions of nearly all benevolent enterprises in the city": a founder of the Mount Royal Cemetery Company, and its president in 1875–77; and a promoter of the Montreal Auxiliary Bible Society and the Montreal Temperance Society.

He married Delia Almira Wells (1810–83) of Waterbury, Vermont, in 1834 and they had 13 children of whom two sons and two daughters outlived him. Particularly in his last years, he spent a good deal of time travelling, and attending to business in Toronto, where he died of pneumonia. His entire estate was left to his widow. Lyman's obituary described him as a man of commanding presence, who, although not demonstrative, formed firm friendships; slow and careful of speech, he nevertheless put his conclusions into practice promptly once decided upon a policy.

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

College of Pharmacy Library (University of Toronto), Douglas Fatum, "Biography of Mr. Benjamin Lyman (1810–1878)"; T. I. Kahnykevych, "Benjamin Lyman, an outstanding figure in the history of pharmacy."

PAC, RG 1, E1, 77, pp.534–35; RG 9, I, C4, 2. York County Surrogate Court, inventory of the estate of Benjamin Lyman, 22 Jan. 1879; will of Benjamin Lyman, 12 Aug. 1861. Bradstreet's reports of the Dominion of Canada, February 1, 1876 (New York, 1876). Canada, Statutes, 1872, c.59; 1873, c.79, c.99; 1874, c.57. Mail (Toronto), 7 Dec. 1878. Montreal Daily Witness, 27 April 1865; 6, 9 Dec. 1878. Montreal Herald, 15 Oct. 1849. The Canada directory for 1857–58 . . . (Montréal, 1857). Dom. ann. reg., 1879, 356–57. Montreal Directory (Mackay), 1848, 1857, 1862. Toronto, Directories, 1850, 1856, 1861, 1873, 1879.

Atherton, Montreal, II, 278; III, 560–61. Campbell, Hist. of Scotch Presbyterian Church, 256–58. Centennial/Anniversary souvenir; a commemorative volume celebrating Canada's centenary and National Drug's 60 years of service (Montreal, 1967), 112. Genealogy of the Lyman family in Canada; ancestors and descendants of Elisha Lyman (no.18) from the end of the 18th century to the present time (1943), ed. Arthur Lyman (Montreal, 1943), 30, 39, 72, 75. Histoire de la Corporation de la Cité de Montréal, depuis son origine jusqu'à nos jours . . ., J.-C. Lamothe et al., édit. (Montréal, 1903), 206–8. Hist. of Toronto and county of York, I, 408. F. W. Terrill, A chronology of Montreal and of Canada from A.D. 1752 to A.D. 1893, including commercial statistics, historical sketches of commercial corporations and firms and advertisements . . . (Montreal, 1893), 57–58.

"Editorial; the election for council," Canadian Pharmaceutical Journal (Toronto), VIII (1874–75), 436–37. "Editors of the journal from 1868–1942," Canadian Pharmaceutical Journal (Whitby), LXXV (15 June 1942), 26. George Hodgetts, "Minutes of the semi-annual meeting of the council of the Ontario College of Pharmacy," Canadian Pharmaceutical Journal (Toronto), VIII (1874–75), 40–47; "Ontario College of Pharmacy, council meeting," Canadian Pharmaceutical Journal (Toronto), VII (1873–74), 68–75; "Ontario College of Pharmacy; minutes of the semi-annual meeting of the council," Canadian Pharmaceutical Journal (Toronto), VIII (1874–75), 267–72. "Many important drug companies started in little back shops," Canadian Pharmaceutical Journal (Whitby), LXXV (15 June 1942), 82. "Obituary; Benjamin Lyman," Canadian Pharmaceutical Journal (Toronto), XII (1878–79), 190–93. "The story of Canadian pharmacy from 1868 to 1942 as it unfolded . . . in the C. Ph. Journal," Canadian Pharmaceutical Journal (Whitby), LXXV (15 June 1942), 12.

M

MACALLUM, ARCHIBALD, educator and author; b. 1 Aug. 1824, in Killmichell, Argyll, Scotland, son of Donald Macallum and Mary Macalpine Barramollach; m. Maria Adams and, after her death, Mary Biggar in 1859; d. 29 June 1879, at Hamilton, Ont.

Archibald Macallum was about six years old when his family came to Upper Canada and settled in the township of East Hawkesbury. He received little formal education before entering, in 1847, the Normal School in Toronto where he obtained the first first-class certificate granted in Canada West. The next year he was appointed senior teacher at the Model School in Toronto. He received a BA from the University of Toronto in 1864, an MA in 1866, and an LLB in 1877.

In 1853 Macallum declined the principalship of the new Central School in Hamilton and recommended that his assistant, John Herbert Sangster*, be appointed. Macallum took instead the office of master of the Model School in Toronto, but in 1858, when Sangster resigned from the Central School, he accepted a second offer of the position. He became superintendent of schools in Hamilton in 1870 and inspector in 1871. During his term as inspector, the first collegiate institute (called at first the grammar school) and seven public elementary schools were constructed.

Macallum was one of the founders of the Teachers' Association of Canada West (later the Ontario Educational Association), in 1861, and served as its vice-president until 1865. He was recognized as a forward-looking teacher and he spoke against racial discrimination, gave support to equal opportunities for women, encouraged women teachers to join the Educational Association, and suggested the need for commercial education, sewing for girls, and other innovations regarded as "frills and fads." In an address in 1862 he also advocated the use of corporal punishment only as a last resort and instead of expulsion.

Macallum was the author of four textbooks which appear to have enjoyed considerable popularity although they do not seem to have been authorized. Nine editions of his Literary extracts were published in three years and the preface to the second edition states that 3,000 copies were sold in ten days. Active in the Centenary Church in Hamilton, he was one of the two Canadian members of the International Sunday School Lesson Committee formed in 1872 and was a member of the board of the Wesleyan Female College (later called the Hamilton Ladies College).

At the time of his death in 1879 Macallum was president of the St Andrews Society and he had been active in forming the Caledonia Society in Hamilton. He was a member of the Masonic order and an office-bearer in the Scottish Rite. He served as director of the Canada Fire and Marine Insurance Company, the Hamilton Street Railway Company, and the Canada Loan and Banking Company. He was survived by his wife, one son, and four daughters.

FREDA F. WALDON

Archibald Macallum, An eclectic grammar, practical and analytical of the English language . . . (Hamilton, 1867); Manual of dates with brief notes, in Canadian, English, ancient and modern history, for the use of public schools in the Dominion of Canada (Hamilton, 1870); Synopsis of natural history; in explanation of the author's chart of natural history (Toronto, 1857). Archibald Macallum and J. M. Buchan, Literary extracts to aid pupils who are preparing for examination in English literature for admission to high schools . . . (Toronto, [1878]; 9th ed. Toronto, 1881).

Hamilton Board of Education, Proceedings of the Board of Trustees for Common Schools for the City of Hamilton, I–IV. Hamilton Public Library, clipping from an unidentified Hamilton newspaper, 30 June 1879, obituary of Archibald Macallum. Documentary history of education in Upper Canada (Hodgins), VII, 283; VIII, 254; IX, 161–62; XI, 16, 168, 279, 282; XIV, 53. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1888), 738–39. Register of the University of Toronto for the year 1920 (Toronto, [1920]). E. C. Guillet, In the cause of education; centennial history of the Ontario Educational Association, 1861–1960 (Toronto, 1960). J. G. Hodgins, The establishment of schools and colleges in Ontario, 1792–1910 (3v., Toronto, 1910), I, 72–107. J. H. Smith, 1853–1903, the Central School jubilee re-union, August 1903; an historical sketch (Hamilton, 1905). L. T. Spalding, The history and romance of education (Hamilton), 1816–1950 ([Hamilton, 1950]). Toronto Normal School, 1847–1897, jubilee celebration, 1897 . . . (Toronto, 1898).

MACAULAY, WILLIAM, Church of England clergyman; b. 9 Aug. 1794 at Kingston, U.C., son of Robert Macaulay*, loyalist, and Ann Kirby; d. Picton, Ont., 2 March 1874.

William Macaulay received his early education under John Strachan* at Cornwall and York (Toronto); from 1816 to 1818 he attended Queen's College, Oxford, but did not take his degree. He was made deacon in London, England, in July 1818 and received priest's orders from Bishop Jacob Mountain* at Quebec in October 1819. In the latter year he was licensed to Hamilton, now Cobourg, as missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Here he built the first St Peter's Church and served also in the adjacent townships. He visited England in 1827 and after his return he was appointed to the mission of Hallowell (Picton) in Prince Edward County where he owned property and had begun, in 1825, the building of a brick church, largely at his own expense. He itinerated in the Hallowell area until other missions were established. From 1821 to 1835 he was chaplain to the Legislative Council, succeeding John Strachan in that office.

William Macaulay was closely involved with the management of the clergy reserves. From 1820 he was a member of the Upper Canada Clergy Corporation established to manage the reserves in Upper Canada. His mission of Hallowell was made into a rectory in 1836 and it was endowed with lands from the reserves. When the reserves were secularized in 1854 Macaulay was the only rector whom Strachan could not persuade to enter the commutation scheme, by which the funds received for the reserves would be placed by the bishop in an endowment fund; hence Macaulay received a government stipend until his death.

In 1871 Macaulay left Picton to live in England but he had returned to Picton by 1872 and he remained there in retirement until his death on 2 March 1874. In 1829 he had married Anne Catherine Geddes, who died 20 April 1849. He then married in 1852 Charlotte Sarah Vesconte (who died in 1884) and by his second marriage had two daughters.

William Macaulay's ambition was to become bishop. In a letter written to his mother, 18 Oct. 1837, his brother, John Macaulay*, then legislative councillor of Upper Canada, wrote frankly and, it appears, accurately of William: "He considers himself overlooked in the Church. He has very aspiring thoughts and a high opinion of himself but has always committed the fatal error of not endeavouring to impress others with a like opinion. . . . He thinks he should be Bishop. I'll venture to say not another clergyman has concurred in this." Macaulay's ambition was never attained, but it often strained his relations with John Strachan even before Strachan's appointment as bishop in 1839. The close connection of early years between the two men, however, was never entirely broken, and at the bishop's visitation in Toronto in 1844, Macaulay preached an eloquent sermon, printed in the Church, in the course of which he praised his former preceptor.

Although he was a gifted preacher William Macaulay did not gain wide repute outside the two communities in which he served for over half a century and to which he is said to have given their present names. His obituary notice remarked: "He was a sound and consistent Churchman of the old Anglican type, courteous and genial to all," and his kindness and generosity is attested to by Frances Stewart [BROWNE] in Our forest home. He was conservative, punctilious in the performance of duty, closely involved in local affairs, and independent in thought and action.

T. R. MILLMAN

PAO, Macaulay family papers; D. B. Stevenson papers; John Strachan letter books. Queen's University Archives, William Macaulay papers. Macaulay published three sermons: The harvest blessing, or a word to prudent men, being a sermon preached . . . August 28th, 1853 (Kingston, n.d.); The portraiture of a true and loyal Orangeman; as sketched in a sermon (Toronto, 1854); A sermon preached . . . on the occasion of the funeral of Mrs. Catherine Wright (Picton, U.C., [1837]).

Scadding, Toronto of old. [Frances Stewart], Our forest home, being extracts from the correspondence of the late Frances Stewart, ed. E. S. Dunlop (2nd ed., Montreal, 1902), 17, 19. [John Strachan], The John Strachan letter book: 1812–1834, ed. G. W. Spragge (Toronto, 1946). Church (Cobourg), 4 Dec. 1841, 28 June 1844. Church Herald (Toronto), 6, 12 March 1874. New Nation (Picton), 7 March 1874. Wilson, Clergy reserves of Upper Canada, 65–67, 69, 154–55.

McCAWLEY, GEORGE, Church of England clergyman and educator; b. at St John's, Newfoundland, in 1802; d. at Halifax, N.S., 21 Dec. 1878.

George McCawley was educated at the University of King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia, from which he was graduated with a BA in 1821 and an MA in 1824; he was granted his DD in 1835. From 1822 to 1828 he was headmaster of the grammar school at Fredericton, New Brunswick. He was ordained deacon by Bishop John Inglis* of Nova Scotia on 9 July 1826 at Fredericton, and was raised to the priesthood in 1827. He was appointed professor of Hebrew and mathematics at King's College (University of New Brunswick), Fredericton, in 1828, and the next year became chaplain to the Legislative Council of New Brunswick. Between 1831 and 1834 he also served as a visiting missionary for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. While in Fredericton he married Anne, the daughter of William Franklin Odell*, a loyalist who had been provincial secretary under the imperial government. They had one child, a daughter, who married the Reverend Charles Bowman.

When the Reverend Charles Porter* resigned as president of King's College, Windsor, in 1836, McCawley was chosen to succeed him. Both Bishop Inglis and William Howley, archbishop of Canterbury, highly approved the appointment; the former wrote: "he [McCawley] is a man of superior talents, an excellent scholar of great distinction, and a man of most pleasing address." McCawley's long tenure at King's can be called its second formative stage; the first was the period ending with Dr Porter's resignation. McCawley went to King's at a crucial time; there had been grave difficulties in 1835 when the government demanded the surrender of the college charter. In 1849 the government attempted to make King's a secular college by prohibiting the teaching of theology, and in 1850 the government grant was withdrawn when the college refused to conform to the new ruling. These problems could have brought disaster, but McCawley met them resolutely, and the college continued.

Since the emoluments at King's were insufficient for his needs, McCawley was appointed rector of Falmouth in 1846. He held this office until his death, but retired from active parochial duties in his later years. In 1865 he was appointed archdeacon and senior canon to assist Dean William BULLOCK at St Luke's Cathedral in Halifax, and held these offices until 1874. He resigned the presidency of King's on 1 Oct. 1875, and retired on pension. He then moved to Halifax where he lived quietly until his death. McCawley was buried in the Old Burying Ground in Windsor, N.S., within sight of the college to which he devoted most of his active life.

C. E. THOMAS

PANS, John Inglis papers, Journal, 1806–7; letters to SPG, 19 Jan. 1827, 17 Nov. 1846. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 23 Dec. 1878. Encyclopedia of Canada, IV, 158. Pascoe, Two hundred years of the S.P.G., 867. F. W. Vroom, King's College: a chronicle 1789–1939, collections and recollections (Halifax, 1941), 96, 105, 123.

McCLURE, Sir ROBERT JOHN LE MESURIER (also spelled M'Clure), officer in the Royal Navy and Arctic explorer; b. 28 Jan. 1807 in Wexford, Ireland, son of Robert McClure and Jane Elgee; d. 17 Oct. 1873 in London, Eng.

Robert John Le Mesurier McClure's father, an army captain, died five months before his son's birth, and an old army comrade, John Le Mesurier, acted as his godfather and guardian. McClure was educated at Eton and Sandhurst and entered the navy in 1824. He had his first experience of the Arctic in 1836 when he served as mate of Terror under George BACK. This expedition reached Foxe Channel where Terror became frozen in the ice; eventually the ship, badly damaged, recrossed the Atlantic barely making the west coast of Ireland. Certainly McClure could have had no more severe initiation to the Arctic. His next service was on Niagara, flagship of Williams Sandom*, captain on the Great Lakes in 1838 during the Upper Canadian rebellion. He went next to the West Indian Station; he received the Romney at Havana and commanded it from 1842 to 1846. Then he went on coast guard duty for two years.

McClure's second visit to the Arctic lasted from 1848 until 1849 when he served as first lieutenant on Enterprise in an expedition commanded by Sir James Clark Ross* on Investigator. This was the first of many expeditions in search of Sir John Franklin*. The ships entered Lancaster Sound but were soon frozen in and further searches had to be made by sledge; McClure, who spent a month on the sick list, took no part. Eventually Enterprise drifted back into Baffin Bay and returned to England with no information about the missing Franklin.

This failure caused an outcry in Britain where the public felt that the government must act resolutely to discover Franklin's fate. The two ships were recommissioned; Richard Collinson* was appointed to Enterprise as leader of the expedition, and McClure was given the command of Investigator. They were to rendezvous at Honolulu and approach the polar seas through Bering Strait. Enterprise arrived at the meeting point first, waited five days, and left; Investigator reached Honolulu on the day Enterprise had gone. McClure then took a dangerous short cut through the Aleutian Islands and arrived before his commander at Bering Strait. Although he must have known he was ahead, McClure continued. Thirty miles past Cape Lisburne, he met Henry KELLETT in Herald. Kellett, who outranked McClure, did not believe that Collinson had gone on ahead and thought that Investigator should await Enterprise, but he did not order McClure to stay and McClure sailed on. Investigator ran aground near Return Reef but was freed to continue her voyage in a northeasterly direction. McClure's route carried him to Banks Island and, almost immediately, he discovered Prince of Wales Strait between it and Victoria Island. He managed to sail part way up the strait before becoming frozen in for the winter; further exploration by sledge showed him that the strait led to Viscount Melville Sound and convinced McClure that he had discovered the northwest passage. His conviction was sound, but, unknown at the time, Sir John Franklin had found another route four years previously. McClure left on Banks Island a record of his achievement dated 21 April 1851 which was discovered in 1917 by Vilhjalmur Stefansson*. In 1851 ice blocked further travel up Prince of Wales Strait so McClure turned back and attempted to sail west around Banks Island. He succeeded in reaching the northern end of the island by entering Banks (now McClure) Strait and spent the winter in an inlet which he called the Bay of Mercy because it provided an escape from the crushing ice. In the spring of 1852 one of his sledge parties reached Winter Harbour on Melville Island and left a message on a rock on which was inscribed a record of Sir William Edward Parry*'s achievement in 1819.

Investigator was trapped in the ice in the Bay of Mercy throughout 1852; by spring the crew were suffering badly from malnutrition and scurvy. McClure made elaborate plans for evacuating the less healthy members who would be unlikely to stand the rigours of a third winter. He had always shown a great concern for their health, delighted in their amusements during the long hours of winter inactivity, and won their respect and affection. By the spring of 1853, however, help was at hand. The message which McClure had left at Winter Harbour in 1852 was found by members of Kellett's Resolute, one of the four ships of Sir Edward BELCHER's expedition. Lieutenant Bedford Pim* walked over the ice from Resolute and found Investigator. McClure wanted to keep enough men to try to get his ship back to England, but Kellett, who subsequently paid a high tribute to McClure, ordered him to abandon it. McClure and his men were forced to spend a fourth winter in the Arctic when Resolute became trapped in the ice. In April 1854 McClure and the crew were sent by sledge to Beechey Island where they boarded the transport North Star. They finally arrived in England on 28 Sept. 1854 along with the crews of Belcher's disastrous expedition.

McClure was court-martialed for the loss of Investigator but was honourably acquitted. He was promoted captain and knighted, and parliament voted £10,000 to the officers and men of his ship for finding the northwest passage. McClure served on the Pacific Station from 1856 to 1861, then returned to England. He was promoted rear-admiral in 1867 and vice-admiral on the retired list in 1873. During his years of active service he remained a bachelor but in 1869 he married Constance Ada Tudor.

McClure handed all his papers over to his fellow officer Sherard OSBORN who wrote an account of McClure's great voyage. This narrative makes clear that McClure took every opportunity to obtain information about the missing Franklin. He also left records of his own movements, as well as supplies for others who might be in need, in order that the Arctic could become fully known. Osborn said that he was "Stern, cool, bold in all perils, severe as a disciplinarian, self-reliant, yet modest as became an officer. With a granite-like view of duty to his country and his profession, he would in war have been a great leader, and it was his good fortune, during a period of profound peace, to find a field for all these valuable qualities." He will always remain one of the great leaders of Arctic expeditions.

J. N. L. BAKER

[McClure], Discovery of the north-west passage (Osborn). DNB. L. J. Burpee, The discovery of Canada (Toronto, 1944). E. S. Dodge, Northwest by sea (New York, 1961). Christopher Lloyd, Mr. Barrow of the Admiralty; a life of Sir John Barrow, 1764–1848 (London, 1970). A. H. Markham, Life of Sir John Franklin and the north-west passage (London, 1891). C. R. Markham, Life of Admiral Sir Leopold McClintock (London, 1909).

McCLURE, WILLIAM, Methodist New Connexion minister; b. in Lisburn, County Antrim, Ireland, June 1803, son of John McClure, a Methodist minister, and Sarah Trelford; d. Toronto, Ont., 19 Feb. 1871.

William McClure was apprenticed to a Belfast tradesman at the age of 14. In 1828 he became a preacher and a travelling agent for the Hibernian Bible Society. During the next 20 years he preached on the Dublin, Bangor, Lisburn, and Limerick circuits, acquiring a reputation as a powerful speaker, a tireless worker, and a resolute foe of both Roman Catholicism and strong drink. In 1848 conditions in Ireland and the wishes of his church brought McClure to emigrate to Canada, to become assistant superintendent of the New Connexion mission.

From 1848 to 1851 McClure served at the Temperance Street Church in Toronto, but he travelled throughout the province, preaching and lecturing on temperance and a variety of other subjects. He was a charter member of the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada along with Michael WILLIS, and he was active in the movement against the clergy reserves. From June 1851 to January 1854 he was in London, Canada West, after which he was transferred to Hamilton. Here he found a debt-ridden church and a small congregation, a situation he worked hard to remedy. He was then appointed in 1857 to Montreal; there he was disgusted by the prosperity of the Roman Catholic Church, which he called "the Roman Beast." He spent much of his time gathering funds for new churches, and saw two buildings completed. He frequently toured the Eastern Townships, and also began contributing to the struggling New Connexion paper in London, Canada West, the Evangelical Witness, of which he became an editor in 1865.

In 1860, McClure took charge of the important Toronto circuit. Despite his lack of formal education, he was appointed to a committee to train young men for the ministry. The year 1860 was also one of personal tragedy for McClure: his wife, Hannah Glynn, whom he had married in 1827, died on 19 July. He subsequently married Margaret Bussell of Oakville in December 1861; she died in 1865.

Although superannuated in 1865, McClure divided his time from 1861 until his death in 1871 between travelling, lecturing, and collecting money for the church and his interest in the education of the ministry. He worked on the Toronto, Galt, Hamilton, Aurora, and Montreal circuits during these years, and twice went on fund-raising and lecturing tours around Canada West. As a tutor with the Theological Institute, which had been established in 1861, he spent much of his time and energy training future ministers. He applied for a seat on the senate of the University of Toronto in December 1862, and was admitted to that body two months later.

William McClure was a sincere, hard-working humanitarian. His prime interests were the welfare of his church and the temperance movement, but he was possessed of sufficient breadth of spirit to endorse such projects as the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young People's Mutual Improvement Association, and the Canadian anti-slavery movement. He was truly an example of the spiritual philanthropist.

I. C. B. Pemberton

William McClure, The character and fatal tendency of Puseyism, defined and exposed; being a course of lectures delivered in the Temperance Street chapel (Toronto, 1850); A charge to five ministers, who were set apart to the work of the ministry; delivered at the Whitchurch conference, June 8th, 1850 (Toronto, 1850); [ ], Life and labours of the Rev. Wm. McClure, for more than forty years a minister of the Methodist New Connexion, ed. David Savage (Toronto, 1872).

PAC, RG 5, Cl, 729, f.1602. Christian Guardian (Toronto), 22 Feb. 1871. Globe (Toronto), 22 Feb. 1871. London Free Press, 3 March 1951. Methodist New Connexion Church, Canada, Minutes of the annual conference (Toronto; London, Ont.), 1849–71. S. R. Ward, Autobiography of a fugitive Negro: his anti-slavery labours in the United States, Canada, & England (London, 1855).

McCOUBREY, JOHN WILLIAMS, newspaper proprietor; b. of middle-class Protestant parents in Waterford, Ireland, in 1806; d. at St John's, Nfld., on 10 Oct. 1879.

In 1819 John Williams McCoubrey's family emigrated to St John's, Newfoundland, where he was apprenticed to a well-known printer, Robert Lee Jr. After his seven years as an apprentice he went to work for John Shea's newspaper, the Newfoundlander, apparently both as printer and as journalist, until 1832, when he founded his own newspaper, the Times and General Commercial Gazette.

McCoubrey had no trouble with the colonial authorities, despite the tight control of the Newfoundland press at the time. Throughout his career he avoided the political and sectarian controversies usual in the journalism of St John's, and achieved a reputation for impartiality and personal integrity. A rival newspaper, the Public Ledger, records his support for Conservative candidates in the 1842 election. The incident in his life most celebrated by the obituarist in his own newspaper was his refusal to compound with his creditors, at great personal expense, after the fire of 1846, when his business was almost wiped out. Perhaps the most fitting last words on his career come from an anonymous correspondent to the Times, who wrote on 17 Oct. 1879 that he had never known McCoubrey "either through the press or otherwise utter one word to wound the feelings of any man, no matter to what creed or party he belonged."

E. J. Devereux

Public Ledger (St John's), 4 Oct. 1842. Times and General Commercial Gazette (St John's), 1832–94. "Chronological list of Newfoundland newspapers in the public collections at the Gosling Memorial Library and Provincial Archives," 18-page typescript compiled by Ian McDonald (copy at the Reference Library, Arts and Culture Centre, St John's). E. J. Devereux, "Early printing in Newfoundland," Dal. Rev., XLIII (1963), 57–66.

McCULLY, JONATHAN, lawyer, journalist, senator, and judge; b. on a farm in Cumberland County, N.S. (probably at Maccan), 25 July 1809, fifth in a family of nine children of Samuel McCully and Esther Pipes; d. at his home in Halifax, N.S., 2 Jan. 1877.

Jonathan McCully attended the usual one-room school until he had exhausted what it offered, then began work on his father's 150-acre farm. From 1828 to 1830 he taught school to earn money to study law, which at that time meant a five-year apprenticeship to a lawyer. He was admitted to the bar in 1837 at the age of 28. McCully enjoyed fighting his cases and put much hard work on them. He was not without elements for success in a colonial society: ambition, thoroughness, and, perhaps one can add, poverty. Yet he was one of those who succeed by grit rather than by brains. He was always a slow, rather unoriginal thinker. Nor was he a great orator. He spoke with force and directness, often with homely allusions laced occasionally with slang, but neither in force nor in metaphor, nor in his public presence, was he the equal of Joseph Howe, whom McCully seems much to have admired.

By 1837 McCully was a convinced Reformer, despite Cumberland County's Tory preponderance, and had begun to write political articles in the Halifax Acadian Recorder in much the same terms as he conducted his law practice. He was a vigorous, slashing writer, who spared nothing and no one. Under the pseudonym, "Clim o' the Cleugh," he made some savage comments in the Recorder on Alexander Stewart* in 1839. His support of Howe in the 1847 election was repaid with his appointment in 1848 to the Legislative Council, a position he continued to hold until 1867. McCully was appointed judge of probate in 1853, an office he held until after the change of government in 1857, when he was duly fired. He then opened a law practice with Hiram BLANCHARD, MLA, Inverness, a partnership which lasted until McCully left the bar for the bench.

In 1842 McCully married Eliza Creed of Halifax; they had three children, a son and two daughters. The son, Clarence,was ultimately to go into the Anglican Church, but it was a berth rather than a vocation; he was a continued disappointment to his father.

While in the probate court McCully had supported Howe's railway projects, one of which was to build, as a government work, a line from Halifax to Truro with a branch to Windsor. His reward was membership on Howe's railway commission from 1854 until Howe's government was replaced by the James W. JOHNSTON–Charles Tupper* government in 1857. It is remarkable that McCully acquired so many offices; in 1855, for example, he was a member of the Legislative Council, a judge of probate, and a railway commissioner.

He was by now beginning to write for the Halifax Morning Chronicle, the Liberal party's lighthouse in the capital. He rapidly became its leading editorial writer, a position he was to retain until 1865. McCully had the pleasure of seeing some of his efforts on behalf of William Young*, Howe, and the Liberals bear fruit, for in 1860 the Liberals (the name "Reformers" was falling out of use now) returned to power. McCully was promptly appointed solicitor general and also made the sole railway commissioner, while still keeping his hand on the editorial desk of the Morning Chronicle. McCully ran the Nova Scotia Railway from 1860 to 1863 with a ruthless eye to saving money. This, rather than that other touchstone, efficiency, guided him. He was in an excellent position for creating enemies and, being blessed with neither tact nor taste, made good use of his opportunities. A doggerel of the time ran:

> I am monarch of all I survey,
> My will there is none to dispute,
> Trains run when I want 'em to run
> And toot when I tell 'em to toot.

McCully's railway interests had also ramified into the Intercolonial Railway project. He had urged this in the Chronicle as early as 1855 and periodically afterwards. In September 1861 he was in New Brunswick for negotiations on the Intercolonial; partly as a result of these negotiations and partly as a result of reaction to the American Civil War, a conference on the Intercolonial Railway between Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia was held at Quebec in October 1861; there McCully again represented Nova Scotia. At a similar conference in September 1862, McCully was replaced by William Annand*, the owner of the Morning Chronicle.

It is fair to say that McCully was a difficult man for Howe's Liberal government to carry. He had little popular appeal; there is good reason to doubt whether he could ever have been elected for a constituency, a fact that Howe was to throw at him in 1867. Howe blamed him, in part at least, for the Liberal defeat at the polls in the general election of 1863, especially because of his bullying administration of the government-owned railway. "Jonathan," said Howe, "is the kind of fellow that costs more than he comes to. I carried him as long as I could stagger under him."

In August 1864 the Tupper government chose both Liberal and Conservative delegates to represent the province at the Charlottetown conference. McCully was the leader of the Liberals in the Legislative Council; nevertheless his name was omitted. Only at the last minute, as a result of the withdrawal of John Locke, was McCully's name suggested by Adams G. Archibald*, leader of the Liberal party. McCully's contribution at Charlottetown and at Quebec was inconspicuous; it can be roughly documented, but it seems to have been unimportant. His real importance in the confederation movement was his attempt to popularize the Quebec resolutions in Nova Scotia, and to expand the political horizons of Nova Scotians to include the idea of a united British North America.

Up to this time union had not been a particular theme of McCully's. The Morning Chronicle in 1856 had praised colonial union as "a measure that every thinking man feels is essential. . . . We cannot remain as we are." But even Howe in those days would have agreed with that. By 1860 McCully was raising massive doubts about the value of a colonial union, as if he were already following Howe's ideas about some new reorganization of the empire. For McCully, Canada's expenditure on such projects as canals and the Grand Trunk Railway and her burgeoning population had, by 1860, made it obvious that this province was outdistancing New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, to say nothing of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland; although the Morning Chronicle would not say flatly that it opposed a colonial union, it felt, on the whole, that Nova Scotia should leave well enough alone (1 Dec. 1860). In any case that project was soon overshadowed by the more immediate prospects (so it was thought) for the Intercolonial Railway, and by the American Civil War. When colonial union appeared again in the Chronicle's editorials, in 1864, it was still being regarded with distrust, especially so with Canadian talk of a federal union being noised abroad (30 June, 4 Aug., 1 Sept. 1864).

Within three weeks after 1 Sept. 1864, the position of the Halifax Morning Chronicle radically changed. The Charlottetown conference had converted McCully, and not a few others, to confederation. Howe made bitter sport of McCully's conversion. After Charlottetown, Howe said, McCully returned to Halifax as full of the glory of confederation as a girl newly proposed to. Indeed, Howe added, more than proposed to: seduced. St Paul, said Howe, had been converted by a flood of light; Danaë was converted from a virgin to a strumpet by a shower of gold: "you . . . can judge whether McCully was converted after the fashion of Danaë or St Paul." All through the autumn of 1864 (though editorials languished somewhat during McCully's absence at Quebec) the Morning Chronicle threw its heavy weight behind confederation, and especially so in the critical period after McCully had returned to Halifax from Quebec on 10 November. Then on 10 Jan. 1865 came the announcement that McCully was fired from the editorial desk of the Chronicle.

At once the Chronicle swung over on its anti-confederate tack. McCully bought out the old Morning Journal and Commercial Advertiser, christened it the Unionist and Halifax Journal, and for over two years laboured to sell confederation to the Nova Scotians. It was uphill work; and after confederation was approved by the Nova Scotia legislature, in April 1866, McCully gradually eased off. He was a delegate to the London conference of 1866–67, but his strength, as before, lay in his pen. In the pamphlet battle he and Tupper vigorously defended the course Tupper's government had taken in London in January and February 1867.

Jonathan McCully was appointed to the Senate of the dominion of Canada later that same year. From this point he is gradually overshadowed politically by Tupper, Archibald, and, in 1869, Howe. McCully was bound to support Tupper and the better terms of 1869, but he seems not to have been influential in the negotiations for Howe's entering the John A. Macdonald* government in 1869. McCully was shrewd enough however to perceive that Canada's acquisition of the North-West would impose tremendous tasks upon the new confederation. "It has come upon us," he said in the Senate, "before we are fully prepared for it. We are scarcely organized ourselves. Our own house is not [yet] set in order. . . ."

In 1870 McCully was appointed puisne judge on the Nova Scotia Supreme Court; he had obviously made his peace with Howe, since it was to Howe as well as to Tupper that he owed his appointment. McCully came comfortably to rest on the bench. Here his forthright manner and natural instincts for dispatching business crossed the penchant of Halifax lawyers for talk. McCully won. The backlog of court dockets was thus dispatched with some celerity, which did not endear him to the legal fraternity but won him golden opinions – a refreshing change for McCully – from the public at large. This firmness was joined, as it seemed appropriate it now should be, to a newer impartiality, something for which McCully had not always been conspicuous.

He died at his home on Brunswick Street, Halifax, at the age of 67, leaving a substantial estate of $100,000. He is buried in Camp Hill Cemetery.

McCully was not a remarkable man; one of those people who could not do things by halves, he climbed, not very elegantly, up through colonial society. He disliked humbug or pretence; he had none of those arts himself. He cared little for public opinion; his course on confederation took courage: there were not many who would have done what he did. Yet somehow he remains an unlovely figure. With McCully, instincts answered for ideas, and his advocacy did not always help a good cause. He was in this respect like Charles Tupper, but without Tupper's cleverness or agility. McCully's stubbornness and pugnacity, his capacity for work, took him a long way – farther perhaps than his talents really deserved. He was a successful man before confederation became an issue; but it was confederation that made him famous, and gave him the right to this long essay here.

P. B. Waite

[Up to the present no major collection of McCully papers has been found. There are a few McCully letters in PAC, MG 24, B29 (Howe papers), 1–5, 30–31; MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 51; MG 26, F (Tupper papers), 1–18; MG 27, I, D8 (Galt papers), 1–4. One can probably assume that most of the leading editorials in the Halifax Morning Chronicle between 1856 and 1865 were written by McCully, and the same can be said for the Unionist and Halifax Journal for 1865 and 1866. His speeches in the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia can be found in the Journals of the proceedings of that body; those in the Senate of Canada, for 1867–68, in Senate debates, 1867–68, ed. P. B. Waite (Ottawa, 1967). The later Senate debates to 1870 have not yet been reprinted and can best be read in the Ottawa Times. McCully's decisions in the Nova Scotia Supreme Court are in Nova Scotia Supreme Court Reports, VIII–XII (1869–79). For secondary sources see the following: Saunders, Three premiers of N.S.; P. R. Blakeley, "Jonathan McCully, father of confederation," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXXVI (1968), 142–81; N. H. Meagher, "Life of the Hon. Jonathan McCully, 1809–1877," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXI (1927), 73–114. P.B.W.]

McDONALD, DONALD (the family sometimes spelled their name Macdonald), surveyor and politician; baptized at Caledonia, N.Y., 7 April 1816, son of Alexander McDonald and Margaret McColl; d. Toronto, Ont., 20 Jan. 1879.

The McDonald family were residents of the Loch Ness region of Inverness. Donald's father, Alexander, was one of a group that left Inverness in 1803 and settled on the Holland Land Company's holdings at Caledonia (then called Northampton) a year later. In 1823 Alexander joined other Scottish families emigrating to Upper Canada. He settled first in the Niagara area, then moved to the township of Dumfries (now North and South Dumfries) near Galt.

Donald McDonald was registered at Upper Canada College in 1830 and in 1832–33, and was trained as a surveyor by his cousin John Macdonald (1794–1873). John, known as "Stout Mac" for his great strength, was the surveyor for the Canada Company before becoming sheriff of the Huron District in 1845 and later of Huron County. Donald worked with him on numerous surveys and "many of the standard maps of the Huron and neighbouring districts were prepared under his [Donald's] supervision."

McDonald joined in the defence of Toronto in the rebellion of 1837 and was present at the assault on John MONTGOMERY's tavern on 8 December. About 1838 he married Frances, daughter of James Mitchell, judge of the London District Court, and niece of Egerton Ryerson*; they had 14 children. A few years later McDonald had to give up surveying because of rheumatism and was transferred to the clerical staff of the Canada Company, working first at Goderich, then, from at least 1843, at Toronto where he rose to hold the post of assistant commissioner. He built a 26-room house which became one of the social centres of the city, for he and his wife were famous for their hospitality.

In 1858, when the first election was held for the new Legislative Council seat of Tecumseth (the counties of Huron and Perth), McDonald was nominated by the Reform party to run against his Conservative (ministerialist) opponent, Thomas Mercer Jones*, his former superior at the Canada Company. He won, his majority being obtained in Huron County. The London Free Press stated that he was opposed by the Canada Company; certainly from this time his connection with the company seems to have ended. Jones contested the election, claiming that McDonald had used bribes and had opened taverns to the voters. A hearing was held, at which McDonald's supporters objected that the presiding judge, Robert Cooper*, had campaigned for Jones. A report was forwarded but no action was taken by the government; McDonald was duly seated the next year.

McDonald was elected chairman of the committee on finance at the Reform convention of November 1859 [see George BROWN]. In a speech he stated that the best solution for Canada's constitutional problem was the establishment of two or more local governments in federation. He argued that "to be effective we must not be rash" but changes were needed in both government and the men in power. When the Constitutional Reform Association was established to follow up the work of the convention, he was elected treasurer, but he played little part in later events leading to confederation. He was appointed a senator in 1867; he held that office and remained a supporter of the Liberal party until his death.

McDonald became a fairly wealthy man, leaving an estate of $141,800, mostly in notes, mortgages, and cash. Although interested in the construction of the Buffalo and Lake Huron Railway and listed in 1873 as a provisional director of the Huron and Ontario Ship Canal Company, he seems to have had little connection with entrepreneurial activities. In 1865 he was elected a director of the Royal Canadian Bank and became vice-president, but in 1869 he got into an acrimonious dispute with some of the other directors over the policy they were pursuing; the subsequent ill-fated course of that corporation probably indicates that he was right. He also owned a 2,000-acre ranch in Kansas where he bred improved shorthorn cattle, and at the end of his life, along with Alexander Campbell* and others, he was speculating in lands in Michigan.

In religion McDonald was a Presbyterian, a member of St Andrew's Church in Toronto. He was a lay trustee of Queen's College at Kingston from 1868 until 1878. McDonald died in Toronto in 1879 after a year's illness; his wife and several of his children afterwards went to live in Los Angeles, California.

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

First Presbyterian Church (Caledonia, N.Y.), "Records," I, baptismal entry for 7 April 1816. Huron County Surrogate Court (Goderich, Ont.), will of John Macdonald, 26 July 1873. PAO, A. N. Buell papers, 13 April, 1, 15 May 1869; 17 Sept. 1871; C. E. Macdonald papers. University of Western Ontario Library, ULM 56–107 (Minutes of the contested election case of Thomas Mercer Jones versus Donald McDonald). York County Surrogate Court, inventory of the estate of Donald McDonald, 17 May 1879; will of Donald McDonald, 14 June 1877.

Globe (Toronto), 10, 12 Nov. 1859; 22 Jan. 1879. Mail (Toronto), 21 Jan. 1879. Dom. ann. reg., 1879, 412. The roll of pupils of Upper Canada College, Toronto, January, 1830, to June, 1916, ed. A. H. Young (Kingston, Ont., 1917), 382–84. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 437. Centennial book of the First Presbyterian Church, Caledonia, N.Y. (Caledonia, N.Y., 1906), 16, 50. W. E. Elliott, Huron early houses and their families; Book III (Goderich, Ont., 1969), 12–17. Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), I, 271; IV, 140–53. C. E. Macdonald, "The clans in Canada," Scottish Canadian (Toronto), VI (1901), 258–59. A. P. Walker, "John McDonald," Ont. Land Surveyors Assoc., Annual Report, no.53 (1938), 100–3.

McDONALD, EDMUND MORTIMER, journalist, politician, and civil servant; b. 29 Sept. 1825 at Pictou, N.S., son of George McDonald; d. 25 May 1874 at Halifax, N.S.

Edmund Mortimer McDonald was one of a number of young Maritimers who apprenticed with Joseph Howe on the Novascotian during the early 1840s. In 1847 he purchased the New Glasgow Eastern Chronicle, which he used to further the interests of the Reform party in Pictou County. In 1860 his services to the party were recognized by his appointment as queen's printer for the province, a position he held until the Tories swept back into power in a provincial election in June 1863.

In November of 1863 McDonald joined with William Garvie to found the Halifax Citizen, a tri-weekly, which, like the Eastern Chronicle, was in the Reform interest. The combination of McDonald's publishing expertise and Garvie's satirical pen thrust the Citizen to the fore in the busy newspaper world of Halifax in the 1860s. Generally speaking, the Citizen favoured the idea of a Maritime union; in 1864, however, it opposed the immediate union of all of British North America under the federal system proposed by the Canadians at the Quebec conference. Suspicious of Canadian politicians, McDonald led the Citizen into almost violent opposition to the Quebec resolutions, and it became the first important paper in Nova Scotia to take a stand in opposition to union.

After the initial opposition to confederation was side-stepped by the provincial government, McDonald and Garvie became founding members of the League for the Maritime Provinces (or the Anti-confederation League). In September 1867 McDonald contested the riding of Lunenburg in Canada's first federal election. He campaigned and was elected as a member of the Nova Scotia party, the political wing of the Anti-confederation League. In the commons he was a leading spokesman for the release of Nova Scotia from the terms of confederation. In the spring of 1868, while Howe was fighting the league's cause in London, McDonald introduced in the commons a series of resolutions formally demanding the repeal of the British North America Act for Nova Scotia, arguing: "The people of Nova Scotia disliked the Union, not merely because of itself or its financial consequences, but because of the mode in which it was thrust upon them."

Like Joseph Howe and many others McDonald soon realized the futility of continued opposition to confederation. When Howe negotiated better terms for Nova Scotia in 1869, McDonald was quick to lay down his arms. The Citizen thereafter supported confederation. McDonald also became a supporter of John A. Macdonald*'s government in the House of Commons. In 1872 he achieved his political reward by being named collector of customs for the port of Halifax, a post he filled without incident until his untimely death just two years later. McDonald was married and had one son who predeceased him by about a year.

McDonald possessed a facile pen and a shrewd political sense. His opposition to confederation struck a chord which many Nova Scotian politicians have played successfully since 1867. His turnabout in 1869 reflected his capacity to judge the political consequences of continued opposition to confederation from a small province.

D. A. Muise

[PANS, Report, 1948, app.C, 35–56 contains two letters from McDonald to William Garvie justifying his political switch in 1868–69. See also: Eastern Chronicle (New Glasgow, N.S.), 1847–60. Halifax Citizen, 1863–69. Obituaries are found in the British Colonist (Halifax), 28 May 1874, and the Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 26 May 1874. The best secondary account of the confederation struggle in Nova Scotia is: K. G. Pryke, "Nova Scotia and confederation, 1864–70," unpublished PHD thesis, Duke University, 1962. D.A.M.]

McDONALD, JOHN, priest, landed proprietor, colonizer, and land agent; b. in 1796 or 1797 at Tracadie, P.E.I., third son of Captain John McDonald* and his second wife Margaret Macdonald; d. 12 Oct. 1874 at Brighton, Eng.

John McDonald was born into the Jacobite family of a Highland tacksman or laird who in 1772 sent 210 Roman Catholic Scots to the central part of the Island of St John (P.E.I.). John McDonald Sr arrived in 1773, established a large house, New Glenalladale, at Tracadie, and settled the "opprest people" on his estate. In September 1813 his widow sent her sons John and Roderick to Lower Canada where they studied at the college of Nicolet. In 1820 John proceeded to England and later to France for further study; he was ordained in Paris in May 1825, the second Island native to become a priest.

Family financial difficulties had compelled John McDonald to obtain assistance from a Scottish bishop to complete his education. In return he had agreed to do missionary work in Glasgow after his ordination, and he remained there until spring 1830. At that time Father McDonald departed for Prince Edward Island taking with him 206 Scots and Irish as tenants for the lands he had inherited. He settled the immigrants at Fort Augustus, and took up residence with his mother at Tracadie. In addition to being priest and landlord, he also acted as land agent for his brother Roderick. This accumulation of functions resulted in considerable discontent among the tenants in the area, most of whom were his parishioners. As a result he soon left for a position in Lower Canada but, after a brief stay, returned to Tracadie. In mid-1835 renewed conflict in Tracadie and the need for a Gaelic-speaking priest in eastern Kings County led Bishop Bernard Donald MacDonald* to transfer McDonald there. He was for a time more successful as a priest than he had been previously. However he was working in an area well known for its radical or escheat views on the land question [see George COLES], and it became apparent that he and his parishioners were in fundamental disagreement. The situation was aggravated by McDonald's attitude toward the people whom "he regarded as his inferiors in every respect," according to the Catholic historian John C. MacMillan*.

In March 1843 Sir Henry Vere Huntley* called out troops to enforce the legal rights of property on lots 44 and 45 of the Cunard estate. When they were given accommodation by Father McDonald many of the settlers suspected that his class position and sympathies had led the priest to concur in, or even suggest, the action. Local sentiment against him was so strong that the bishop, after a visit to the district, requested in September 1843 that Father McDonald leave the area within a month. He refused, with the result that his parishioners took matters into their own hands. On 1 Jan. 1844 under the leadership of their escheat assemblyman, John Macintosh*, they elected new elders (customarily appointed by the priest) and directed them to tell McDonald "to quit the Parish, in a fortnight, or month, as they might determine." At the next Sunday mass, McDonald refused to recognize the new elders; Macintosh rose demanding a hearing and was only silenced when the priest knelt in prayer. The service then ended with Father McDonald retreating to the parochial house and Macintosh angrily berating him.

The priest took legal action against the assemblyman, and employed as his lawyers the Tory politicians Robert HODGSON and Edward Palmer*. Macintosh was acquitted by a jury, and the bishop, who had opposed the action, ordered McDonald to leave the parish. Although many of the congregation were now boycotting his church, the priest refused and did not withdraw to Tracadie until he was suspended from his duties late in 1844. After this reprimand, McDonald, who felt the bishop and neighbouring priests had conspired with the escheators against him, resolved never again to serve in the Island diocese. Leaving his estate on lots 35 and 36 in the hands of an agent, he went to Quebec City in 1845. After teaching church history at the seminary there, he proceeded to England where he held several charges near London until his health deteriorated. He then retired to a convent in Brighton where he died.

Father John McDonald appears to have been a man of considerable talent. According to MacMillan "he was a preacher of more than ordinary power," and the author of "a few minor works, one of which, a manual of devotion and an abridgement of Christian doctrine combined, had at one time a wide circulation among the people of eastern King's County." He was fluent in three languages – Gaelic, English, and French. Nevertheless, during his years in his native colony these abilities were largely negated by his class position and attitudes, and by his insensitivity to the antagonisms thus generated. By the mid-1840s John McDonald had outlived his usefulness as a pastor in P.E.I. and was virtually compelled to go where the performance of his religious functions would not be impaired by his social rank.

IAN ROSS ROBERTSON

Archives of the diocese of Charlottetown (Roman Catholic), Bishop Bernard D. MacDonald papers, letter book of bishops MacDonald and Peter MacIntyre; a tattered copy of a volume published by Father John McDonald containing reprints of documents relevant to his conflicts with John Macintosh, Bishop MacDonald, and his fellow priests (the first four pages are missing but the probable date of publication is 1845). Prince Edward Island, Supreme Court, Estates Division, will of John McDonald, 14 June 1872. Examiner (Charlottetown), 16 Nov. 1874. Islander (Charlottetown), 26 July, 16, 23 Aug. 1844. Palladium (Charlottetown), 25 July 1844. R. C. Macdonald, Sketches of Highlanders: with an account of their early arrival in North America . . . (Saint John, N.B., 1843).

The arrival of the first Scottish Catholic emigrants in Prince Edward Island and after, 1772–1922 (Summerside, P.E.I., 1922), 27, 37–40, 50–53, 110. James Donahoe, Prince Edward Island priests who have labored or are laboring in the sacred ministry outside the diocese of Charlottetown (St Paul, Minn., 1912), 3, 25–28. J. C. MacMillan, The early history of the Catholic Church in Prince Edward Island (Quebec, 1905), 43–44, 151, 189, 193, 208–9, 279–80, 292–93; Catholic Church in PEI, 3–5, 10–11, 45–52, 308. John Prebble, The Highland clearances (London, 1969), 12–19. A. F. MacDonald, "Captain John MacDonald, 'Glenalladale,' " CCHA Report, 1964, 21–37. Ada MacLeod, "The Glenaladale pioneers," Dal. Rev., XI (1931–32), 311–24. J. F. Snell, "Sir William Macdonald and his kin," Dal. Rev., XXIII (1943–44), 317–30.

MACDONALD, JOHN SANDFIELD, lawyer and politician; b. 12 Dec. 1812 at St Raphael West, Glengarry County, U.C.; d. 1 June 1872 at Cornwall, Ont.

John Sandfield Macdonald's father, Alexander, was a Roman Catholic Highland Scot of Clan Ranald. As a child Alexander had emigrated in 1786 with other Catholics from Scotland to settle in what was to become Upper Canada. He married Nancy Macdonald, the daughter of a distant cousin, and John Sandfield was the first of their five children.

Left without a mother at eight, Sandfield developed the independent and undisciplined character that marked his future political career as an "Ishmaelite." He seemed to dislike the confines of the parish school, attending it only for a few years and, at 16, he took his first job as a clerk in the general store in Lancaster. Later, he had a similar position in Cornwall.

Discontented with his prospects after several years as a clerk, Sandfield was encouraged by a local lawyer to enter the legal profession. In 1832 he enrolled in Cornwall's Eastern District grammar school, the famous training school of the Family Compact, then under the Reverend Hugh Urquhart of the Church of Scotland. Sandfield graduated in 1835 at the top of his class and was articled to Archibald McLean*, a lawyer and leading Tory in Cornwall.

McLean was elevated to the Court of the King's Bench in 1837, and Sandfield became his assistant on the western circuit. It was a position which enabled Sandfield to meet eminent men of the day, including Allan MacNab*, Thomas Talbot*, and William Henry DRAPER under whom he later articled. He was also given a commission as queen's messenger, charged with carrying dispatches between the lieutenant governor in Toronto and the British minister in Washington. On one of these missions the tall, gangling Glengarrian met Marie Christine Waggaman, daughter of George Augustus Waggaman, a former Whig senator from Louisiana originally from the Maryland gentry, and Camille Armault, who came from Louisiana's old French aristocracy. In 1840 Sandfield opened his own law office in Cornwall and in June of that year was called to the bar. Several months later, Christine eloped from her French finishing school in Baltimore with the adventuresome Scot. They were married in New York City in the fall of 1840.

In 1841 Sandfield was drafted by Colonel Alexander Fraser* and John McGillivray*, respectively the Catholic and Presbyterian political lairds of Glengarry, to stand for election to the first Legislative Assembly of the united Province of Canada. His patrons' control over the area was such that Sandfield won by a substantial majority over the Reformer, Dr James Grant, without delivering a single political address. Sandfield became known outside his district as a Draper Conservative but had at this point few fixed ideas on politics. He seemed at times closer to the old-line Tory position of Alexander McLean, MLA for Stormont and brother of his former tutor, Archibald, particularly when Draper's municipal reforms threatened the patronage system of Glengarry. Draper placated Fraser by appointing him first warden of the Eastern District, made up of the counties of Stormont, Dundas, and Glengarry, and Sandfield secured the privilege of delivering the speech of welcome at Cornwall to the new governor general, Sir Charles Bagot*, and of seconding the address-in-reply at the opening of the session of the assembly in 1842. He was jibed at by the old-line Tories for his alleged betrayal. He believed that it was they who made Draper's position untenable and he agreed with Bagot's policies. For these reasons he continued to support the government when it was reorganized along Reform lines with the coming to office of Robert Baldwin*, Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*, Augustin-Norbert Morin*, and others. Moreover, the new council was prepared to serve Glengarry well: a generous provincial grant for district education was obtained and patronage jobs were given to supporters. Sandfield himself became a lieutenant-colonel in the 4th Regiment of the Glengarry militia. Aided by his own and Christine's flair for entertaining, he was fast becoming his own master in Glengarry.

Sandfield went into opposition on the resignation of the Reform ministers in November 1846, following the dispute with Governor General Charles Metcalfe* over patronage. The Glengarrian thus took the decisive step in affixing to himself the label of Reformer and joined Baldwin's crusade for responsible government; he was to remain a self-proclaimed "Baldwinite" until his death. Despite Draper's successful attempt in most of Canada West (still popularly called Upper Canada) in the ensuing election to condemn Reformers as disloyal and inimical to British institutions, Sandfield was easily returned in Glengarry and helped defeat McLean in Stormont.

The tide began to turn to Reform and Sandfield's influence increased. He had his own weekly newspaper, the Cornwall Freeholder, and won re-election in 1848 despite the intervention of the Catholic bishop Patrick Phelan*, who implied that the faithful should vote for the Tories. The La Fontaine–Baldwin ministry was formed with a majority from both Lower Canada (Canada East) and Upper Canada and responsible government seemed secure. To Baldwin, patronage was its vital concomitant and, in and around Glengarry and Cornwall, Sandfield was its chief purveyor. He supported Baldwin's municipal reforms in 1849 (although securing the survival of the Eastern District as the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas, and Glengarry), and held Glengarry for Lord Elgin [Bruce*] during the crisis over the rebellion losses bill despite Fraser's objections. Late that same year, he became both a queen's counsel and Baldwin's solicitor general for Upper Canada. In 1850 Sandfield's followers made a clean sweep in the local municipal elections.

Sandfield's personal fortunes were also rising. He was steadily acquiring property and his legal practice had so expanded that he was forced to hire two assistants. "No barrister," claimed the Globe, later to be his most insistent critic, "stands higher in the estimation of mercantile men." In 1849 his family, then including three daughters and a son, moved into Ivy Hall, the stately residence that had once housed the imperial garrison in Cornwall. Later there were two more children.

Once formal responsible government was secure, Reform forces began to disintegrate, and in 1851 La Fontaine and Baldwin resigned. Francis Hincks* tried to reorganize the government and Sandfield now expected to succeed Baldwin as attorney general west. Hincks personally disliked Sandfield, however, considering him too independent-minded, and felt it essential also to regain the support of the Clear Grits, the Upper Canadian radical democrats. Using an unsuspecting Sandfield as a go-between, Hincks succeeded in bringing two Clear Grits into the cabinet and secretly asked William Buell Richards* to be attorney general. Knowing the effect it would have on Sandfield, Hincks wrote him a condescending letter blaming him for the Clear Grit demand for two cabinet positions rather than one. The enraged Glengarrian resigned as solicitor general. He never forgave Hincks for turning him out "to pasture like an old horse."

Sandfield had become essentially an independent Reformer but, after the elections of December 1851 and his own flattering return by acclamation, he had a considerable following in the assembly from eastern Upper Canada. In recognition of his power and, no doubt, to mute his voice, Hincks offered him the speakership. After considerable hesitation, he accepted. As speaker, however, he was unable to voice his and his constituents' dissatisfaction with the government's support of sectarian colleges and separate schools and with its hesitation in abolishing the clergy reserves and other examples of denominational privilege in Upper Canada. In Glengarry, the relationship between Protestant and Roman Catholic Scots was a friendly one. This experience, his own individualism, and the alienation of the Catholic Scots from the church hierarchy, securely in militant Irish hands, shaped Sandfield's highly secular attitudes toward church and state relations. He was himself only nominally Catholic.

The speaker was also greatly displeased with the profusion of railway scandals, some involving the premier himself. To increase his frustration, he was forced in 1853 to take a rest of six months in Europe because of lung trouble which was to leave him a semi-invalid. While in London, he made a dubious deal by which his brothers, Alexander Francis and Donald Alexander*, were to construct the portion of the Grand Trunk Railway between Farrans Point in Stormont and Montreal.

The speakership was a burden but it gave Sandfield one of his greatest moments. The government did not resign after defeat in the speech from the throne debate at the opening of the 1854 session. Instead of calling for a new ministry Elgin appeared two days after the vote to dissolve the house. Before he could read the closing address, an irate Sandfield delivered a stern rebuke, in English and French, questioning the constitutionality of Elgin's actions. Dissolution followed, but the outspoken speaker became overnight a popular hero as the defender of the constitution against tyranny. He was returned by acclamation in Glengarry, and George Brown of the Globe even pledged support to any government he formed if it was dedicated to the separation of church and state and to representation by population. Sandfield could hardly have accepted the latter proposition; as a central Canadian with Montreal as his metropolis, he was dedicated to the dual nature of the united province. He believed that government should not be carried on against the wishes of a majority from one or other of its two historic sections.

The election proved inconclusive but it seemed that Sandfield, with the backing of Brown, dissident Reform elements, and moderate Conservatives, would become premier of Canada. This did not happen. Although Hincks was defeated in the house, he and others were able to effect a coalition with the Conservative faction. Elgin summoned MacNab of the Tories, not Sandfield, and Morin and the rest of the Lower Canadian wing of the old government held firm.

Sandfield was left as the leader of a disunited Reform opposition made up of Brown, the Clear Grits, the Rouges or Lower Canadian radicals, Sandfield's own following, and a few other scattered Baldwinites. Sandfield refused to support Brown's policies, including representation by population, and relations between them deteriorated during the sessions of 1855 and 1856. Sandfield ceased to be leader of the opposition and their cooperation ended when Brown mounted a scathing personal attack in 1856 against a resolution by Sandfield favouring official endorsation of the principle of the double majority. Brown seemed, meanwhile, to be taking over and absorbing the more radical Clear Grits.

Sandfield's health was also declining and in 1857 he lost the use of one lung. Because of his weakened condition, he turned over his large rural constituency of Glengarry to his brother Donald Alexander, retaining the riding of Cornwall with its fewer than 700 voters for himself. Both brothers won in the elections of November 1857. With Reform victories elsewhere, the Conservative government failed to gain an Upper Canadian majority. In early 1858, John A. Macdonald*, now premier, offered Sandfield a ministerial post to gain support in the eastern counties. It was doubtful whether Sandfield ever intended to join the government. He took a tough line, demanding for Reformers three of the six Upper Canadian seats. John A. was unwilling to go that far. Sandfield then telegraphed a simple "No Go."

When the cabinet was defeated in July on the seat of government question, Sandfield reluctantly agreed to serve as attorney general west in the government formed by George Brown. This "most ephemeral government" met defeat in the house and, being refused dissolution, lasted less than 48 hours. The chief Reformers were out of the house seeking re-election, as they were required to do on accepting portfolios, and a somewhat strengthened old gang under George-Étienne CARTIER returned through the dubious manœuvre known as the "Double Shuffle." Sandfield took part in the ensuing opposition tour of the province denouncing the actions of Cartier, John A. Macdonald, and Governor General Edmund Head*, but privately he was convinced that Brown's impatience to seize office had led to the Reform downfall. To Sandfield, Brown was a leader incapable of getting a Lower Canadian majority to accept him. He could not understand the adulation heaped upon Brown in the western peninsula and once snapped to Charles Clarke*, in Elora: "Can't you do anything without George Brown . . .?" Consequently, Sandfield gradually moved closer to Louis-Victor Sicotte* and other members from Lower Canada, who had become alienated from Cartier and might be termed "Mauves," and farther away from the Free Kirk, Toronto-based, Victorian Liberal George Brown.

The two great Reformers clashed bitterly and personally in 1859 and 1860 in the assembly and in the press over the source of compensation to the former seigneurs of Lower Canada for the loss in 1854 of their casual dues. Was this to come from general revenue or, as Brown claimed he had proposed, from some special levy on Lower Canada alone? In a dualistic country such as Canada, Sandfield argued, Brown could not be a leader, and did nothing now but disrupt Reform and prevent it from achieving power. In all this, Sandfield found a friend and ally in Josiah Blackburn*, influential owner and editor of the London Free Press.

Sandfield also became embroiled in the other major split within Reform. In the spring of 1859, when the Globe was temporarily under the editorial direction of George Sheppard*, the paper urged the dissolution of the union and the abandonment of the British parliamentary system for the republican version operating in some mid-western American states. This proposal was as unacceptable to Sandfield as was Brown's advocacy of the single majority in the assembly. In the fall, Brown called for a great Reform convention in Toronto to reassert his authority and to secure endorsement for "rep by pop" and Canadian federalism. Not happy with conventions, especially those held in Toronto under Brown's leadership, Sandfield refused to attend and few delegates were present from east of Cobourg. Division continued and, despite Brown's protestations of strength after the convention, Sandfield argued through the London Free Press that Brown's followers were the smallest faction of Reform, the dissolutionists second, and the Baldwinites the largest. He was willing to admit that rep by pop was perhaps desirable at some future date if Upper Canada continued to grow, but he emphasized that double majority was more important for harmony, goodwill, and necessary reform.

By March 1860, Sandfield had determined to overthrow Brown as leader of Upper Canadian Reform and began again to attend Reform caucuses. Rumours of a Sandfield–Sicotte alliance increased as both men tried to form closer links with the Rouges and some restless Bleus. They would be "Baldwinite Reformers," and, like Baldwin, Sandfield argued that, to be viable, Reform had to avoid doctrinaire, sectarian, and sectional stands. The problems of the union were the agitation from the southwestern peninsula and unsuitable men in government, not the constitution.

Sandfield and Sicotte failed in their attempt at reconstruction. Michael Foley*, considered a potential rallying point in the west, succumbed to Brown's pressure by voting in May 1850 for his resolutions in the assembly declaring the union a failure and calling for a redivision, to be linked by "some joint authority." Foley attempted to reconcile Brown and Sandfield but their relations grew increasingly bitter. Sandfield stayed away from the caucus during the session of 1861, and continued to cooperate with Sicotte and other sympathetic French-Canadians. A small triumph came when his motion, seconded by Foley, criticizing the government for its failure to have an Upper Canadian majority, narrowly missed acceptance (49 to 64), and helped force the Conservatives to declare the basis of representation an open question. But if Reform was not able to unite on the constitutional question, it could on most non-sectional economic issues. A motion moved by Sandfield and seconded by Antoine-Aimé Dorion*, the Rouge chief, condemning the government for financial mismanagement, failed by only a few votes. Nevertheless, Reform disunity helped the Conservatives in the 1861 elections. Brown was personally defeated and his monopoly on rep by pop destroyed when some Conservatives adopted the programme. The London Free Press bluntly called him a "government impossibility." Sandfield was again on his way up.

It was true that John A. Macdonald gained in Upper Canada but Cartier lost ground to Sandfield's ally, Sicotte, in Lower Canada. When 16 more Lower Canadians switched over to Sicotte to defeat Cartier's militia bill, the governor general, Lord Monck*, summoned Sandfield who had stayed in the background during the defence debate. Sandfield accepted and was sworn in as attorney general west on 24 May 1862, with Sicotte as his associate (he had been passed over lest the British authorities be enraged because he had caused the militia bill to fail).

Premier Sandfield Macdonald's government was dominated by Baldwinites and Mauves, although it did contain Dorion and William McDougall*, and it was dedicated to the double majority. Difficulties were many: the province was torn by sectional and sectarian tensions, and a civil conflagration raging south of the border threatened Canada. At the same time Britain viewed the province with disdain and condescension. Sandfield secured approval of a measure that doubled the size of the provincial voluntary militia and provided for the encouragement of unpaid units. The defence budget was three times that of 1861 but less than one third that provided in Cartier's bill. After it completed routine business Sandfield had the restless assembly prorogued in June 1862 and did not have it reassembled until 1863. In that interval he prepared legislation and pared expenditures.

He also tried to cope with the Duke of Newcastle, the irate colonial secretary, in order to improve Anglo-Canadian relations. Reasserting the argument that the defence of Canada was primarily a Canadian responsibility, Newcastle virtually demanded an active Canadian militia of 50,000 trained men. On 24 Sept. 1862, in Sandfield's most important state paper, he and his cabinet informed Newcastle that Canada would support such a costly military force only during a state of war or imminent invasion. The province, it continued, had no quarrel with the United States; if war came, Canada would loyally respond, yet war would only come as the result of a British-American feud. Enlarging the militia would require direct taxation, which no Canadian government could sustain. The cabinet rejected Newcastle's suggestion that army funds be placed beyond the control of the Canadian legislature as totally unacceptable to "a people inheriting the freedom guaranteed by British institutions." It urged Britain to consider any Canadian expenditure on the construction of the Intercolonial Railway as expenditure for imperial defence. If he was unsuccessful with Newcastle, to whom the arguments were "buncombe," Sandfield gradually brought Monck to an understanding of the realities of Canadian politics, and the two men developed a close and lasting friendship.

Sandfield met the assembly with optimism in early 1863: internal divisions seemed to have subsided, the administration was going well, and he could report that the volunteer force had reached 25,000 men. Nevertheless, the old disruptive issues remained unresolved, and they appeared in the crucial debate over Richard Scott*'s government-supported separate school bill. The issue of separate schools for the Roman Catholic minority of Upper Canada had bedevilled Canadian politics since at least 1850. The Scott bill, in its final emasculated form, seemed aimed mainly at clarifying the Étienne-Paschal Taché* act of 1856, which had been passed against a majority from Upper Canada, and it only slightly extended the privileges of the minority. Sandfield personally opposed the religious segregation of children but accepted the bill to achieve educational tranquillity, as did Egerton Ryerson*, the chief superintendent of education in Upper Canada. Scott and the representatives of the Irish hierarchy agreed that it would serve as the final settlement of their demands.

Both the Clear Grits and the Orangemen were in an uproar. Two events now changed the whole political situation: Dorion's withdrawal from the cabinet because of his opposition to expenditures on the Intercolonial, and Brown's reappearance in the assembly after winning a by-election. The Scott bill, backed by Sandfield, John A. Macdonald, Sicotte, Cartier, and Dorion, carried but without a majority from Upper Canada. Sandfield was furious with Brown and the Grits and he vainly argued that the passage of Scott's bill did not really invalidate the double majority because his government retained the support of the two majorities. Sicotte's hold on the erstwhile Bleu supporters, however, was faltering and there was a drift back to Cartier. The government was defeated in the assembly on 8 May even though it regained its majority in Upper Canada when Brown declared that he preferred John S. to John A. and Cartier.

Monck granted Sandfield a dissolution and Sandfield began secret negotiations with Brown, Dorion, Luther HOLTON, and Oliver Mowat* aimed at a reconstruction. He and others kept the double majority as their personal conviction but the government had to declare the basis of representation an open question. Sicotte was dropped for Dorion as Sandfield's chief associate, and Sicotte, Michael Foley, D'Arcy McGee*, and other dropped ministers turned with a vengeance on their former chief. In the ensuing elections, "re-united" Reform swept Upper Canada but in the sweep Brown gained most. In Lower Canada the Mauves had already disintegrated, and although Dorion and his Rouges slightly improved their position, they could not win the majority. With a shaky lead of one, Sandfield could no longer govern in the image of La Fontaine and Baldwin.

Yet the régime survived through 1863 and made considerable progress. Plans for departmental and fiscal reforms matured. Sandfield secured the passage, with double majorities, of two defence bills which reorganized the militia, providing for service battalions, a volunteer force of 35,000, and a defence budget over twice that of 1862. Even the British press was impressed with these bills and with Finance Minister Holton's restrained, though still unbalanced, budget. Brown himself seemed mellowed as he and Sandfield even entertained each other. The survey of the Intercolonial, but not the construction, was undertaken by Sandford Fleming* at Canadian expense, despite Dorion's misgivings, alleviating somewhat Maritime distrust of Canadians, especially of Canadian Reformers. The government was also working on an unprecedented audit bill which would establish careful legislative scrutiny of departmental expenditures.

The old chronic deterioration then recommenced, and the tiny majority evaporated. Brown became hostile over cabinet changes, over Holton's Montreal orientation in fiscal policies, and finally over Sandfield's attempt to secure support from "loose fish" members in the Ottawa area. A vital by-election was lost. The assembly gathered in February 1864 with the opposition under Cartier eager and ready for the kill. It talked parliament to a standstill. Sandfield tried desperately to break loose from Brown by combining with Sir É.-P. Taché and other Bleus but failed and resigned on 22 March. The audit bill, his main legislative achievement, became law under his successor.

The régime which followed Sandfield's fared even worse, falling within three months. Canada had reached a political impasse which reflected the centrifugal forces within the province; the political problem was not deadlock arising from two solid, equally matched phalanxes facing one another in the assembly but the impossibility of forming an executive in this multi-party situation where every government was a coalition.

Sandfield, with Monck's backing, had attempted an unusual coalition with Taché that would consist of Reformers from Upper Canada and Bleus from Lower Canada. This was a precedent, but it failed, partly because it did not propose major constitutional change. In June, the "Great Coalition" involving Brown, Cartier, John A. Macdonald, and Alexander Tilloch Galt* was formed, dedicated to seek release from the impasse "by introducing the federal principle into Canada" and, if possible, by a linking of the Maritimes to the new system. Sandfield opposed federalism, which he considered a prodigal, divisive, and un-British system, one which would split "Central Canada" by cutting most of the upper St Lawrence off from its natural entrepôt in Montreal, but he did not necessarily disapprove of coalition or even British North American union. For the next three years he found himself on the side-lines leading a small disunited band of Upper Canadian Reformers, some of whom were Clear Grits, against union.

Sandfield expressed his viewpoint in the Canadian confederation debates in 1865. He was incensed by the haste with which a strange coalition, along with the British government and the Grand Trunk Railway, was demanding a major and indefinite constitutional rearrangement, even though the "disruption" of the union had not been an issue in the last election. The Canadian problem, he argued, was not really the present constitution but "demagogues and designing persons who sought to create strife between the sections." The assembly did nevertheless approve the Quebec resolutions by a double majority, and Sandfield and Dorion later failed in their attempt to secure referral of the Quebec or subsequent London scheme to the people through a general election. The expectant Canadian Fathers would brook no notions of popular sovereignty.

Sandfield was a realist and soon accepted confederation itself as inevitable. During the latter part of the 1866 session he concerned himself mainly with trying to nudge the proposed constitution of Ontario toward his line of thought. He fully accepted supervision of provincial legislation but opposed, as a violation of responsible government, the prohibition against provincial tampering with separate schools.

Where would he fit politically in the new scheme of things? Brown, his constructive work completed, had left the great coalition but John A. was determined to preserve it; without it, the Conservatives' extremely weak position in Ontario might prove his political undoing in the new dominion parliament. With Brown and most of the Grits in opposition denouncing continuing coalition, the two Macdonalds were drawn toward one another and had serious talks in mid-1867. Given Monck's enthusiastic approval, and counselled by John A. Macdonald's chief confidant in Toronto, Senator David Macpherson*, the provisional lieutenant governor of Ontario, Sir Henry William STISTED, asked Sandfield Macdonald to become the first premier of Ontario. His coalition government was sworn in on 15 and 20 July 1867; besides the premier, who became attorney general, the cabinet contained another Baldwinite, a coalition Grit, and two Conservatives.

The "royal choice" had now to be submitted to the verdict of the electorate. In Ontario this was a unique election: voting for federal and provincial candidates took place at the same time and the two first ministers, the two Macdonalds, "hunted in pairs," crossing and recrossing the province trying to work out compromises and deals so that Coalition Reformers and Conservatives would face only "factious" Grits. When the count for the Ontario legislature was in, it was clear that about 50 of 82 members, with more Conservatives than Reformers, were prepared to follow the "Patent Combination" led by the gaunt and sickly lawyer from Cornwall, himself elected to both parliaments.

With a great martial display, Sandfield had Ontario's first legislature opened on 27 Dec. 1867. The ensuing session went well and its greatest achievement was undoubtedly Stephen Richards*' homestead act. It was modelled on the American act of 1862 and provided for virtually free land for homesteaders on surveyed crown lands of Muskoka, Haliburton, and north Hastings. Another act encouraged the northern extension of railways into these "free land grant" areas, and during the next three years this policy of northern development was broadened, further liberalized, and extended to include growing concern for forestry and mining developments as well as for settlement.

Sandfield showed his predilection for the separation of church and state and for retrenchment by concentrating aid on the University of Toronto and cutting off the rather feeble denominational colleges, over Ryerson's and Sir John's objections, but with opposition approval. Sandfield later regained Ryerson's confidence by supporting his plan to reorganize the primary and secondary school systems: free schooling, compulsory attandance, standard teaching qualifications, more emphasis on science in the curriculum, and municipal financial support for both levels were all part of this proposal. The Liberal opposition, led by Edward Blake*, fought the bill, especially its compulsory and centralizing features, so vehemently that it was not passed until 1871. The same year enabling legislation was passed for the Ontario School of Agriculture, opened in 1874 (later the Ontario Agricultural College, now the University of Guelph), and a technical college (ultimately the Ryerson Polytechnical Institute).

Sandfield's other important legislation was the election act of 1868, which established "same day" elections throughout Ontario and considerably broadened the franchise, and in the field of social welfare institutions. His prison and asylum inspection act of 1868 and other subsequent measures gave his fighting inspector J. W. Langmuir* vastly increased powers to begin the long overdue task of prison and hospital inspection and reform. Large additions were begun on the Toronto Asylum for the Insane and an asylum was established in London. He also had constructed the Ontario Institution for the Deaf and Dumb in Belleville and the Ontario Institution for the Blind in Brantford.

Solid and substantial as these reforms were, they failed to capture the Ontario mind. Instead, Grit accusations that Sandfield was a kept man, vassal of the Canadian prime minister, gained more and more credence. There was little substance to the charge; surviving correspondence clearly shows this. Sir John's chief complaint was that Sandfield was too independent for his own good and for the proper operation of the new and, as Sir John vainly hoped, highly centralized system. In fact, Sandfield, like Sir John, really preferred United Kingdom–style legislative union but accepted the quasi-federalism of the British North America Act, which clearly seemed to provide for provincial subordination to the central government in Ottawa. Admitting this system, Sandfield was as much his own master as he dared, and he chafed when Sir John declined to consult him about senior Ontario appointments.

Despite disagreements, Sandfield and Sir John again "hunted in pairs" in 1868 and went to Nova Scotia to persuade Joseph Howe to accept confederation. Then, in the summer of 1869, the prime minister infuriated Sandfield by appointing his old enemy, Sir Francis Hincks, lately returned to Canada, as minister of finance and McDougall's replacement as Reform leader in the cabinet. To Sandfield, the old railway broker was neither a Reformer nor an honest man. Late in 1869 and early in 1870, Sandfield was involved in various schemes aimed at overthrowing Sir John and creating some new kind of combination, perhaps under himself or Cartier. At one point he even had discussions with Brown. Nothing came of these plots, and the Grits prepared instead to destroy Sandfield. They were assisted by the revival of anti-French feelings accompanying Louis Riel*'s adventures on the Red River, when Sandfield's identification with Sir John caused him to be included in accusations made against the latter.

Sandfield was vulnerable from the candid and rather crude way in which he used the patronage system, a system which he, like Baldwin, believed to be an essential aspect of responsible government. He did not regard the Ontario legislature as a sovereign parliament, moreover, and emphasized the role of the provincial cabinet. Though noted and abused for his personal parsimony, he had the legislature vote large, only vaguely appropriated amounts of money for governmental expenditure. When, in 1871, $1,500,000 from the huge provincial surplus was voted for purposes of aiding the northern extension of railways, the Grits had a popular issue although it has never been shown that any of the money was improperly expended.

The results of the spring election of 1871 were inconclusive. The Grits made the campaign for the defence of Ontario rights almost a holy crusade. Sandfield's efforts were seriously curtailed by his rapidly declining health. He had been suffering repeatedly from long "infernal colds" and had to spend most of the campaign in bed with rheumatic pains and high fever. Equally serious, Sir John, in Washington for the protracted negotiations which would lead to the Anglo-American treaty, was unable to pull the usual strings. But although the Grits swept most of the western peninsula with the exception of London they did not have a clear majority; a very ill Sandfield determined to carry on and meet the legislature even if he had "to be carried there in a blanket."

One of his own reforms proved his undoing. The Grits charged irregularities in the election of six Sandfield men but were themselves only charged for one. The Controverted Elections Act of 1871 took decisions on electoral irregularities out of partisan committees of the legislature to the courts; it also provided, unwisely, that while the matter was before the courts, the member whose election was being investigated could not take his seat. Under the stern provisions of the law, by-elections had also to be called, but they could only be called after parliament opened, which it finally did on 7 Dec. 1871.

With so many vacancies, Sandfield claimed that a non-confidence vote could not overthrow his government but Blake moved the motion nonetheless. He chose the issue of the railway appropriation, an astonishing motion because it really attacked the former legislature, not the cabinet. It carried by seven votes. Sandfield refused to resign, but the one Grit coalitionist in the cabinet, Edmund Burke Wood*, joined forces with Blake. The assembly was paralysed and the speaker, R. W. Scott, whom Sandfield had appointed in an attempt at mollification after the Sandfield Macdonald family had repeatedly clashed with him on social, economic, and political issues, appeared to act in support of Blake's position. All efforts at a compromise failed. Sandfield's support ebbed away and efforts to adjourn failed. On 19 February he announced the resignation of his government and Blake became premier in a cabinet which included Scott. Despite its fall from power, Sandfield's coalition, ironically, won all but one of the by-elections called.

Although Sandfield occasionally reappeared in the assembly, his health prevented him from acting as leader of the opposition, and this role was taken up by Matthew Crooks Cameron*. He also gave up law, which he had practised in partnership with John and Donald Ban MacLennan. He had concentrated on real estate law, and it had made him a wealthy man. He was, however, able to play the key role in securing the services of Thomas Charles Patteson* as editor of a new broadly financed daily, the Toronto Mail, to challenge the Globe and act as the Ontario spokesman for both the Ontario opposition and Sir John A.'s government.

Confined to bed in March 1872, Sandfield blithely wrote Patteson that he secretly believed that he had "a touch of the horse distemper." But in May doctors informed him that his heart was so "displaced and impaired" from previous illness that death was imminent; he took the news bravely and philosophically. On 1 June he died at Ivy Hall.

Throughout his career, John Sandfield Macdonald was enigmatic, and there is still no agreement among historians as to his stature. Usually a lighthearted and an affable man, he and his wife were famous for their gala entertaining. He could, however, when slighted or attacked, be vindictive and sustain a grudge. Although not a truly great man he did give Ontario four good years of service, efficiently establish the machinery of provincial government, and carefully and creatively begin the long process of reform and construction which the paralysis of pre-confederation politics had so long delayed. But Ontario was not really his focus; instead it was the old "central Canada," based on Montreal and expressed in the "bicultural" Province of Canada.

As premier of Canada, Sandfield had lowered the temperature of sectional, sectarian, and cultural conflict, though the specific constitutional details of his double majority were hardly realizable; he thus made the Great Coalition and confederation more attainable. His central concept of Canada as a land of two majorities has again now found increasing acceptance. Sandfield's opposition to the details of the Quebec scheme and to the procedures for implementing it might show some lack of realism or foresight but hardly, as has been claimed, a lack of vision. It was not union but the American kind of federalism which he opposed. On the other hand, as premier, he accepted the system established by John A. Macdonald and can therefore scarcely be accused of betraying Ontario because he did not endorse the new doctrine of provincial rights and coordinate federalism that the Grits were now successfully advancing.

As a political leader he was not able, as did George Brown or Sir John A. Macdonald, to secure a large body of geographically dispersed followers dedicated to him personally. He was essentially a central Canadian based in Cornwall, looking as much to Montreal as to Toronto, not the best of places from which to lead Upper Canadian Reform.

BRUCE W. HODGINS

[A complete list of the sources, primary and secondary, used in the preparation of this biography for the period up to March 1864 in given in the author's "The political career of John Sandfield Macdonald to the fall of his administration in March 1864: a study in Canadian politics," unpublished PHD thesis, Duke University, 1964. A selective bibliography appears in the author's John Sandfield Macdonald, 1812–1872 (Toronto, 1970). B.W.H.]

MTCL, Baldwin papers. PAC, MG 24, B30 (Macdonald-Langlois papers); B40 (Brown papers); MG 26, A (Macdonald papers); MG 27, II, D14 (Scott papers). Queen's University Archives, Alexander Mackenzie papers. Canada, Province of, Confederation debates; Legislative Assembly, Journals. Ontario, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1867–72. Globe (Toronto), 1844–72. Leader (Toronto), 1852–72. London Free Press, 1849–64. Mail (Toronto), 1872. Quebec Daily Mercury, 1862–64. "A letter on the Reform party, 1860: Sandfield Macdonald and the London Free Press," ed. B. W. Hodgins and E. H. Jonse, Ont. Hist., LVII (1965), 39–45.

Careless, Brown. Chapais, Histoire du Canada, VI–VIII. Cornell, Alignment of political groups. Dent, Last forty years. B. W. Hodgins, "Attitudes toward democracy during the pre-confederation decade," unpublished MA thesis, Queen's University (Kingston, Ont.), 1955. Morton, Critical years. Waite, Life and times of confederation. B. W. Hodgins, "Democracy and the Ontario fathers of confederation," Profiles of a province: studies in the history of Ontario (Ont. Hist. Soc. pub., Toronto, 1967), 83–91; "John Sandfield Macdonald and the crisis of 1863," CHA Report, 1965, 30–45.

MacDONELL, DONALD AENEAS, soldier, politician, and public servant; b. in Charlottenburg Township, U.C., 31 July 1794, son of Isabella McDonell and Miles Macdonell*, who came to Upper Canada from Schoharie County, N.Y., after the American Revolution and who was chosen by Lord Selkirk [Douglas*] to be the first governor of Assiniboia (1811–15); m. Mary McDonell, daughter of Archibald MacDonell of Leek, by whom he had several children; d. 11 March 1879, at Brockville, Ont.

Donald Aeneas MacDonell attended John Strachan*'s school at Cornwall. He then served during the War of 1812 in the British regular forces in Upper Canada. Commissioned an ensign in the 8th Regiment in 1813, he took part in the engagements at Stoney Creek, Lundy's Lane, Sackets Harbor, and York (Toronto). In 1815 he exchanged into the 98th Regiment as a lieutenant and served in England and in Nova Scotia. He was placed on half-pay in 1817 with the rank of lieutenant and returned to Stormont County, Upper Canada. He had also a long career in the militia, serving with the 1st Battalion of Stormont as an officer and ultimately (1846–50) as its commanding officer. During the uprising in Lower Canada in November 1838, he commanded the regiment on a special expedition to Beauharnois, where rebels had seized the manor house of the seigneury of Beauharnois and taken prisoner Edward Ellice Jr; when the force arrived, the rebels had already fled.

In 1834 MacDonell had been appointed a justice of the peace for the Eastern District (the counties of Stormont, Dundas, and Glengarry) and in the same year was elected to the House of Assembly of Upper Canada for Stormont as a Reformer. He was re-elected in Stormont in 1836 but was then defeated three times, in 1841, 1844, and 1847, in bids for a seat in the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada. In April 1848 he was appointed crown lands agent and sheriff of the Eastern District, but in November of the same year he became warden of the Provincial Penitentiary at Kingston, on the suspension of the then warden, Henry Smith*, as a result of the investigations of a committee of which George BROWN was secretary. In 1850 his position as warden was made permanent and he held this post until 1869. More humane (and economical) than Smith, he was personally popular with the staff and inspectors until increasing infirmity brought some complaints about his effectiveness toward the end of his career.

His last years were spent in Brockville, Ontario, in somewhat straitened circumstances and much of his time was devoted to an attempt to recover arrears in salary and a larger retiring gratuity to which he believed he was entitled.

J. K. JOHNSON

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 300/1, letterbooks 5–7; 276341–429; RG 5, C1, 512, nos.818, 820; RG 9, I, B5, 6; C4, 5; RG 68, 1. G.B., WO, A list of the officers of the Army and of the Corps of Royal Marines, 1813–17. Dom. ann. reg., 1879. L. H. Irving, Officers of the British forces in Canada during the war of 1812–15 (Welland, Ont., 1908). Cornell, Alignment of political groups.

MacDONNELL, ROBERT LEA, doctor, author, and professor; b. 1818 at Dublin, Ireland, son of Robert MacDonnell, a prominent Dublin doctor, and Margaret Lea; d. 31 Jan. 1878 at Montreal, Que.

Robert Lea MacDonnell was orphaned in infancy; he was entrusted, with his three sisters and his brother Richard, who later followed him to Canada, to the care of a paternal uncle, the Reverend George MacDonnell, rector of Trinity College, Dublin. Robert completed his elementary schooling in Scotland before registering, in 1835, at Trinity College, where he studied medicine. He passed the degree examinations in 1841 and was admitted to the Royal College of Surgeons of Ireland. The following year he married Margaret Croates, by whom he had three children. Shortly afterwards MacDonnell began to collaborate regularly in the editing of the Journal of Medical Science, published at Dublin, where he taught anatomy in a private school. In addition, he took part in the sessions of the Pathological Society of Dublin. He obtained another degree in 1844, from the King's and Queen's College of Physicians of Ireland.

During 1845 Dr MacDonnell took up residence at Montreal, after being nominated to the chair of medicine at McGill University. In the same year he was appointed secretary of the Montreal Medico-Chirurgical Society, and until 1847 collaborated in the editing of the British American Journal of Medical and Physical Science. In 1849 MacDonnell accepted the post of director of the Department of Clinical Medicine at McGill, while still retaining his positions as professor in the faculty and as practitioner attached to the Montreal General Hospital.

MacDonnell spent a few months at the University of Toronto in 1850, then returned to Montreal. He worked as a surgeon at St Patrick's Hospital, and in 1851 founded the St Lawrence School of Medicine. The following year the school went out of existence, and MacDonnell started the Canada Medical Journal . . ., a periodical which replaced the British American Journal but ceased to appear in February 1853. At this period Dr MacDonnell enjoyed an enviable reputation in the field of gynaecology.

In 1866, following the cholera epidemic that swept through Europe, the Canadian government created a board of health and entrusted the presidency of it to Dr MacDonnell. Robert Lea MacDonnell died on 31 Jan. 1878 of injuries received two days earlier in a road accident, on his way back from the funeral of his confrère Hector PELTIER.

JEAN-PIERRE CHALIFOUX

British American Journal of Medical and Physical Science (Montreal), 1845–47. Canada Medical and Surgical Journal (Montreal), VI (1878), 382, 422–27. Canada Medical Journal and Monthly Record (Montreal), 1 March 1852 – Feb. 1853. Abbott, History of medicine, 56, 67–69. J. J. Heagerty, Four centuries of medical history in Canada and a sketch of the medical history of Newfoundland (2v., Toronto, 1928), II, 71, 119–20. Some historical and personal notes on the Tynekill branch of the MacDonnell family (Dublin, 1892), 33–34 (copy in the Osler Library, McGill University).

McDOUGALL, GEORGE MILLWARD, Methodist clergyman and missionary, b. 9 Sept. 1821 at Kingston, U.C.; d. 25 Jan. 1876 near Fort Calgary.

George Millward McDougall's parents were Highland Scots. His father was stationed in Kingston as a non-commissioned officer in the Royal Navy during the War of 1812, and he himself, when a youth, served during the rebellion of 1837 in a militia unit, the Royal Foresters. Later he migrated with his parents to a farm near Barrie, Upper Canada. Though his elementary education was slight, he early learned the many pioneer skills needed in his future mission in the far west. On 10 Jan. 1842 he married Elizabeth Chantler, an English-born woman of Quaker parents. They had eight children, including John Chantler*, who became his father's assistant in missionary work, and David, a trader and rancher supplying the missions.

After religious conversion in meetings held by a Methodist lay preacher, Peter White, McDougall became a lay preacher also and offered himself for the ministry. He attended Victoria College, Cobourg, C.W., during the winter term of 1849–50, and then went to Alderville where he became assistant "on trial" to the veteran educator of Indians, the Reverend William Case*. McDougall's early service as missionary was at Garden River and at Rama, near Orillia. He was ordained by the Methodist conference at Belleville, C.W., in June 1854.

In 1860 McDougall was appointed to the Rossville mission, near Norway House, HBC territory, and made chairman of the Methodist district extending from Oxford House and Rainy Lake (Lac La Pluie) to the Rocky Mountains. After visits to the missions in the Norway House area, he undertook an exploratory trip into the Saskatchewan valley in 1862. He conferred with fellow missionaries and with the Crees, and promised to become resident there the following year. In 1863 he and his family did indeed travel in HBC York boats up the Saskatchewan River, perhaps the first family in the vanguard of Ontario pioneers who settled in Alberta in the 1860s.

McDougall established a mission, Victoria (Pakan), on the North Saskatchewan River about 80 miles east of Edmonton House. His immediate task was to reinforce the religious work begun by the English Wesleyan missionary Robert Terrill Rundle* in 1840–48 and being continued by Henry Bird Steinhauer* and Thomas Woolsey, and to demonstrate to the Indians a way of life based on settlement and agriculture. On a fertile river bench, McDougall constructed the mission as the nucleus of a model pioneer settlement. Soon Indians and Métis (some of the latter from the Red River Settlement) took river lots on either side of the mission. With meagre equipment, seed grain and garden seeds were sown and agriculture taught, and homes and auxiliary buildings, a school and a church, were constructed. McDougall made numerous missionary journeys to his nomadic people in remote areas.

His son John was pressed into service to reopen a mission which they named Woodville, at the northwest end of Pigeon Lake. This mission was on an overland trail midway between Edmonton and Rocky Mountain Houses, accessible to both Stoney and Blackfoot tribes from the south.

The period from the transfer of the HBC territory in 1869 to the acquisition of the land by treaties with the Indians and the entry of the North-West Mounted Police in 1874, was one of distress and uncertainty in the North West. The buffalo migrated beyond the usual hunting ranges, crops failed, and game animals were visibly diminishing. The long-established authority of the HBC was set aside for a civil government previously unknown. The North-West Rebellion of 1869–70 made the procurement of food, goods, and mail service difficult for the missionaries. Then followed the smallpox epidemic of 1870. McDougall did his best with the remedies and medical knowledge he had. All his household were affected except his wife, and three of his daughters died. McDougall was appointed to a board of health, which reported that 3,512 persons died in the epidemic, approximately one-third of the native population. About this time McDougall built at the Victoria mission possibly the earliest hospital in present-day Alberta.

McDougall's administrative duties had been made lighter in 1868, when a Red River District was established to the east, centring in Upper Fort Garry (Winnipeg), with its own chairman, the Reverend George Young*. McDougall's western area was named the Saskatchewan District, and more missionaries were found to expand the work. Financial support then and later was largely supplied by the Missionary Society of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada.

Because of the growing importance of Edmonton House as a transportation and trading centre, McDougall moved there to establish a permanent mission in 1871. He no doubt wished this mission to be a counterfoil to those of the Roman Catholics, by then well established at Lake Ste Anne and at St Albert under Father Albert Lacombe*, and at Edmonton with a church within the palisade. In 1873, authorized to begin a mission among the Blackfeet, McDougall and his son John located a site in the valley of the Bow River (Morley). This mission would be protected by the Mountain Stonies and within easy reach of the Blackfoot tribes on the prairies. Since the time of Rundle, the Stonies had remained staunch allies of the Wesleyans. The Blackfeet were the most intractable of the western tribes, and little missionary work had been done among them except when they had come to trade at the northern posts. McDougall appointed John to Morley as missionary in late October 1873, and his brother David went with him.

McDougall was involved in two pressing social problems, the illegal liquor traffic among the Indians [see ONISTAH-SOKAKSIN] and the demands of the Indian tribes for treaties with the Canadian government [see WIKASKOKISEYIN]. Feeling compassion for the many Indians, especially widows and orphans, made destitute by unrestrained tribal warfare, debauchery, and violence, often traceable to the rapacity of free traders, McDougall led the Indians to request the total prohibition of the sale of liquor in the territory. He voluntarily supported the new dominion government in persuading the native peoples to remain at peace and not to join the rebellious elements led by Louis Riel* in the Red River area. He was a "middleman" in communicating to the Indians the government's intention to treat with them fairly; he also encouraged the Indians to address their own petitions to the government urging that their rights be settled by formal treaty.

When McDougall returned from furlough in 1875, he was requested by Alexander Morris*, lieutenant governor of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, to assure the western Indians that commissioners would be sent to negotiate treaties. McDougall undertook to visit every Indian camp from Carlton House (near present-day Prince Albert) west to the Rocky Mountains bearing this message and listening to the Indians' addresses and requests. He carried this exacting assignment out satisfactorily, preparing the Indians for Treaties No. 6 and 7.

As the earliest Wesleyan clergyman to settle permanently on the prairies, McDougall advanced the cause of the Protestant church beyond the itinerancy of his predecessors. A man of his times, he was strongly sectarian in his church loyalties, but worked without stint to "christianize and civilize" his charges. His promotion of elementary education, agriculture, and health was outstanding, for the period and for the west. At his death he was planning a new mission station and an Indian orphanage on the Playground River (Oldman River). A strong stabilizing influence among the Indians and Métis, he was also a believer in confederation as a solution of the British North American problem and essentially nationalist in his sympathies. He warned church and state against separatist tendencies which he felt were supported by the Roman Catholic clergy, or which might be caused by the encroachments of the American free traders.

McDougall died of exertion while hunting buffalo. His body was found after a search and was buried in the Wesley Band cemetery (on the property of McDougall Memorial Church), near Morley. "Few men have passed away more deeply regretted by the Indian or white man, than this large hearted, courageous, laborious, and self-denying minister of Christ."

JAMES ERNEST NIX

Alberta Provincial Library, Journal of John Chantler McDougall, 1875–76. J. C. McDougall, George Millward McDougall, the pioneer, patriot and missionary (1st ed., Toronto, 1888; 2nd ed., 1902). Methodist Church of Canada, Missionary Society, Annual Report, 1875–76. Missionary notices of the Methodist Church of Canada (Toronto), 3rd ser., III (1875–78). Morris, Treaties of Canada with Indians, 168–276. Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada, in connexion with the English conference, Missionary Society, Annual Reports (Toronto), 1865–74. Wesleyan Missionary Society notices, Canada conference (Toronto), I (1854–59); new ser., II (1868–74). John Maclean, Vanguards of Canada (Toronto, 1918), 119–38. J. E. Nix, Mission among the buffalo; the labours of the Reverends George M. and John C. McDougall in the Canadian Northwest, 1860–1876 (Toronto, [1960]).

McEACHEN, EMANUEL, farmer and politician; b. in 1816 or 1817 at South Lake, P.E.I.; d. a bachelor, on 5 Nov. 1875, in Charlottetown, P.E.I.

Emanuel McEachen, an only son, was born four months after the death of his father, a farmer. He eventually became head of his family, taking possession of more than 100 acres of the farm and supporting his mother and sisters. Well known in his district, McEachen entered politics in 1853 when he was elected to the House of Assembly for Kings County First District. He was appointed to the Tory Executive Council, but, after one tempestuous session during which he became a centre of controversy and struck a Liberal assemblyman, William McGill, in an anteroom of the house, McEachen decided not to contest the election of 1854. He ran again in 1858 and 1863, but without success. A Roman Catholic of Scottish descent, McEachen had remained a Tory at a time when religious issues dominated Island politics and induced most Tory Catholics to join the Liberals. In the 1863 election he was the only Catholic Tory running and was defeated by a margin of more than two-to-one in his constituency – the most Catholic on the Island.

In 1866, when religious passions had subsided, McEachen won a by-election against Benjamin Davies*, a Protestant Liberal. However, he was defeated in the general election the following year, and remained out of public life until 1870, when he was once again elected, and was named to the Executive Council of Premier James Colledge Pope*. Pope's government was swept out of office in 1872, and McEachen lost his seat to William Wilfred Sullivan*, then a Liberal. But the following year McEachen returned to the assembly and the new Tory government appointed him commissioner of public lands, a position he held until his death. In this period he forcefully advocated a system of publicly supported separate schools, declaring in the assembly that "it is better that Mormonism be taught to children, than no religion at all." McEachen, no friend of Mormonism, was emphasizing the faults of the existing system, which he accused of instructing the young in "the mysteries of heathen mythology."

As a politician, Emanuel McEachen was primarily distinguished by unswerving loyalty to his party when almost all his fellow Catholics had abandoned it. Known for vehemence in debate, he was generally considered to be a man who, while hot-tempered, bore few grudges.

Ian Ross Robertson

Prince Edward Island, Supreme Court, Estates Division, will of Emanuel McEachen, 22 Oct. 1875. Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Debates, 1866, 75, 105; 1871, 39; 1873, 31–32, 110; 1874, 291, 296, 448–50, 468–69, 494–95, 513–14; 1875, 173–74, 192–93, 196, 208, 312, 320, 322, 358. Examiner (Charlottetown), 26 Jan. 1863; 8 Jan., 5, 12, 19, 26 Feb. 1866; 27 Sept., 4, 18 Oct., 8 Nov. 1875. Island Argus (Charlottetown), 26 Oct., 9, 16 Nov. 1875. Islander (Charlottetown), 18 Jan. 1867. Bolger, PEI and confederation, 140. Robertson, "Religion, politics, and education in PEI."

McKAY, JAMES, fur-trader, guide, and politician; b. 1828 at Edmonton House, North-West Territories (present-day Alberta), son of the fur-trader James McKay; d. at St James, Man., 2 Dec. 1879.

James McKay was educated at Red River. In the employ of the Hudson's Bay Company, 1853–60, he advanced rapidly, serving as clerk and postmaster, principally in the Swan River district, and establishing posts on the Sheyenne and Buffalo rivers in American territory in 1859. His facility in Indian languages, which he may have acquired through his mother who was either Métis or Indian, and his thorough knowledge of the prairies combined to make him a notable guide whose services were sought by distinguished travellers. He was responsible for meeting Sir George Simpson* on several of the trips made by the HBC governor from eastern Canada via the Mississippi en route to Upper Fort Garry (Winnipeg). "Jeemie McKay was proud of the fact that, always on the tenth day of their start from Crow Wing [Minn.] at the stroke of noon from the Fort Garry bell, he landed Sir George at the steps of the Chief Factor's House. Relays of horses enabled him to do this, rain or shine; and the slightest stoppage in muskeg or stream found McKay wading in to bring Sir George on his broad shoulders to dry land." In 1857 McKay guided the British expedition headed by Captain John Palliser* [see Bourgeaux] from Fort Ellice (St Lazare, Man.) through the Saskatchewan plains to its winter quarters at Fort Carlton (Sask.). In 1859 when the Earl of Southesk [Carnegie*], on a western hunting trip, was in Simpson's party from Crow Wing to Upper Fort Garry, he described McKay: "Immensely broad-chested and muscular, though not tall, he weighed eighteen stone; yet in spite of his stoutness he was exceedingly hardy and active, and a wonderful horseman. His face – somewhat Assyrian in type – is very handsome: short, delicate, aquiline nose; piercing dark grey eyes; long dark-brown hair, beard, and moustaches; white, small, regular teeth; skin tanned to red bronze from exposure to weather. He was dressed in Red River style – a blue cloth 'capot' (hooded frock-coat) with brass buttons; red-and-black flannel shirt, which served also for waistcoat; black belt round the waist; buff leather moccasins on his feet; trowsers of brown and white striped home-made woollen stuff."

McKay left the service of the HBC – Simpson tried unsuccessfully to keep him – to engage on his own account in trading, freighting, mail transportation, and supervision of road construction. He had married Margaret Rowand in June 1859 and established a fine home at Deer Lodge. A son died in infancy; McKay had informally adopted a girl named Augusta whose parents had been killed by Sioux and who lived with the Grey Nuns.

McKay was appointed a member of the Council of Assiniboia in 1868, and president of the Whitehorse Plains District Court. When disturbances broke out in the Red River Settlement in 1869–70, McKay was prepared to accept the plans of the Canadian government for administration of the newly acquired territory, but he would not actively oppose his Métis friends and withdrew for a time to the United States. Subsequently, he averted a visit to the settlement by an armed band of Sioux Indians which might have provoked hostilities in the delicate situation. He was named one of the English councillors in the provisional government.

When, after the formation of the province of Manitoba, Lieutenant Governor Adams George Archibald* appointed his first council, on 10 Jan. 1871, he included McKay. McKay's addition to the two French and two English representatives, wrote Archibald, "would in no way disturb the delicate balance since his father was Scotch, his mother French Half-breed and though he himself [is] a Catholic he has two brothers Presbyterians." McKay occupied several important positions in the government of Manitoba until he was forced by ill health to retire in 1878. He was president of the Executive Council, 1871–74. He was a member of the Manitoba Legislative Council throughout its existence, 1871–76, and its speaker until 1874.

McKay was minister of agriculture in the Robert Atkinson Davis* government, 1874–78. The programme of the Bureau of Agriculture and Statistics over which he presided was confined, as were those of other departments of the Manitoba government of that period, by inadequate funds. However, the bureau did undertake the compilation of information for the advancement of agriculture and the encouragement of immigration, and supported the establishment of agricultural societies. McKay represented Lake Manitoba in the Legislative Assembly, 1877–78. Throughout his political performance, he was described by a contemporary as "cautious, of excellent judgment in some instances; but had implicit faith in the advice of the clergy and [was] not likely to oppose the views of the Archbishop [Alexandre-Antonin Taché*]. I must say in fairness he considered those opposed to him, and was at all times willing to discuss public questions with his opponent, with a degree of justice, and at times wonderful adroitness."

From 1873 to 1875 McKay had also been a member of the Council of the North-West Territories in which he concerned himself with problems affecting the native population, including the regulation of the buffalo hunt and the control of the liquor traffic. It was in the settlement of Indian claims that McKay made his most significant public contribution. He had assisted in the negotiation of Indian Treaties No 1 (Lower Fort Garry) and No 2 (Manitoba Post on Lake Manitoba) in 1871, and No 3 (North West Angle of Lake of the Woods) in 1873. He was one of the commissioners for Treaty No 5 (Winnipeg) in 1875 and for Treaty No 6, concluded at Forts Carlton and Pitt (near present-day Lloydminster) in 1876. As Alexander Morris*, lieutenant governor of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, pointed out, McKay on these occasions "had the opportunity of meeting with them [the Indians] constantly, and learning their views which his familiarity with the Indian dialects enabled him to do." He was both negotiator and interpreter. At Fort Carlton, in 1876, he said to the Indians: "I hope you will not leave until you have thoroughly understood the meaning of every word that comes from us. We have not come here to deceive you, we have not come here to rob you, we have not come here to take away anything that belongs to you, and we are not here to make peace as we would to hostile Indians, because you are the children of the Great Queen as we are, and there has never been anything but peace between us." Morris' observation that this "remarkable man, the son of an Orkneyman by an Indian mother . . . possessed large influence over the Indian tribes, which he always used for the benefit and the advantage of the government" must be coupled with other statements attesting to his generosity in treating with the Indians. He was associated with his fellow commissioners in Treaty No 6 in according additional benefits to the Indians, including provision for medical supplies and for assistance in times of epidemic and general famine, and during the initial period of establishment on reserves.

James McKay died at his estate in the parish of St James. "His career spanned the transition from a way of life based on the nomadic buffalo hunt and fur trade to one based on agriculture and settlement."

Allan R. Turner

Archives des soeurs grises (Saint-Boniface, Man.), Chroniques de la Rivière-Rouge, 10 avril 1863, 10 août 1866; Registre des orphelines, 1846–1904, p.11, no.63. PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), correspondence with Adams George Archibald, 1870–72, and Alexander Morris, 1872–73 (copies in SAB). PAM, Alexander Morris, Lieutenant-Governor's collection, correspondence and papers, 1872–77; Alexander Morris, Ketcheson collection, 1869–77 (copies in SAB). SAB, Saskatchewan Historical Society, 37. Canada, Sessional papers, III (1870), PT.5, no.12, 93–95. Canadian North-West (Oliver), I, 71, 85, 125–26; II, 1011–75. Morris, Treaties of Canada with Indians, 195. Palliser papers (Spry). Southesk, Earl of [James Carnegie], Saskatchewan and the Rocky Mountains: a diary and narrative of travel, sport, and adventure, during a journey through the Hudson's bay company's territories, in 1859 and 1860 (Edinburgh, 1875). Manitoba, Statutes, 1873–78. Manitoba Free Press (Winnipeg), 3 Dec. 1879. Can. parl. comp., 1874, 481, 483; 1875; 1877, 363, 371.

Donnelly, Government of Manitoba, 3–25. Margaret

McWilliams, Manitoba milestones (Toronto and London, [1928]), 106–12. Morton, Manitoba, a history. J. H. O'Donnell, Manitoba as I saw it from 1869 to date, with flash-lights on the first Riel Rebellion (Winnipeg and Toronto, 1909), 53–54. I. M. Spry, The Palliser expedition; an account of John Palliser's British North America expedition 1857–1860 (Toronto, 1963). L. H. Thomas, The struggle for responsible government in the North-West Territories, 1870–1897 (Toronto, 1956), 56, 64, 83. F. A. Milligan, "The establishment of Manitoba's first provincial government," HSSM, Papers, 3rd ser., no.5 (1948–49), 5–18. R. T. F. Thompson, "Deer Lodge through the century," HSSM, Papers, 3rd ser., no.22 (1965–66), 95–98

McKAY, JOHN RICHARDS, HBC employee; b. Rupert's Land, probably 10 Aug. 1792, eldest child of John McKay and Mary Favell; m. first Harriet Ballenden by whom he had seven sons and five daughters, second Catherine White by whom he had one son and two daughters; buried at St Clements Church, Mapleton, Man., 11 Dec. 1877.

John Richards McKay was sent to England to be educated and returned to Albany Factory in 1808 as a writer for the Hudson's Bay Company. Later he joined his father at Brandon House and was with him at the time of his death in 1810. During the next 14 years he served at various HBC posts. After the North West Company destroyed Qu'Appelle House in 1815 McKay was sent to rebuild it, but met with such strong opposition from the Nor'Westers' neighbouring post, under Alexander Macdonell*, that his senior officer, James Sutherland*, came to his assistance. At the time of the coalition of the HBC and the North West Company he was in charge at Brandon House.

In 1824 he retired to the Red River Settlement, but after the failure of several enterprises ending with an academy to teach "writing, arithmetic, reading, English French dancing fencing and the Graces," McKay joined the American traders on the Missouri River in 1830. The next year found him back with the HBC. In 1833 he was placed in charge of Fort Ellice (St Lazare, Man.), where his popularity with the Indians enabled him to extend the trade of that post. After another retirement in 1844 he again served the company at various posts from 1846 until his final retirement in 1859.

McKay was "very active and much beloved by the Indians" whom he understood and liked, and who admired his unusual skills as a horseman, swordsman, and marksman. He treated them justly and generously, sometimes to the annoyance of his superiors who considered him an extravagant trader.

T. R. McCloy

PAC, MG 19, E1 (Selkirk papers), 6, pp.1946–59; 62, pp.16500–51. PAM, Church of England registers, St Clements Church (Mapleton), burials, 1862–91. Somerset House, London, Heathfield 147, will of John McKay. Isaac Cowie, The company of adventurers: a narrative of seven years in the service of the Hudson's Bay Company during 1867–1874 on the great buffalo plains (Toronto, 1913), 173, 180–81, 185. Hargrave correspondence (Glazebrook), 40, 61. HBRS, III (Fleming), 54, 446–47. M. A. MacLeod and W. L. Morton, Cuthbert Grant of Grantown, warden of the plains of Red River (Toronto, 1963), 11, 19, 32, 35, 38, 79, 81. Morton, History of the Canadian west, 437, 548, 573. W. B. Cameron, "Clan McKay in the west," Beaver, outfit 275 (Sept. 1944), 3–7.

McKEAGNEY, JAMES CHARLES, lawyer, politician, and judge; b. in 1815 in County Tyrone, Ireland; d. 14 Sept. 1879 in St Andrews, N.B.

James Charles McKeagney's family migrated to Nova Scotia in 1822, and he was educated in Baddeck, Cape Breton Island, and at McQueen's Academy in Halifax. On 20 Oct. 1842 he married Eliza Henry of Antigonish. Six years after her death in 1851, he married Eliza Hearne of Sydney.

McKeagney was called to the bar of Nova Scotia in October 1838 and appointed a QC in 1866. He was elected to the assembly for Richmond County in 1840 as a Reformer but was unseated on a technicality. In 1843 he successfully ran in Inverness County; McKeagney, however, was a non-resident and this fact was used by Peter Smyth, also a Reformer, to defeat him in the election of 10 Aug. 1847. Elected in Sydney Township in a by-election in 1848, he served in 1851 as minister without portfolio in the Liberal government until his defeat six months after his appointment. Re-elected in 1855, he was one of the Roman Catholics who helped bring the Conservatives to power when he crossed the floor in 1857 [see Joseph Howe and James W. Johnston]. In December 1857 McKeagney was appointed to the new position of inspector of mines and minerals, his principal duty being to carry out the terms of an agreement with the General Mining Association concerning the mineral resources of the province. In 1859 he declared that his heavy duties precluded his running for election again, but comments from the Antigonish Casket, which supported him, indicated that he was unhappy over not receiving a promotion.

In 1867 McKeagney was elected to the federal parliament for Cape Breton County as an anti-confederate, though prior to the election he had promised the bishop of Arichat, Colin Francis MacKinnon, to accept confederation. However, in 1868 he was forced by opposition within his own county to support the agitation for repeal of union, although he assured John A. Macdonald* that, in a crisis, he would vote with the government. His tactics were unsuccessful and he was defeated in the general election in 1872.

Privately, however, McKeagney had been promised a judicial appointment in Manitoba by Charles Tupper* if he contested the election, thereby splitting the Nova Scotia Catholic vote. Macdonald was afraid that McKeagney was too old but Thomas Louis CONNOLLY, archbishop of Halifax, strongly supported the appointment. McKeagney, apart from his experience as a lawyer, had gained some judicial training as judge of probate for Cape Breton from 1848 until 1867 and also as a surrogate in the Court of Vice-Admiralty. He was appointed as a puisne judge of the Queen's Bench of Manitoba on 7 Oct. 1872. During his tenure, he served as administrator of Manitoba from 10 Jan. 1873 until 7 Sept. 1874. He was again administrator on 28 Feb. 1876, becoming acting lieutenant governor of Manitoba and the North-West Territories on 25 Aug. 1876. From 1873 until 1875 McKeagney also investigated claims arising from the uprising led by Louis Riel*. The most dramatic cases heard by McKeagney were the trials of Ambroise-Dydime Lépine* [see BÉTOURNAY] and of André Nault* in 1874 for the murder of Thomas Scott*; the trial of Nault ended in a split jury.

McKeagney's political career in Nova Scotia, often influenced by his defence of the Roman Catholic church, suggests that, though the religious issue disrupted party organization, it did not force a man to change his political principles. McKeagney's now faint reputation in Manitoba would indicate that he was barely competent either as a lawyer or as a judge during that phase of his career.

K. G. PRYKE

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), pp.47030–40, 47069–72, 47124–26, 47357–58, 47401–3, 157564–67; letter books, 12, 20. The Canadian legal directory: a guide to the bar and bench of the dominion of Canada, ed. H. J. Morgan (Toronto, 1878), 238–39. Directory of N.S. MLAs (Fergusson), 223–24. D. G. Whidden, The history of the town of Antigonish (Wolfville, N.S., 1934), 101–3. F. J. Wilson, "The most reverend Thomas L. Connolly, archbishop of Halifax," CCHA Report, 1943–44, 55–108.

McKENZIE, GEORGE ROGERS, shipbuilder, sea captain, and politician; b. at Halifax, N.S., 12 Dec. 1798, son of John McKenzie and Elizabeth Grant; m. Sarah McGregor, daughter of Dr James McGregor*; they had two daughters; d. at New Glasgow, N.S., 12 March 1876.

Captain George Rogers McKenzie was a prominent shipbuilder in Pictou County, Nova Scotia. He started in a small way in 1821 at Boat Harbour, N.S., with a 45-ton schooner, named James William in honour of his nephew James William Carmichael*. Later he moved his yards to New Glasgow where he began to build much larger vessels, notably the 1,444-ton Hamilton Campbell Kidston and the 1,465-ton Magna Charta. Initially, his brother-in-law, the New Glasgow merchant James Carmichael, helped provide the capital required for McKenzie's shipbuilding and shared in the profits when the ships were sold. George McKenzie was known as the "father of shipbuilding" in Pictou County for he led the way in constructing vessels of a superior class which he owned and usually sailed himself. His business flourished during the 1850s and 1860s when wooden vessels from the Maritimes were needed for the timber trade to Great Britain, for the coal trade from Pictou to the United States, and for supplying the British and American armies during the Crimean War and the American Civil War.

An energetic and courageous man, Captain McKenzie divided his time between shipbuilding and seafaring; he was noted as the instructor of many skilful captains who sailed Nova Scotian ships on the seven seas. When the Hamilton Campbell Kidston made a voyage to Glasgow in the spring of 1852, Captain McKenzie sailed the ship up the narrow Clyde to the city. The arrival of this large vessel caused a sensation among Glasgow merchants who marked the event on 14 April 1852 with a presentation to the captain of a silver tea and coffee service.

McKenzie soon gained the attention of Joseph HOWE, who referred to his prowess as a shipbuilder in a speech on "The organization of the empire" delivered in the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia on 21 Feb. 1854. The following year McKenzie followed Howe into politics and was elected to the assembly as a Reform member for Pictou County. Although the two men shared the same political outlook, McKenzie was content to remain on the sideline in debate, but served on committees for trade and navigation. Despite the fact that he had decided views on many controversial issues, he won the respect and friendship of his political opponents. He was re-elected to the assembly in 1859 and represented Pictou County Eastern Division until 1863 when he retired from politics. McKenzie died 13 years later leaving an estate of $34,864 in property, notes, and shares in two ships.

WILLIAM B. HAMILTON

[Joseph Howe], Speeches and letters (Chisholm), II, 274–75. J. P. MacPhie, Pictonians at home and abroad

(Boston, 1914). G. G. Patterson, A history of the county of Pictou, N.S. (Montreal, Pictou, N.S., Halifax, Saint John, N.B., and Toronto, 1877). J. H. Sinclair, Capt. George McKenzie: an appreciation (n.p., n.d., copy at Acadia University Library, Wolfville, N.S.). Wallace, Wooden ships and iron men.

MacKENZIE, JOHN GEORGE DELHOSTE (he signed MacKenzie; Mackenzie and McKenzie are also frequently used), Church of England clergyman and educator; b. 22 April 1822, at St Ann's Garrison, Bridgetown, Barbados, son of Captain John MacKenzie, a Peninsular war veteran; d. 4 March 1873, at Stratford, Ont.

John George Delhoste MacKenzie came to Upper Canada in 1834 with his family, who settled near St Thomas. He attended schools in Trinidad, in England, and in Toronto (Upper Canada College). In 1839 he was tutor to the family of the Reverend Alexander Neil BETHUNE at Cobourg and assisted Bethune in editing the Church. He entered the Diocesan Theological Institution at Cobourg, was ordained deacon in 1845 and priest in 1846, received his BA from King's College, Toronto, in 1849, and in 1853 was granted the first MA degree conferred by Trinity College in Toronto. From 1845 to 1856 he was incumbent of St Paul's Church, Yorkville, and at the same time he was headmaster of St Paul's Grammar School. He laboured in the parish of Georgetown and Norval, 1856–1859, and then removed to Hamilton where he took charge of a school attached to Christ's Church.

John G. D. MacKenzie made solid contributions both to the church and to education. As a parish priest he gained the warm approval of Bishop A. N. Bethune, his lifelong friend, and of the congregations among whom he laboured. As a teacher he tried, in his two private schools, to incorporate religious with secular instruction at the secondary level. He was appointed inspector of grammar schools for Ontario in 1868. In this position, which he retained until his death, he earned praise from the Council of Public Instruction for his impartiality, faithfulness, and efficiency.

During his connection with the Church, MacKenzie wrote several sketches, one of which, "Paul of Samosata: a tale of the ancient Syrian church," appearing in the newspaper in 1844, combined elements of history and imagination. Two funeral sermons delivered in Toronto were printed in 1852, and selections from other sermons were published posthumously in 1882 with a memoir written by Bishop Bethune and an appendix composed of extracts from MacKenzie's reports to the provincial education department from 1868 to 1871. The sermons are scriptural expositions of a high order; the reports illustrate his ideals in educational matters and his accurate observation of the schools which it was his duty to visit. Both sermons and reports are written in a lucid, polished English reflecting his classical training.

MacKenzie married in 1846 Catherine Eliza, eldest daughter of Marcus Crombie, headmaster of the Toronto grammar school, and they had several children.

T. R. MILLMAN

PAO, John Strachan letter books; John Strachan papers. J. G. D. MacKenzie, A sermon, on the occasion of the death of Clarence Yonge Wells, preached October 20th, 1850, at St Paul's Church, Toronto (Weymouth, Ont., 1852); [ ], Selection from sermons of the late Rev. J. G. D. Mackenzie . . . with memoir (Toronto, 1882). J. of education for Ont., XXVI (1873), 58–59. Synod of the Church of England, Diocese of Toronto, Journal, 1876. Church Herald (Toronto), 13 March 1874. The roll of pupils of Upper Canada College, Toronto, January 1830, to June 1916, ed. A. H. Young (Kingston, Ont., 1917). Trinity University Review (Toronto), XV (1902), 85–86.

McKENZIE, KENNETH (in his youth he sometimes spelled his name Mackenzie), Puget's Sound Agricultural Company bailiff and agent on Vancouver Island, farmer, and provisions supplier; b. 25 Oct. 1811 in Edinburgh, Scotland, son of Dr Kenneth McKenzie, surgeon, and Janet Blair; d. at Lakehill Farm, Victoria, B.C., 10 April 1874.

Kenneth McKenzie spent his youth in Edinburgh where he attended the High School and College of Edinburgh. Probably in the late 1820s he moved to his father's estate of Rentonhall in the parish of Morham, Haddingtonshire, in the East Lothian District, where he managed the farms, sheep-runs, and a tile works. About 1841 he married Agnes Russell who bore him eight children, six before the family left Scotland.

In spite of his attested abilities in managing the estate, young McKenzie was unable to cope with the encumbrances left by his father. In 1848 he put the lands and estate up for auction, but a sale did not take place; and from 1848 to 1851 McKenzie applied unsuccessfully for positions as factor, bailiff, or land steward on estates in the British isles. Finally, in October 1851, he sold Rentonhall for £4,925, and, through his friendship with John Haldane*, was granted an interview by the Hudson's Bay Company. He was offered the position of bailiff or overseer on one of the four farms it projected under its subsidiary, the Puget's Sound Agricultural Company, in the Esquimalt district near Fort Victoria on Vancouver Island, and he spent the spring and summer of 1852 recruiting labourers, blacksmiths, carpenters, and a schoolteacher for the venture.

McKenzie's five-year contract with the Puget's Sound Agricultural Company is dated 16 Aug. 1852. It was to provide a farm of 600 acres, livestock, seed, and implements, and to pay for all improvements. McKenzie was to receive £60 per annum and after three years share 1/3 of the profit or loss. The company stipulated that the relationship was that of master and servant, but in effect it sought to establish a landed gentry or squirearchy surrounded by small landholders, a paternalistic form which proved incompatible with conditions on the frontier of empire.

McKenzie and his party of 73 persons arrived at Vancouver Island on 16 Jan. 1853, and were temporarily accommodated at Fort Victoria. After viewing Craigflower, the farm allotted to him at Maple Point between Esquimalt Harbour and the Gorge, McKenzie moved the carpenters and blacksmiths to the site on 24 January. By 1 April preparations were sufficiently advanced for his family to move to a temporary dwelling; a large manor house resembling Rentonhall was ready on 1 May 1856. During the spring and summer of 1853 McKenzie and his men built additional houses, planted gardens and fields, set up the seven horsepower engine brought from England to run a sawmill and grind grain, and began a lime kiln and a brick works. McKenzie's men proved to be fractious with frequent instances of drunkenness and desertion. To augment his labour force, he used men from HMS Trincomalee then at Esquimalt and he hired several groups of Indians, but these too proved unsteady hands. Evidently in an attempt to provide a measure of authority and justice on the four farms of the Puget's Sound Agricultural Company, on 31 March 1853 Governor James DOUGLAS appointed McKenzie and three others to be magistrates and justices of the peace in the District of Victoria.

On 3 Feb. 1854 the HBC appointed McKenzie agent and superintendent for the agricultural company on Vancouver Island with a commission of ten per cent on the net profits of the four farms in addition to his regular salary from Craigflower. Wage disputes and unauthorized salmon trading with the Indians along the Fraser River led to Douglas' intervention in 1855; on McKenzie's appeal to London the HBC instructed him to follow the governor's advice. The company also found it necessary to complain to McKenzie about inadequate accounts and excessive expenses. When McKenzie proposed mills and a brewery, the HBC governor, Andrew Colvile, reminded him that bailiffs should devote their efforts to raising crops and making the farms self-sufficient. Colvile added that McKenzie was to be prepared for a precise limitation on his expenditures.

McKenzie as company agent was instructed to deal with Edward Edwards Langford*, the luxury-loving, lavish, and intractable bailiff of Colwood Farm at Esquimalt. In 1854 McKenzie received orders to terminate Langford's contract, but Langford refused to give up quietly and McKenzie was chastised for not taking "more active and effective measures for the protection of their [the company's] property." The troubles with Langford put McKenzie in an embarrassing position between company officials and the bailiffs, and he was further discredited in the eyes of the company. In 1857 Alexander Grant Dallas* was sent to Fort Victoria, and one of his responsibilities was the administrative supervision of the farms.

In 1855 hospital huts were erected at Esquimalt to receive the wounded from the battle of Petropavlovsk, and thereafter ships of the Pacific Squadron increasingly used the harbour as a base, particularly during the San Juan Island dispute [see Douglas]. Craigflower Farm was ideally situated to supply the naval squadron, and in September 1856 McKenzie reported that he had provided nearly 1,000 pounds of meat and 400 pounds of vegetables per day. Despite HBC opposition, McKenzie erected mills at Craigflower to provide flour for the navy's bakers, who frequently used his ovens. Continuing to supply the Royal Navy with meat and vegetables, McKenzie undertook to supply bread and biscuit in 1858, and in 1860 he entered into a regular contract with the commander-in-chief of HM Pacific Squadron to supply 10,000 pounds of biscuit within 24 hours of demand and an unlimited quantity within 14 days. The navy's demand for bread was so great that it took all of the wheat McKenzie could supply from his own farms, and he was forced to import wheat from Oregon. Despite protests from local bakers in Victoria, McKenzie continued to hold the navy's bread contract until his death in 1874 except for a brief period in the mid-1860s. He installed an engine and biscuit machines at Dallas Bank on Esquimalt Harbour. He also sold breadstuffs to the HBC for its ships, and during the British Columbia gold rush he advertised breads and crackers for sale at San Francisco prices when a loaf of bread sometimes sold for as much as $3 in Victoria.

During this period, Craigflower became a social centre for naval and colonial officials, and the McKenzie girls were much courted by visiting officers. When Lady Jane Franklin [Jane GRIFFIN] visited Victoria in the spring of 1861 the season's most colourful social event was the picnic in her honour at Craigflower.

The farm at Craigflower was not large enough for both cropland and pasturage for the sheep from which McKenzie hoped to get a profitable wool clip. In 1855 he established a sheep station at Lakehill, near Christmas Hill, north of Victoria; and in 1856 and 1857 he acquired lands there in his own name along with 825 acres for the Puget's Sound Agricultural Company's new Lake District farm known as Broadmead.

Craigflower began to show small and intermittent profits after 1857, but the agricultural company remained concerned by McKenzie's "confused and incorrect" accounts. Despite the fact that Craigflower was its only profitable farm, it became increasingly critical of the capital debt charged against the operations. In 1861 McKenzie's second five-year contract as bailiff was cancelled and he was given a two-year lease (renewable on a year-to-year basis for a total of five years) on the cultivated acreage of the farm with the rent set at £500 per annum so long as he held the naval bread contract. If McKenzie lost the biscuit contract, the rent was to be halved. The livestock and implements of husbandry at Craigflower were to be sold, and McKenzie's Lakehill farm was used as security for his purchase of the stocks of flour, biscuit, growing crops, and equipment. At the termination of this contract, McKenzie was to leave Craigflower. In 1864, McKenzie, still beset by financial problems, was notified that his lease on Craigflower farm would terminate on 31 Oct. 1865; on that date he mortgaged his Lakehill and Dallas Bank properties to the company to secure his indebtedness to them of more than £3,000. He moved his family to Lakehill during 1866. Although the company was patient, the burdensome debt plagued him for the remainder of his life.

Kenneth McKenzie's position and experience led him to accept minor legal positions and to assume leadership in the agricultural community. He served as a justice of the peace from 1853 to 1855 and again from 1867 until his death. During the 1860s he was a road commissioner for the Esquimalt District and for Victoria, and in 1871 was appointed to the Court of Appeal for the Esquimalt and Metchosin Road District. In 1861 he was a founder of the Vancouver Island Agricultural and Horticultural Association, serving at various times as director and president. In 1865 McKenzie, considered to be a protectionist, was a candidate for the legislature, but he stepped aside in favour of John Ash*, a free trader. Again in 1869 he supported protection and opposed confederation with Canada in seconding the nomination of James Lowe as a candidate for the Legislative Council.

McKenzie died at his home of heart disease. Beset by the effects of overcapitalization in a developing economy, he nevertheless had done a great deal to encourage agriculture and milling on Vancouver Island as the colony moved from the limitations of the fur trade to become the entrepôt for the mining rush and the base for Britain's Pacific naval operations. So far as the company was concerned, its agricultural enterprise on Vancouver Island was a "mistake" conducted at "fearful expense," but families such as the McKenzies "did much good to the colony in the shape of keeping it at a high standard of civilization. . . ."

WILLIAM R. SAMPSON

PABC, Kenneth McKenzie papers (catalogued collection and unsorted uncatalogued collection); Robert Melrose, "Royal emigrant's almanack concerning five years servitude under the Hudson's Bay Company on Vancouver's Island" (copy of a diary, August 1852–July 1857, handbound). British Colonist (Victoria), 21, 22 March, 8 June, 5 Sept. 1861; 10 March 1862; 24 July 1863; 11 June 1864; 6 June, 12 July, 29 Sept., 2, 21 Oct. 1865; 6 June 1866; 3 May 1867; 19 March, 29 July, 21 Oct., 30 Nov. 1869; 5 Feb., 26 March 1871; 11, 15 April 1874; 8 April 1884; 15 June 1897. N. de B. Lugrin, The pioneer women of Vancouver Island, 1843–1866, ed. John Hoise (Victoria, 1928). S. G. Pettit, "The trials and tribulations of Edward Edwards Langford," BCHQ, XVII (1953), 5–40.

MacKINNON, COLIN FRANCIS, priest and educator; b. at Williams Point, a sparsely settled rural area adjacent to the town of Antigonish, N.S., 20 July 1810, son of John MacKinnon and Una (Eunice) MacLeod; d. at Antigonish, 26 Sept. 1879.

Colin Francis MacKinnon's family emigrated from Scotland in 1791 and first settled at Parrsboro, Nova Scotia. His parents later moved to Williams Point to live among other Roman Catholic Highland settlers. The lack of educational facilities in the immediate area forced MacKinnon's parents to place him, in 1824, under the tutelage of the Reverend William B. MacLeod, parish priest at Grand Narrows, and later under Malcolm MacLellan at East Bay, Cape Breton. Following his completion of preparatory classical studies the young student enrolled at Urban College in Rome on 22 Jan. 1829. He remained there until 26 June 1837 and qualified for both his PHD and DD. MacKinnon was ordained into the priesthood at the College of the Propaganda in Rome by Archbishop Luigi Fransoni on 4 June 1837.

Father Colin Francis MacKinnon returned to Nova Scotia that summer and was appointed first resident pastor at St Andrews, Sydney (now Antigonish) County. His pastorate extended from 3 Nov. 1837 to 11 May 1853. In the summer of 1838 he established the St Andrews grammar school, the first school of its kind in the area, and one which gained a respectable reputation through the distinctions won by its graduates. It was probably through his efforts in this venture that Father MacKinnon became convinced of the need for an institution of higher learning in eastern Nova Scotia.

On 11 Nov. 1851, the Reverend Colin MacKinnon was appointed bishop of Arichat, at that time the ecclesiastical centre of eastern Nova Scotia. He was consecrated by Bishop William Walsh* on 27 Feb. 1852 and lived at Arichat from 11 May 1853 until 21 July 1858. Recognizing the religious needs and educational aspirations of the Roman Catholic Highlanders of his diocese, Bishop MacKinnon founded a minor seminary, St Francis Xavier College, on 20 July 1853, his 43rd birthday. When it opened the college had a staff of four professors and a student population of 40; instruction was given in mathematics, Latin, Greek, theology, philosophy, English, French, and Christian doctrine. In 1855 the college was moved to Antigonish where it grew into St Francis Xavier University. In an effort to improve the educational opportunities for young women, Bishop MacKinnon brought the sisters of the Congregation of Notre-Dame to Arichat in 1856; their superior was Mother Sainte-Élisabeth (Marie-Louise Dorval*), a former superior-general of the congregation.

Bishop MacKinnon lived at Antigonish from 21 July 1858 until his death in 1879. During that period he carried out his episcopal and educational duties aided by the Reverend John Cameron, DD, whom he had appointed as the first rector of the college when it transferred to Antigonish. In 1860 MacKinnon was able to write that St Francis Xavier "bade fair to realize to religion and to society all the benefits anticipated at its foundation." The recognition of its success came in 1866 when the college was granted, without any difficulty, full university powers by an act of the provincial legislature. From the evidence available, it is apparent that MacKinnon did not become seriously involved in any political controversies of the day. He was quite successful in increasing the number of churches and priests in his diocese, and between 1866 and 1874 he was largely responsible for the building of St Ninian's Cathedral, the present seat of the diocese.

During his later years he was again assisted by the competent and aggressive Cameron, who had been appointed coadjutor bishop in 1870. Forced by ill health to retire from active charge in July 1877, MacKinnon was made titular archbishop of Amida on 7 September. He died on 26 Sept. 1879 and was buried in the vault of St Ninian's Cathedral. His work in the promotion of higher education in Nova Scotia stands as his greatest achievement.

R. A. MacLean

Ronald MacGillivray, Remember your prelates: a sermon, preached at the solemn requiem of Colin Francis MacKinnon, archbishop of Amydo, in St. Ninian's Cathedral, Antigonish, September 30, 1879 (Halifax, 1879), copy in PANS. Casket (Antigonish, N.S.), 27 June 1895; 17 June, 30 Sept., 25 Nov. 1943; 7, 14 July 1960. Catholic encyclopedia (1907–12), II, 563. St. Francis Xavier's University, 1853–1920 (Antigonish, N.S., 1920). A. A. Johnston, "Antigonish diocese priests and bishops, 1790–1825," typescript in possession of the author, Antigonish, N.S. Sister St Miriam of the Temple [Eileen Scott], "The Congregation of Notre Dame in early Nova Scotia," CCHA Report, 1953, 67–80.

McLACHLIN, DANIEL (Donhuil), lumber merchant and politician; b. 1810, near Pointe-Fortune, Vaudreuil County, L.C., son of Hugh McLachlin; m. Maria Harrington in 1837, by whom he had four sons and two daughters; d. 6 Feb. 1872, at Arnprior, Ont.

Daniel McLachlin, the son of a Highland Scot Presbyterian, entered the Ottawa timber trade. The first record of his activity is in November 1834 when he and his brother William signed a contract with the timber exporting firm headed by William Sharples to deliver a raft of white pine timber to Quebec by 1 July 1835. Daniel may have been in the trade for some time before this: William Sharples and Sons, a large and successful house, would have been unlikely to deal with inexperienced timbermen.

The McLachlin business operated originally from Pointe-Fortune, Lower Canada. However, in 1837 Daniel moved to Bytown (Ottawa), Upper Canada, already the entrepôt of the Ottawa River timber trade. No longer working with his brother, he obtained extensive limits in the next decade on the Ottawa River, and on the Madawaska and Indian rivers. Restless and ambitious, he constantly expanded his business into new areas. He was among the first to employ the power of the Chaudiere Falls at Bytown, erecting saw and grist mills there with three run of stones. He was also a general merchant with his brother Hugh. Their store in central Bytown remained open until 1855 when they dissolved their partnership.

McLachlin truly began to build an empire in 1851 when he bought 400 acres of land along the Madawaska River near its junction with the Ottawa. This was the site of the near-ghost village of Arnprior, in Renfrew County. Founded in 1831, the settlement and its excellent millsites had languished for over a decade until McLachlin's purchase. Setting up his timber business there, he reconstructed the mills, built bridges, and laid out and peopled a village. He took the lead in promoting public improvements which made Arnprior more accessible, such as the Madawaska River Improvement Association (later Company) and a wagon road from Arnprior to the Long Rapids on the Madawaska River. He moved to Arnprior himself in 1857, settling his family in a substantial two-storey stone house popularly known as "The Hill." In this now-thriving community McLachlin built one of the largest and most prosperous firms in the Ottawa valley. By 1865, when his sons were brought into the business and it was given the name of McLachlin Brothers, his mills and timber operations employed 800 men and produced 25,000,000 feet of lumber, worth about $500,000 annually.

McLachlin combined his business ambition with a paternalistic concern for his settlement: he advanced adult education through the Mechanics' Institute and the Ottawa Natural History Society; he was generous to the poor and to churches; he showed a continuing concern for improvements as a director of projects such as the Upper Ottawa Steamboat Company and the Bytown and Prescott Railway (later the St Lawrence and Ottawa Railway). Nevertheless, he remained a typically rough-hewn timberman. He shared the lumber community's impatience with any restraints upon their business, their contempt for government attempts to regulate the trade. For instance, in 1856 McLachlin and several other major operators in the area found their logs caught in a jam on the Madawska River. In clearing the jam they calmly destroyed the recently completed Madawaska Bridge. There is a pathetic quality to the correspondence in which the Bureau of Agriculture attempted to convince McLachlin and his associates that it was their duty to rebuild the bridge or to pay for its replacement.

McLachlin entered politics in 1851 when the Reformers of Bytown chose him as their candidate. He ran as a moderate, "Baldwinite" Reformer, and on 10 Dec. 1851 was elected to the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada. He did not seek re-election in 1854, perhaps because he had been appointed the previous year as an associate justice in the Court of Oyer and Terminer for Carleton County. In 1861, by now a "Coalition Reformer" supporting the George-Étienne CARTIER–John A. Macdonald* government, he was unopposed for the Renfrew seat in the assembly. His move toward the business-minded Liberal-Conservatives was typical of the pragmatic politics of the Ottawa valley, where principles took second place to the interests of the timber trade. Indeed, the only factor which could compete with the staple was religious antagonism. McLachlin discovered this to his sorrow in 1863 when he decided to contest the riding of Carleton. Despite a sound, business-like platform, he was easily defeated by the prominent Orangeman and Protestant agitator, William Frederick Powell*. McLachlin returned to politics in 1867 when he was chosen by acclamation for South Renfrew to the first dominion parliament.

Daniel McLachlin was feeling the effects of his busy career. In June 1869 he resigned his seat in parliament. At the same time he retired from the lumber trade, turning the business over to his three older sons, Hugh, John, and Daniel. McLachlin himself retreated to the bucolic pleasure of his estate, happily listing himself as a "farmer" in the census of 1871. He could be well content with his life when he passed from it on 6 Feb. 1872.

McLachlin's chief importance is not as a politician, for his career though long was undistinguished. He is significant as an example of the entrepreneur-paternalists who did so much to develop and settle the commercial frontier in Canada.

MICHAEL S. CROSS

PAC, RG 31, A1, 1861, Arnprior village, 14; 1871, Arnprior village, 1, 41. PAO, McLachlin papers. Ottawa Citizen, 1851–72. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson), 422. Arnprior centennial, 1862–1962 . . . (Arnprior, Ont., 1962), 17–22. Cornell, Alignment of political groups, 31, 48, 50, 103–4, 109. [Charlotte Whitton], A hundred years a-fellin' . . . 1842–1942 (Ottawa, n.d.), 62–63, 133.

MacLEAN (McLean), DONALD CHARLES, HBC employee, farmer, militia officer, and justice of the peace; b. 1786 in Argyllshire, Scotland, d. 1873 at Eardley, Que.

Donald Charles MacLean came to Hudson Bay in July 1813, having been contracted by the Hudson's Bay Company as a "shallop master." He served as mate of the schooner Mainwaring until it was decommissioned in 1815. Early in 1816, after the HBC ships had become ice-bound in Hudson Bay, he accompanied George Gladman*, the chief factor at Moose Factory, on a hazardous, two-month, overland journey to Montreal with the company "Indents and papers," which were destined for London. They started out with six others but four were forced to turn back within a week of their departure from Moose Factory. Alternate freezing and thawing conditions caused the travellers to become fatigued and frequently to lose their direction. MacLean fell through the ice on at least two occasions, but he and the other three men completed the trip with little or no adverse effects. Upon the expiration of his contract with the HBC in July 1816, MacLean joined the North West Company as a ship's master on the upper Great Lakes.

In 1820 he married Annie Warren of Fort Erie and within a year quit the company and journeyed to Scotland. He returned in 1824 accompanied by his wife, his son, his father, and ten brothers, sisters, and cousins. They all settled on a 1,500-acre grant in Eardley Township, Lower Canada. In the early 1830s MacLean left the family homestead and settled in Lochaber Township. He was appointed justice of the peace for Lochaber in 1833, a post which he held intermittently for about 15 years. In 1837 he was appointed captain of the Two Mountains Loyal Volunteer Cavalry. They were on call during the rebellion in Lower Canada, and in 1838–39 were paid for general service, mostly involving escort and dispatch duties. MacLean moved back to Eardley during the 1850s; there he farmed, operated a lumber mill, and served as justice of the peace for a short time. He and his wife raised ten children. Although a member of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, he was buried in the cemetery of the Church of England at Eardley.

Donald MacLean was typical of thousands of courageous pioneers who left their homeland to immigrate to British North America and settle in the wilderness.

David B. Flemming

HBC Arch. A.1/51 (Minute books, 1814); A.5/7 (London correspondence books outward, General series, 1824); A.16/17 (Officers' and servants' ledgers, Moose, 1791–1822); A.30/14 (Lists of servants in Hudson Bay, 1798–1816); A.32/18 (Servants' contracts, 1813); A.32/41–43 (Servants' contracts, MacE-MacV); B.3/a/119b (Albany, Post journal, 1815–16: "Journal of a journey from Albany and Moose Factorys in Hudson's Bay to London . . . by George Gladman"); B.135/e/3 (Report for Moose District, 1815–1816, by Joseph Beioly); C.1/298 (log of Eddystone, 1813); C.1/302 (log of Eddystone, 1815); F.4/32 (North West Company ledger, 1811–21). PAC, RG 4, B36 (Provincial Red Book, 1845); RG 8, I, B5, 1039, 1044. Census of the Canadas, 1851–2 (2v., Quebec, 1853–55), I. Census of the Canadas, 1860–61 (2v., Quebec, 1863–64), I. Census of Canada, 1870–71 (5v., Ottawa, 1873–78). Langelier, Lands granted in Quebec, 1763–1890. Lovell's Province of Quebec directory for 1871 (n.p., n.d.). Mitchell's Canada Gazetteer and business directory for 1864–65 (Toronto, 1864). Cyrus Thomas, History of the counties of Argenteuil, Que., and Prescott, Ont., from the earliest settlement to the present (Montreal, 1896).

McLEOD, ALEXANDER, deputy sheriff and storekeeper; b. 17 Jan. 1796 at Carnoustie, Forfarshire (Angus), Scotland; m. Ellen Morrison by whom he had several children; d. 27 Sept. 1871.

After a brief, youthful career in the British army during the Napoleonic Wars – he was discharged as a sergeant from the 127th Lancers – Alexander McLeod emigrated to Upper Canada in the early 1820s. On two occasions he began a grocery business, first in Kingston and then in York (Toronto), with indifferent success. McLeod's relationship to the "Family Compact," and the web of local official groups which sustained it, is obscure. He did secure an appointment as deputy sheriff of the Niagara District, and turned out, in the defence of Toronto, for the skirmish at John Montgomery's tavern in early December 1837.

It was in the aftermath of the rebellion that McLeod was thrust into prominence. His official duties often took him to the Buffalo, New York, area. Here he learned, on Christmas eve 1837, that the American steamboat Caroline was to be used to supply rebel William Lyon Mackenzie* and his followers who had established themselves on Navy Island in the Niagara River just above the falls. McLeod conveyed this information to the Upper Canadian authorities, and later accompanied the small party led by Commodore Andrew Drew which confirmed the report. On the night of 29 December, Drew took a raiding party across the river to the American side where the Caroline was moored at Schlosser's Wharf. The ship was seized after a brief scuffle in which one man, an American named Amos Durfee, was killed. The unmanned Caroline was towed into the river, set afire, and allowed to drift a short distance downstream where it sank. Despite the lurid accounts that still persist, especially in American textbooks, it did not go plummeting down Niagara Falls ablaze. There is no evidence that Alexander McLeod was involved in the raid.

Not surprisingly, American opinion, particularly in the northeast, was incensed at this violation of sovereignty. Great Britain and the United States were already at odds over the disputed boundary between New Brunswick and Maine, and tension increased. Protracted discussions between the two countries brought no resolution; and then, enter Alexander McLeod. In November 1840 he was arrested in Lewiston, New York. It was alleged (falsely) that he had boasted openly of his participation in the cutting out of the Caroline. McLeod was indicted by a state grand jury for arson and murder, and bound over for trial.

Lord Palmerston, the British foreign secretary, demanded McLeod's release, arguing that the attack on the Caroline was authorized by the proper authorities in Canada and the unfortunate McLeod could not be held personally liable. If he were convicted and hanged, Palmerston thundered, his death would be avenged. Daniel Webster, the new American secretary of state, was prepared to accept the British interpretation, but he could not intervene directly. New York state refused to surrender its jurisdictional rights in the case, although it did agree to change of venue to Utica, some distance from the inflamed Niagara district. Opinion in England, however, viewed this step as so much federalist sophistry and the newspapers of both countries indulged in a fit of warlike bombast.

The administration of William Henry Harrison had no wish for hostilities. When Palmerston left office, the prospect for an amicable resolution improved. In any case, William H. Seward, governor of New York, informed Webster that if McLeod were convicted a pardon would be granted. The trial took place in October 1841, closely covered by the newspapers. McLeod was able to produce a satisfactory alibi and was acquitted.

The American Congress repaired the constitutional difficulty the following year with legislation which provided that in such cases involving aliens the federal government could claim jurisdiction. With the McLeod case settled, Webster and Lord Ashburton proceeded to resolve the Caroline affair itself by a diplomatic nicety. Ashburton did not, in fact, extend a formal apology for the violation of American sovereignty, but regretted that an apology had not been made.

As for Alexander McLeod, he returned to the relative obscurity from which he had so bizarrely emerged. Once again he became a store-keeper, this time in Drummondville (now part of Niagara Falls), Upper Canada. As a result of repeated petitions (he also went to England in the 1850s to press his claims), he was awarded a pension of £200 in 1855 to assuage his wounded feelings. He was further compensated in 1866 by an appointment as justice of the peace in Welland County.

J. E. Rea

PAC, RG 5, A1, 1837–40; B43; RG 7, G1, 108–11, 226–27, 241, 244–49, 253–54, 454–56; RG 8, I, A1, 35, 610. PAO, McLeod-Morrison papers. PRO, FO 414. Arthur papers (Sanderson). Head, Narrative. Trial of Alexander M'Leod, for the murder of Amos Durfee; and as an accomplice in the burning of the steamer Caroline, in the Niagara River, during the Canadian rebellion in 1837–8 (New York, 1841). Craig, Upper Canada. A. B. Corey, "Public opinion and the McLeod case," CHA Report, 1936, 53–64. Alastair Watt, "The case of Alexander McLeod," CHR, XII (1931), 145–67.

M'LEOD, DONALD, soldier and journalist; b. at Fort Augustus, Inverness-shire, Scotland, 1 Jan. 1779; d. at Cleveland, Ohio, 22 July 1879.

Donald M'Leod was educated for the ministry at the University of Aberdeen. He served, however, in the Royal Navy, 1803–8, and then in the British army, fighting as a sergeant in the Peninsular campaign, then in Canada in the War of 1812–14 at Queenston Heights, Crysler's Farm, and Lundy's Lane, and again in Europe at Waterloo in 1815. In 1816, after his discharge, he returned to Canada and settled on land in Augusta Township. Unsuccessful in farming, he taught school in Brockville and then moved to Prescott where he opened a classical school and was appointed clerk of the Court of Requests.

In 1832 M'Leod purchased the Reform newspaper, the Grenville Gazette, in Prescott. He also took an active part as a journalist in the politics of Grenville County in opposition to Jonas Jones*, the Tory member for Leeds and Grenville. With the outbreak of the rebellion in Upper Canada, in December 1837, a Tory mob seized his printing office and destroyed his property. M'Leod, who had been a major in the Grenville militia, fled to the United States, made his way to Navy Island where the "Patriots" had massed for an invasion of Upper Canada, and became a brigadier-general in the Patriot army.

After the Patriot withdrawal from Navy Island, General Rensselaer Van Rensselaer*, their military commander, directed M'Leod to lead the men to Detroit to join the western Patriots and their American supporters. His force occupied Fighting Island in the Detroit River on 24 Feb. 1838 but, being practically without arms, was forced to withdraw. M'Leod then went to the support of the Patriots who had occupied Pelee Island, only to learn that they had been defeated and driven off on 3 March. Later in March a committee of the Canadian refugees at Lockport, New York, including M'Leod, organized the party that burned the British vessel Sir Robert Peel in the St Lawrence River on 29 May. When the premature Short Hills affair of June threatened to render abortive a larger plan for coordinated Patriot raids on Canada on 4 July, M'Leod sent Linus Miller to Canada in an unsuccessful effort to get the participants to withdraw.

M'Leod then established himself at Cleveland, the headquarters of the western division of the Hunters' Lodges, formed to transform Canada into a republic, and attempted to recruit men for the Patriot cause. He was now in financial need and resented the fact that the American Hunters kept control in their own hands and would give him no relief from the funds collected for the cause. M'Leod called the Cleveland committee a set of "speculators." He also stated that he had quarrelled with them over their intention to resort to "the midnight assassin business," by which leading Upper Canadian Tories would be seized and kept as hostages and their property burnt, and "threw . . . my commission . . . in their faces."

M'Leod was arrested on a charge of violating the neutrality laws of the United States and tried at Detroit on 25 June 1838. The jury acquitted him after deliberating all night. In 1840, after William Lyon Mackenzie*'s release from jail, M'Leod quarrelled with him, disappointed at Mackenzie's refusal to countenance more border warfare. M'Leod then announced his own withdrawal from Patriot activity.

In 1841, "driven by necessity," M'Leod published A brief review of . . . Upper Canada . . ., writing it in six weeks and copying freely from Mackenzie's Caroline Almanack and Mackenzie's Gazette. In 1846 he published his History of Wiskonsan. . . . This book was under way in 1843 but M'Leod has been accused of plagiarizing from Increase Allen Lapham's A geographical and topographical description of Wisconsin . . . (Milwaukee, 1844). He may have made free use of it, but he also gave considerable additional material on the soil and climate of Wisconsin; he praised its land system and constitution at the expense of Canada West.

M'Leod returned to Canada West in November 1846, after receiving a pardon, and settled in Sparta, Yarmouth Township. When Mackenzie was elected to the Legislative Assembly in 1851, M'Leod promptly renewed his correspondence with him. In the same year John Rolph*, who had also been implicated in the rebellion, became commissioner of crown lands; M'Leod solicited an appointment through him and was given a post in the Patent Office. He supported Rolph in the "Flag of Truce" controversy, over whether Rolph had played a treacherous part in agreeing to be one of Francis Bond HEAD's emissaries to the rebels in Toronto with a flag of truce, and while on this mission advising the rebels to march on Toronto without delay.

In his old age M'Leod was granted a pension for his services. Weakened by asthma and catarrh, but in possession of his faculties to the end, M'Leod died in Cleveland at the home of his daughter in 1879.

LILLIAN FRANCIS GATES

Donald M'Leod, A brief review of the settlement of Upper Canada by the U.E. loyalists and Scotch Highlanders in 1783; and of the grievances which compelled the Canadas to have recourse to arms . . . (Cleveland, Ohio, 1841); History of Wiskonsan, from its first discovery to the present period; including a geological and topographical description of the territory with a correct catalogue of all its plants (Buffalo, N.Y., 1846).

PAC, MG 24, B24 (Dr John Rolph papers). PAO, Mackenzie-Lindsey collection. Wisconsin Hist. Soc., a.l.s., M'Leod to L. C. Draper, 18 May 1879. The Caroline Almanack, and American Freeman's Chronicle . . ., ed. W. L. Mackenzie (Rochester, N.Y., [1840]). Cleveland Herald and Gazette, 5 Feb. 1838. Cleveland Leader, 19 July 1876. Detroit Daily Free Press, 28 July 1839. William Canniff, History of the settlement of Upper Canada (Ontario), with special reference to the Bay Quinté (Toronto, 1869). R. B. Ross, "The Patriot war," Michigan Pioneer Collections (Lansing, Mich.), XXI (1892), 509–609. O. E. Tiffany, "The relation of the United States to the Canadian rebellion of 1837–1838," Buffalo Hist. Soc., Pubs., VIII (1905), 7–147.

McNEILL, WILLIAM HENRY, master mariner, HBC chief factor, and pioneer; b. in Boston, Mass., 7 July 1801, son of William Henry and Rebecca McNeill; d. at Victoria, B.C., 3 Sept. 1875.

William Henry McNeill, like many of his New England contemporaries, answered the call of the sea when young. In 1823 he became a master mariner, and at the end of the following year commanded the brig Convoy on a trip to the Sandwich Islands (Hawaii) and to the Queen Charlotte Islands. For some years he traded between Massachusetts and South America, West Africa, and the Sandwich Islands, but in 1830 he was on the northwest coast of America working for the Boston merchants Bryant and Sturgis. His energy soon established him as one of the more successful fur-traders, and he refused to be coerced by the powerful Hudson's Bay Company into abandoning the lucrative northwest coast. On one occasion, in April 1832, Captain Thomas Sinclair aboard the HBC brigantine Cadboro attempted to force McNeill to take his ship, the brig Lama, out of the competition; McNeill faced the challenge and Sinclair was obliged to back down.

Although Chief Factor John McLoughlin* of the Columbia District wanted to be rid of the competing American traders, he respected McNeill's experience and ability and, in August 1832, needing another ship for the coastal trade to replace the damaged schooner Vancouver, McLoughlin arranged through his assistant Duncan Finlayson* for the purchase of Lama. McNeill and his two mates entered the service of the company at the same time, although McLoughlin knew that the HBC committee would object to his employing Americans; not until 1834 did he receive approval of McNeill's appointment.

At first McNeill continued to command Lama, and in 1834 rescued three Japanese sailors whose junk had foundered off Cape Flattery and who were being held captive by Indians. Three years later, he received command of Beaver, first steamship on the Pacific coast. Although a mutiny of its crew early in 1838 marred his record, he was promoted chief trader in November 1839. The appointment meant that he would have to become a British subject and he travelled to London in 1842 for this purpose, but it does not appear that he changed his citizenship before 1853 when he took up land near Fort Victoria.

Back in the Columbia District in 1844, McNeill requested a transfer to a land establishment and in 1845 took charge of Fort Stikine. Three years later he moved to Fort George because of ill health, but in 1849 established Fort Rupert, on the north end of Vancouver Island, where he stayed one year. After a trip to the Sandwich Islands he took charge of Fort Simpson in 1851 and remained there till 1859. One of his more interesting experiences was a trip he made in 1851 in Una to investigate the gold deposits on the Queen Charlotte Islands. The local Indians were not cooperative; when the sailors set off blasts to loosen the gold-bearing rock, both Indians and sailors would rush in to recover the more valuable pieces. Since the Indians were bellicose, dragging the seamen from the holes by their feet and threatening them with knives, McNeill was obliged to withdraw. His main concern, however, was trading for furs, and his journals and letters written at Fort Simpson indicate that he found the men at the post difficult to manage and the Tsimshians and other Indians a constant threat. The sale of spirits by American traders aggravated his problems; he wanted a gun boat to bring them under control. In 1856 his labours were rewarded when he was appointed a chief factor, and after a furlough from 1859 to 1861 he returned to Fort Simpson where he remained until he retired to his farm at Victoria in 1863.

Even in retirement McNeill was active. He was appointed to the British Columbia pilot board in 1868, and from 1872 until 1874 he captained the steamer Enterprise which operated between Vancouver Island and the mainland. He was a signatory to the 1869 petition addressed to President Ulysses S. Grant requesting the annexation of British Columbia to the United States. McNeill was married twice – to Mathilda who died in 1850 leaving one son and five daughters, and to Martha who was probably of the Nass tribe.

McNeill's career with the HBC was long and distinguished. In the 1830s and 1840s he helped the company to overcome the tricky navigational problems of the coast. As master of a trading post he managed to establish with the Indians the relationship necessary for profitable trading.

G. R. Newell

PABC, W. H. McNeill journals and correspondence. Daily British Colonist (Victoria), 5 Sept. 1875. Daily British Colonist and Victoria Chronicle, 15 May 1868. HBRS, IV (Rich); VI (Rich); VII (Rich); XXII (Rich).

MACTAVISH, DUGALD (the name is frequently written MacTavish or McTavish, but his branch of the family used Mactavish), HBC officer; b. 10 Aug. 1817 at Kilchrist House near Campbeltown, Argyllshire, Scotland, second son of Dugald Mactavish Sr and Letitia Lockhart; d. a bachelor, on 24 May 1871, at Montreal, Que.

Dugald Mactavish and his elder brother William* were appointed as apprentice clerks in the Hudson's Bay Company on 2 Jan. 1833; they sailed for Hudson Bay in the summer, and Dugald was posted to Moose Factory in the Southern Department where his uncle, John George McTavish*, was in charge. Dugald was transferred to Michipicoten, 100 miles north of Sault Ste Marie, on Lake Superior in 1835; for outfits 1837–38 and 1838–39 he was a clerk at Lachine.

The Council of the Northern Department meeting at Red River in June 1839 ordered Dugald Mactavish to the Columbia Department as clerk at Fort Vancouver under Chief Factor John McLoughlin*. When he reached this post in October he found it "so very large that on first arriving a stranger is almost apt to imagine himself in the civilized world. . . ." In the spring of 1840 he accompanied the York Factory Express east with the Columbia Department's yearly accounts, and in June he was instructed to take charge of the Columbia Brigade from Edmonton to Fort Vancouver and to convey 3,000 prime otter skins to meet the company's contract with the Russian American Company. The brigade arrived safely on 31 Oct. 1840 and Mactavish received McLoughlin's praise.

In June 1841 Mactavish was promoted to the rank of clerk first class at £100 a year, and his engagement at Fort Vancouver was renewed for three years. In 1842 Dugald's sister Letitia*, wife of James Hargrave*, characterized him as "a distinguished voyageur & driller of unruly men but he appears to be a good accomptant [sic] – as they say the Columbia papers were never before in such order as since he went." Yet advancement was slow under McLoughlin, and Dugald considered leaving the company. His merits were not entirely unnoticed on the Columbia, however, for when he took the accounts to Red River in 1845, Chief Factor James DOUGLAS urged Governor Sir George Simpson* to send Mactavish back to the Columbia "as there is no person here, capable of replacing him."

Mactavish, who went east with the accounts both in 1844 and in 1845 was, according to his sister Letitia, a slender, handsome, and intense youth of charming, buoyant manner dressed in expensive finery ordered out from England, including an embroidered black satin waistcoat in which he astonished some of the residents of York Factory. He was an indefatigable horseman, and rode at Fort Vancouver even on Sundays, when McLoughlin required all to walk. According to Edward Martin Hopkins, personal secretary and assistant to Sir George Simpson, who visited the post in 1841–42, Mactavish worked from 4:00 A.M. to 11:00 P.M. the entire year, but could be wild as well as serious. The American missionaries conducting Sunday services at the fort were apt to find themselves disconcerted by "a loud & curious chanting" from the next apartment, where lay Dugald "singing . . . voyageur songs with his head under the blankets, & this is his pastime every Sunday morng from 6 till 9. . . ."

Increasing American settlement south of the Columbia River in these years made the HBC's continued ability to retain its lands and investments in Oregon doubtful. Accordingly, McLoughlin and other company employees entered claims in their own names, attempting to secure the company's important site at the falls of the Willamette River (Oregon City). Mactavish entered a claim to part of the lands at the company's mill, which he registered with the provisional government of Oregon on 16 Dec. 1843. However Isaac W. Alderman, an American probably encouraged by the Methodist mission, forcibly took possession of the land and improvements arguing that Mactavish's claim was invalid since he was not an American citizen. Mactavish was successful in his suit for recovery of the land but soon sold the claim to McLoughlin for $900.

When Mactavish arrived back at Fort Vancouver from York Factory in October 1845 it was expected that he would soon leave to take charge of Fort Victoria, Richard LANE having been assigned to his post as accountant at Fort Vancouver. However, the suicide of McLoughlin's son-in-law, William Glen Rae*, at San Francisco in January 1845 had revealed that the company's affairs there had been poorly managed, and McLoughlin sent Mactavish to close its business. He sold the company's premises for $5,000 and appointed an agent for the collection of the $10,000 in accounts owed to the HBC. With David McLoughlin and Rae's family, Mactavish returned to Fort Vancouver on 11 July aboard the HBC barque Vancouver.

He spent the next six months getting his accounts in order, taking measures to keep American claim jumpers off lands held by employees for the company, and attempting to collect the debts of the Red River settlers who had left the company and taken up farms south of the Columbia. Beginning in September, he sat as one of two judges for Vancouver County under an appointment from Oregon's governor, George Abernethy. His most important case concerned the jumping of a claim of Chief Factor Francis Ermatinger*. Richard Lane arrived on 8 Dec. 1846 bringing Mactavish's long-sought commission as chief trader effective 1 June 1846, and orders to succeed George Pelly in the "principal management" of the company's business at Oahu (Hawaii). Mactavish turned his Columbia Department responsibilities over to Henry N. Peers* and Thomas Lowe*, resigned as judge, and left to join the barque Toulon for passage to San Francisco, where he boarded the Currency Lass for Oahu.

In August 1852 Mactavish took a long-deferred furlough in England and Scotland. He had been promoted chief factor in 1851, and upon his return to Fort Vancouver in September 1853 he acted jointly with Chief Factor Peter Skene Ogden* on the board of management of the company's newly created Oregon Department, comprising the lands and posts in the United States to which it retained possessory rights by the Oregon treaty of 1846. Ogden died on 27 Sept. 1854, and Mactavish had sole responsibility for the department until June 1857 when Chief Factor William Fraser Tolmie* joined him on the board, although Tolmie remained at Fort Nisqually on Puget Sound. During the Indian troubles of 1855–56, Mactavish had to abandon Fort Hall in present-day Idaho, and he was called on to advance supplies to the territorial volunteers of both Oregon and Washington. He estimated the total value of these supplies at $100,000, and as late as 1866 the bill remained unpaid. At Fort Vancouver itself he protested what he considered the premature survey of HBC lands by United States officials and the appropriation of company lands and buildings for the U.S. army's Columbia barracks. In June 1858, with the company's ability to maintain its operations at Fort Vancouver in doubt, Mactavish turned the fort over to Chief Trader James Allan Grahame* and moved to Fort Victoria where he replaced James Douglas. With the creation of the crown colony of British Columbia, the position of the HBC there became what it was in its last years on the Columbia. Mactavish and Chief Factor John Work* prepared a report on its claims to lands and posts in mainland British Columbia which governor Douglas transmitted to the Colonial Office. Douglas felt that the company had acquired rights to the soil by occupation, improvement, and public services, and he urged that its claims be met in a spirit of "judicious liberality" particularly as the decision of the British government would influence the settlement of the company's claims in Oregon. Mactavish's future with the company was determined in part by his work on the British Columbia claims.

From February 1859 to June 1860 Mactavish was in England on sick leave. He returned to serve as the senior member of the board of management for the company's posts in British Columbia until November 1863, when he again returned to England.

In the early months of 1864, the United States and Great Britain ratified a treaty which provided for a joint commission to make final settlement of the claims of the HBC and the Puget's Sound Agricultural Company arising from the Oregon Treaty of 1846. Mactavish left London on 28 Oct. 1864 for Washington, D.C., with orders to help prepare the company's memorial to the joint commission. From Washington, Mactavish went to Canada and in May 1865 he made his last trip to the northwest coast. Arriving in Victoria on 26 June he had a month to prepare for the arrival of the U.S. commissioner who was to take testimony. Mactavish was back in Montreal by Christmas, and in March and April 1866 he wrote his first deposition for the agents of the commission. Between April 1866 and March 1867 he moved between Montreal, New York, Washington, D.C., and North Carolina on business connected with the company's claims, and from 8 March to 1 May he gave many hours of testimony in Washington to the joint commission. On 10 Sept. 1869 the commissioners made their final awards, reducing the claims of the two companies from $5,449,936.67 to $650,000.

Mactavish left for London at the conclusion of the commission's deliberations, but his days as company trouble-shooter were not yet over. Scarcely a month after his arrival, Mactavish, "a man of great intelligence, plain and unpretentious in his manner, and possessed of sound common sense," was recalled to Montreal to take the position vacated by Chief Factor Donald A. Smith*. Mactavish took rooms at St Lawrence Hall, and there on 24 May 1871 he died on a reading room sofa of "disease of the heart" following a sudden seizure at Martineau's bathing rooms.

William R. Sampson

PABC, Thomas Lowe journal, 1843–50. Canadian North-West (Oliver). Evidence on the part of the Hudson's Bay Company claimants (British and American Joint Commission for the final settlement of the claims of the Hudson's Bay and Puget's Sound Agricultural companies, [Papers], 14 v., Washington, Montreal, 1865–69, II). Evidence for the United States in the matter of the claims of the Hudson's Bay and Puget's Sound Agricultural companies. Miscellaneous (British and American Joint Commission for the final settlement of the claims of the Hudson's Bay and Puget's Sound Agricultural companies, [Papers], 14v., Washington, Montreal, 1865–69, XI). Hargrave correspondence (Glazebrook). HBRS, VI (Rich); VII (Rich). [Mactavish], Letters of Letitia Hargrave (MacLeod). British Colonist (Victoria), 10 Oct. 1859, 23 June 1860. Daily British Colonist (Victoria), 27 June, 28, 31 July 1865. Daily British Colonist and Victoria Chronicle, 17 June 1871. Gazette (Montreal), 25 May 1871. Montreal Herald and Daily Commercial Gazette, 25 May 1871. Treaties and other international acts of the United States of America, ed. [David] Hunter Miller (8v., Washington, 1931–48). J. A. Hussey, The history of Fort Vancouver and its physical structure ([Tacoma, Wash., 1957]).

MAGUIRE, JOHN, lawyer, judge of the Superior Court; b. April 1810 at Maguire's Bridge in Fermanagh County, Ireland, son of Matthew Maguire and Catherine O'Hara; d. 5 July 1880 at Quebec.

John Maguire arrived in Canada in 1823 with his parents. He attended the Petit Séminaire of Quebec and completed his classical education there. He then received legal training in the office of William Power*, and on 20 Sept. 1834 became a member of the bar.

During the 1837 insurrection John Maguire marched under the standard of the Patriotes. He then rallied to the party of Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* and offered himself as a candidate on the Liberal-Conservative ticket for the city of Quebec, but was defeated. From then on he turned his talents to municipal politics. Maguire had been a member of the city council for the district of Champlain since 1846 and he occupied this post until 1854. In 1852 he also became inspector and superintendent of police for the city of Quebec. The following year, the English Protestants of Quebec accused him of negligence in carrying out his duty at the time of the riot caused by Alessandro Gavazzi*, a fanatical, anti-Catholic Italian who had come to Quebec to give lectures against "papism" [see Charles Wilson]. An inquiry conducted by two Protestant justices of the peace cleared Maguire of all blame. Still in the setting of municipal administration, he was active on the aqueduct committee, where he exerted all his influence to provide Quebec City with the water services it needed.

In 1852 Maguire was appointed judge of the Court of Sessions of the Peace for the district of Quebec. Sixteen years later he became judge of the Superior Court for the district of Bonaventure, and, from 1 Sept. 1873, for the district of Rimouski. In 1877, with two of his colleagues, Judges Thomas McCord* and Louis-Napoléon Casault*, he had the courage to deliver a judgement condemning the Catholic priests of Bonaventure County, who during the previous electoral campaign had supported the Conservative candidate by using their spiritual authority. As Judge Maguire refused to retract, he incurred the wrath of Bishop Jean-Pierre-François Laforce* Langevin, and the bishop excommunicated him. This sentence was lifted by Bishop George CONROY in the autumn of 1877.

At his death, on 5 July 1880, he left his wife, Frances Agnes Horan, sister of Bishop Edward John HORAN, the first principal of the École Normale Laval, and nine of his 14 children.

BÉATRICE CHASSÉ

Rapport des commissaires nommés pour faire une enquête sur la conduite des autorités de police lors de l'émeute de l'église Chalmers, le 6 juin 1853, avec les minutes des procédés et des témoignages rendus devant la dite commission (Québec, 1854). Journal de Québec, 25 oct. 1853; 6 juill., 9 juill. 1880. Morning Chronicle (Quebec), 6 July 1880. Quebec Mercury, 8 July 1880. F.-J. Audet, "Commissions d'avocats de la province de Québec, 1765 à 1849," BRH, XXXIX (1933), 587. P.-G. Roy, Les juges de la province de Québec, 335. Robert [Philippe] Sylvain, "Séjour mouvementé d'un révolutionnaire italien à Toronto et à Québec," RHAF, XIII (1959–60), 183–229.

MAILLET (Maillé), MARIE-ANNE-MARCELLE. See MALLET

MAILLOUX, ALEXIS, secular priest, vicar general, temperance advocate, and missionary in Illinois; b. 8 Jan. 1801 at Île-aux-Coudres (Charlevoix County), L.C., son of Amable Mailloux and Thècle Lajoie; d. 4 Aug. 1877 at Île-aux-Coudres, Que.

In the autumn of 1814 Abbé Jérôme Demers* made the acquaintance of the young Alexis Mailloux at Île-aux-Coudres, and because of his family's poverty offered him free instruction at the seminary of Quebec. In May 1825 Bishop Joseph-Octave Plessis* ordained him to the priesthood.

Abbé Mailloux began his pastoral life as chaplain (1825–29), then first parish priest (1829–33), of Saint-Roch de Québec. After some months officiating at Fraserville (Rivière-du-Loup), he was required by his bishop to go to work among the student body of the young college of Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière (Kamouraska County). Ill prepared to devote himself to education, opposed by temperament to the laxity of the founder-superior of the institution, Abbé Charles-François Painchaud*, in matters of discipline and administration, he went so far as to challenge the promitto of the priesthood (the vow of obedience to the bishop), in the hope of declining his superior's invitation. Consequently it was without enthusiasm, and even with the greatest repugnance, that he agreed to become director of the college, a post he held until 1838.

In that year, following the death of the founder, he received advancement, and became parish priest of Sainte-Anne and superior of the parish college. Also in 1838 he was appointed vicar general of the diocese. During the ten years or so that followed, his vocation as preacher and writer became clear. Indeed, from that time on his correspondence abounds in details about his pastoral concerns. The evils he castigated and fought were drunkenness, luxury, immorality in all forms, and especially neglect on the part of parents in bringing up their children properly and watching their associates. The remedies he advocated were temperance societies, an extension of the role of confraternities or pious associations, the use of indulgences, and the use of parish retreats, which he inaugurated in the diocese.

All the same, it was the setting up of retreats that he liked best, the more because a sedentary life did not suit his personality. During the decade 1840–50, he contemplated in turn joining the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, founding a society of preaching priests of which he would be the head, and becoming a missionary in British Columbia or the Saguenay. To satisfy these aspirations, Bishop Joseph Signay* finally agreed, in 1847, to release him from his parish, to enable him to give himself exclusively to preaching in the diocese. After ten years of an itinerant ministry as preacher and colonizing missionary, Mailloux left Canada to go to combat Charles-Paschal-Télesphore Chiniquy*'s schismatics in Illinois. Returning to Canada, he was parish priest of Saint-Bonaventure-d'Hamilton (Bonaventure County) from 1863 to 1865. After that, preaching and writing took up the rest of his life.

Mailloux's written work is extensive. Among the best known titles are: La croix présentée aux membres de la Société de tempérance; L'ivrognerie est l'œuvre du démon . . . ; Essai sur le luxe et la vanité des parures . . . ; and Manuel des parents chrétiens ou devoirs des pères et des mères. . . . This last work reproduces the content of his first sermons given at retreats. Its distribution and therefore its influence – the fifth edition was in 1927 – did not diminish in the 20th century; indeed in 1945 the Bulletin des recherches historiques recommended it for French Canadian homes because it "is best adapted to our ideas and needs."

The ideas of Vicar General Mailloux were inspired by the rigorism that owed its prevalence to Jansenist ethics, as were those of the 19th-century French Canadian clergy as a whole. Hence there is nothing surprising in the fact that he felt little sympathy for his "materialistic and mechanistic century." As a whole his teaching was based on a rejection of the world and still more on a fear of God and hell. Furthermore, his impetuous temperament carried him away while he was preaching. In 1863, during a retreat of 40 hours at Sainte-Claire, Dorchester, his homily so scared the congregation that many complained and did not want to confess their sins. Consequently Bishop Charles-François Baillargeon* once deemed it expedient to say to Mailloux: "One must beware of arbitrariness; of the rigorism that damns many and saves no one; of the exaggeration that . . . falsifies consciences; of the excess that finds sin where there is none."

SERGE GAGNON

Alexis Mailloux's writings are many; his best known titles are: La croix présentée aux membres de la Société de tempérance (Québec, 1850); Essai sur le luxe et la vanité des parures spécialement dédié aux personnes de la campagne (Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière, Qué., 1867); L'ivrognerie est l'œuvre du démon, mais la sainte tempérance de la croix est l'œuvre de Dieu (Québec, 1867); Manuel des parents chrétiens ou devoirs des pères et des mères dans l'éducation religieuse de leurs enfants (Québec, 1851).

AAQ, Registres des lettres des évêques de Québec. Archives de l'évêché de Sainte-Anne (La Pocatière, Qué.), Paroisse de Sainte-Anne; Collège de Sainte-Anne (original letters of Mailloux, 1834–47). Archives du collège de Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière (Qué.), Fonds Alexis Mailloux (large collection of original documents concerning Mailloux, 1834–47). ASQ, Polygraphie, L, LI, LII, LIII (Mailloux's correspondence during his years in the United States).

Julienne Barnard, Mémoires Chapais; documentation, correspondance, souvenirs (4v., Montréal et Paris, 1961–64), I. N.-E. Dionne, Sainte-Anne de la Pocatière, 1672–1910; l'Île-aux-Oies, 1646–1910 (Galerie historique, III, Québec, 1910), 82–85, 87–95, 129; Vie de C.-F. Painchaud; prêtre, curé, fondateur du collège Sainte-Anne de la Pocatière (Québec, 1894), 206–57. Wilfrid Lebon, Histoire du collège Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière (2v., Québec, 1948–49), I, 39–79. Fernand Porter, L'institution catéchistique au Canada; deux siècles de formation religieuse, 1633–1833 (Montréal, 1949). Marcel Trudel, Chiniquy (2e éd., [Trois-Rivières], 1955). "Le « Manuel des parents chrétiens »," BRH, LI (1945), 242.

MAKOYI-KSIKSINUM. See SOTAI-NA

MALCOLM, ELIAKIM, miller, farmer, politician, and rebel; b. 18 March 1801 in the township of Oakland, U.C., son of Tryphena and Finlay Malcolm, an early American settler in the area; d. 26 Sept. 1874, at Scotland, Ont.

A miller and "yeoman" like his father, Eliakim (or "Liak") Malcolm laid out the village of Scotland and served as surveyor and as a justice of the peace. He married Samantha Sexton in 1822 and became the father of eight children.

Malcolm was a vocal Reformer and opposed the administration at York (Toronto) in the 1830s because of its alleged neglect of remote communities such as Oakland and its awarding of lucrative monopolies in transportation and banking to its "extravagant" friends. Following the lead of Dr Charles Duncombe*, the principal Reformer in the London District, Malcolm and members of his family spoke at protest meetings in Burford and Oakland townships in 1837. When the rebellion broke out in December, Scotland was the gathering place for Duncombe's armed supporters, who included Malcolm. Following the defeat of William Lyon Mackenzie*'s force near Toronto, many loyal militiamen were released for duty in the west and they soon descended on Scotland, from which the disheartened rebels had already withdrawn. The militiamen uncovered on Malcolm's property incriminating correspondence and a muster-roll of local dissidents. A few days later, on 16 Dec. 1837, a proclamation offered a reward of £250 for his apprehension. He succeeded, however, like Duncombe, in escaping to the United States. On a list of rebels drawn up in October 1838 Malcolm's name still occupied a prominent place after that of Duncombe.

Yet he seems to have been able to return to Upper Canada about three years later. Resuming his life as a farmer and miller (he constructed the first sawmill in Scotland in 1848), Malcolm still found time for local politics. In the less turbulent political atmosphere of the mid-century his Reformist ideas were more acceptable. Malcolm was elected to Oakland Township's first council and was named its first reeve at the council's inaugural meeting in 1850. In 1853 when the county of Brant (of which Oakland formed a part) was separated from its neighbours, Halton and Wentworth counties, the one-time rebel was selected as its first warden. He strongly championed such "internal improvements" as navigation on the Grand River and the Buffalo and Brantford Railway (named, in 1856, the Buffalo and Lake Huron Railway Company), called for the effective use of the county's vaunted "hydraulic power," and promoted social improvements such as penal reform and public sanitation.

In 1855 Malcolm was defeated in a bid to serve a third term as warden and in 1857 stepped down as reeve of Oakland. He spent the remainder of his life farming and milling.

C. M. JOHNSTON

Oakland, Ont., Township offices, minutes of the Oakland Township Council, 1850–56. Brant County Council, Minutes, 1853–57. [George Coventry], "A contemporary account of the rebellion in Upper Canada, 1837," ed. W. R. Riddell, Ont. Hist., XVII (1919), 113–74. J. H. Land, "The recollections of Lieut. John Land a militia man, in the rebellion of 1837," Wentworth Hist. Soc. Papers and Records (Hamilton), VIII (1919), 20–24. Brantford Expositor, October 1874. Mirror (Toronto), 26 Oct. 1838. Upper Canada Gazette (Toronto), 2 Dec. 1837, 25 Oct. 1838. J. K. Malcolm, The history and genealogy of the Malcolm family of the United States and Canada (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1950). Dent, Upper Canadian rebellion, II. The history of the county of Brant, Ontario (Toronto, 1883). Fred Landon, An exile from Canada to Van Diemen's Land, being the story of Elijah Woodman transported overseas for participation in the Upper Canada troubles of 1837–38 (Toronto, 1960); Western Ontario and the American frontier (Toronto, 1941). F. D. Reville, History of the county of Brant (2v., Brantford, 1920), I. W. C. Trimble, "Historical sketch of the county of Brant," in Illustrated historical atlas of the county of Brant, Ont. (Toronto, 1875), iii–xvi.

MALHIOT, CHARLES-CHRISTOPHE, doctor, seigneur, member of the Legislative Council of the Province of Canada and of the Canadian Senate; b. 11 Oct. 1808 at Verchères, L.C., second son of François-Xavier-Amable Malhiot, seigneur of Verchères, member of the assembly and legislative councillor for Lower Canada, and of Julie Boucher de La Perrière; d. 9 Nov. 1874 at Pointe-du-Lac, Que.

After completing a classical education at the college of Montreal, Charles-Christophe Malhiot studied medicine under Dr Robert NELSON, considered a great surgeon at that time. Having qualified as a doctor, he first went to live at Yamachiche; on 20 Oct. 1835, at Pointe-du-Lac, he married Julie-Éliza Montour, daughter of Nicolas Montour*, seigneur of Pointe-du-Lac, member of the assembly for Saint-Maurice, and one of the pioneers of the North West Company. Nine children were born of this marriage, but they all died in infancy.

After his marriage Charles-Christophe established his office and took up residence in the parish of La Visitation-de-la-Pointe-du-Lac. In 1833 he had been appointed surgeon in the 3rd Battalion of Saint-Maurice County. Although a stranger to this region, Dr Malhiot, who was a great benefactor of the poor, rapidly won the respect of the people. The fact that he was seigneur of Pointe-du-Lac undoubtedly also brought him a good deal of prestige. Dr Malhiot's wife had inherited a joint third of this seigneury, of which Malhiot was to become owner on her death in 1865; a few years later, in 1873, he made an offer to purchase another third of the seigneury. As well as this land at Pointe-du-Lac, he possessed titles to other seigneuries: on the death of Joseph Boucher de La Perrière in 1819 he had become the owner, with his father and two brothers, of the seigneury of Contrecœur, and in 1854 his father bequeathed to him the seigneury of Verchères.

Even if the practice of medicine in this rural region interested him greatly, Dr Malhiot did not restrict his field of activity to his occupation. In 1847 he sat on the council of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Lower Canada in his capacity as one of the governors of this organization, representing the district of Trois-Rivières and Saint-François. He had, moreover, supported with his signature a petition, presented that same year to the house, seeking legal recognition of the medical profession in Canada East.

Dr Malhiot, like several doctors in his day, was interested in political life. The son of an ardent Patriote, he had defended the cause of the Patriotes in the circles in which he moved, but does not seem to have taken part actively in the disturbances of 1837–38. He began his political career at the municipal level when he was elected mayor of Pointe-du-Lac in 1859; he held this office until 1864. At the same period, following in his father's footsteps, Dr Malhiot turned his attention to the national scene; he stood as candidate in the Shawinigan division for the elections to the Legislative Council of 1862. He was the Liberal candidate, and faced George BAPTIST, a merchant of Trois-Rivières. Baptist, less popular than his opponent, withdrew a few days before the election, and on 30 Sept. 1862 Dr Malhiot was elected by acclamation. He sat until confederation. In May 1867, by royal proclamation, he was called to the Senate as representative for the division of La Vallière. He remained a senator until his death. Malhiot was acknowledged as a loyal supporter of the Liberal party throughout his career. Although he took a fairly active interest in political life, he seems on the whole to have played only an unobtrusive part in it.

Charles-Christophe Malhiot, a great landowner and from a fairly well-to-do family, lived in comfortable circumstances. On his death he left a fortune estimated at about $60,000, which, after charitable donations to religious communities at Trois-Rivières and to the parish council of Pointe-du-Lac, he bequeathed to his brothers, chiefly to Adolphe.

LOUISE CRÊTE-BÉGIN

AJTR, Registre d'état civil, paroisse La Visitation-de-la-Pointe-du-Lac, 1834–1874. ASTR, Trifluviens du 19e et du 20e siècle, Charles Malhiot. Canada, Province of, Legislative Council, Journals, 1862–1866; Statutes, 1847, c.26. Le Canadien (Québec), 22 sept., 13 oct. 1862; 11 nov. 1874. Le Constitutionnel (Trois-Rivières), 11 nov. 1874. L'Ère nouvelle (Trois-Rivières), 22 sept., 2 oct. 1862. Le Journal des Trois-Rivières, 12 nov. 1874. Le Pays (Montréal), 18 sept., 27 sept. 1862. Can. parl. comp., 1874, 61–62. Political appointments, 1841–1865 (J.-O. Coté), 57, 60. Political appointments and judicial bench (N.-O. Coté), 3, 168. Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 275–76. Ahern, Notes pour l'histoire de la médecine, 399–400. F.-J. Audet, Contrecœur: famille, seigneurie, paroisse, village (Montréal, 1940), 44–46. Deux siècles de vie paroissiale à La Pointe-du-Lac; compte-rendu des fêtes du deuxième centenaire de La Pointe-du-Lac le dimanche 31 juillet 1938 (Pages trifluviennes, sér. A, 21, Trois-Rivières, 1939), 23. Alexandre Dugré, La Pointe-du-Lac (Pages trifluviennes, sér. A, 15, Trois-Rivières, 1934), 23, 59. J.-J. Lefebvre, "La famille Malhiot, de Montréal et de Verchères," SGCF Mémoires, XII (1961), 153. Sœur Marie du Rédempteur, "La Pointe-du-Lac aux 19e et 18e siècles," BRH, XXXVIII (1932), 301–15. Albert Tessier, "Les Trifluviens s'échauffent . . . Le dernier demi-siècle des forges (1833–1883)," Cahiers des Dix, XV (1950), 168.

MALHIOT, ÉDOUARD-ÉLISÉE, Patriote and lawyer; b. around 1810 or 1814 at Saint-Pierre-les-Becquets (Nicolet County, Quebec); d. August 1875 at L'Assomption (Assumption), in Illinois.

Information about Édouard-Élisée Malhiot's childhood is totally lacking. We know, however, that he went to Montreal around 1830, and that he studied law there. At Montreal he adopted the Patriote cause with a kind of mystic fervour. He was a friend of Ludger Duvernay*, a keen supporter of Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU, and an active member of the Fils de la Liberté [see LEBLANC], and was to be found at all the meetings and demonstrations that took place repeatedly at Montreal between April and November 1837. On 6 November he took part in the brutal clash between the Fils de la Liberté and the members of the Doric Club, who supported the government's policies. This episode, as he told Duvernay in confidence, was for him the beginning of total commitment.

He threw himself into the battle like a crusader. He is thought to have commanded the small contingent that on 28 November, the day after the events at Saint-Charles, attempted to intercept Colonel George Augustus Wetherall* at Pointe-Olivier (Saint-Mathias), in Rouville County, as he was on his way to Montreal. Shortly afterwards, with several of his compatriots, Malhiot reached the United States and took refuge at Swanton, Vermont. With the object of joining the Patriotes at Saint-Eustache he recrossed the border at the head of a group of 70 to 80 men, but was shortly, on 6 December, stopped at Moore's Corner (Saint-Armand-Station) by a party of Canadian volunteers [see MOORE]. He was wounded, and got back to Swanton the next day; then began for him a short but painful period of exile.

Malhiot passed through a stage of discouragement. During the first weeks of January his material situation was precarious. Above all, he dreaded the worst for the future. In his opinion, the Americans were too tardy in showing in a tangible way their sympathy and especially their support. Moreover, the dissensions among the Patriote leaders were in danger of compromising the cause of independence beyond redemption. Loyal to Papineau, he was angry with Robert NELSON and Cyrille-Hector-Octave Côté* for criticizing his leader in public. Only towards the end of May, impatient "with the unpopular and dishonest conduct of Papineau," did he make it up with Robert Nelson and come round to the idea of an invasion from the United States, as a means of facilitating the move to make Lower Canada an independent republic.

After the failure of a first attempt on 28 Feb. 1838, due it was believed to excessive rashness and to Washington's desire to keep a more careful watch on the observance of American neutrality, the Patriotes had decided to reorganize themselves in a secret society, the Frères-Chasseurs [see NELSON]. In this group Malhiot was to play an important role. Taking advantage of the general amnesty granted by Lord Durham [Lambton*] on 28 June 1839, he returned to Montreal in August of that year intending to remain there. He did not receive any unwelcome attention. He was appointed Grand Aigle of the Association des Frères-Chasseurs, and conducted a remarkable propaganda campaign in the Richelieu valley. Going round from parish to parish, the "Commandant du Sud," as he styled himself, set up lodges, initiated new members, and promised arms and munitions for the day of the general uprising. On that day, 3 November, the Patriotes of Lower Canada, assisted by the invasion army directed by Nelson, were to launch simultaneous attacks against Saint-Jean, Chambly, and Sorel and proceed towards Montreal, where the Patriotes would have risen. Sorel was Malhiot's objective.

The plan proved to be a total failure. Malhiot managed to assemble rapidly nearly 300 men at Saint-Ours, and set off towards his objective during the night of 3 or 4 November. Learning that Nelson had not moved from Napierville, he returned to Saint-Ours the same night. He was a helpless witness of Nelson's departure from Napierville, his defeat at Odelltown, and his flight to the United States. From 10 to 14 November, with about 200 Patriotes, 3 guns, and more than 100 rifles, he maintained a camp on the mountain of Saint-Bruno-de-Montarville, fully determined to hold out. To no avail. On the morning of the 14th, as the regular troops approached from Sorel, Malhiot, on whose head a price had been set, fled with a few comrades. They crossed the border after wandering for two weeks in the woods.

Malhiot was profoundly depressed and embittered by the turn of events. Few persons found grace in his eyes. He wrote to Duvernay expressing his contempt for the egoism and ignorance of the Americans, the ingratitude of his compatriots, and particularly the deceit and cowardice of some of those who preached revolution before November 1837 for the purpose of acquiring popularity or through personal interest. It is not impossible that his feelings, together with a certain uneasiness at the idea of seeing again those who had had faith in him, explain why he chose exile. In any case, he had not the kind of temperament which could accept a life of self-effacement.

After some hesitation he went to settle at L'Assomption (Assumption), in Louisiana. The French-speaking settlement that existed in Louisiana was now the home of other refugees of the 1837–38 period, for example Benjamin Ouimet and the doctors J.-Guillaume Beaudrieau and Pierre Damour*. Until 1856 Malhiot practised law with great success, acquiring fame and fortune. In 1856 a district elected him senator in absentia.

Malhiot had decided, in this year, to renew contact with his past. Abandoning his career, he bought some fertile land in Illinois. He had conceived the plan of starting there an agricultural settlement, where homes could be set up by some of the thousands of French Canadians who each year were forced to emigrate, and who preferred to work with the earth rather than in the brick-fields and textile factories of New England. About 50 families, some of whom came from his native parish, joined him there. His undertaking prospered. He obtained the services of a Canadian priest for his little community of L'Assomption (Assumption). In 1875 he died prematurely, stricken by cholera. He was mourned by his wife and two sons.

YVES ROBY

"Inventaire des documents relatifs aux événements de 1837 et 1838, conservés aux archives de la province de Québec," APQ Rapport, 1925–26, 172, 193, 210, 212, 217, 221, 224, 258, 259, 260, 272, 322. "Papiers Duvernay conservés aux archives de la province de Québec," APQ Rapport, 1926–27, 147–252. Fauteux, Patriotes. Ivanhoë Caron, "Édouard-Élisée Malhiot," RSCT, 3rd ser., XXII (1928), sect.I, 155–66.

MALLET (Maillet, Maillé), MARIE-ANNE-MARCELLE, professed religious of the Sisters of Charity of the Hôpital Général of Montreal, foundress of the Institute of the Sisters of Charity of Quebec, and superior of that community from 1849 to 1866; b. 26 March 1805 at Montreal, L.C., daughter of Vital Mallet, farmer and tanner, and Marguerite Sarrazin; d. 9 April 1871 at Quebec.

Marie-Anne-Marcelle Mallet's childhood was upset by her father's premature death on 23 April 1810, and by the disruptions that resulted. At the age of 10 she had to leave the village of L'Assomption, where her family had lived since 1806: faced with the problem of her children's education, the mother had resigned herself to giving them up to an aunt and uncle at Lachine. Each year the adolescent girl regretfully took leave of her brother and her adoptive parents and went for some months as a boarder to the sisters of the Congregation of Notre-Dame, probably at Pointe-Claire.

At 16 Marcelle Mallet was already sensitive to the disarray well known to the child without a family and the poor without a home. She therefore decided to join the religious daughters of Mother d'Youville [Dufrost* de Lajemmerais], who had founded the Institute of the Sisters of Charity of the Hôpital Général of Montreal, the earliest religious congregation that was strictly Canadian. Admitted first as a postulant because of her youth, Marcelle Mallet was permitted to enter the noviciate on 6 May 1824. She made her profession in the community on 18 May 1826, and was called upon to perform the most varied tasks, but above all to care for the sick. In 1846 she began the custom of home visiting as a charitable undertaking. In 1847 typhus struck Montreal, and she had an opportunity to display her organizational abilities as much as her zeal, when, in the capacity of assistant superior, she assumed entire responsibility for the hospital.

In the period 1840 to 1850 the community set up a number of foundations. After Saint-Hyacinthe, Saint-Boniface (Manitoba), and Bytown (Ottawa) [see Élisabeth BRUYÈRE], came Quebec. Selected as foundress-superior of this last mission, Sister Mallet left her religious family on 21 Aug. 1849 with five companions. It was an irreversible departure, according to the rule of the foundations of the time. On 22 Aug. 1849 the population of Quebec received its first Sisters of Charity. After two conflagrations and a terrible cholera epidemic, Quebec was then going through one of the most harrowing periods in its history. On their arrival, the sisters set themselves up in the orphanage-school in Rue des Glacis, on the boundary of the parish of Notre-Dame. On 5 November the members of the Société Charitable des Dames Catholiques de Québec entrusted to Mother Mallet an organization which they had founded in 1831 and maintained for 18 years; the ladies of the society remained associates of the Sisters of Charity.

Mother Mallet, who had come with her companions "to look after the sick, the education of needy young girls, and other requirements," concerned herself with answering the most pressing appeals of those in distress. In 1849 she instituted a relief service for poor schoolchildren. Then, in addition to the orphan girls, she took in women boarders in 1855, aged and infirm persons in 1856, and orphan boys in 1861. In 1866 she agreed to set up an out-patient service for the needy, and, during the 17 years that she directed the community, she established in the country, within the confines of the diocese of Quebec, five boarding-schools for girls, which were complementary to the local schools and served as training centres for schoolmistresses.

These charitable activities, which grew and became diversified, took their toll of Mother Mallet. She knew the ordeal of solitude: her early companions had either died soon after the founding of the institute, or, taking advantage of an invitation from the Hôpital Général of Montreal in 1854, had decided to return to Montreal despite their pledge in 1849; the epidemics of typhus in 1851 and of cholera in 1854 had reduced her work force while increasing her duties; on 3 May 1854 a fire had laid waste an orphanage that had just been built; and finally, quite unforeseen conflicts within the community she had started tried her sorely.

In September 1849 Mother Mallet had received four recruits for her charitable undertaking. She had thus established the bases of a new religious family. The Institute of the Sisters of Charity of Quebec received its official consecration in the church on 1 July 1866. On that day Pius IX approved its Règles et constitutions. Mother Mallet and several of her companions would have liked to remain loyal to the spiritual heritage of the Sulpicians bequeathed by Mother d'Youville and the Hôpital Général of Montreal. The foundress had refused a change in the legislation so long as she had been free to do so. But in 1863 Charles-François Baillargeon*, bishop of Quebec, had imposed on her a new rule which was the work of the Jesuit Antoine-Nicolas Braün, and which was essentially derived from the Society of Jesus.

When this new rule was put into force, the community of the Sisters of Charity of Quebec experienced a period of internal crisis. Although there was no conflict of principle between the two rules, all the sisters could not give their allegiance with equal freedom to the reorientation of the community. Mother Mallet herself, accustomed to the old rule, found it difficult to pass from the liberal atmosphere of the Sulpician school, in which her charity had flourished for 40 years, to this Ignatian framework, whose quality had proved itself but in which everything was more measured, more austere, and more rigorous. On the other hand the young nuns formed by Father Braün, the spiritual director of the community from 1856, enlisted boldly under the banner of the robust St Ignatius. Soon conflicting currents of ideas began to be apparent. In this drama of the Règles et constitutions Mother Mallet had the most difficult role. Ever since 1863 her attitude, conciliatory though it was, had been challenged by certain of the sisters. And Father Braün readily fostered this contention. In the 1866 elections the foundress was not re-elected as head of her community; she did not even have a place in the administration.

Mother Mallet then addressed herself to the humble task of a Sister of Charity, and, gently, reached her last days. She died at dawn on Easter Sunday, 9 April 1871. She was remembered as a woman of great activity and energy. Undaunted by time and space, her community in its vitality confirms her faith and justifies her work. Today, a century after her death, the community of the Sisters of Charity of Quebec numbers nearly 1,800 professed religious in the United States, Japan, Paraguay, Argentina, the Congo, and above all in the province of Quebec which gave it its corner-stone. "With no distinction of country, race, or culture" these nuns perpetuate Marcelle Mallet's consecration to childhood, sickness, and old age.

ANDRÉE DÉSILETS

[Sœurs de la Charité de Québec], Actes du chapitre général, première session, juillet-août 1968 (n.d., 1968); Statistiques de la congrégation des sœurs de la Charité de Québec (n.d., 1968); Dans le sillage de la charité (Québec, 1959). Une fondatrice et son œuvre: mère Mallet (1805–1871) et l'Institut des sœurs de la Charité de Québec, fondé en 1849 (Québec, 1939).

MANCE. See CÉRÉ

MANNERS-SUTTON, JOHN HENRY THOMAS, 3rd Viscount Canterbury, politician and colonial administrator; b. 27 May 1814 in London, Eng., son of Charles Manners-Sutton, 1st Viscount Canterbury, and Lucy Maria Charlotte Denison; d. 24 June 1877 in London.

John Henry Thomas Manners-Sutton was descended from a line of distinguished British Conservatives; his grandfather, Charles Manners-Sutton, had been archbishop of Canterbury; his great-uncle, Thomas Manners-Sutton, had served as lord chancellor of Ireland; his father was speaker of the British House of Commons for 18 years. He himself was educated at Eton and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he received an MA in 1835; he entered Lincoln's Inn in that year but was never called to the bar. On 5 July 1838 he married Georgiana Tompson by whom he had five sons and two daughters.

The political career of Manners-Sutton began somewhat falteringly in 1839 when he won a Cambridge by-election for the Tories but was subsequently unseated for bribery. He won the seat again in 1841 and in September was appointed under-secretary for the Home Department in Sir Robert Peel's administration. He rarely took part in Commons debates and resigned his office when Peel was overthrown in 1846. Defeated in the 1847 election, Manners-Sutton retired from politics to devote much of his time to editing the Lexington Papers (8v., London, 1851) for publication.

On 1 July 1854 Manners-Sutton was appointed the eighth lieutenant governor of New Brunswick. According to W. S. MacNutt, he had been selected "by reason of a promising ability that had been displayed" at the Home Office and by reason of his family's "important connections." When he arrived to take up his post in October, a group of local politicians were concerned because responsible government had not become an accomplished fact and they believed Manners-Sutton had reservations on this score. On 20 Oct. 1854 the reform leader, Charles Fisher, introduced an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne arguing that the government had "quailed" before the lieutenant governor, Sir Edmund Head*, in 1851, and that responsible government had, therefore, really not come in 1848 [see Wilmot]. Fisher also referred to rumours that Head had met his successor, Manners-Sutton, in Boston and told him how to run the Legislative Council and, through it, the colony. It was obvious that the new governor was not popular with the reform-minded members of the assembly. Eight days after Fisher's speech, the government, led by John Ambrose Street*, lost a division in the assembly. "Shortly after," as MacNutt has noted, "for the first time in New Brunswick history, a government resigned because of an adverse vote in the house of assembly." Manners-Sutton then appointed Fisher attorney general, but in his dispatches to London the governor made no attempt to hide his distaste for the new government.

The main concern of the Colonial Office in 1854 was that the New Brunswick assembly pass the laws necessary for the success of the reciprocity treaty with the United States. A dispatch to Manners-Sutton in September expressed the hope that "the fruits of so much execution will not be thrown away." The British government felt that the treaty would bring "the greatest advantages to Her Majesty's North American subjects" but recognized that the colony had "the ultimate decision as to the deliberations of this legislation." Manners-Sutton was authorized to make changes in colonial trade laws in compliance with the council and to bring the question of reciprocity "in the fullest and fairest manner before the provincial legislature."

During the first year of his tenure, Manners-Sutton and the Colonial Office disagreed on several points. The governor was in favour of granting the title "honourable" to retiring members of the Legislative Council, but he was over-ruled by Sir George Grey at the Colonial Office who wrote to Sir Robert Peel that such a move threw "an invidious power into the hands of a Governor who has already for the most part sufficient danger of unpopularity." In January 1855 both Grey and Peel opposed Manners-Sutton's suggestion that New Brunswick's civil list be placed in the hands of the Executive Council. Six months later he seemed to be on better terms with his superiors: the legislature had made changes especially in the trade and fishing laws – a continued preoccupation of the imperial government.

Manners-Sutton's next test came in 1855. The New Brunswick assembly had passed a bill in 1853 prohibiting the importation of alcoholic beverages into the colony. This measure could not be enforced effectively, but the temperance adherents, led by Samuel Leonard Tilley*, wanted a more stringent bill. In 1855 a second prohibition bill was passed, and, despite the governor's objection, given royal assent. Manners-Sutton did, however, recommend to the Colonial Office in London that it disallow the bill, but the Colonial Office ignored the recommendation. After the controversial measure became law, Manners-Sutton advised his New Brunswick government either to enforce the law or to repeal it – advice intended to destroy Fisher's government. The government's failure to enforce the prohibition bill eventually forced its resignation, but a subsequent election saw most of the same men returned to the assembly. Many of those elected had changed their minds about prohibition during the campaign; they acknowledged the propriety of Manners-Sutton's actions by repealing the measure.

During the remaining four years of his term, amidst a period of unprecedented prosperity in the province, the secret ballot was introduced, the power of the Legislative Council was reduced, and some assemblymen were pressing Manners-Sutton to open negotiations enabling the executive to initiate money grants. In 1857 the Colonial Office recognized the principle of responsible government in the colony by stating that any bill which did not receive "the assent of the three branches of the legislature must be regarded simply in the light of a 'Dropped Bill.' " A prolonged controversy over government grants to King's College, later the University of New Brunswick, aided Fisher and his supporters in their persistent demand that the legislature be given the right to supervise the drafting of confidential dispatches sent by Manners-Sutton to London. The Colonial Office supported Manners-Sutton's right to give confidential and private advice but when word reached Fredericton that Sir Howard Douglas*, Bishop John Medley*, and Edward Barron CHANDLER all had called at the Colonial Office to make representations concerning King's College, the New Brunswick government successfully demanded that copies of the documents should be made available for rebuttal. Yet another inroad had been made on the powers of the lieutenant governor.

Manners-Sutton had many other differences with Fisher, but they did agree on one issue: they chose to ignore a resolution passed in Canada in 1858 urging talks about the union of the British North American colonies. Manners-Sutton feared that imperial trade might be hampered by a union, and he also predicted that the Maritime provinces might resent the loss of their autonomy. He was in favour of Maritime union, however, and, in 1858, reported to London that talks on the subject would shortly begin between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The news was premature, for when Manners-Sutton was succeeded in October 1861 by Sir Arthur Hamilton Gordon* the movement for union of any kind seemed dormant.

From New Brunswick, Manners-Sutton went to Trinidad where he was governor for two years, long enought to witness the nearby Jamaica Rebellion and its bloody aftermath. His last colonial appointment, as governor of the Australian colony of Victoria in 1866, was the most tranquil and hence the happiest. That colony had undergone significant and, at times, stormy changes during the term of the previous governor, Sir Charles Henry Darling*. Manners-Sutton had no serious confrontations with the assembly during his seven-year term, and was one of Victoria's most popular governors. He resigned in 1873 and returned to England to take his seat in the House of Lords, having become 3rd Viscount Canterbury on the death of his older brother.

Like many other British colonial administrators in the mid-19th century, Manners-Sutton was fighting a rearguard action against rising demands for local autonomy. His aristocratic upbringing and outlook contrasted sharply with the egalitarian and colonial mentality of men like Charles Fisher. Nevertheless, Manners-Sutton was able to work with these local politicians and to gain their grudging respect.

RICHARD WILBUR

PRO, CO 188/118, 188/122–188/135. New Brunswick House of Assembly, Debates, 1854–61. DNB. R. M. Crawford, Australia (rev. ed., London, 1963). Hannay, History of New Brunswick, II. MacNutt, New Brunswick, 353–93. Geoffrey Serle, The golden age: a history of the colony of Victoria, 1851–1861 (Melbourne, Aust., 1963). E. E. Williams, History of the people of Trinidad and Tobago (London, 1964).

MANSON, DONALD, HBC chief trader; b. 6 April 1796 at Thurso, Caithness, Scotland, son of Donald Manson and Jean Gunn; d. 7 Jan. 1880 at Champoeg, Oregon.

Donald Manson was engaged by the Hudson's Bay Company in 1817 and stationed at Rock Depot (Gordon House) on the Hayes River in present-day Manitoba. From there he went to Fort Superior and various other posts including Ile-à-la-Crosse in the English River District. An 1822 report noted that he was a "fine powerful active young man [and a] tolerable Clerk & Trader." Manson, once described by John Tod* as a "ramping highlander," had already begun to show his penchant for a rugged outdoor life. In 1822 he participated in expeditions led by Chief Factor Donald McKenzie* to the headwaters of the Missouri and South Saskatchewan rivers. Later in the same year, Manson travelled with Francis Heron* to examine the Bow and Red Deer rivers for possible trading post sites.

A report of 1825 confirms Manson's reputation as a "Fine strapping fellow" who "would be thrown away at an Establishment, active service being his forte." Late that year he was transferred as a clerk to the Columbia District, where, under John McLoughlin*, he helped to supervise improvements at Fort Vancouver with James McMillan* and John Work*. Then Manson was sent to build Fort Langley on the Fraser River in 1827. In the season of 1829–30, he was stationed at Fort George at the mouth of the Columbia. There he tried to rescue from the "Graveyard of the Pacific" two company ships, the William and Ann, which had gone down in March 1829, and the Isabella, which sank in May 1830.

Manson took charge of Fort Simpson on the Nass River in 1831 and explored the stream during that season. He explored the Skeena River in 1832, finding not "one solitary spot" suitable for a post. The following spring, he constructed Fort McLoughlin on Millbank Sound. In George Simpson*'s words, "Besides blasting and levelling, Mr. Manson, without aid of horse or ox, had introduced several thousand loads of gravel, while, by his judicious contrivances in the way of fortifications, he had rendered the place capable of holding out, with a garrison of twenty men, against all the natives of the coast." Manson was promoted to chief trader in 1837 and remained at Fort McLoughlin until 1839, when he travelled to Scotland. During this trip Manson was presented to the governor and committee in London on 21 Oct. 1840.

Manson took over Kamloops Post on the Thompson River in 1841. During 1843–44 he was in charge of Stikine, a post established in territory leased from Russia. One of his duties was to investigate the murder there of young John McLoughlin, son of the departmental governor. The senior McLoughlin was upset by Manson's apparent lack of vigour in searching out the killers and handing them over to the Russian authorities for trial, but apparently there was no evidence on which he could act.

From 1844 until his retirement in 1857, Manson was based at Fort St James on Stuart Lake in New Caledonia. Unfortunately, the final part of his career was marred by complaints that he treated his subordinates roughly. More than once, Governor Sir George Simpson reprimanded Manson for his bad temper and his reputation for harshness, and warned that "club law" would not be tolerated. It would appear that Manson was denied promotion to chief factor primarily because of his rough and abrasive ways.

In October 1828 Manson had married Félicité Lucier and they had eight children. After his retirement from the HBC, he and his family moved to Champoeg, Oregon, where they bought a farm on the banks of the Willamette River. The farm was inundated by a flood in December 1861, but the house remained unscathed. After his wife's death in 1867, Manson lived on at the farm until his own death.

Donald Manson was one of the many capable individuals who manned the farthest outposts of the huge HBC empire. A recent biographer, Harriet Munnick, describes him as "a typical trader in the employ of a great monopoly – tough, obstinate, a little grim, honest, humorless, and a titan for work."

Kenneth L. Holmes

PABC, "Biography of Donald Manson," typescript by J. A. Grant, 1938. Oregon State Library, Salem, Ore., Archives Division, U.S. Census Bureau, Population schedules, Oregon, 1860, Marion County, Champoeg Precinct, family no.2200; Oregon, 1870, Marion County, Champoeg Precinct, family no.961; schedules of mortality, Oregon, 1880, Marion County; Provisional Government recorder, Land claim records, 1845–49, 3, p.21. Canadian North-West (Oliver), II. Isaac Cowie, "The minutes of the Council of the Northern Department of Rupert's Land, 1830–1843," North Dakota State Hist. Soc. Coll., IV (1913), 644–862. HBRS, III (Fleming); XVIII (Rich and Johnson). Morice, History of northern interior of B.C. F. W. Howay, "Authorship of traits of Indian life," Oregon Hist. Q. (Portland, Ore.), XXXV (1934), 42–49. H. S. Lyman, "Reminiscences: Mrs. Anna Tremewan," Oregon Hist. Q. (Portland, Ore.), IV (1903), 261–64. H. D. Munnick, "Donald Manson," Mountain men and the fur trade, ed. L. R. Hafen (7v., Glendale, Cal., 1965–69), VII, 217–25. W. H. Rees, "Donald Manson," Oregon Pioneer Assoc. Trans. (Portland, Ore.), VII (1880).

MARIE DE BONSECOURS. See Gadbois

MARSHALL, JOHN GEORGE, lawyer, legislator, judge, author, and lecturer; b. at Country Harbour, N.S., in 1786; d. at Halifax, N.S., 7 April 1880, in full possession of his faculties.

John George Marshall was the son of Captain Joseph Marshall, a loyalist of the King's Carolina Rangers, and his wife Margaret. In 1794 the family moved to Guysborough where George received his early education before proceeding to Halifax grammar school. In 1803 he entered the law office of Judge Lewis Morris Wilkins* Sr, and was admitted to the bar of Nova Scotia in 1810. He first practised in Pictou, but later moved to Halifax where he built up a lucrative business. He married Catherine Jones on 26 Nov. 1809; they had several children.

In 1811 Marshall succeeded his father as representative for the county of Sydney (now Antigonish County) in the assembly, and held the seat until 1818. He was re-elected in 1820 and remained in the legislature until April 1823 when he resigned his seat. In the assembly he took great interest in bills which were designed to reform the social structure of the community. In 1823 he introduced a bill for the support of schools by local assessment and also backed a bill to give all creditors equal claim in bankruptcy suits. Although both bills failed to pass the house while Marshall was a member, the former was accepted by 1825 and the latter many years later.

Marshall resigned from the assembly on his appointment as chief justice of the Interior Court of Common Pleas and president of the Courts of General and Special Sessions, Custos Rotulorum, and justice of the peace for Cape Breton. He lived in Sydney for the 18 years he was on the bench, administering justice in a manner which commanded the respect of all and doing what he could to improve social and moral conditions in the province. When the Court of Common Pleas was abolished in 1841, Judge Marshall retired on pension and devoted the rest of his life to a number of causes which he felt would better the lot of the common people. He was a prolific writer upon almost every topic that men of his day discussed – law, temperance, education, to mention only a few. Although not a brilliant writer, he studied his subjects carefully and wrote forcibly. His best-known work was The justice of the peace, and county & township officer, in the province of Nova Scotia, which became a standard textbook for local magistrates.

Marshall was a zealous temperance advocate; he travelled widely on this continent and in Europe lecturing on the topic. Politically he was an anti-confederate. He supported Joseph HOWE with a zeal which prompted Howe to declare publicly in 1867, "When I think of a man of his age and intellect . . . aiding his countrymen in this struggle, I feel he has done that for us which hardly anyone else could have done so well. . . . The service which he has rendered his country will make me feel grateful towards him to the day of my death. . . ."

When Judge Marshall died, a personal friend, the editor of the Acadian Recorder, wrote: "A Puritan of the Puritans himself, he regarded worldly amusement in general as snares of the devil, and being utterly indifferent to popularity, he attacked right and left with a directness of speech in the cause of morality and righteousness. . . . He was a prodigious writer on a multitude of subjects, never hesitating to attack what he thought was wrong. He was stern and uncompromising, nevertheless he contributed of his limited means to all objects of charity and philanthropy, and he died as he had lived, in the midst of a true and noble fight."

C. E. THOMAS

A list of Marshall's publications appears in Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis. J. G. Marshall, The justice of the peace, and county & township officer, in the province of Nova Socita; being a guide to such justice and officers in the discharge of their official duties (2nd ed., Halifax, 1846). Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 7 April 1880. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 7 April 1880. Morning Herald (Halifax), 7 April 1880. Directory of N.S. MLAs (Fergusson). Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81. A. C. Jost, Guysborough sketches and essays (Guysborough, N.S., 1950). D. P. Floyd, "Jottings of Guysboro County happenings during the past centuries," Canso Breeze and Guysboro County Advocate (Canso, N.S.), 11 March 1921.

MARSHALL DE BRETT MARÉCHAL, JOSEPH, 2nd Baron d'Avray, professor, educator, and journalist; b. in London, Eng., 30 Nov. 1811, the eldest of 12 children of Joseph Head Marshall, 1st Baron d'Avray, and Elisabeth Golding Elrington; d. in Fredericton, N.B., 26 Nov. 1871.

Marshall d'Avray's early life was conditioned by the fact that his father was associated with Edward Jenner in the discovery of vaccination, and subsequently introduced the practice into Naples where he became physician extraordinary to King Ferdinand I and Queen Maria Carolina. The family lived much in France. Joseph Head Marshall warned the government of the impending escape of Napoleon from Elba, and he received his title as a reward for aiding in the restoration of the Bourbons in 1815. Marshall d'Avray was tutored by his father in company with the children of Louis-Philippe, and subsequently inherited his father's title at the latter's death in 1838. On the decline of the family fortunes, largely because of French dynastic changes, Marshall d'Avray found employment as a professor in the Royal College in Mauritius, but the climate there did not suit his wife, Margaret Emma Glenn. In 1848, he, his wife, and their daughter, Laurestine Marie, moved to Fredericton, N.B., where he had been appointed to found the first training school for teachers in the province.

As head of the normal school until it burned in November 1850, and later as chief superintendent of education (1854–58), d'Avray proceeded to institute a series of educational reforms which a modern student has characterized as "ultra-progressive." His policy was unjustly attacked by John Gregory*, secretary of the board of education, as undemocratic. Not unmindful of the importance of classical education, d'Avray nonetheless proposed the establishment of an agricultural college, to which a model farm would be attached. As an exponent of the philosophy of Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi and Philipp Emanuel von Fellenberg, he was the first in the province to perceive the need for a system of vocational education. During his tenure as chief superintendent of education, he defended King's College, Fredericton, where he had become professor of modern languages on 28 Oct. 1848, against the attacks of Albert James Smith*, member for Westmorland, and others in the legislature, who, largely for sectarian reasons, wished to deprive that institution of public support, and divert its grants to a denominational institution founded by the Methodists. With a view to making his defence of the college more effective, d'Avray assumed the editorship, in 1854, of a local newspaper, the Fredericton Head Quarters. Rough treatment at the hands of Smith and others on the floor of the assembly was the response to his mild editorial banter, and when the "Smasher" government succeeded to office in 1858, he, along with many others, lost his place, a circumstance that evoked a public outcry.

During the remainder of his life, he occupied himself exclusively with the duties of his professorship at King's College, Fredericton, and the University of New Brunswick, into which it was transformed in 1859. He was devoted to the teaching of English and French literature, but he opened to his students a wider spectrum than the university curriculum had hitherto provided, including, for the first time, works in political economy and modern history. Eldon Mullen, a former student of d'Avray and later deputy director of education in the Transvaal and Orange River colonies, wrote of him as "a thorough and elegant scholar with a keen appreciation of what was best and truest in literature." Bliss Carman* recalled Professor d'Avray and his wife as a most delightful couple: "he was a distinguished looking gentleman of the old school, with grey waxed moustache and a charming dry wit; she very animated, with sparkling dark eyes and an incessant fund of humour." At their home Carman first met George R. Parkin* who was to become, except for his parents, the chief influence on his life. Parkin and Canon George G. Roberts, the father of Sir Charles G. D. Roberts*, were two of Marshall d'Avray's most distinguished students and through them d'Avray became an influence upon the formation of the Fredericton school of poets, the first national movement in English-Canadian literature.

ALFRED G. BAILEY

[Many d'Avray family papers were destroyed in the great Fredericton fire of 1850; most of those remaining are with the Bailey papers in the University of New Brunswick Library. The family background is most fully treated by Marshall d'Avray's grandson, J. W. Bailey, in The curious story of Dr Marshall, with a few side lights on Napoleon and other persons of consequence (Cambridge, Mass., 1930). See also: Pietro Colletta, History of the Kingdom of Naples, 1734–1825, trans. by S. Horner (2v., Edinburgh, 1858), I, 403, and Sir Jonah Barrington, Personal sketches of his own times (3rd ed., 2v., London, 1869), II, 97–104, 145–50. J. W. Bailey gives a brief chapter to Marshall d'Avray in Loring Woart Bailey, the story of a man of science (Saint John, N.B., 1925) D'Avray's role as founder of New Brunswick's first training school for teachers and as superintendent of education is most fully treated in K. F. C. MacNaughton, The development of the theory and practice of education in New Brunswick, 1784–1900: a study in historical background, ed. and intro. A. G. Bailey (U. of New Brunswick Hist. Studies, I, Fredericton, N.B., 1947), chapters 7 and 8. For references to his professorship at King's College, New Brunswick, see The University of New Brunswick memorial volume, ed. A. G. Bailey (Fredericton, N.B., 1950), 22–32, and J. S. Willison, Sir George Parkin, a biography (London, 1929), 13–16. A.G.B.]

MASSON, ISIDORE-ÉDOUARD-CANDIDE, businessman and legislative councillor; b. 4 May 1826 at Montreal, L.C., son of Joseph Masson*, seigneur of Terrebonne, and Marie-Geneviève-Sophie Raymond*, founder of Collège Masson at Terrebonne in 1847; brother of Louis-François-Roderick* (Rodrigue), lieutenant governor of the province of Quebec 1884–87; d. 5 Aug. 1875 at Montreal, Que., buried 7 August in the old church at Terrebonne, and reinterred in 1880 in the present church in the Masson family's vault.

Isidore-Édouard-Candide Masson's family was originally from Vendée. Gilles, the forbear, born at Luçon in 1630, was still young when he emigrated to New France. Édouard's father belonged to the fifth generation of the Masson family. Around 1805 he left Saint-Eustache, his birthplace, to try his hand at business in Montreal. It was there that Édouard was born, the fifth child of a family of 14, eight boys and six girls.

At six years of age, that is in 1832, Édouard Masson left Montreal. His father had just bought the seigneury of Terrebonne. The new seigneur, who was already "the largest and richest merchant in Montreal," was able to provide his family with a comfortable existence in an unpretentious house beside the Thousand Islands River, opposite Île Jésus.

Édouard Masson was educated at the college of Montreal, then studied literature and science in England from 1842 to 1846. After his father's death on 15 May 1847, he and his eldest brother Wilfred (Wilfrid) took over the management of the family business, which consisted chiefly of dealing in cloth and fabrics, as well as in potash. Joseph Masson left three commercial undertakings: Joseph Masson, Fils et Cie., in Montreal; Masson, Langevin et Cie., in Quebec; and Masson, Sons and Company, in Glasgow, Scotland. Édouard Masson was also president of the Montreal Gas Company and major of the 12th Battalion of militia. On 17 Jan. 1848 he married Marie-

Josephte-Caroline Dumas, who gave him three boys and two girls.

Following in his father's footsteps, Édouard Masson became municipal councillor for the eastern district of Montreal in 1855. On 31 Oct. 1856 he was elected legislative councillor for the division of Thousand Islands, which comprised the counties of Terrebonne and Deux-Montagnes. Politically he was opposed to the Rouges of the time, but he maintained an independent position in relation to the Conservative party, of which George-Étienne CARTIER, conjointly with John A. Macdonald*, had just assumed the leadership. Masson returned to private life on 28 Sept. 1864, after being defeated by Dr Léandre Dumouchel*, an avowed supporter of the Conservative party.

Édouard Masson then devoted his energy and his "very fine intelligence" to the settlement of the vast territories to the north of Montreal. He was the founder and organizer of a large French-Canadian settlement at Sainte-Marguerite, in the picturesque and untouched region of the Laurentians. A large number of settlers came from the Terrebonne seigneury and its vicinity. A mission was founded in 1864, and in 1871 a church was built on a piece of land given in 1869 by Édouard Masson. He had received by letters patent a grant of 1,646 acres of land, which took in the lake that bears his name today. There he erected a saw and flour mill on the outlet, right beside the village. In 1875 the parish of Sainte-Marguerite-du-Lac-Masson numbered 700 souls.

Lac Masson, and the municipality of the parish of Sainte-Marguerite-du-Lac-Masson, where Édouard Masson lived himself for some years, preserve the memory of what he did for colonization. To the homage represented by the Laurentian place-name can be added that of a contemporary and friend of Édouard Masson: "He was," wrote Laurent-Olivier David*, "one of the most spiritual, likeable, and generous men of his day."

ANDRÉE DÉSILETS

AVM, B 2735; Biographies de conseillers. Bibliothèque de l'université de Montréal, Collection Baby, Correspondance et papiers concernant la famille, XXIII, 14225–26 (copies in PAC). PAC, MG 24, D47 (Robertson collection); MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 20, p.431; RG 4, B28, 138, no.5797. Private archives of Henri Masson (Montreal, Que.), family papers. "Correspondance de Jean Langevin avec son frère Hector (1843–1867)," Béatrice Chassé, édit., AQ Rapport, 1967, 51–55. "Lettres de Joseph-Adolphe Chapleau (1870–1896)," Fernand Ouellet, édit., APQ Rapport, 1959–60, 38–40. La Minerve (Montréal), 8 oct., 15 oct. 1856; 16 sept. 1864; 6 août 1875. Le Nouveau Monde (Montréal), 6 août 1875. Desjardins, Guide parlementaire. Raymond Masson, Généalogie des familles de Terrebonne (4v., Montréal, 1930–31). Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 241–42.

L.-O. David, Mes contemporains (Montréal, 1894), 261–68. C.-A. Gareau, Aperçu historique de Terrebonne; 200e anniversaire de fondation et congrès eucharistique (Montréal, 1927). J.-E. Garon, Historique de la colonisation dans la province de Québec de 1825 à 1940 (Québec, 1940). B.-A. Testard de Montigny, La colonisation, le nord de Montréal ou la région de Labelle (Montréal, 1895). É.-J. Auclair, "Terrebonne, les Masson, leur château," RSCT, 3rd ser., XXXVIII (1944), sect.I, 1–14.

MASSON, LUC-HYACINTHE, doctor, businessman, and politician; b. 16 Aug. 1811 at Saint-Benoît (Deux-Montagnes County), L.C., son of Louis Masson, tavern-keeper and militia captain, and of Marie-Louise Choquet; d. 18 Oct. 1880 at Coteau-Landing (Soulanges County) and buried 20 Oct. 1880 at Saint-Anicet, Que.

Luc-Hyacinthe Masson belonged to the fifth generation of an Orléans family that emigrated to Quebec in the middle of the 18th century. He learned the rudiments of grammar and mathematics while living at home in the little village of Saint-Benoît. He continued his education at the college of Montreal, then turned towards medicine, which he studied under Dr Robert NELSON. An arbitrary action of the government had made the youth susceptible to the political influence of the famous Dr Nelson: on 12 July 1827 his father had been relieved of his post as militia capatin for "Patriote activity."

In the spring of 1832 the epidemic of Asiatic cholera that reached Lower Canada from Europe pushed major political and national questions into the background. Doctors were summoned to another kind of heroism than that of nationalist resistance. The young student went to the assistance of the immigrants of Pointe-Saint-Charles, replacing his master, who had just fallen ill; on 1 Aug. 1832, at Saint-Clément-de-Beauharnois, he took the place of Dr Charles Fleming, who had succumbed to the disease. Masson's strong constitution enabled him to emerge unscathed from this arduous experience, and the following year, 1833, he qualified as a doctor. He practised first at Saint-Clément-de-Beauharnois, then in his native village of Saint-Benoît, where on 28 Jan. 1835 he bought a piece of land in Rue Saint-Jean-Baptiste.

At this time was formed the famous triumvirate of Jean-Joseph Girouard*, Jean-Olivier Chénier*, and Luc-Hyacinthe Masson, which formed the basis of the resistance of the north to the "Red Coats." Luc-Hyacinthe Masson took part in all the meetings prior to the rebellion and showed himself to be a fiery orator. Lord Gosford [Acheson*] as a result annulled his commission as justice of the peace. From words the young doctor quickly passed to action, and became closely involved in the organization of resistance on "military" lines. Arrested on 16 Dec. 1837, the day after the defeat at Saint-Eustache, he was exiled to the Bermudas by the proclamation of Lord Durham [Lambton*] on 28 June 1838. Luc-Hyacinthe obtained permission to practise medicine during his months of exile.

The disavowal of Lord Durham's proclamation by the British parliament allowed Luc-Hyacinthe Masson to leave the Bermudas. He entered the United States on 9 Nov. 1838. At Fort Covington, New York State, he opened a general store in partnership with his uncle, Eustache Masson, who, having been compromised and ruined by the rebellion, had resolved to take refuge in the United States with his family. The business was highly successful, and Luc-Hyacinthe married his uncle's daughter Cécile (Célinie). But Eustache Masson died in 1840, and two years later Luc-Hyacinthe decided to return to Canada. His liking for trade prevailed over his liking for medicine, and, in partnership with his brother Damien, Luc-Hyacinthe Masson laid at Saint-Anicet the foundations of a general business under the name of Masson et Cie. Through his drive and spirit of initiative he stimulated the growth of the new village of Saint-Anicet.

In 1844 Luc-Hyacinthe became collector of customs in the port of Dundee, on the Canadian-American border. He also became involved in municipal politics as mayor of Coteau-Landing and in provincial politics as representative for Soulanges in the assembly of the Province of Canada from 31 July 1854 to 28 Nov. 1857. In parliament he completed the task to which he had given his energy since 1849: the obtaining of an indemnity for farmers on the two shores of Lac Saint-François for damage caused by floods resulting from the construction of piers at the head of the Beauharnois Canal. In 1860 he took up residence on the other side of the river, at Coteau-Landing, where he again devoted himself to business. After confederation, Luc-Hyacinthe Masson was the representative for Soulanges in the Canadian House of Commons from 3 Sept. 1867 to 8 July 1872. The fiery Patriote agitator of 1837 had become a fervent supporter of the Conservative party.

In 1872 Luc-Hyacinthe Masson returned to private life. He held the offices of registrar of the county of Soulanges and of clerk of the circuit court, with residence at Coteau-Landing. Having lost his wife on 3 May 1846, he had married on 12 June 1849 Odile (Élodie) Watier, daughter of Joachim Watier of Coteau-du-Lac. Of his six children, only two survived him.

At the southwest corner of the monument to the Patriotes of 1837–38, erected in the cemetery of Côte-des-Neiges at Montreal, the name of Luc-Hyacinthe Masson bears witness to the tragic moments of a sometimes troubled life. His reputation as a philanthropist when he died on 18 Oct. 1880 is a testimony of another kind, to a life always well lived.

ANDRÉE DÉSILETS

AJM, Louis Richard, La famille Masson. AVM, B 2015. Archives paroissiales de Saint-Clément-de-Beauharnois (Beauharnois, Qué.), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures. Archives paroissiales de Saint-Ignace (Coteau-du-Lac, Qué.), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures. Archives paroissiales de Saint-Zotique (Coteau-Landing, Qué.), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures. ANQ, Jean-Joseph Girouard, Papiers personnels et lettres reçues, 17 août 1751; Ludger Duvernay, nos.292, 391; QBC, Procureur général, Événements de 1837–1838, nos.598, 669, 770, 803, 805, 845, 869, 3182, 4106, 4145. PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 20, p.450.

"Le journal de l'abbé N.-J. Ritchot, 1870," G. F. G. Stanley, édit., RHAF, XVII (1963–64), 537–64. "Les Patriotes aux Bermudes en 1838, lettres d'exil," Yvon Thériault, édit., RHAF, XVI (1962–63), 438; XVII (1963–64), 424–32. La Minerve (Montréal), 18 oct., 19 oct. 1880. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 19 avril 1877. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson), 358. Can. parl. comp., 1872. Desjardins, Guide parlementaire. Raymond Masson, Généalogie des familles de Terrebonne (4v., Montréal, 1930–31). R.-L. Séguin, "Biographie d'un patriote de '37, le Dr Luc-Hyacinthe Masson (1811–1880)," RHAF, III (1949–50), 349–66.

MASSON, MARC-DAMASE, merchant and businessman; b. 23 Feb. 1805 at Sainte-Geneviève on Montreal Island, L.C., son of Eustache Masson and Scholastique Pfeiffer (Payfer); d. 23 April 1878 at Montreal, Que.

Marc-Damase Masson's family came from Saint-Benoît parish in the town of Orléans (province of Orléanais). The first member of the family to take root in Canadian soil was Pierre, a manufacturer of pulleys (born in 1724). He married Marie-Louise Beaupré on 22 Feb. 1751 at Quebec, and their son Pierre-Marc was Marc-Damase Masson's grandfather.

Marc-Damase Masson spent the early years of his childhood on his father's farm at Sainte-Geneviève. He then lived at Saint-Clément-de-Beauharnois, where his father soon established a business. In 1829, after a good business training in the family environment, the young man became a merchant himself at Saint-Clément-de-Beauharnois. On 1 Feb. 1830 he married Virginie Jobin, daughter of the notary André Jobin* of Montreal.

Eight children were born of this marriage: three boys and five girls.

Marc-Damase Masson's business position was excellent when the 1837 rebellion broke out. The young merchant aligned himself with the Patriotes. His property was "destroyed by the soldiery," and he thereby lost the results of several years' work. In 1839 he moved to Montreal to re-establish himself, and thanks to his experience and unremitting toil he succeeded in becoming a leading Montreal businessman. At the corner of McGill and Notre-Dame streets he opened a wholesale and retail grocery, which, as the Montreal Herald and Daily Commercial Gazette was to write on 23 April 1878, "he carried on most successfully, making the house of D. Masson & Co. not only one of the largest, but one of the best known firms throughout the city and country." After his death his three sons, Damase, Alfred, and Adolphe, continued their father's large business.

Marc-Damase Masson's activities became more numerous and varied as his business grew. In 1846, a number of prominent Montreal citizens founded the Montreal City ond District Savings Bank. The majority of Montreal banks at that time were strictly commercial banks, that is, they met only the needs of trade. The basic principles of the Savings Bank were the value and necessity of saving and the need to popularize the habit. Together with a few of the most prominent Montreal citizens of the time, Marc-Damase Masson was elected a director of the new bank from 1846 to 1850. According to the official organ of the Savings Bank, "this was a judicious choice. Masson, an honest and prosperous merchant, put his experience at the disposal of his colleagues, so that the Savings Bank would be established on sound bases."

On 13 Dec. 1846 Marc-Damase Masson was chosen churchwarden of Notre-Dame. In February 1855 he was elected by popular vote to the council of the city of Montreal. He sat for three years as alderman for the St Lawrence district, and for some years was chairman of the finance committee. He contributed generously to the building of the aqueduct and to other improvements in the town. In 1858 he became president of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste, and in 1861 was among the businessmen who, with Hugh Allan* as president, founded the Merchants' Bank. Lacking sufficient capital, the bank did not open its doors until three years after receiving its charter. Masson was one of its directors until his death and one of its biggest shareholders. He took a great deal of interest in this institution and it largely owed to him its few years of prosperity, from the time of its purchase of the Commercial Bank of the Midland District in 1868 until 1873. The Merchants' Bank then suffered from the Canadian Pacific railway scandal in which Allan was implicated, as well as from the economic crisis that followed. But because it had been launched properly, the bank recovered after 1878 and extended its operations throughout the whole of Canada. It had acquired a valued place among Canadian banks by 1921, when it was taken over by the Bank of Montreal. Marc-Damase Masson was a director of the Richelieu Company, and also a member of the board of directors of several insurance companies, among them the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company [see SINCENNES].

On 23 April 1878 he died at Montreal, at the age of 73. His name was highly esteemed in the business world, where he had distinguished himself by his honesty in public and private dealings: "His word was above reproach, and he steadily tried by his example to instil into those who came in contact with him the same high principles."

ANDRÉE DÉSILETS

AJM, Louis Richard, la famille Masson. AVM, 3610.4, 3610.6; Biographies de conseillers. Archives paroissiales de Sainte-Geneviève (Pierrefonds, Qué.), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures, 23 févr. 1805, 14 sept. 1853. Gazette (Montreal), 23 April 1878. La Minerve (Montréal), 24 avril 1878. Montreal Herald and Daily Commercial Gazette, 23 April 1878. Le National (Montréal), 23 avril 1878. Le Nouveau Monde (Montréal), 23 avril, 26 avril 1878. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 25 avril, 2 mai 1878. The Canadian album . . ., ed. William Cochrane et al. (5v., Brantford, Ont., and Toronto, 1891–96), V, 117. Raymond Masson, Généalogie des familles de Terrebonne (4v., Montréal, 1930–31). Tanguay, Dictionnaire, V. Denison, Canada's first bank. É.-Z. Massicotte, Processions de la Saint-Jean-Baptiste en 1924 et 1925 (Montréal, 1926), 40–41. R.-L. Séguin, "Biographie d'un patriote de '37, le Dr Luc-Hyacinthe Masson (1811–1880)," RHAF, III (1949–50), 496.

MATHESON, RODERICK, merchant, militia officer, and politician; b. December 1793, in Lochcarron, Ross County (now Ross and Cromarty), Scotland, son of John Matheson and Flora Macrae; m. at Montreal, 5 Nov. 1823, Mary Fraser Robertson who died in 1825, then on 11 Aug. 1830 at Gavilock, Scotland, Annabella Russel by whom he had at least five sons, one of whom, Arthur James*, was treasurer of Ontario, 1905–13; d. Perth, Ont., 13 Jan. 1873.

Roderick Matheson moved to Lower Canada with a brother at the age of 12. He was a sergeant in the Canadian Fencibles when, on 12 Feb. 1812, he was named quartermaster of the Glengarry Light Infantry Fencibles. He was wounded during the attack on Sackets Harbor, N.Y., on 29 May 1813, and promoted lieutenant on 21 August. He ended the war as the paymaster of the regiment and was placed on the half-pay list in 1816. He was granted land the following year in the military settlement at Perth, around which the rest of his life centred.

Matheson was named returning officer at Perth in 1820. The next year he was gazetted captain in the newly formed 2nd Battalion Carleton militia, and on 18 June 1822 major of the 4th Battalion. These positions were contrary to the rule that militia promotions were to be based on relative seniority in the British army and elicited remonstrances from several half-pay officers senior to Matheson. He was not present at the fray at Perth between a company of the 4th Carleton and the Irish immigrants at the militia muster in April 1824, but he was among the justices of the peace who restored order. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 1st Regiment Renfrew militia in November 1846, and in the next month of the 2nd Lanark. On 14 Sept. 1855 he was made colonel and given command of the 1st military district of Canada West, a post he retained until 1863.

Matheson used his land grant and regular income from half pay wisely. He established a successful general store in Perth, bought land, and was a director in William Morris*' Tay Navigation Company. On 24 Aug. 1833, he was appointed one of ten commissioners of the court of requests for the 1st division of the Bathurst District, and he was a member of the board of education of Perth. He also took a lively interest in securing internal improvements in the Bathurst District. Sir Charles Metcalfe* put his name forward in 1844 as a possible nominee to the Legislative Council. In February 1847, William Henry Draper again placed Matheson on a list of nominations to Lord Elgin [Bruce*] for a seat in the Legislative Council. He was appointed on 27 May 1847. Matheson sat in the upper chamber as a conservative until 1867 when he was named a senator. He helped in 1855 to defeat a bill supporting an elective Legislative Council by introducing resolutions against the principle.

The first of a series of paralytic strokes in December 1867 disabled Matheson and another stroke on 7 Jan. 1873 caused his death at Perth one week later.

Geo. Mainer

PAC, RG 8, I, A1, 625, p.33; D2, 1168, p.93; RG 9, I, B1, 17, 4 Jan., 14 Aug. 1822; 18, 27 March, 5 July 1822. PRO, CO 42/519, index entry for missing p.310; 42/541, index entry for missing p.386; 42/542, index entry for missing p.453; 42/598, 142 (copies at PAC). Bathurst Courier (Perth), 5 Sept. 1834; 10 July 1840; 4 April 1842; 7 March, 22 May, 20 June 1843; 16 Jan. 1844. Brockville Recorder, 24 July 1845. Canada Gazette (Montreal; Quebec), 5 June 1847, 17 Oct. 1863. Montreal Gazette, 2 Nov. 1813, 8 Nov. 1823, 14 Oct. 1830. Perth Courier, 17 Jan. 1873. Upper Canada Gazette (York), 17 Sept. 1821. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1888), 459.

MAYRAND, ÉTIENNE, businessman and politician; b. 3 Sept. 1776 at Montreal, Quebec, of the marriage of Jean-Baptiste Mayrand and Agathe Roy; d. 22 Jan. 1872 at Rivière-du-Loup (Louiseville, Maskinongé County), Que.

Young Étienne Mayrand's intellectual training was probably rather superficial, although elementary schools directed by the Sulpicians did exist at Montreal at that time. He early became interested in the fur trade and travelled in the Canadian west, working for the North West Company; he returned from this venture with a sizeable capital. While he was in the west, Étienne Mayrand had married an Indian; she bore him two daughters, whom he brought back with him to Lower Canada. The exact date of this return is not known, but it was certainly at the beginning of the 19th century, since Mayrand married his second wife, Sophie Héneau, of Berthier on 20 Aug. 1806; they had one child, who died young. He established himself at Rivière-du-Loup, where he made a fortune in the grain and hay business. His success enabled him to act as a moneylender and real estate agent. He built a comfortable stone house measuring 60 feet in length by 35 feet in width, with two large rooms serving as "salons," one for his family and the other for the master of the house. If an absent-minded visitor made his way into the latter without having been expressly invited, "he was withered with a look," Édouard-Zotique Massicotte* remarked, and he learned with brutal clarity that "the master was not receiving at the moment."

During the War of 1812 Mayrand served as an officer of the militia. He was promoted lieutenant in the 2nd Rivière-du-Loup Battalion in 1813, and then was appointed captain in the 8th Battalion of the Trois-Rivières division. He kept his interest in the military and, in 1846, was major of the 4th Battalion of Saint-Maurice County. He retired from the militia in 1855 at the age of 79.

Mayrand's remarkable success in business led him to take an interest in politics. In November 1809 he served as returning officer for Saint-Maurice County, when Louis Gugy* was chosen to represent this county in the House of Assembly. He also canvassed for votes himself in this constituency, which he represented from 1816 to 1820 (according to Édouard-Zotique Massicotte he was an MHA from 1816 to 1838). He was a believer in law and order, and in politics was always a thoroughgoing Conservative. On 2 April 1838 he was nominated a member of the Special Council that replaced the House of Assembly during the disturbances of 1837–38, and took part in the deliberations of that body until the setting up of the government of the Union in 1841. Finally, on 9 June 1841 he became a member of the Legislative Council, but resigned on the 22nd of the same month. He then gave his attention to finance and real estate.

In addition to his commercial and political activities, Étienne Mayrand also took on various important responsibilities in the public life of his region and even at the provincial level. He was appointed commissioner for internal communications in Lower Canada (12 Jan. 1818), commissioner for small causes (13 Nov. 1821), member of a commission instructed to make a hydrographic survey of Lac Saint-Louis with a view to improving its navigability (5 July 1836), and commissioner for the administration of the oath of allegiance (21 Dec. 1837).

Francis-Joseph Audet*, in his work on the members of the assembly for Saint-Maurice, states that Mayrand was a "school visitor" for his county (4 July 1826): the statement can only refer to the royal schools created by the school act of 1801, for the law establishing schools under public trustees was not passed until 1829. A royal school did exist at Rivière-du-Loup, and it is probable that Mayrand was named a visitor to it by reason of his social standing. "Visitors," according to the regulations of the Royal Institution, were to make a report to the corporation every six months, on "the number and progress of the pupils, the conduct of the master, his conformity or non-conformity with the directives of the Institution, any deficiencies in the provisions made for the education offered at the school, and any irregularity in the method of applying them." They were also to "make a formal inspection of the school . . . , they have the authority to determine the school hours, the number and duration of the holidays and the different feast-days it is appropriate to allocate, to establish the rate of tuition and to name the children who will be admitted free and those whose parents will be obliged to pay, all this being subject to the approval of the Institution."

Étienne Mayrand died at Rivière-du-Loup, at the venerable age of 96. On 30 Sept. 1811, at Montreal, after his second wife's death, he had married Thérèse Heney, who bore him eight children and died in 1825. On 2 Aug. 1827, at Quebec, he married again, his fourth wife being Félicité Le Maître-Bellenoix, Louis Gauvreau's widow. Étienne Mayrand served his country loyally under four sovereigns, George III, George IV, William IV, and Queen Victoria, no less than 19 governors general, and 21 lieutenant governors. He was a witness of three constitutions: 1791, 1840, and the confederation of Canada.

Louis-Philippe Audet

AJM, Registre d'état civil (notes biographiques fournies par J.-J. Lefebvre). Desjardins, Guide parlementaire. Journal de la chambre d'Assemblée du Bas-Canada, 1824, app.Y, "Règles et règlements pour les écoles de fondation royale dans la province du Bas-Canada sous la conduite de l'Institution royale." Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 134–35. Audet, Le système scolaire de la province de Québec, IV, 274–75. F.-J. Audet, Les députés de Saint-Maurice, 1808–1838, et de Champlain, 1830–1838 (Pages trifluviennes, sér. A, 12, Trois-Rivières, Qué., 1934), 45–48; "Membres du Conseil spécial," BRH, VII (1901), 82–83. F.-L. Desaulniers, "Les députés de Saint-Maurice," BRH, V (1899), 284–85. É.-Z. Massicotte, "La famille de l'honorable Étienne Mayrand," BRH, XXXIII (1927), 708–12.

MEDCALF, FRANCIS HENRY, millwright, ironfounder, Orangeman, and politician; b. 10 May 1803 at Delgany, County Wicklow, Ireland, son of William and Martha Medcalf; d. 26 March 1880 at Toronto, Ont.

Francis Henry Medcalf's parents emigrated to Upper Canada with their eight children in 1819 and settled on the Big Otter Creek in Bayham Township on land bought from Thomas Talbot*. About 1823, Francis Henry moved to Philadelphia where he worked as a blacksmith and millwright. He returned to Upper Canada in 1839, living in Toronto, and by 1843 he had his own business as millwright and machinist. In 1847 he opened the Don Foundry and Machine Shop, specializing in agricultural implements and machinery, in steam engines, and in heavy castings for grist- and sawmills.

Philadelphia in the 1830s was a battleground between Irish Roman Catholics and Protestants; Medcalf was for the rest of his life the staunchest of Orangemen. He was several times master of Lodge 275 in Toronto, district (later county) master for Toronto from 1854 to 1862, and from 1862 to 1864 provincial grand master of Canada West. In 1860 Medcalf first ran for office and was elected alderman in Toronto; he sat again in 1863 and from 1867 to 1871. His lodge service took him into the mayoral election of January 1864. The separate school controversy was at its height in 1863 and a coalition of Liberals (marshalled by George Brown's Globe), Orangemen, and Tories brought him forward to oppose Mayor John G. Bowes*. Bowes, a defender of separate schools, was said to be too clever as well as too deceitful. Medcalf, a simple mechanic risen by hard toil, was pictured by contrast as honest and bluff, with no pretence to skill in argument or finesse in finance. He was also the adamant Protestant candidate. He deprived Bowes of a seventh term.

In 1865 Medcalf won the mayoralty overwhelmingly and in 1866 he was not opposed. So seriously did he take this mandate that in 1866 cooler heads had to restrain him from precipitating bloodshed on St Patrick's Day, when fears of a confrontation with Fenians were high. From 1867 to 1873 the city council chose the mayor, but when the system of popular election returned in 1874 Medcalf once again received most votes. By 1876, however, when even supporters acknowledged his torpor, he was heavily defeated. Already in March 1871 he had been beaten in the provincial constituency of East Toronto by Matthew Crooks Cameron*.

Medcalf married Mary Harrison of Philadelphia in 1831, and they had six children. The four sons were brought into their father's trade; the third son, Alfred, entered into a partnership with his father and took over the foundry after Medcalf's death in 1880.

A favourite with the ambitious and the common man alike, Medcalf was nicknamed "Old Squaretoes," pointing up his utilitarian boots, and he gloried in the name as a mark of his incorruptible ordinariness. The only matters which aroused him to anger and eloquence were Catholic assertiveness and slurs on the Orange order. He had been a man who joined fraternal societies, and his long funeral procession included Orangemen, freemasons, oddfellows, and foresters.

BARRIE DYSTER

MTCL, Toronto Public Libraries scrapbooks, II, especially election card for 1874. PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 237, Gilbert McMicken to Macdonald, 18 March 1866. St James' Cemetery (Toronto). Loyal Orange Association of British North America, Grand Lodge, Annual Reports, 1847–57. Toronto, City Council, Minutes of proceedings, 1860–71, 1874–76. Globe (Toronto), 1860; January 1861; December 1863; January, December 1864; January, December 1865; January 1866; January 1874; 1875–76; 29 March 1880. Leader (Toronto), December 1863; January, December 1864; January, December 1865; January 1866. Mail (Toronto), 29 March 1880.

City of Toronto directory, for 1867–8 (Toronto, 1867). Commemorative biog. record, county York, 626–27. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1886), 124. The Toronto directory and street guide for 1843–4, ed. Francis Lewis (Toronto, 1843). Hist. of Toronto and county of York, II, 108–9. Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), VI, 153–64, 195. Middleton, Municipality of Toronto. S. B. Warner, The private city: Philadelphia in three periods of its growth (Philadelphia, 1968).

MEILLEUR, JEAN-BAPTISTE, doctor, educator, founder of the college of L'Assomption, MLA, first superintendent of education in Lower Canada; b. 8 May 1796 at Petite-Côte, in the parish of Saint-Laurent (Montreal Island), L.C., son of Jean Meilleur and Marie-Suzanne Blaignier; d. 6 Dec. 1878 at Montreal, Que.

An only son, Jean-Baptiste Meilleur was 14 months old when his father died. His mother remarried in 1798, and his paternal grandparents brought him up. It is not known what form his elementary education took. A family tradition has it that at 19 he came into his inheritance and registered at the college of Montreal, where he completed his classical studies among students younger than himself. He became acquainted at the college with a young American convert, John Holmes*, a native of Vermont and a future teacher at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec. Meilleur wanted to become a lawyer, but Holmes advised him to go to New England and study medicine.

Meilleur left the college, attended an English school at Montreal, enrolled in 1821 at Castleton Academy of Medicine (Vermont), which was affiliated to Middlebury College at Montpelier (Vermont), and followed the courses in science and medicine given at both institutions. Chemistry and botany were taught by a famous teacher, Amos Eaton, and experimental physics and mineralogy by Frederick Hall, who had a great influence on Meilleur. On 18 Nov. 1824 Meilleur defended a thesis, "On Scrofula," which earned him his doctorate in medicine; this was conferred on him in 1825 by Middlebury College, at the time when he was registered as a graduate student at Dartmouth College, Hanover (New Hampshire). During his stay at Middlebury and Hanover, Meilleur gave private French lessons, and in 1825 published A treatise on the pronunciation of the French language . . ., as well as several other short works which are today equally untraceable. His stay in the United States was beneficial for Meilleur. He noticed the enthusiasm displayed by the inhabitants of that country for public education in comparison with the little store set by it in Lower Canada. In addition, he acquired scientific knowledge which would help in the education of his fellow-countrymen.

In February 1826, on his return to Canada, Meilleur took up residence at L'Assomption. The following month the Medical Board granted him a licence, and he began medical practice, which he carried on concurrently with his educational, scientific, and political activities. On 26 June 1827, at Repentigny, he married Joséphine Éno, dit Deschamps. Ten children were born of this marriage, one of them being Joséphine-Charlotte who married Georges-Isidore Barthe*.

During the 15 years he lived at L'Assomption, Meilleur practised medicine and took an active part in public life. He soon acquired a competency, and the various official positions in which he served gave him a firm reputation as an enlightened citizen. In 1827 he received a commission as lieutenant in the 1st militia battalion of Leinster (L'Assomption County), and five years later a commission as surgeon of the 2nd militia battalion of Berthier (Berthier County). After being named a member of the Medical Board in 1831, he was appointed census-taker and justice of the peace for Leinster County, and in 1834 became postmaster at L'Assomption. From 1827 on, he had been actively involved in the elections to the House of Assembly, and in November 1834 was elected, at the same time as Édouard-Étienne Rodier*, for L'Assomption County; he served until 1838.

Meilleur's political venture was a brief one, but he sat in the assembly amid the feverish atmosphere that preceded the 1837 rebellion. His colleague Rodier, one of the most prominent members of the Patriote party, endeavoured, unsuccessfully, to see that Meilleur, who was considered a moderate, did not follow those who broke away from Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU. When the orator came to harangue the students of L'Assomption, Meilleur replied tartly to his impassioned appeals. Although in sympathy with the Patriotes' cause, he disapproved of their appeals to violence, and he went through all the parishes in his county to exhort the population to obey the pastoral letter of Bishop Jean-Jacques Lartigue*.

As a member of the house standing committees on education, hospitals, and charitable institutions, Meilleur had a hand in the passing of a bill creating normal schools. But the opposition of the Legislative Council prevented the renewal of the 1829 primary schools act, thus forcing some 1,300 schools to close their doors. Meilleur got approval for the purchase of the museum established by Pierre Chasseur, and he was made responsible for classifying the collection of animals that Chasseur had placed in their natural habitat. This museum was almost completely destroyed in the fire that devastated the Quebec parliament in 1854.

Meilleur's interest in education and science was revealed also by the numerous letters and articles he published from 1826 on in La Minerve of Montreal, of which he was the correspondent, in Michel Bibaud*'s Bibliothèque canadienne, and in L'Écho du Pays and Le Glaneur of Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu. He wrote on chemistry, domestic economy, the salt-impregnated water of L'Assomption, geology, agriculture, and the Hessian fly; in 1826 and 1827 he published in the Quebec Medical Journal, the first Canadian medical journal, two articles, one "On prussic acid" and another "On scrofula," which was his doctoral thesis. In 1828, in La Minerve, Meilleur began to publish letters on education which gave rise to a long controversy; he kept it alive himself, signing some of his letters with various pseudonyms. In this way he prepared people's minds for the founding of a college at L'Assomption, where he had become a trustee of the parish schools established by the act of 1829. He undertook to give regularly each week in the village schools explanations and exercises relating to grammar, arithmetic, and geography. In 1833 he published a Nouvelle grammaire anglaise, and, at Montreal, his Cours abrégé de leçons de chymie. The latter work, intended for the youth of the schools, was the first of its kind written by a Canadian and published in Canada. Having finally won over the parish priest, Abbé François Labelle, and his confrère, Dr Louis-Joseph-Charles Cazeneuve, he founded with them the college of L'Assomption, which opened its doors in 1834. The founders, the priest's brothers, and some friends subscribed the funds required for its construction, and Meilleur obtained from the Legislative Assembly a grant for its operation. The teaching followed Lancaster's mutual system, which was popular at the time (under the master's direction, the most advanced pupils instructed the youngest). Except for the parish priest Labelle, the teachers were all laymen [see DUPUY]; the pupils who were boarders took their meals at the presbytery as did the teachers.

The deplorable state of education in Lower Canada and the ways to remedy it were one of the concerns of Lord Durham [Lambton*]. In July 1838 he issued letters patent, which were published in the papers, instructing Arthur Buller*, a member of his administrative staff, to "inquire and seek information as to the past and present methods of utilizing all moneys or funds intended for or applicable to education in the said province of Lower Canada." Meilleur replied to this invitation. An exchange of letters began on 3 Aug. 1838 in Le Populaire of Montreal; the first one, signed with the initials A.B., was followed by a reply signed C.D. of which Meilleur claimed the authorship; he also said that the one signed A.B. was by Arthur Buller. In four letters, printed in Le Canadien of Quebec, Meilleur outlined plans for the organization and financial support of public instruction, from the primary school to the classical college. A.B. published three letters in this paper, and other correspondents took part in this interesting discussion, to which Meilleur replied in a fifth letter.

Meiller did not favour imposing a land tax because of the poverty and even destitution of the farmers and proposed in his letters that, at least at the beginning, primary education should be free. To balance the cost, the wealth of the Jesuits would be used, particularly to subsidize the classical colleges, where he wished to see the direction and teaching reserved for the clergy. He suggested increasing customs duties on tobacco and alcoholic beverages, and raising the amount charged for innkeepers' licences. Finally, the savings realized by reducing the enormous salaries of certain officials would be allocated for education.

In his second letter Meilleur analysed the causes of the sorry plight of education: the apathy, ignorance, and prejudice of too great a number of farmers, bad administration on the part of trustees who were sometimes illiterate, the incompetence and poor habits of too many teachers, and the beggarly emoluments of schoolmasters. In the third, he described the school organization he advocated. He visualized four levels, including classical teaching, leading to the priesthood and the professions; academic teaching, including model schools, analogous to the high schools he admired in the United States, and preparing for commerce, business, the classical course, and, as necessary, training future elementary school teachers; and normal schools for the training of secondary school teachers. The fourth level, primary school, would be obligatory, and Meilleur's wish was that after 10 years no one would be allowed to hold a public office if he had not at least this level of instruction. Boards of examiners would confer teachers' certificates, and visitors would see that the schools, administered by trustees elected by all groups of a parish, were pedagogically and financially efficient. Meilleur, firmly convinced that a law of this kind would be successful, was ready to assume full responsibility for it.

Meilleur's observations were well received by Lord Durham, who made favourable mention of them in his famous Report, but the plan did not correspond to his views. When the union of the two Canadas was an accomplished fact, a Montreal lawyer Charles-Elzéar Mondelet published in the Canada Times of November and December 1840 a series of letters. In them he proposed the setting up of communal schools, in which religious instruction would be given under the supervision of ministers of the various churches, and which would be financed by a land tax, and the creation of school districts administered by commissioners, of whom some would be elected and others nominated by the district inspectors, the whole being under the jurisdiction of a superintendent appointed by the governor. The plan was coldly received by the religious authorities; however, the education act of 1841 was partly based on Mondelet's proposals, and everyone thought he would be appointed superintendent of education. But when he was appointed a judge by the governor, Sir Charles Bagot*, Meilleur asked for the post of superintendent. In 1842 Bagot, judging that one man could not perform its duties properly, appointed an unpaid superintendent, responsible to parliament, and two deputy superintendents: Meilleur for Lower Canada and the Reverend Robert Murray* for Upper Canada.

Meilleur, who had been practising medicine in Montreal since 1840, was the obvious choice for the duties that were being entrusted to him. Bilingual, and a man of integrity, he had acquired valuable experience in the field of education. He had, however, to set in motion, in deplorable conditions and in the unhealthy political climate of the first years of the union, a law that went against his own convictions. The 1841 act related to both schools and rural municipalities, and in practice did not distinguish between the municipal councils and the school commissions that in a way emanated from them. The members of these commissions, elected by the taxpayers of the school districts, were to administer the schools, while the mayors and treasurers of the municipalities, appointed by the governor, received the grants paid by the superintendent of schools and were authorized to levy and collect school taxes as well as municipal taxes. The people, who had never paid any taxes, detested the school tax, the more because it was imposed on them by non-elected officials. The act did not provide for initial expenses, maintenance costs, or the payment of staff for the office of the deputy superintendent, who had furthermore to be content with a salary lower than that of his counterpart in Upper Canada. Under these conditions, about which Meilleur constantly complained, he had to revive schools which had been closed for six years and create others, knowing that there were not enough competent teachers to meet the demand. He had no real authority over school curricula and textbooks, any more than he had over the choice of schoolmasters.

During the 13 years of his administration, Meilleur had to apply seven different versions of the schools act. The 1845 version corrected a few anomalies of the original act: it made Meilleur the superintendent of education for Lower Canada, and put the parish rather than the municipality at the base of the school system. In addition, it replaced the obligatory tax by a voluntary contribution, collection of which, Meilleur foresaw, would be difficult and uncertain. In 1846 an act set up parish school commissions; their members, elected by the landowners, were to raise, through contributions, a sum equal to the grant made by the superintendent. A board of examiners was to approve the school textbooks and the teachers' certificates, but the commissioners hired the teachers and could decide upon the curricula to be used in their schools. It has been said of this act that it was the great charter of public instruction in Quebec, but contemporaries did not view it in this way. The habitants of the country districts, spontaneously or at the instigation of demagogues, many of whom were MLAs, saw in it nothing less than the dreaded spectre of taxation, and that is how what has been called the guerre des éteignoirs began. Parents withdrew their children from the schools; elections of commissioners were interfered with; prominent citizens and members of the clergy who supported the superintendent and the government were intimidated; schools were burned. In certain places the government had to be asked to call in the militia to re-establish order. These disturbances lasted until about 1850, at which time, in the face of the firm attitude of the superintendent, the clergy, and the civil authorities, the rural population calmed down and recognized the benefits that education could bring them. The acts of 1849 and 1851 brought Meilleur only part of what he had been seeking for a long time: visitors, then school inspectors, whom he had appointed immediately, and normal schools, which came into existence only under his successor's administration.

Meilleur, especially at the beginning of his administration, could well say that having had to struggle unremittingly against difficulties and obstacles not created by him, he had had more worries and weariness than success in the application of an unpopular act, and that no one seemed to know what the Department of Education was. Later he was able to congratulate himself on the ever growing number of schools and of pupils who attended them. This increase meant an added burden of work and responsibilities too heavy for one man, who was approaching 60 years of age. Meilleur's personality did not make things easier. He was a blunt man, who did not brook interference in his affairs. Portraits of him show a man with a high, broad forehead, thin lips, and a strong jaw; the look appears at first severe and inquisitive, but one detects a certain gentleness in it. His didactic writings testify to his respect for science as a source of certainty and to his sense of order and method, which often became dogmatic. His astounding memory and almost universal curiosity induced him, except when he was a superintendent, to give the newspapers his opinion on all manner of questions. But if he wrote a lot it was because, as a timid and uncommunicative man, he preferred the pen to the spoken word as a way of convincing people and if need be to justify himself.

His correspondence with Abbé Louis-Édouard Bois*, his only confidant, shows that in trying to escape the interventions of politicians Meilleur was uncompromising in the extreme. His letters are full of his complaints, his anxieties about his family, whom he accused himself of neglecting, but also of his suspicions concerning MLAs and ministers and of accusations against them. His distrust, not always justified, prevented him from associating with those who might have been able to help him.

When the government left Montreal, after the riots and the burning of the parliament buildings in 1849, Meilleur followed it neither to Toronto nor to Quebec, where it sat alternatively. Far from the centre of power, the superintendent found himself more and more isolated and overlooked. During this period, classical teaching in Lower Canada was at its peak, and the Institut Canadien was the focal point of renewed intellectual activity at Montreal and Quebec; younger men were entering parliament, and among the school commissioners were men better educated than others about whose competence he had complained. Those whom Meilleur called his adversaries cast doubt on the quality of the masters and the education they were dispensing. In 1853, to ascertain what the situation was, the Legislative Assembly appointed a special committee, presided over by Louis-Victor Sicotte*, the member for Saint-Hyacinthe, "to inquire into the state of education." Meilleur, who thought Sicotte was proud, vindictive, and arrogant, considered this inquiry a personal insult.

The Sicotte report brought out facts such as the illiteracy of half the commissioners, and the lack of qualifications of the majority of male and female teachers, of whom most were too young and all were badly paid. These were things that the superintendent, anxious to open schools and lacking teachers, had been unable to prevent, since the act gave him neither the authority nor the means to do so. The committee did not blame Meilleur directly, but concluded that the school system needed "a directorate that is active, energetic, and intelligent, and has the right to take the initiative. . . .” However, the report recommended keeping the structure and principles of the 1846 act, while modifying its details and increasing the financial participation of the government, so that the plans the committee was submitting might be carried out. The most important were the appointment of competent inspectors, fewer and better paid, who would preside over the examiners’ boards of the school districts and form, with the superintendent, the Council of Instruction; this council would be responsible for applying the schools act, and, among other activities, choosing and approving the school texts and having them printed, and ensuring the uniformity of teaching methods. Finally, the report recommended that normal schools be opened at Quebec and Montreal, that teachers be better paid, and that they be assured of a pension after 30 years of teaching.

The Legislative Assembly did not put this report into effect. For his part, Meilleur prepared a plan designed to correct a situation he deplored, but the government of Francis Hincks* and Augustin-Norbert Morin* did not deem it opportune to bring it before the assembly. Meilleur’s position rapidly became untenable, and on 19 June 1855 the superintendent resigned. Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau* succeeded him. Chauveau was more fortunate than his predecessor, whom he praised in his first Rapport annuel for “the intelligent and continued efforts, the determined perseverance, the even superhuman patience required merely to manage to set in motion a law that was unfortunately unpopular.” He had the support of a council and a department of education established in 1856. Meilleur never forgave Chauveau for not mentioning his name in this report, and in 1859 picked a useless quarrel with him in La Minerve, over a trifling botanical question.

Meilleur’s career continued to wane, although on several occasions his fellow-citizens showed him their gratitude. Immediately after his resignation he was appointed director, then in 1861 inspector, of the post office at Montreal. He ran into serious difficulties in this appointment, being obliged to make good from his own pocket a cash deficit for which he was not responsible, and he left his employment. As he could not continue to live except by using up his slender resources, he accepted the office of justice of the peace, and, in response to a petition from 30 MLAs worried about his fate, the government appointed him temporarily a distributor of legal stamps. When confederation, which he had combatted, finally came into being, he became provincial deputy registrar, with residence at Quebec, and his salary was paid until his death.

In retirement, the former superintendent found new intellectual vigour. In 1857 he attended the congress of the American Association for the Advancement of Science held at Montreal, was a member of the local organizing committee, and deplored the apathy of his French-speaking fellow-citizens. The following year he disputed the validity of the opinion of those who claimed that French Canadians had no aptitude for sciences. The Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste of Montreal had elected him president “in recognition of the outstanding services he had rendered to the country in the cause of education,” and he was president of the building society of the district of Montreal. During this period he wrote the work that was to be the crowning achievement of his career as an educator, and in a manner avenge his memory. The Mémorial de l’éducation du Bas-Canada appeared in Montreal in 1860; the first edition, which had a printing of 1,009 copies, was quickly exhausted, and a second, considerably larger, was published at Quebec in 1876. This is an indispensable work for anyone who wishes to know the history of education in Canada. The author gives an objective version of the events in which he was both actor and witness, without showing animosity against those who, he says nonetheless, thwarted his endeavour.

While he was living at Quebec, Meilleur became interested again in the natural sciences and collaborated actively with his friend Abbé Léon Provancher*, who in 1870 got him elected president of the Natural History Society of Quebec. He published several articles in Le Naturaliste canadien, which Provancher had started in 1868. In his old age Meilleur thus returned to his first love, after having devoted to education the 30 most fruitful years of his long career. His life was an example of persistent and unselfish determination in the service of his fellow-citizens.

LÉON LORTIE

Meilleur’s writings are extensive His reports as superintendent of education for Lower Canada are published in appendices of the JALPC for 1843–55. In addition there are: “Agriculture et chimie,” Bibliothèque canadienne (Montréal), VI (1828), 72ff. and VII (1828), 73ff.; “Analyse de l’eau saline de L’Assomption,” Bibliothèque canadienne (Montréal), II (1826), 142, 199; Cours abrégé de leçons de chymie, contenant une exposition précise et méthodique des principes de cette science, exemplifiés (Montréal, 1833); “Dissertation on scrofula,” Quebec Medical Journal, I (1826), 233 and II (1827), 81ff.; “Géologie; réponse à J.M.B.,” Bibliothèque canadienne (Montréal), V (1827), 215; “Lettre à l’abbé Provancher au sujet du Traité de botanique de l’abbé O. Brunet,” Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), II (1870), 150–52; “Lettre au sujet des recherches du docteur J.A. sur la ‘bufonine’,” Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), II (1870), 239–41, 268–70; "Lettre de remerciement à l'abbé Provancher," Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), IV (1872), 100–2; Mémorial de l'éducation du Bas-Canada (1re éd., Montréal, 1860; 2e éd., Québec, 1876); Nouvelle grammaire anglaise . . . (1re éd., Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu, Qué., 1833; 2e éd., Montréal, 1854); "On Prussic acid," Quebec Medical Journal, I (1826), no.3, 171ff.; "Quelques-unes de nos plantes les plus intéressantes," Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), II (1870), 355–64; "Supplément critique au Petit traité d'agriculture de Valère Guillet," Bibliothèque canadienne (Montréal), IX (1829), 170–77, 189–95, 210–14; A treatise on the pronunciation of the French language or a synopsis of rules for pronouncing the French language with irregularities exemplified (2nd ed., Montreal, 1841).

There are also a number of articles either under his own name or under a pseudonym in the following newspapers, L'Écho du pays (Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu, Qué.), 10 oct. 1833, 4 juill., 11 juill. 1833; Le Glaneur (Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu, Qué.), avril, mai, juin, sept. 1837; Mélanges religieux (Montréal), 1841; La Minerve (Montréal), 1826, 1829, 9 juin 1831, 23 août 1832, 3 mars, 17 mars, 19 mars, 9 avril 1859; Le Populaire (Montréal), 6 août, 13 août, 17 août, 27 août, 3 sept., 5 sept., 7 sept., 26 sept. 1838.

AJM, Registre d'état civil. ASJCF, Collège Sainte-Marie, Fonds Meilleur (microfilm in the possession of Léon Lortie). ASN, Collection Bois, lettres de Jean-Baptiste Meilleur (microfilm in the possession of Léon Lortie). Audet, Le système scolaire de la province de Québec, I. Anastase Forget, Histoire du collège de L'Assomption (Montréal, [1933]). J. K. Jobling, "The contribution of Jean-Baptiste Meilleur to education in Lower Canada," unpublished MA thesis, McGill University, 1963. André Labarrère-Paulé, Les instituteurs laïques au Canada francais, 1836–1900 (Québec, 1965), 161ff. Léon Lortie, Notes sur le « Cours abrégé de leçons de chymie » de Jean-Baptiste Meilleur (Publ. du laboratoire de chimie de l'Université de Montréal, 1, Montréal, 1937). L.-P. Audet, "Index analytique du Mémorial de l'éducation dans le Bas-Canada du Dr Jean-Baptiste Meilleur," RSCT, 4th ser., II (1964), sect.I, 49–62; "Jean-Baptiste Meilleur était-il un candidat valable au poste de surintendant de l'Éducation pour le Bas-Canada en 1842?" Cahiers des Dix, XXXI (1966), 163–201. Léon Lortie, "Deux notaires amateurs de science; Jean De Lisle et son fils Augustin-Stanislas De Lisle," RSCT, 3rd ser., LV (1961), sect.I, 39–47; "L'étrange aventure de quelques documents officiels concernant Jean-Baptiste Meilleur," Annales de l'ACFAS (Montréal), IX (1943), 171–75; "Les lettres de J.-B. Meilleur sur l'éducation en 1838," Revue trimestrielle canadienne (Montréal), XXIV (1938–39), 251–71; "Le retour de Jean-Baptiste Meilleur au Canada," RSCT, 3rd ser., L (1956), sect.I, 69–83.

MERCER, ANDREW, issuer of marriage licences and office-holder; b. possibly in Sussex, Eng., c. 1778–84; d. Toronto, Ont., 13 June 1871.

The first certain fact about Andrew Mercer's early life is that he arrived at Quebec late in 1800, accompanying Thomas Scott*, the new attorney general of Upper Canada. Mercer once stated that his mother, Mary Mercer, was unmarried, and his intimacy with Scott led to gossip that he was Scott's illegitimate son.

They arrived at York (Toronto) early in 1801 and Mercer became Scott's secretary. He next held the junior clerkship in the Executive Council (1803–20), and the office of king's printer (1816), probably through Scott's influence. Mercer was paymaster for the Home District militia during the War of 1812 and was taken captive at the fall of York in April 1813, but was soon released. In 1833 he became a magistrate. Mercer also had business interests for some years after 1809, operating a general store in partnership with Samuel Smith Ridout*, and later developing an extensive mortgage and loan business.

Although much was later said about his philanthropy, it is known only that he made a gift of 1,000 acres of land, located in swampy townships, toward the endowment of the University of Trinity College in 1851. From 1827, although wealthy, he lived at Bay and Wellington streets in Toronto in a cottage later said to be "scarcely worth insuring," and he was described as "almost parsimonious."

Mercer was issuer of marriage licences in York by 1818 but never himself obtained one. In 1850 he acquired a violent-tempered, illiterate, and thieving housekeeper, Bridget O'Reilly, who seems to have terrorized him for the rest of his life. She gave birth in 1851 to a boy, christened Andrew Francis Mercer, and generally believed to be the son of septuagenarian Andrew, whom she threatened with seduction charges. He provided for the boy and gave him some land, but never made him his heir and on one occasion reportedly stated that he "would leave his money to the government."

Mercer died suddenly in 1871, intestate. As the estate would pass to the crown unless legitimate heirs were found, the provincial government immediately took over on a commission of escheat, and in 1872 the attorney general, Adam Crooks*, was appointed administrator. Mercer's household was allowed to remain in the cottage, a search for heirs was begun in Great Britain and Canada, and steps were taken to put the $180,000 estate in order, as the holdings, largely in the form of land, mortgages, loans, and stocks, were found to be in considerable disarray.

In 1875 Oliver Mowat*, appointed administrator the previous year, began arrangements for a hearing in the Court of Chancery to test the claims of the would-be heirs. At this point Bridget

O'Reilly and her son suddenly produced a marriage certificate, dated a month before the latter's birth, and a will leaving them the entire estate. The hearing of all claims took place in January 1876 with John Beverley Robinson* acting for the crown. Roman Catholic Archbishop John Joseph Lynch*, John MONTGOMERY, and others supported young Mercer's claim, but he himself refused to enter the witness box for examination. Vice-Chancellor Samuel Hume Blake* declared both documents forgeries and decided in favour of the province.

Still, Mercer refused to vacate the Bay Street property and a series of law suits resulted. These developed into a constitutional test case over whether a province or the federal government had the right to escheat estates under sections 102 and 109 of the British North America Act. The Ontario courts decided in favour of the province, the Supreme Court of Canada supported the dominion claim, and a decision in favour of Ontario was finally handed down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of Great Britain in 1884. The Bay Street property was then taken over and sold.

The rest of the estate had meanwhile been disposed of by the Ontario government. A sum of $10,000 was allocated for an Andrew Mercer Eye and Ear Infirmary for the Toronto General Hospital in 1878, and a total of $106,000 went toward the erection of the Andrew Mercer Ontario Reformatory for Females, opened in 1880 and used until 1969. Much of the money was swallowed up in legal costs, including a large portion of the $30,000 Mowat generously allowed young Mercer.

Andrew Mercer, albeit unwittingly, gained a certain immortality through the court cases and the institutions. To later generations, who knew the name but not the circumstances, he appeared a great benefactor of the cause of female reform.

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

PAC, RG 1, E1, 47, pp.283, 291; E14, 10, pp.158–59; L3, M6/332, 37; RG 5, A1, 26, pp.12067–69; 27, pp.12563–64, 12799–800, 26686–87; RG 7, G16, C, 9, p.48; RG 8, I, A1, 690, pp.166–66a; RG 68, 1. PAO, Alexander Campbell papers, 18 Nov. 1881, 31 May 1883; Chancery Court files, 1875, 55, "Mercer v. attorney-general"; 1878, 526, "Attorney-general v. O'Reilly"; Misc. 1934, John Robertson, "Memorandum re A. Mercer and Thomas Scott"; RG 8, I-7-b-2, 1878, no.34; 1879, no.33; 1882, no.51; 1888, no.30; Ridout papers, 1809, agreement of partnership. Trinity College Archives (Toronto), Minutes of the council, 20 Feb. 1851, 27.

Attorney general of Ontario v. Mercer (1883), 8 App. Cas. 767 (P.C.) reversing (1881), 5 S.C.R. 583, which reversed (sub nom.) Attorney general of Ontario v. O'Reilly (1880), 6 O.A.R. 576, which affirmed (1878), 26 Gr. 126 (Ch.). Ontario, Sessional papers, IX (1877), PT.2, no.7; X (1878), PT.4, no.38; XII (1880), PT.4, no.34; XIII (1881), PT.4, no.48. Ontario, Statutes, 1878, c. 1; 1879, c. 38.

Globe (Toronto), 14 June 1871, 15 Nov. 1875, 14–22 Jan. 1876. Scadding, Toronto of old, 55, 84, 269, 363, 366. Town of York, 1793–1815 (Firth), 140, 281. Hist. of Toronto and county of York, II, 109. J. E. Jones, Pioneer crimes and punishments in Toronto and the Home District . . . (Toronto, 1924), 46. Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), I, 46–48, 433.

MERCIER, ANTOINE, priest, Sulpician, parish priest of Saint-Jacques-le-Majeur (Montreal); b. 14 May 1817 at Lyons, Department of Rhône, France, son of Antoine Mercier and Élisabeth Chirat; d. 12 April 1875 at Montreal, Que.

Antoine Mercier was ordained priest in 1842, and the following year entered the Society of Saint-Sulpice in Paris. His noviciate completed, he served for five years as bursar of the seminary of Clermont, Department of Oise; then, at his own request, his superiors allowed him to go to Canada, where he arrived on 10 Oct. 1849.

He was at first curate at Notre-Dame de Montréal, where he had several administrative responsibilities. Shortly before his installation as chief bursar of the seminary of Montreal, M. Mercier, on 26 April 1857, founded the institute of the Little Sisters of St Joseph; the founding was on the initiative of a pious young girl, Rose de Lima Dauth, and had the approval and consent of his superior and his confrères. The community's main object was to devote itself, through prayer and good works, to the material and moral support of seminarists and priests. Initially, in accordance with its founder's ideas, it had new features: it was an association of girls for whom no special dress, vows, or noviciate were required; they could join after a retreat of only three days. M. Mercier had scarcely laid the foundations of the new institute and drawn up its general regulations when he was replaced at the head of the undertaking by his confrère Damien-Henri Tambareau. Even if subsequently the functions entrusted to him did not allow him to direct the Little Sisters of St Joseph, he always remained keenly interested in the institute and ready to advise its members.

After a year's stay at the seminary, Mercier withdrew from the temporal administration of charitable works of the Society of Saint-Sulpice to give his attention almost exclusively to parish ministry. He was entrusted with the direction first of the dependent church of Notre-Dame-de-Grâces at Montreal, 1858–62, then of the Indian mission at Lac-des-Deux-Montagnes (Oka), 1862–68, and finally of the parish of Saint-Jacques-le-Majeur at Montreal, 1868–75. In 1864 he had brought the Little Sisters of St Joseph to Oka and allotted them various tasks among the Algonkins, the Iroquois, and the missionaries, including the upkeep of the mission church and the missionaries' residence, and the running of a needlework school for Algonkin women; one of the nuns learned enough of the Iroquois language to be able to teach the children.

In the different duties he had to perform, M. Mercier always distinguished himself by his great spiritual qualities, by his gentleness and benevolence, and especially by an irrepressible activity that never knew any respite. He died on 12 April 1875 at the seminary of Notre-Dame, after an illness of four months.

ANTONIO DANSEREAU

[Antoine Mercier], Réflexions et retraites, Émile Boucher, édit. (Montréal, 1964). This book contains the private notes of M. Mercier's spiritual retreats from the time of his ordination to the subdiaconate in 1840 until his death. The volume was not for sale but was designed for the religious community which he founded. A.D.]

Archives de l'Institut des Petites Filles de Saint-Joseph (Montréal). ASSM, Biographies, Antoine Mercier; Communautés religieuses. Allaire, Dictionnaire. Gauthier, Sulpitiana. A.-L. Bertrand, Bibliothèque sulpicienne ou histoire littéraire de la Compagnie de Saint-Sulpice (3v., Paris, 1900), II. René Labelle, Les Petites Filles de Saint-Joseph; les origines de la communauté (Montréal, 1923). Olivier Maurault, Saint-Jacques de Montréal; l'église, la paroisse (Montréal, 1923). L.-O. David, "Biographie du Révérend M. Mercier, s.s.," La Minerve (Montréal), 14 avril 1875.

METHERALL, FRANCIS, Bible Christian minister, founder of the Bible Christian mission in Prince Edward Island; b. December 1791 in North Devon, Eng.; d. 9 June 1875 at Cape Wolfe, P.E.I.

Francis Metherall experienced evangelical conversion in 1819 under the ministry of James Thorne, associate of William O'Bryan, founder of the Bible Christian movement, a Methodist sect which originated in Shebbear, Devon, in 1815. After being received into the Bible Christian ministry in 1822, Metherall served circuits in the Isles of Scilly, Monmouth, Jersey, Somerton, Guernsey, Portsea, and Penzance.

Metherall was appointed to Prince Edward Island in 1831 following a request by Bible Christian immigrants from the west of England for a minister of their own. He arrived at Bedeque on 26 May 1832, and soon founded his first congregation at Union Road six miles northeast of Charlottetown. Within a year he organized an 80-mile circuit including Wheatley River, Vernon River, and Sturgeon track, with a total of 47 members. He also built a residence and mission house at Vernon River; his first wife was Mary Langlois, whom he had married in Guernsey on 22 Aug. 1826, and they had eight children. When Philip James arrived on the Island in 1834, the circuit was enlarged to include New London with an itinerary of 120 miles and 36 preaching stations. James served the eastern area, and Metherall extended the work westwards to St Eleanors, New Bideford, and West Cape, for several years travelling the rough terrain on foot. In an area settled largely by Roman Catholics and Presbyterians, the progress of the Bible Christians was slow, but widespread use of protracted meetings led to "the great revival" of 1843 when the church's membership increased to 400 in two years. With this increase, P.E.I. was designated a district of the English Bible Christian Church with Metherall as superintendent. Two additional ministers, William Calloway and William Harris, joined Metherall; James had by that time gone to the Cobourg circuit in Canada West.

In 1846 Metherall moved from Vernon River to the West Cape circuit. His first wife had died in 1841, and in 1853 he married Mary Nelson by whom he had four children. In that same year he took over the Union circuit, and in 1857 was succeeded as superintendent by Cephas Baker. At this time Metherall's poor health and his failure to secure additional help from England caused a recession in the work of the mission. Metherall retired from active ministry in 1869, but continued to serve on the West Cape circuit until his death. An obituary said of him, "His name on P.E. Island is, and will for many years be an household name, while the fruit of his Christian toil abides as a monument of indefatigable perseverance under the divine direction and blessing." In 1884 the Bible Christian Church in Canada became part of the Methodist Church of Canada.

ALBERT BURNSIDE

UCA, Francis Metherall papers, letters and diary. Francis Metherall family bible, in possession of Miss I. M. Metherall, Halifax, N.S. Bible Christian Church in Canada, Annual Conference, Minutes, 1857–84. Bible Christians, Annual Conference, Minutes (Shebbear, Devon; London), 1819–76. Bible Christian Magazine . . . being a continuation of the Arminian Magazine (Shebbear, Devon), 1831–84. Observer (Bowmanville, Ont.), 1867–84. Albert Burnside, "The Bible Christians in Canada, 1832–1884," unpublished DD thesis, University of Toronto, 1969. John Harris, The life of the Rev. Francis Metherall, and the history of the Bible Christian Church in Prince Edward Island (London and Toronto, 1883). J. E. Sanderson, The first century of Methodism in Canada . . . (2v., Toronto, 1908–10), II, 426–30. Thomas Shaw,

The Bible Christians, 1815–1907 (London, 1965), 31, 52. George Webber, "The Bible Christian Church," Centennial of Canadian Methodism (Toronto, 1891), 205–27; "Prince Edward Island, No. II," Observer (Bowmanville, Ont.), 9 April 1873.

MIDDLETON, ROBERT, journalist; b. 1810 at Berwick-on-Tweed, Eng.; d. 27 Aug. 1874 in Quebec City.

After apprenticeship to a printer in Scotland, Robert Middleton married and emigrated. He arrived in Quebec City in 1832 during the Asiatic cholera outbreak, and at the height of a political crisis involving John Neilson*, owner and editor of the Quebec Gazette, the oldest and leading newspaper in the Canadas. Neilson, long the proponent in the assembly of French Canadian rights, had just broken with his former ally Louis-Joseph Papineau, refusing to vote in censure of the governor general, Lord Aylmer [Whitworth-Aylmer*]. To clarify his position, Neilson in April 1832 began publishing a separate French version of his paper three times a week, at the same time continuing an English edition three times a week. The young Middleton took charge of the printing press and book shop while Neilson battled in parliament and in editorials. After Neilson lost his seat in the 1834 election, his sons Samuel and William successively took over ownership of the paper. Though Neilson still wrote articles, Middleton is listed until 1847 in Quebec City and Canada directories as "Editor." The paper published important accounts of constitutionalism and the insurrections, and of Neilson's opposition to the union of the two Canadas. From 1842 to 1847 the Gazette published only in English.

Middleton, Neilson's printer, writer, and bookseller, also became a lay preacher at Centenary Methodist Chapel in 1838, and by 1844 was superintendent of the Sunday schools in the Saint-Louis suburbs and corresponding secretary of the Quebec Auxiliary Bible Society.

In May 1847 there was a political crisis over the question of local responsible government in the colonies. Neilson battled against Francis Hincks* and Robert Baldwin*. On 18 May 1847, Middleton left Neilson's Gazette and with Charles Saint-Michel set up a rival publication, the Morning Chronicle, on the Côte de la Montagne, taking a stand for Canadian self-government and supporting the views of Lord Elgin [Bruce*], while attacking those of his predecessor Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe*. The new paper also announced its intention to emphasize commercial and shipping news, and to include more literary reviews than its rivals. Neilson, "Bookseller and Stationer," continued to publish the Gazette, also at premises on Côte de la Montagne, writing fiery editorials till the eve of his death on 1 Feb. 1848. Neilson's third son, John, inherited, and hired Ronald MacDonald* as editor for the next three months. Then he invited Robert Middleton to rejoin the Gazette as a partner. Within a few months the younger Neilson retired, leaving Middleton as editor, and from May 1849 as proprietor. The stationery and bookselling shop had been suspended on the death of John Neilson, but was revived by Middleton.

Politically, Middleton swung the Gazette in the spring of 1849 into support of Baldwin and Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*, Hincks and Augustin-Norbert Morin*. L'Avenir, founded 1847 by Jean-Baptiste-Éric Dorion*, emerged as a rallying point for the late John Neilson's followers. During the Hincks-Morin administration, the Gazette, still liberal, became the official government organ. Middleton took John T. Dawson into partnership in paper and shop in 1856.

Middleton, who had written strong pleas for Quebec in the "seat of government question," found his paper diminishing in power when the capital shifted from city to city. In 1857 the Gazette dropped from daily to tri-weekly publication. Now politically independent and moderate, the Gazette gave more and more space to literary reviews, latest news from overseas and from the United States, news of ship arrivals, and good-humoured debate with its rival, the Quebec Mercury. In 1864, the centenary of the founding of the Gazette, Middleton was editorializing mildly about confederation, and more vehemently on civic questions such as the plight of victims of fire, the nature of Irish celebrations on St Patrick's day, and the good work being done by evangelical harbour missionaries. When the government moved permanently to Ottawa in 1866, the Gazette's value as first-hand observer of day-to-day activities in the house ceased. During Middleton's last years, the now Conservative Gazette focused on business and shipping news. After his death the paper merged with the Morning Chronicle he had helped to found, and the successor was named the Quebec Chronicle and Quebec Gazette (1875).

Middleton's editorials, lively and direct, brought him wide respect as an accurate and impartial reporter. Like his predecessor, Neilson, whom he praised for being "always on the side of truth, honesty and virtue," he had an attractive ironic touch and a gusto in political reporting.

Elizabeth Waterston

Morning Chronicle (Quebec), 1847–49. Quebec Gazette, 1833–74. Beaulieu et Hamelin, Journaux du Québec.

McLaughlin's Quebec directory . . . for 1855–1856, comp. Samuel McLaughlin (Quebec, 1855); 1857–1858 (Quebec, 1857). Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis. The Quebec directory, and city and commercial register, 1847–1848, comp. Alfred Hawkins (Montreal, 1847). A history of Canadian journalism . . . (2v., Toronto, 1908–59), I. Canada, an encyclopædia, V, 221, 226.

Careless, Union of the Canadas. Christie, History of Lower Canada, III, IV. Dent, Last forty years. Elzéar Gérin, La Gazette de Québec (Québec, 1864). W. H. Kesterton, A history of journalism in Canada (Carleton Library series, 36, Toronto, 1967). S. M. E. Read, "An account of English journalism in Canada from the middle of the eighteenth century to the beginning of the twentieth, with special emphasis being given to the periods prior to confederation," unpublished MA thesis, McGill University, 1925. Shortt, Sydenham. Waite, Life and times of confederation.

MIERTSCHING, JOHANN AUGUST, Moravian missionary to the Eskimos and Arctic explorer; b. 21 Aug. 1817 at Groeditz, Saxony, son of Johann Miertsching and Erdmuth Naacké; m. in 1856 C. A. Erxleben; d. 30 March 1875 at Kleinwelke, Saxony.

Born of German working-class parents, Johann August Miertsching was sent as a boy to the Moravian community at Kleinwelke, Saxony, where he became a shoemaker and eventually joined the Moravian Church. One of the oldest Protestant sects in Europe, the Moravians had established their headquarters at Herrnhut in eastern Germany in the 18th century after fleeing from persecution in Bohemia. The evangelical impulse to convert the Eskimos led them first to Greenland in 1733, then to Labrador in 1771. Miertsching was called to the service of the mission to the Eskimos in 1844 and spent the following five years at the Okak mission station on the northern Labrador coast. Here he learned the Eskimo language and gained experience in Arctic travel.

In 1849 the British Admiralty asked the Moravian Mission Board for the services of a Labrador or Greenland missionary to join the expedition then being fitted out to search for Sir John Franklin*. Miertsching, in Saxony on furlough at the time, accepted the assignment and joined HMS Investigator (Capt. Robert McClure) just before she sailed from Plymouth on 20 Jan. 1850. Sailing around Cape Horn, Investigator entered the Arctic seas from the Pacific, attempting to search out a northwest passage. Johann Miertsching and most of the crew did finally make their way across the Arctic and home to England, but only after enduring four Arctic winters and leaving Investigator and a rescue ship abandoned in the ice.

During this gruelling experience Miertsching kept a journal, which was published in abbreviated form in 1855 and translated into English and published in full in 1967. The journal is rich in topographical detail and in descriptions of the Eskimos tribes encountered, and relates in dramatic fashion the perils from ice and cold. Several times Miertsching, attired in native Eskimo dress, acted as the captain's "invaluable interpreter," drawing on the English he had learned in daily study sessions aboard ship. On more than one occasion, when the natives were armed and threatening, he took command of the situation, calmed the Eskimos by assurances in their own language, and left them as friends. He found that the Eskimos of the western Arctic were similar to those in Labrador in their features, dress, language, and tools. Through his efforts much valuable information was gained about the geography of the region, although, unfortunately, no trace of Sir John Franklin was found.

Miertsching preached to the Eskimos whenever possible, defended his religion to Captain McClure and other sceptics on Investigator, and made several converts among the ship's crew. He entered wholeheartedly into the sledge journeys and hunting expeditions that became the daily round of life in the Arctic winters. Through it all he regarded and recorded shipboard life with an observant and not unhumorous eye. Describing the "school" held aboard the ice-bound ship he remarks: "It is interesting to see a polar school: some of the bearded scholars writing on paper, others on a blackboard, others forming letters; some mending their clothes, while others in a half-reclining posture smoke their pipes of tobacco and play the silent spectator."

After this epic journey Miertsching never returned to Canada. Following his marriage in Saxony, he became a missionary to the Hottentots of South Africa, serving at the mission stations of Elim and Genadendal, east of Capetown. He retired to Kleinwelke in 1868 and died there. His daughter Marie married another Labrador missionary, Hermann Theodor Jannasch*, with whom she spent 24 years working on the Labrador coast. Descendants have settled permanently in Canada.

Johann Miertsching was in many ways a typical Moravian missionary – quiet, candid, and possessed of a deep religious faith. When he was seconded to the Arctic expedition he rose to the occasion, and, under exacting conditions, carried out his duties conscientiously and ably, leaving the mark of his personality on the whole of the ship's company.

William H. Whiteley

[McClure], Discovery of the north-west passage (Osborn). [J. A. Miertsching], Frozen ships: the Arctic diary of Johann Miertsching, 1850–1854, ed. and trans. by L. H. Neatby (Toronto, 1967); Reise-Tagebuch des Missionars Joh. A. Miertsching welcher als Dolmetscher die Nordpol-Expedition zur Aufsuchung Sir John Franklins auf dem Schiffe Investigator begleitete ([Gnadau], 1855; Gnadau, Leipzig, 1856). Periodical accounts relating to the missions of the Church of the United Brethren, established among the heathen (London), 1846–75. Daniel Benham, Sketch of the life of Jan August Miertsching, interpreter of the Esquimaux language to the Arctic expedition on board H.M.S. "Investigator," Captain M'Clure, 1850, 1851, 1852, 1853 (London, 1854). H. W. Jannasch, "Grossvater Miertsching," Herrnhuter Miniaturen (Lüneburg, 1953), 80–96.

MILLER, LINUS WILSON, farmer and insurrectionist; b. 28 Dec. 1817 in Delanti (now Stockton), N.Y., son of Benjamin Miller, a pioneer settler in Chautauqua County, N.Y., and Laura Hamlin; d. 11 April 1880, at Jamestown, N.Y.

Linus Wilson Miller was among the Americans who strongly sympathized with the "Patriot" cause. He studied law with Judge James Mullett, and in early spring of 1838 he visited Upper Canada to verify the views he held on the situation in the colony. He returned to Canada in April as the emissary of the Canadian Refugee Relief Association in Lockport, New York, to abduct seven men who had been sentenced to die for their part in the rebellion and who were being held in the Hamilton jail. The scheme failed, as the result, Miller said, of the activities of the "Prince of Traitors, Jacob Beemer." Miller himself narrowly escaped to the United States.

He again entered Upper Canada in June 1838, alone, as the staff officer of General Donald M'Leod in the Patriot army. Major plans for an invasion by the Patriots on 4 July had been made, and M'Leod saw these jeopardized when news came that a small party of Patriots, under Colonel James Morreau and including Beemer, was in the vicinity of the Short Hills in the Niagara peninsula. Miller was sent with orders from M'Leod that they withdraw, but they refused. The border was too closely guarded for Miller's return to the United States, and he rejoined the raiders, but he was captured soon after. Miller and 15 others were tried at Niagara and received the death sentence, later commuted to transportation overseas. Confined in Fort Henry, they were later sent to England and were held in Newgate Prison for six months while the English Court of Queen's Bench examined the cases. The sentences of transportation were eventually confirmed for the 16 men, despite pleas made by Lord Brougham, John Arthur Roebuck, Joseph Hume, and William Henry Seward, later a member of Abraham Lincoln's cabinet. Miller and his fellow prisoners were placed aboard Canton along with numerous English felons, and landed at Hobart, Van Diemen's Land (Tasmania), on 12 Jan. 1840.

For the next four years Miller was compelled to undergo the same hard labour and harsh treatment as the English felons. He was interned for some time with the other Canadian prisoners at Brown's River Road Station; after being transferred to Lovely Banks he attempted to escape in 1840 and was sent to the maximum security prison at Port Arthur. Only in his last year of exile did his condition improve. He received his pardon following the recall in 1843 of the lieutenant governor of Van Diemen's Land, Sir John Franklin*, and he became tutor to the family of Thomas James Lempriere, the colony's assistant commissary. He sailed for home in September 1845 and landed in the United States 25 Jan. 1846.

Linus Miller's account of his exile is recorded in a book he wrote and published in 1846 after his return. It is divided rather unequally between the record of his service with the Patriot force in Upper Canada, the review of his case before the English Court of Queen's Bench, and his days of exile between 1840 and 1844. Miller provides abundant detail of penal life. His style is bitter and bombastic, and a reader might doubt his mental balance. Despite the author's readily apparent prejudices, however, the narrative is one of the most informative of the memoirs written by men sent to Van Diemen's Land.

Miller was married on 10 Jan. 1850 to Anne Jeanette Curtis, to whom two sons and three daughters were born. Miller engaged in farming and dairying at Delanti. He moved to Jamestown, N.Y., shortly before his death.

Fred Landon

L. W. Miller, Notes of an exile to Van Dieman's Land: comprising incidents of the Canadian rebellion in 1838, trial of the author in Canada, and subsequent appearance before her majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, in London, imprisonment in England, and transportation to Van Dieman's Land . . . (Fredonia, N.Y., 1846). Fredonia Censor (Fredonia, N.Y.), 21 April 1880, 7 April 1897. E. C. Guillet, The lives and times of the Patriots; an account of the rebellion in Upper Canada, 1837–1838, and the Patriot agitation in the United States, 1837–1842 (Toronto, 1938). Fred Landon, An exile from Canada to Van Diemen's Land; being the story of Elijah Woodman transported overseas for participation in the Upper Canada troubles of 1837–38 (Toronto, 1960), 178, 204–7, 212, 216, 255–56. A.W. Young, History of Chautauqua County, New York: from its first settlement to the present time (Buffalo, N.Y., 1875).

MILLER, MARIA FRANCES ANN. See MORRIS

MILLOY, DUNCAN, steamboat captain and owner; b. 1825 (perhaps in August), in Scotland, fourth son of Alexander Milloy; d. 20 Oct. 1871 at Niagara, Ont.

Duncan Milloy was raised in Oban, Argyllshire, Scotland, but left in 1843 with his widowed father and his six brothers to settle in Brant County, Canada West. All the brothers made their careers in inland shipping, Duncan immediately taking employment on Royal Mail Line steamers running between Hamilton and Montreal. On 25 Nov. 1851 he married Euphemia Thompson, who came from a shipping family; in 1862 they moved from Toronto to Niagara.

In 1853 Milloy took command of the passenger steamer Chief Justice Robinson running from Toronto to Niagara and Lewiston, New York, a route he was to travel most of his life. He transferred in 1854 to the opulently appointed sidewheeler Zimmerman, 475 tons, estimated cost $60,000, launched that year from Louis Shickluna's yards at Niagara for the Erie and Ontario Railroad Company with whose service it connected at Niagara. In 1858 he commanded the Peerless running from Toronto to Hamilton, but he bought the Zimmerman from Samuel Zimmerman*'s estate in time for the 1859 season and returned to the Toronto, Niagara, and Lewiston route. In 1863, however, the Zimmerman burned at its Niagara wharf, its steam-whistle shrieking mournfully. Milloy immediately handed a design of his own to Shickluna, and on 20 April 1864 the City of Toronto, 221 feet, 512 tons, and built of seasoned oak, slipped into the water. Railways ran around the head of Lake Ontario after 1855, and there was less need for passenger shipping; except for one year, Milloy was the only one making the journey from 1861 on.

Duncan Milloy appears to have been a handsome, genial, and even dashing figure – fitting the captain who travelled the route to the falls, at once a festive, a fashionable, and an international voyage. Canadians favoured his route as a link to the eastern seaboard and to Europe since it connected with the New York Central Railroad at Lewiston. A passenger skipper had standing in the community. Milloy, a Presbyterian and a freemason, appears to have been on familiar terms with Conservative leaders John A. Macdonald* and John Hillyard CAMERON, but his affability had to extend the whole range of the social scale to cope with the holiday and moonlight excursions for which his vessel was often hired.

Milloy died in 1871 at "Oban House," his home at Niagara. In the last two seasons before the City burned in 1883 it was owned and skippered by his eldest son William. One of Milloy's brothers, Donald*, at one time purser on the Zimmerman, later headed steamboat partnerships.

BARRIE DYSTER

Niagara Historical Society (Niagara), W. A. Milloy papers. PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), pp.258203–4; RG 5, C1, 1858, no.195. Globe (Toronto), especially 11 July 1867 and 21 Oct. 1871. J. of Education for Ont., XXIV (1871), 187. Caverhill's Toronto city directory, for 1859–60 . . . (Toronto, [1859]). Hutchinson's Toronto directory, 1862–63 . . . (Toronto, n.d.). Commemorative biog. record, county York, 627. Erik Heyl, Early American steamers (5v., Buffalo, N.Y., 1953–67), II, 37; III, 353–54; V, 61–62. Janet Carnochan, History of Niagara (in part) (Toronto, 1914). Barlow Cumberland, A century of sail and steam on the Niagara River (Toronto, 1913). History of the Great Lakes (2v., Chicago, 1899), II, 4. Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), II, 896, 915, 917.

MILLS, SAMUEL SYLVESTER, businessman and politician; b. at what later became Hamilton, U.C., 1 Dec. 1806, one of 11 children of James Mills and Christina Hesse; d. at Hamilton, Ont., 24 Jan. 1874.

Samuel Sylvester Mills' parents, born in the United States, pioneered on a farm in the Hamilton area in 1800. Available evidence does not support the claims that either his father or his mother were UEL. Samuel was educated at a Hamilton grammar school and went into the wholesale hardware business. Later he also involved himself in shipping, milling, real estate, and construction. He built and rented a large number of houses in workers' districts. He owned a sizeable amount of stock in insurance companies and banks, and served as a director of the Bank of Hamilton and of the Canada Life Assurance Company. For a short period he was president of the Gore Bank.

Described as one of "the three wealthiest men in Hamilton," Mills was generous with his wealth. An Anglican, he donated to his diocese the land and money required for the construction of All Saints' Church. He also presented land to Hamilton for use as a cemetery.

Samuel Mills served briefly as a Hamilton alderman and for several years was chairman of the board of commissioners of the Provincial Lunatic Asylum. In 1849 the government of Robert Baldwin* and Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* made him a life member of the Legislative Council, in which he served until 1867. Although one of Baldwin's local Reform lieutenants during the 1840s, he was a Conservative during the confederation period, a pattern of political evolution consistent with that of numerous Baldwinites. He was called to the Senate on 23 Oct. 1867 but did not play a prominent role in the upper house.

He had married in 1831 Aurora Holton, an American, by whom he had eight children. He died in Hamilton in 1874.

DONALD SWAINSON

Hamilton Public Libarary, A. W. Roy, "Newspaper clippings scrapbook," 14. MTCL, Baldwin papers, A58, ff.32–41. PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 508–10, 512–15, 518. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson), 367–68. Can. parl. comp., 1873. A. M. Brock, The Mills, Holton and Smith families (Toronto, 1927). M. F. Campbell, A mountain and a city, the story of Hamilton (Toronto, 1966). Genealogical and historical records of the Mills and Gage families, 1776–1926, 150 years, comp. Stanley Mills (Hamilton, Ont., 1926). Ross and Trigge, History of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, III. A. C. Cawthra, "The Mills family," UEL Assoc. of Ont., Annual Trans. (Toronto), I (1897–98), 46–48.

MILNER, CHRISTOPHER, Church of England priest and missionary, b. 28 Feb. 1787 at Hawxwell, Yorkshire, Eng.; d. 2 Nov. 1877 at Sackville, N.B.

Christopher Milner was ordained a Church of England deacon on 20 Dec. 1812 by Brownlow North, bishop of Winchester, and immediately appointed curate at Binstead, Isle of Wight. He was raised to the priesthood in the following year by George Henry Law, bishop of Chester. Late in 1817 he was accepted as a missionary by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and was sent to Halifax where he arrived with his family on 18 May 1818. At the request of the governor, Lord Dalhousie [George Ramsay*], and with the approval of Bishop Robert Stanser*, he took charge of the collegiate school in Windsor, Nova Scotia, in June 1818.

In May 1820 Milner was appointed missionary at Sackville, New Brunswick, and, upon arrival, found himself the only Church of England missionary between Sussex Vale and Halifax. Making his headquarters at Fort Cumberland until a parsonage was built at Westcock in 1824, he served congregations at Amherst, Dorchester, Shediac, and several other settlements. Wherever he could find a congregation, Milner encouraged the people to build churches and schools. The church at Fort Cumberland, which had fallen into ruin through disuse, was rebuilt by March 1821, and a church and school were built at Shediac in 1822. He also encouraged the establishment of new schools under the Madras system which enabled one schoolmaster to teach a large number of children by employing the advanced students as "pupil teachers."

In 1836 he became missionary at Westfield, N.B., and also took charge at Petersville and Greenwich until those parishes obtained resident ministers. Here, as elsewhere, he exhorted the people to build churches, taking an axe into his own hands and felling the first tree when he felt the congregation was moving too slowly. The churches constructed at Oke Point, Greenwich, and Nerpesis were a result of his endeavours.

The Reverend Mr Milner was an energetic and vigorous clergyman, who covered his large mission on foot, on horseback, and by rowboat. It was reported to the SPG that "[he] often rowed himself, in storms when no person would venture with him." Another report told how Milner's horse got its foot caught in the ice while crossing a river. The missionary freed his mount by cutting a hole with his pocket knife, but "his hands and arms . . . were completely frozen, like solid masses of ice, to his elbows, and were with great difficulty recovered by immersion in spirits." He often preached as many as four times on a given Sunday at points many miles apart. In July 1859, while rowing from Greenwich to Westfield after morning service, he suffered a sunstroke which completely incapacitated him and forced his retirement from the ministry after 42 years of service.

C. E. THOMAS

USPG, Journal of SPG, 31, letters of John Inglis, 19 May, 21 June 1818; 32, p.319, 19 May 1820; C/CAN/NS, letter of Christopher Milner, 7 Sept. 1824. G. H. Lee, An historical sketch of the first fifty years of the Church of England in the province of New Brunswick (1783–1883) (Saint John, N.B., 1880), 122. W. C. Milner, History of Sackville, New Brunswick (Sackville, N.B., 1934), 63–64. Pascoe, Two hundred years of the S.P.G., 867.

MILTON, Viscount. See WENTWORTH-FITZWILLIAM

MINIXI. See ONISTAH-SOKAKSIN

MOLESWORTH, THOMAS NEPEAN, surveyor and engineer; b. 24 June 1824 in Moy, County Armagh, Ireland, son of Arthur Nepean Molesworth and Harriett Hawkins; d. 24 April 1879 in Toronto, Ont.

Thomas Nepean Molesworth is said by earlier writers to have attended Trinity College, Dublin, but the college records do not bear out this claim. He was, apparently, apprenticed to Williby Hemans under whom he learned civil engineering. Having acquired a trade, and married Sarah Georgina Kertland, Molesworth in 1848 emigrated to Canada.

Molesworth's first employment in Canada was teaching school at Trafalgar, near Oakville, Canada West. He soon moved to Goderich (the centre for the developing counties of Huron, Grey, and Bruce), qualified as a provincial land surveyor in 1851, and established a practice which he maintained until 1858. Molesworth was also retained for several public projects; in 1852–56 he surveyed parts of St Joseph and Bear islands in Lake Huron and laid out the town plots of Wingham and St Joseph. He formed a partnership in 1856 with Thomas Weatherald, which lasted about nine years, and the next year surveyed part of the north shore of Lake Superior.

In 1858 Molesworth became chief engineer of the Buffalo and Lake Huron Railway (which had its western terminus at Goderich) and he moved to Brantford, the company's headquarters, in 1859. He moved to Fort Erie in 1863, where he helped survey and plan the International Bridge, and went into the employ of the Grand Trunk Railway. His home at Fort Erie was damaged in a Fenian attack in 1866.

Molesworth was retained by the Department of Public Works of Ontario in 1868 and 1869 to survey swamp lands in Kent and Essex counties. In 1870 he became assistant engineer of the department and moved to Toronto. In his new capacity he was largely concerned with drawing up reports on the status of canal, road, and drainage projects. From 1874 until his death in 1879 he was chief engineer of public works for Ontario, concerned mainly with reports regarding the inspection of railways, which had to meet established standards of quality as well as specific construction deadlines to qualify for provincial aid.

Molesworth had seven children, one of whom, Balfour Nepean, also became a provincial land surveyor.

STEPHEN F. SPENCER

PAO, J. C. Bailey papers, 29 Nov. 1876, 27 Nov. 1877, 8 Jan. 1878; RG 15, ser. IV–2 (Assistant engineer's letter book, 1870–73). Ontario, Dept. of Public Works, Annual Reports, 1874–79. Burke's peerage (1924), 1596–97. H. L. Esten, "Balfour Nepean Molesworth," Ont. Land Surveyors Assoc., Annual Report, no.47 (1932), 123–25. "Thomas Nepean Molesworth," Ont. Land Surveyors Assoc., Annual Report, no.35 (1920), 109–10.

MOLSON, WILLIAM, brewer and distiller, merchant, and banker; b. 5 Nov. 1793 at Montreal, L.C., third and last son of John Molson* Sr and Sarah Insley Vaughan; d. 18 Feb. 1875 at Montreal.

Little is known about William Molson's childhood, except that it was spent amid the influence of a family of entrepreneurs. His father, who had arrived at Montreal in 1782, an orphan of 18 years of age, had immediately ventured with his friend James Pell into the lucrative trade in foodstuffs, especially meat, that was a feature of the years of high inflation caused by the American Revolution. He had also gone into the production of beer with his friend Thomas Loid. In 1785 he became sole owner of the brewery. John Molson Sr refused, however, to take part in the active fur trade on which, during these years when the North West Company was being formed and the Beaver Club instituted, Montreal's commercial activity was based. All his life he opposed by his activities this structure of a staple economy. He was above all an industrial entrepreneur, if we can agree not to consider this term an anachronism given the slow progress of manufacturing at that period. His three sons were to be profoundly marked by this pattern, William like the others, but in his own way.

William was only 16 when his father, having bought the shares of his two partners John Bruce and John Jackson, to whom he had given financial assistance for the building of a steamboat, launched the Accommodation on 19 Aug. 1809, the first steam vessel to ply the St Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec. William went to school at that time, but his interest and activity were already centred on the family enterprises. On 19 Oct. 1810, on the eve of a departure for England, John Molson prepared a will before a notary, in which he mentioned the activity of his two youngest sons, Thomas* and William, as brewers, and committed them to the care of John*, his eldest son. The latter, in a letter to his father on 6 Jan. 1811, wrote: "William is still at school and I believe he can go the whole season as we will endeavour to do without him. He is growing fast and is nearly as tall as I am."

When war broke out between England and the United States in 1812, young William, aged 19, entered the militia as a volunteer. By October 1812 he had obtained an ensigncy. The Molsons' shipping company profited considerably from this war, taking soldiers who had arrived at Quebec to the Upper St Lawrence with their arms and baggage. The writer Bernard Keble Sandwell* states that William, despite his youth, commanded the Swiftsure during the war. At the end of the war, during at least two shipping seasons, John Sr and Jr corresponded, each from the ship he commanded, and their letters show that both were engaged in transactions involving bills of exchange from Montreal to Quebec and London, a prelude to their future activity as bankers. The youngest son also profited from these transactions. In a letter of 24 June 1815 to his father, John Jr wrote: "I have also purchased a bill for William of 110 Pounds." At this period the eldest son was established at Quebec to direct the wharf and warehousing operations, with the double responsibility of handling general merchandise for the shipping business and of taking delivery of and selling beer in the Quebec area for the Montreal brewery.

The first contract of partnership between the father and his three sons, under the name of John Molson and Sons, was signed before a notary on 1 Dec. 1816. Each remained the owner of the assets that he contributed to the company, and received on their value an annual interest of 6 per cent. The capital of the company came from John Sr, except for the ship Swiftsure, which he had given to the eldest brother. The latter was responsible for all the business at Quebec, where he resided; Thomas and William would live at Montreal, where they would work under their father's direction. It was mentioned that Thomas would be in charge of the brewery. The company's profits would be divided equally between the four partners. The uncollected profits, which were left in the enterprise, were capitalized. A reckoning of capital, dated 1 April 1819, shows that William had already accumulated £7,165 12*s*. 8*d*.

We do not know when William moved to Quebec to replace his elder brother and assume responsibility for the business in that town, but in 1819, at the time of his marriage, he moved to a house at 16 Rue Saint-Pierre and was to remain there until 1823. On 7 Sept. 1819, in the Anglican Christ Church, Montreal, William married Elizabeth Badgley (1799–1887), daughter of Francis Badgley* and sister of John Thompson Badgley (of whom William became a partner in 1830) and Judge William Badgley*. Their first two children were born at Quebec.

William probably developed his liking for politics at this period. In fact it is more than likely that his father entrusted him with the task of carrying on certain lobbying activities that were concomitant, on the one hand with John Sr's shipping business, and on the other with his status as member of the assembly since his election in the county of Montreal East on 25 April 1815. In the eyes of the entrepreneurs it was urgent that authorization be granted to build a wharf on the beach at Montreal, near the new market, an authorization which up to then the colonial authorities had persistently refused, out of respect for the crown monopoly on beach right of way. John Molson Sr remained a member for Montreal East until he lost his seat in the election of 1827, a few months after he had been made president of the Bank of Montreal.

When Thomas, in the spring of 1822, after his first experiments with making whisky, decided to try to sell it in England, he sought help from his brother William at Quebec with the necessary customs formalities. Meanwhile, William continued to capitalize part of the income paid by John Molson and Sons to the four partners; a reckoning dated 9 Feb. 1822 indicates that William's share amounted to £10,813 8*d*.

In the same year an important event, with repercussions on the assets of the family firm, took place in the shipping company. In April 1822 the Molsons succeeded in obtaining control of the shipping undertakings that since 1815 had been competing with them on the St Lawrence. Thus, in addition to the ships they already owned were added the Car of Commerce, property of a group of men that included Horatio Gates* and Jabez Dean De Witt; Thomas Torrance*'s and David Munn's Caledonia; the Telegraph from Montreal; the Québec, owned by a group that included Noah Freer; and a few other ships.

The competition had entailed over-capitalization and a considerable wastage of resources. With the arrival of a period of stagnation and of serious and numerous economic crises, consolidation became essential. In April 1822 the St Lawrence Steamboat Company was formed; it brought together the vast majority of the steam navigation interests on the St Lawrence. The company was made up of 44 shares of £1,000 each, the four Molsons holding collectively 26 and individually 6 1/2 each. Furthermore, the firm of John Molson and Sons was appointed to manage the company. This new responsibility resulted in the separation of the shipping enterprise from the activities of the Molson family. In book-keeping terms, it implied the withdrawal of the most important components (ships, wharves, and warehouses) of the assets of the family enterprise.

According to certain documents, John Jr seems to have returned to Quebec, and worked there in 1822 together with William, while Thomas stayed at Montreal, in sole charge of the brewery for several months. Thomas did not have a marriage contract, and the difficulties this entailed in a country whose law was that of France's ancien régime, persuaded him to leave Montreal in 1824 for Kingston, Upper Canada, where he became a brewer and distiller. In fact, for an entrepreneur joint estate was unthinkable. When it came time to negotiate a new partnership, with the expiry after seven years of the 1816 contract, John Jr maintained that he could leave Quebec for Montreal and take the direction of the brewery from Thomas. The father intervened, however, and insisted that William should leave Quebec, move to Montreal near him, and take charge of the brewery. "John fansied he could manage the Brewhouse himself," John Molson Sr wrote to Thomas on 4 January. "I told him not, have had William near a fortnight."

The new contract was signed at the beginning of 1824 but applied retroactively to 1 Dec. 1823, the date on which the previous firm's accounts were closed. The partners were John Molson Sr, John Jr, and William. The assets consisted of the property of John Sr: the brewery and hostelry establishments at Montreal and the businesses at Quebec. The firm had the same name as the previous one: John Molson and Sons. It was also in 1824 that William's third and last child, Anne, was born.

In 1828 the Molsons decided that the companies in which they participated should be diversified according to the nature of their undertakings. Thus the firm of John Molson and Sons became exclusively responsible for steam navigation, as an agent of the St Lawrence Steamboat Company. Around 1830 the firm took over control of the Ottawa Steamboat Company, which held the monopoly for steam navigation on the Ottawa River. In 1834, with the opening of the Rideau Canal, this company became the Ottawa and Rideau Forwarding Company and was to dominate steam navigation from Montreal to Kingston.

The other undertakings of the family were from 1828 managed by a new company, founded that year, that of John and William Molson, which brought together the father and his two sons, John and William. For reasons which remain obscure, John Jr withdrew from this company in April 1829, and thus brought about its dissolution. But a new company, John and William Molson, was immediately formed on 30 June 1829, bringing together this time the father and William, his youngest son.

During the next five years William was in sole charge of the brewery. In addition, he undertook the management and administration of St Mary's Foundry, a small metallurgical enterprise, probably originally called the Bennett and Henderson Foundry. As well as selling implements for the building of the Rideau Canal, William closely followed the foundry's work in 1831 on the Royal William, the first ship entirely powered by steam to cross the Atlantic.

At this period William launched out into commerce. From 1 May 1830 to 14 Feb. 1834 he worked in partnership with his brother-in-law, John Thompson Badgley, to set up, with the help of funds advanced by his father, a business for the importing and retail sale of all kinds of goods from England. They operated under the name of Molson and Badgley. According to newspaper advertisements of the time, it appears that William was competing with John Jr, who on 1 May 1829, with George and George Crew Davies, had established the firm of Molson, Davies and Company, in exactly the same business.

However, it does not seem that the competition between the two brothers had any deep significance. Thus, when the Champlain and St Lawrence Railroad Company was founded in 1831, both brothers sat on the board of directors, together with Peter McGill* and Jason C. Pierce; John Jr was president. This company built the first Canadian railway, the one that in 1836 linked Laprairie-de-la-Madeleine on the St Lawrence with Saint-Jean on the Richelieu, a distance of 20 miles.

Both William's activities as an industrialist and his wealth continued to expand. The will that he prepared on 3 Aug. 1832 before the notary Henry Griffin permits us to evaluate the approximate extent of his fortune. He left an annuity of £400 to his wife which, at the then usual rate of interest of 6 per cent, represents a principal of nearly £7,000, and £6,000 to each of his two daughters. The will also directed that his sons (he had only one) be residuary legatees.

In contrast to his son's expanding activities, those of the father continued to decline. However, the latter became more active in political and social life. He was appointed a legislative councillor in 1832, and was a member of the Constitutional Committee of Montreal (in 1835, the Constitutional Association of Montreal), a political movement formed to defend the interests of the English-speaking bourgeoisie of Montreal against the activities, which it considered menacing, of the Patriotes. William played an important role within this organization. A letter he wrote to his father on 16 Nov. 1834 gives evidence about the unrest which was already prevalent in Montreal in 1834. "The election in the western ward [Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU was a candidate] still remains unsettled, but am sorry to say that every night there are disturbanses in the streets, people beaten, and glass or windows of houses broken." In 1835 he was named commissioner to hear minor cases (litigation involving amounts of less than £6 5*s*.).

In 1833, William Molson, then in the full vigour of manhood, had begun a new operation destined to become much more lucrative than brewing: distilling. He obtained the necessary equipment in the spring and began to purchase raw materials after the autumn harvests. In December 1833 or January 1834 distillation actually began. In January 1834 William asked Robert Shaw* of Quebec to be his agent in that town for his product. His partnership with his brother-in-law, John Thompson Badgley, came to an end in this period. On 14 Feb. 1834 an act by the notary

Henry Griffin dissolved the firm of Molson and Badgley.

The same year Thomas Molson decided to leave Kingston and return to Montreal to go into partnership with his father and his brother William. A new company was then formed bringing together the father, William, and Thomas. The contract was signed on 21 Feb. 1835, and was retroactive to 30 June 1834. The share capital of the firm of John Molson and Company was divided into eight portions: two for John Sr, three for Thomas, and three for William. The father contributed the physical capital, namely all his establishments, for which he drew an annual rent of £1,100, representing a rate of 6 per cent of their value. Profits and losses were to be distributed in proportion to the number of shares held by each partner.

This partnership began a close collaboration, which was to last nearly 20 years, between the two brothers. In a commercial economy, at grips with the considerable difficulties that inevitably accompanied frequent and also profound crises, William and Thomas Molson, with surprising persistence, identified themselves as industrialists. True, the products of their establishments met demands that economists call inelastic, that is to say a rise in prices or a fall in income did not lead to a diminution in production. Perhaps even the demand for spirits was at that period "counter-cyclical," in the sense that an economic crisis might make it go up. And a fall in the price of the raw materials might well have been more important than a fall in the price of the finished product, since it would enable the entrepreneurs, when the demand varied little, to increase their profits at the height of an economic crisis.

But the Molson brothers were in opposition to their society, both from the economic and from the social and cultural point of view. In a mercantile economy, the whole structure is centred on export and import trade. The principal source of public revenue is customs, customs duties on exports and on imports. A tacit agreement is established between the state and the large merchants, encouraging foreign trade and discouraging national production. Such is the "staple trap," as critics of this famous theory of economic development have called it.

Customs duties on the importation of spirits were an important source of fiscal receipts, the more because this revenue fluctuated little throughout the trade cycle and did not fall in a time of crisis, when other sources of income run dry. With the increase in the production of spirits, in the early 1830s began "the battle of whisky against rum," which brought into conflict industrialists who produced spirits and a coalition of large merchants and the state. The Montreal Board of Trade made itself the eloquent spokesman of the large merchants when the governor of the colony consulted it in order to ascertain the cause of a fall in treasury receipts. But it was also the whole puritanical society of the time that the producers of spirits were up against, because to their activity was imputed responsibility for popular behaviour. Consequently, in a period of flourishing evangelical revival, they were the prey of preachers of all sects. The decision of William and Thomas during the 1840s to build the church of St Thomas' in the district where their factories stood, did not, apparently, allay this animosity.

The partnership of William and Thomas was furthermore directed against their eldest brother. John Molson Sr died on 11 Jan. 1836. William exclusively received all the properties situated at Près-de-Ville (Quebec): wharf, warehouses, houses, other buildings, and all the land. St Mary's Foundry reverted to John Jr. The brewery, whose buildings also housed the distilling equipment, became the property of John Henry Robinson Molson, Thomas's eldest son. This clause thus enabled John Henry Robinson to avoid the risks involved in the system of joint estate that governed the marriage of Thomas and Martha Molson. But the boy was only nine. The will stipulated that until he reached his majority the brewery should be directed by Thomas and William, according to the terms of the company established in 1835. The three sons were in addition named residuary legatees. John claimed that as residuary legatee he had the right to share in the profits of John Molson and Company, and that the credits remaining, in the form of invested income, on properties sold at Quebec before their father's death, did not form part of William's personal endowment, but of the residuary legacy. The Honourable Peter McGill and George Moffatt*, who had been nominated by John Sr to act, with his three sons, as executors, withdrew when they saw dissensions arise, but in 1842 they agreed to act as arbitrators. They declared John to be right in the matter of sharing in the profits of the company, and William to be right in respect of the Quebec credits. In addition to the shares he already owned and those he received as residuary legatee, William may have had a third of the controlling shares held by the Molsons in the St Lawrence Steamboat Company.

The firm of John Molson and Company came to its scheduled end on 30 June 1837. A new company was formed under the name of Thomas and William Molson. On 5 Jan. 1838 fire destroyed a large part of the Montreal factories, and the Molson brothers obtained a sum of money as compensation from their insurance company. The arbitration board of 1842 decided that this sum was to be used to restore the buildings. Meanwhile the two partners had agreed to form a second company, unrestricted by the difficulties involved in carrying out their father's will. On 25 April 1838 they founded the firm of Thomas and William Molson and Company. It is clear, from the various account books, that the sole object of the partnership of 1837 was to administer the brewery on behalf of young John Henry Robinson, whereas that of 1838 managed the distillery and brewery establishments, built after the fire, for the exclusive advantage of William and Thomas.

The combativeness of the two brothers in partnership did not stop there. Indeed, they ventured to attack the Bank of Montreal, the most powerful banking institution in the colony, by taking advantage of special circumstances to issue currency. Following their father's death, John had been appointed to the board of directors of this bank to replace him. During the economic crisis of 1837 and the rebellions of 1837 and 1838, the government decided to suspend specie payments, from 16 May 1837 to 23 May 1838 and from 5 Nov. 1838 to 1 June 1839. In times of suspension several business houses took advantage of the situation to issue their own paper-money, which was convertible, not into coin, but into notes of the best known banks. Some did so in good faith, but others acted in a completely fraudulent manner; yet the practice was tolerated, for it was a way of avoiding the difficulties created by the scarcity of specie. The Thomas and William Molson Company, like many others, issued in 1837 notes bearing in this case the words "Molsons Bank." Once specie payments had resumed, these "bills on sufferance" were supposed to be bought back by those who had issued them. William and Thomas abstained from withdrawing their notes from circulation and continued to issue new ones.

At the beginning of 1839, the Bank of Montreal and the Board of Trade prepared for the Special Council (of which John Molson had been a member since 1837) the text of a decree forbidding the circulation of private currency. On 1 March, the Molsons protested against the draft decree to the governor, Sir John Colborne*, and on 10 March they forwarded proposed amendments. The decree was none the less promulgated on 11 April 1839 and was to be in force by 1 June 1839, the date of the second return to specie payments. It provided in general terms that certain private banks could issue notes. On 18 May William and Thomas Molson asked that their enterprise be recognized as a private bank. The Special Council's refusal was announced on 22 July. During all this time the two brothers continued to issue their private money illegally. On 8 November, the board of directors of the Bank of Montreal approved the managing director's decision to refuse deposits made by the firm of Thomas and William Molson, and on 19 November instructed him to close the account of this firm by forwarding to it the £1,600 that remained in its balance. The Molson brothers' situation was becoming precarious; for several months, no longer having any bankers, they had to do cash transactions with their suppliers and customers. In order not to lose credit with the public, they soon agreed to buy back the notes they had issued. After they had acquired a substantial block of shares in the Banque du Peuple, the latter agreed to receive them as customers. This institution was their banker from 1840 to 1844. When the new governor general, Lord Sydenham [Thomson*], who was known for his plans for monetary and banking reform, arrived at the end of 1839, the two brothers again attempted to obtain a private bank licence. On 22 Dec. 1840 they presented their petition, which was refused in its turn on 31 December.

Such were the relatively troubled beginnings of this long association of William with his brother Thomas. The years of depression (1837–42), followed by a short expansion (1842–45) and the great commercial crisis of 1845–50, do not seem to have affected too grievously the common undertaking of the two brothers. On the contrary, they modernized their factories, and continued to add more important and more productive pieces of equipment. They got rid of some of their competitors by buying their businesses, such as the Handyside brothers' in 1844, and John Michael Tobin's small distillery on the Rivière Saint-Pierre in 1848.

The correspondence of the Molson enterprise shows that William, among other activities, had developed a certain specialization in relations with competitors and with the state. Thus it was he who negotiated cartel agreements with companies, and who saw that they were respected. No doubt because of his skill in this area, he was chosen by the brewing and distilling industry as a whole to defend their interests by lobbying parliament and certain ministries; it was indeed necessary to see that any increase of taxes on production and consumption was constantly discouraged, and that the laws restricting or forbidding the consumption of spirits were delayed and rendered less severe.

Was it to defend more effectively the collective interests of the brewers and distillers that William entered politics? When the municipal council for Montreal was re-established in 1840 (the city charter was not renewed in 1837) he accepted a nomination by the governor as councillor until 1 Dec. 1842. He was elected in December 1842 in Sainte-Marie ward and again in 1843. In April 1844, when the political "Metcalfe crisis" was at its height, William decided to stand for "the party of the governor," Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe*, against the Irishman Lewis Thomas Drummond*, of the Reform party, in a by-election in the constituency of the town of Montreal. On 26 March, his friend John YOUNG wrote to tell him that groups of Irish and French Canadian workers employed on the Lachine Canal were banding together to attack his supporters on election day. He urged William to ask for the protection of the police and the army. It was one of the most violent elections in Canadian history. It had been set for 11 April, but in view of the violence it was broken off and postponed until the 16th and 17th. On those days there were clashes, and soldiers intervened. But the returning officer, Alexandre-Maurice DELISLE, declared that the electors had nevertheless had the opportunity to vote, and announced the election of Drummond. According to Jacques Monet, the powerful Temperance Society had displayed strong opposition to William Molson.

William's solidarity with the Tory party explains why five years later he was closely involved in the annexationist movement, of which he was secretary, and why he signed the famous manifesto of 1849. Like all the signatories, William was the victim of repressive action by the colonial administration: he lost his rank, which he had obtained in 1847, as major in the 2nd Battalion of the Montreal militia, and it appears that he also lost his post as judge.

William's wealth continued to increase. The will that he made on 24 April 1840 made his wife the beneficiary of an annuity of £500 – a principal of £8,000 when calculated at 6 per cent interest – and his daughters the beneficiaries, in equal parts, of the interest on a capital sum of $10,000 which would itself be given over to them on their coming of age; his son was made residuary legatee.

At this period William's career as an entrepreneur underwent a profound change. Perhaps his activity as a banker at the end of the 1830s had produced a vocation that would now find expression: that of banker and financier. In 1843 he joined his eldest brother on the board of directors of the Bank of Montreal, on which the latter had sat continuously since their father's death in 1836. It was also at the beginning of the 1840s that he was elected to the board of directors of the Mutual Insurance Company of Montreal.

The family also underwent profound changes in this period. His only son, William, died on 22 Jan. 1843 from smallpox. The funeral took place at the Episcopalian St Thomas' Church, which William and his brother Thomas had just constructed. The marriage of his eldest daughter, Elizabeth Sarah Badgley, to David Lewis Macpherson* was celebrated at the same church on 18 June 1844. In 1845 it was the turn of his daughter Anne to leave the family circle and she married John Molson III, son of John Molson Jr. The rapprochement between the two brothers thus took on a new, deeper significance.

Around 1845 vast plans for railroad construction, which had been retarded by the economic crisis, began to be brought into effect in Canada, although it was not until 1850 that the building of the Grand Trunk was undertaken. But before 1850, some small railroads were built, radiating from Montreal in several directions. William Molson appeared on the boards of directors of a large number of these small companies, sometimes even as president. With him on the boards were often the Honourable James Ferrier* or his son-in-law David Lewis Macpherson. William was a director of numerous companies between 1845 and 1850: the Champlain and St Lawrence Railroad Company, the Champlain and New York Railroad Company, the Montreal and New York Railroad Company, the Montreal and Champlain Railroad Company, the Lake St Louis and Province Line Railway Company, the St Lawrence and Ottawa Grand Junction Railroad Company, the St Lawrence and Atlantic Railroad Company, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company. This list clearly contains a certain amount of duplication and repetition. Indeed, the railroad companies changed their names when some of them grouped together, or when they obtained from the government a supplementary tract of land over which they could extend their lines. And there is no proof all these legal entities actually built railways.

The extent of the sums William invested in these undertakings is not known. The Molson Archives contain numerous statements for purchased shares, but it is impossible to ascertain whether they are a complete inventory of his operations. It is known that on 12 March 1855 the board of directors of the Bank of Montreal advanced £3,000 to the Champlain and New York Railroad Company and that William alone personally guaranteed repayment of £1,000; this guarantee, by its size, is indicative. The significant thing, however, is that he took a close interest in the new forms that industrial capitalism was taking as it developed in Canada. Technological progress, and the increasingly large place the capital factor was assuming in the production process, were bringing about important shifts in the role of the entrepreneur, and leading to the formation of a capital market in Canada. At the same time the financiers in the mother country, particularly those of Baring Brothers, were beginning to show an interest in financing private companies in the colonies that were investing in the economic infrastructure.

William Molson was willing to adjust himself to the new capitalist structures. In future, a leading entrepreneur would no longer be a technician, who personally owned the means of production and administered an undertaking. It would from then on be too vast for individual or family ownership. Its large number of employees, and the complexity of the problems involved in organizing the work of factory and office, would no longer permit an entrepreneur to see to all the details of its daily running. The law would then adapt itself to the new economic structures and the joint-stock, limited-liability company would appear. The new entrepreneur was therefore no longer the exclusive owner of the means of production. Thanks to the control that he could exercise over the other shareholders, he did not even need to own a majority of the shares. From then on the top-ranking entrepreneur would be above all a financier. William Molson, in the new directions he gave to his activities, recognized the developments the Canadian economy, even western capitalism, was undergoing.

In 1847 William's name appears along with that of his brother Thomas among the first group of shareholders of the New City Gas Company. This company, formed to provide the city of Montreal with a proposal for gas street lights, was in competition with an existing company but would soon bring about its disappearance.

The new structures of Canadian capitalism, which had developed during the late 1840s with the railroads, were to grow more firm in the mining industry at the beginning of the 1850s. William Molson showed a great interest in this field also. In different capacities, he was a member of various companies, in particular the Montreal Mining Company, the Upper Canada Mining Company, the British North American Mining Company, and the Quebec and Lake Superior Mining Association. Here again it would be hard to specify to what extent all these mining companies were developed and the importance of William's participation.

While William was thus asserting new characteristics of his personality as a financier-entrepreneur, he was also preparing to break the long, close association with his brother Thomas. On 30 June 1848 Thomas and William Molson and Company, formed in 1838, reached the end of its contract, and a new agreement had to be signed. This was done on 12 July before the notary Isaac Jones Gibb, and was retroactive to 1 July. A new partner joined the undertaking, John Henry Robinson Molson, Thomas' eldest son, who had reached his majority the previous year; he brought to the common undertaking the brewery he now owned. Each partner, as in the previous companies, remained the owner of the physical capital that he brought in and for which he drew an annual rent. From the brewery the young partner would get £500, and from the distillery William and Thomas would get conjointly £1,800. The profits would be distributed in the ratio of 10/24 for each of the senior partners and 4/24 for the youngest.

On 5 June 1847 John Henry Robinson had become 21. Normally, on that day he should have received possession of the brewery inherited from his grandfather, and the sum of £3,872 2*s.* 6*d.* from the insurance company in compensation for the damage that the business had suffered in the 1838 fire. On that day also William and Thomas should have handed him his indentures and taken him in at least as a salaried employee, by virtue of the articles of apprenticeship concluded between the youth and his two employers on 15 Nov. 1844, but which were retroactive to 1 Nov. 1843. The latter waited a year before delivering him his indentures and giving him the sum of money and possession of the brewery. The young man received no compensation for the interest that had accumulated for ten years on the sum paid by the insurance company and for the remuneration that had not been paid since the end of his apprenticeship. These actions would influence John Henry Robinson's behaviour towards his father and his uncle William.

According to the contract, the new company would come to an end in ten years. But special provision was made whereby William could withdraw from it after five (on condition that advance notice of one year was given to his co-partners) without detriment to the structure of the undertaking. No doubt the early foundation of Molsons Bank was anticipated, as well as the broad outlines of the bill the Legislative Assembly was to pass in 1850, which would authorize the formation of private banks but forbid a banker to engage in any other business than that of the bank.

And in fact, on 24 June 1852, William did give his brother Thomas advance notice in writing. During the months that followed, the two brothers attempted to reach an understanding as to the value of William's equity, which Thomas wanted to purchase. The latter offered £7,000; William demanded £8,000, and even threatened to sell to a third party if he did not get his price. The final agreement came on 11 Dec. 1852, and the sale took place on 18 December: William sold his share in the distillery (£8,000), two pieces of land (£122), five lots and a house (£738 10*s*.); the sum was payable three years after the date of William's withdrawal on 1 July 1853, with an annual interest of 6 per cent. Even if the negotiations had sometimes been difficult, one cannot accept the hypothesis, suggested by Merrill Denison, of a quarrel between the two brothers. On 7 Jan. 1853 Thomas decided to leave for England, and gave his brother a general power of attorney for the administration of all his affairs. A rupture between the two brothers would have prevented such confidence.

In 1850, the Legislative Assembly had passed the bill authorizing private banks. On 1 Oct. 1853 William Molson went into partnership with his brother, John Molson, to set up the firm of Molsons and Company. The name of Molsons Bank was registered on 3 December. The correspondence of Thomas Molson's enterprises shows that during its first two years the new bank encountered certain difficulties in issuing and circulating its notes. In this period, when notes were convertible, it was permissible for a bank to accumulate the notes of a rival bank for a certain time, and to demand suddenly from that bank the conversion of the accumulated notes into coin; as a considerable sum might be involved, the stability of the latter's cash balance might thereby be endangered. The Bank of Montreal, despite the wishes for success addressed by the members of its board of directors to William and John Molson at the time of their resignation, exerted this pressure on Molsons Bank, sometimes in collusion with the Bank of Upper Canada in Toronto.

Difficulties of this kind perhaps underlay the decision of the Molson brothers to withdraw from the regime set up by the private banks' act, and to ask that their bank be placed under the system of charter banks, in operation since 1817. On 19 May 1855 Molsons Bank was legally constituted. It was to be directed, not by a company of individuals, but by a joint-stock company or "corporation." The persons who had submitted this request were John, Thomas, and William Molson, George and John Ogilvy Moffatt, Samuel Gerrard*, James Ferrier, William Dow*, and Johnson Thomson. The new charter bank began operations on 1 Oct. 1855. On 22 October, the shareholders named their first board of directors: John, Thomas, William, and John Henry Robinson Molson, and Ephrem Hudon. The next day, at the first meeting of the board, William was elected president and John Jr vice-president.

Thereafter, William Molson's career was to be characterized by his new activity as banker. Until his death he was the president of the family bank. However he continued to interest himself in one way or another in the mining and railroad companies of which he was a director. In addition he continued to direct certain small undertakings such as the Otterdorf and Heilman's Soap Factory at Place Papineau, in which, according to certain documents dated 1855, he had a substantial interest. He also had real estate investments in certain areas of Montreal, particularly in the Sainte-Marie district, where the brewery and distillery establishments were, and where he lived himself on Rue Sainte-Marie (now Rue Notre-Dame) until shortly before his death. The great fire of Montreal, on 9 July 1852, had affected this district seriously and had destroyed three of William's houses, one in Rue Sainte-Marie, the two others at Place Papineau.

Apart from the appreciation in the value of the shares that he held in the bank, and of the dividends that he drew from them, William received each year the sum of $2,000, not as a contractual payment but as a bonus voted by the shareholders at their annual meeting in recognition of his work. A few months prior to his death, at the annual meeting of 12 Oct. 1874, he refused to accept the sum, stating that he had not been able to concern himself with bank business during the previous year.

During the late 1860s and early 1870s, Molsons Bank developed considerably, and extended its operations in Quebec and Ontario. In February 1875, however, at the time of William's death, the Canadian economy was experiencing the effects of the great world crisis of 1873 and of the long depression that was to last until 1879. It is this that explains the financial disaster which befell one of William's last undertakings: the production of iron by the treatment of the magnetic iron sands found at the mouth of the Rivière Moisie, in Baie des Sept-Îles on the north shore of the St Lawrence. In this venture William had been closely associated with his nephew William Markland, Thomas's son. The two Molsons had controlled the Moisie Iron Works Company since 1867; their manager from 1867 to 1869 was Louis LABRÈCHE-VIGER. The bulk of the production was exported to the United States. The crisis of 1873 brought about a sudden drop in demand, and a change in the American government's tariff policy and the tariff structure placed Moisie iron in such a heavily taxed category that its price in the United States became prohibitive, and the Molsons were never able to sell their iron there again. A few months after William's death the enterprise had to close its doors and the company had to declare itself bankrupt.

During a great part of his life William showed much interest in McGill University and the Montreal General Hospital. As in every industrial and financial community, in a young country, certain large educational and health institutions derive financial resources and administrative competence from the generosity and initiative of entrepreneurs; one can go so far as to say that in defining an entrepreneur's place in society one must include almost of necessity an active interest in such institutions. In 1856, when a fund-raising campaign was started on behalf of McGill University, 50 donors paid £15,000, the three Molson brothers alone giving £5,000, the income from which was earmarked for the endowment of a chair of English language and literature. In 1861 William gave a sum large enough to cover the cost of constructing William Molson Hall, a wing added to the west end of the arts building. The obituary notices published in the Montreal newspapers stressed that he had made a gift of $5,000 to the Montreal General Hospital, and a few months before his death a further gift of $2,000 for the endowment of the convalescent home of the hospital. During much of his life he was a member of the boards of governors of these two large institutions. In 1868 he succeeded John Redpath* as president of the Montreal General Hospital. The Saturday Reader of 8 Sept. 1866 stressed that William Molson was one of those who promoted the founding of the Hospice de Montréal. In the same way he supported places of worship. In 1866 Mrs William Molson, at the cost of £2,000, had built the two stories of the tower and the spire of Trinity Church, at the northwest corner of Place Viger.

William Molson had prepared his last will on 18 May 1865. He completed it with two codicils, one dated 22 Nov. 1869 and the other 31 Jan. 1870. He left all his possessions to his wife, his two daughters, and his 12 grandchildren. It is interesting to note that by the codicil of 1870 he expressly named his successor to the presidency of Molsons Bank: his son-in-law John Molson III, the son of his brother, John Molson Jr.

William Molson died on 18 Feb. 1875 and was buried in Mount Royal cemetery where, after the death of John Jr in 1860, was erected a huge monument, topped by an obelisk. William's death was announced in all the newspapers of the time and in resolutions adopted by the shareholders' meetings and the boards of directors of the companies and institutions with which he had been the most closely connected. Each vied with the other in praising the dynamic nature of the entrepreneur and the humane qualities displayed throughout his life by the man William Molson.

Thanks to the perspective afforded by time, it is possible to look at William Molson within the society in which he lived and to compare him with other entrepreneurs, first with those who were closest to him: his father, his brothers, and his nephews. More than others, he had the flexibility required to adapt himself to the transformations that the Canadian economy and western capitalism were undergoing. The evolution of industrial technology, the rise in incomes, and the increase in savings encouraged entrepreneurs to look more and more towards financial operations, in order that the savings of individuals could be built up to proportions appropriate to the growth in the capital equipment of business enterprises. William Molson's career illustrates clearly that the first and indispensable condition for being an entrepreneur is to know how to take part in building up investment capital, either by acting on one's own, or through one's family, or – still better and more effectively – through the large financial institutions.

Alfred Dubuc

Materials on William Molson are distributed in several archives. Among the most important sources are: the minutes of the board of directors' meetings and of the shareholders' meetings in the Archives of Molsons Bank (kept at the head office of the Bank of Montreal, Montreal) and in the Archives of the Bank of Montreal; the minutes of the board of directors' meetings in the Montreal Board of Trade Archives; the minutes of the municipal council at AVM; the registers of notaries Thomas Barron, Isaac Jones Gibb, Henry Griffin, John Carr Griffin, James Stewart Hunter, William Ross, and James Smith at AJM; the Molson documents at Château de Ramezay (Montreal) and at the McCord Museum (McGill University, Montreal); and the William Molson collection at the Redpath Library (McGill University).

Without doubt the most important repository is the Molson Archives at the Molson's Brewery, Montreal. This archives is described in an inventory prepared in 1955 for the Molson's Brewery (copy in PAC, MG 24, D1). The following volumes were consulted: 321–24, 327–29, 349–52, 356, 360–67, 370–74, 383–85, 388, 390–91. The Shortt papers at the PAC (MG 30, D45) also contain interesting information on Molson. See also: Report of progress from 1866 to 1869 (Geological Survey of Canada, Montreal, New York, London, Leipzig, and Paris, 1870), 211–304. Merrill Denison, The barley and the stream; the Molson story . . . (Toronto, 1955); Canada's first bank. Alfred Dubuc, "Thomas Molson, entrepreneur canadien: 1791–1863," thèse de doctorat, Université de Paris, 1969 (in process of publication). Father's Rest (Montreal, n.d.). G. C. Mackenzie, The magnetic iron sands of Natashkwan, county of Saguenay, Province of Quebec (Ottawa, 1912). Georges Ripert, Aspects juridiques du capitalisme moderne (Paris, 1946). B. K. Sandwell, The Molson family, etc. (Montreal, 1933). B. E. Walker, A history of banking in Canada; reprinted from "A history of banking in all nations," . . . (Toronto, 1909). F. W. Wegenast, The law of Canadian companies (Toronto, 1931). G. H. Wilson, "The application of steam to St. Lawrence valley navigation, 1809–1840," unpublished MA thesis, McGill University, 1961. René Bélanger, "Les forges de Moisie," Saguenayensia (Chicoutimi, Qué.), VI (1964), 76–79; "Moisie; peuplement – mouvement de la population de 1860 à 1895," Saguenayensia, VI (1964), 103–5. Alfred Dubuc, "Montréal et les débuts de la navigation à vapeur sur le Saint-Laurent," Revue d'histoire économique et sociale (Paris), XLV (1967), 105–18. Jacques Monet, "La crise Metcalfe and the Montreal election, 1843–1844," CHR, XLIV (1963), 1–19.

MONDELET, CHARLES-ELZÉAR, lawyer and judge; b. 28 Dec. 1801 in the parish of Saint-Marc, county of Verchères, L.C., son of Charlotte Boucher de Grosbois and Jean-Marie Mondelet*, notary, member of the Legislative Assembly from 1804 to 1809, and coroner of Montreal; d. 31 Dec. 1876 at Montreal, Que.

Charles-Elzéar Mondelet attended the college of Nicolet and the college of Montreal, and then studied law under the distinguished Michael O'Sullivan* and under Lower Canada's attorney general, Charles Marshall. He was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada on 30 Dec. 1822 and practised first in Trois-Rivières. On 21 June 1824, in Montreal's Christ Church Cathedral (Church of England), Charles married Mary Elizabeth Henrietta Carter. The Mondelets had 15 children; six reached adulthood.

In Trois-Rivières Mondelet immediately flung himself into the pro-assembly anti-administration politics of the period of Governor General Dalhousie [Ramsay*], which were at their most passionate in the years immediately after the 1822 union bill scare. Mondelet began with journalism, editing Ludger Duvernay*'s political and literary newspaper Le Constitutionnel, "the French gazette of Trois-Rivières," from its foundation in 1823 until 1825 when it was discontinued. In 1826 Mondelet founded the lively and more incisive L'Argus, "journal électorique," which was designed primarily to influence the electorate to choose radical members of parliament. Specifically, L'Argus supported the unsuccessful candidature of Pierre-Benjamin Dumoulin* against Solicitor General Charles Richard Ogden*, and then ceased to appear until it was revived a year later in Montreal by Augustin-Norbert Morin*. Mondelet was also active in a local constitutional committee which in association with committees in other districts had been formed to oppose union with Upper Canada and which also protested against the policies of the governor and his legislative councillors generally. These activities cost Mondelet his militia commission in November 1827. His subsequent condemnation of Governor Dalhousie's militia policies in the Quebec Gazette earned him an indictment for libel in March 1828. After Dalhousie left Canada, these charges were dropped.

In 1829 or 1830 Mondelet moved to Montreal. There he practised law with his brother Dominique*, and worked for the latter's election to the assembly in April 1831. Under the signature "Pensez-Y-Bien" he also wrote letters to the editor of La Minerve demanding that the Legislative Council be abolished or made elective. The council declared this statement libellous and imprisoned the publisher, Ludger Duvernay, for about a month. Soon after Duvernay's release, Charles' close association with the Patriote party ended temporarily when personal loyalties and other circumstances persuaded him tacitly to renounce his political radicalism and to defend his brother's different politics.

In an 1832 by-election the Mondelets favoured the moderate candidate Stanley Bagg* over his radical opponent Daniel Tracey*. The Patriote party condemned the brothers for their support, and even more for avoiding the inquest after troops transformed the polling into the notorious "Massacre of Montreal" by killing three of Tracey's supporters. The Mondelets did wear mourning arm bands but their father, Jean-Marie, was after all the coroner and therefore deeply involved in the proceedings as a non-partisan official. Then on 27 Nov. 1832 the Reform-dominated assembly censured Dominique for becoming an honorary executive councillor, and the censure extended to the brother who supported him. Finally, in April 1834, when Charles publicly opposed the 92 Resolutions, Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU's young lieutenant Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* viciously attacked both brothers in Les deux girouettes, ou l'hypocrisie démasquée. He accused Charles of slavishly following Dominique in betraying his ideals and his party and added charges of personal hypocrisy and meanness.

Charles Mondelet nevertheless continued in close association with both moderate and radical politicians through the Comité Sanitaire de Montréal in which he was active during the cholera years. He also joined the politico-literary Aide-toi, le Ciel t'aidera club, whose radical members later transformed it into the militant Fils de la Liberté, which in its turn gave rise to the nationalistic Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste. On 2 Nov. 1837 he was unanimously accepted into the revolutionary Comité Central et Permanent du district de Montréal.

At the Montreal assizes in September 1838 Mondelet and two colleagues defended four Patriotes, François Nicolas, Amable Daunais, Joseph Pinsonnault, and Gédéon Pinsonnault, for executing loyalist Joseph Armand, dit Chartrand; the trial was noted for Charles' impassioned speech on behalf of Nicolas. In 1839 Charles defended François Jalbert* for killing Lieutenant George Weir while he was a prisoner in Patriote custody. In both cases Mondelet argued that his clients had committed political not criminal acts, and should therefore be treated as political prisoners: he even tried to have Jalbert freed under the amnesty granted by Lord Durham [Lambton*] on 28 June 1838. Mondelet also argued that an oppressed people should not suffer for acts committed during justifiable rebellions. In both cases the jury acquitted the prisoners. Ironically, Nicolas and the 20-year-old Daunais were later retried for their activities during the 1838 uprisings, with Dominique Mondelet one of the crown prosecutors, and they were sentenced to hang.

Between assizes, on 4 Nov. 1838, Charles Mondelet was arbitrarily arrested and thrown into the prison of Montreal where he renewed his friendship with La Fontaine. When they were finally released without trial, Mondelet returned to his law practice until his partner and brother Dominique was appointed to the Trois-Rivières Court of Queen's Bench on 1 June 1842. Then Charles practised briefly with his frequent legal associate Côme-Séraphin Cherrier*, Louis-Joseph Papineau's cousin.

After the rebellions Charles, who supported Union, had mingled with politicians but not politics, devoting himself to law and to education. His farsighted Letters on elementary and practical education greatly influenced the education act of 18 Sept. 1841 introduced by Sydenham [Thomson*]. Mondelet proposed English and French public schools for the united province, financed by direct taxes and legislative grants. The system would be headed by a powerful superintendent, officials appointed by the governor but responsible to the legislature, several elected officials, and all resident clergymen as ex officio school wardens. Thus in the control of public education there would be a nice balance between the people, the government, and the religious establishments. Mondelet's description of the almost autocratic powers of the proposed superintendent of education is interesting because Sydenham promised him the post. The latter died without a commission having been issued; it may be that either the governor or Mondelet changed his mind.

Sydenham's successor, Sir Charles Bagot*, appointed Jean-Baptiste MEILLEUR deputy superintendent for education in Lower Canada and named Mondelet to the district bench instead, with a jurisdiction including the counties of Terrebonne, L'Assomption, and Berthier. In 1844 he became circuit judge at Montreal. On 24 Dec. 1849 he was appointed judge of the Superior Court and served until 1859 and from 1869 until his death. From 30 May 1859 to 31 Dec. 1869 he was judge pro tem. of the Court of Queen's Bench. It was as superior court judge that Mondelet became involved in the famous Guibord affair.

The battle raging between Quebec's clerical hierarchy and the politically radical Institut Canadien, whose 1868 and 1869 annuals were on the Papal index, culminated in a local parish's refusal to bury Institut member Joseph Guibord*, dit Archambault [see TRUTEAU]. In November 1869 in his decision on the suit brought against the parish of Notre-Dame by Guibord's widow, Henriette Brown, and later by her heir, the Institut, Judge Charles Mondelet instructed the parish to bury Guibord and to pay all court costs. This decision, reversed on 12 Sept. 1870 by the Court of Revision, was sustained on 28 April 1874 by the paramount judicial authority, the Privy Council. Mondelet's judgement was of great moment because of the issues involved: his selection of the custom of Paris as the relevant body of law and his interpretation of essentially ecclesiastical questions in defiance of contemporary ecclesiastical opinion. On 16 Nov. 1874 Guibord was buried but Bishop Ignace Bourget* declared his plot morally separate from the Catholic cemetery, and so it has remained. Thus the spirit of Mondelet's judgement was defied by the ecclesiastical authorities he had challenged.

Mondelet's Essai analytique sur Le Paradis perdu de Milton (1848), co-authored with William Vondenvelden*, and his Address before the American Association for the Advancement of Science (1857), indicate his diversified interests. He even translated Peter Parley's Geography and adapted it for use in Canadian schools, adding a supplement for small children explaining the operation of natural phenomena.

Mondelet, very much a free thinker, married an English Canadian in an Anglican church, despite his French-Canadian Catholic background, and defied not only his bishop but public opinion in the Guibord affair. A witty man, he was learned in the law and also in various aspects of education, its practical operation in many countries and its philosophy. In politics he was a radical, except for one brief period, and it was these sympathies which dominated when he became a member of Aide-toi, le Ciel t'aidera, when he joined the revolutionary Comité Central et Permanent du district de Montréal, and when he defended Patriote prisoners. Immediately after 1834 Charles continued his close association with many of the radical politicians, and his youthful radicalism remained intact, for in the Guibord affair he sided with the most radical members of French Canadian society when he himself was an old man.

Elizabeth Nish

[Mondelet's Letters on elementary and practical education (Montreal, 1841) gives his ideas on how a school system should be set up. Documents relating to constitutional history, 1819–1828 (Doughty and Story) contains many extracts from the official correspondence relating to the decommissioning of the militia under Dalhousie and to the libel suits of that period. L.-H. La Fontaine, Les deux girouettes; ou l'hypocrisie démasquée (Montréal, 1834) is of great importance for anyone interested in the Mondelet brothers since the entire book is devoted to attacking them. Much of the available information about Charles' early political life in Montreal comes from this book. Christie, History of Lower Canada, III–V, and H. T. Manning, The revolt of French Canada, 1800–1835: a chapter in the history of the British commonwealth (Toronto, 1962), provide excellent surveys of the early period of Mondelet's life. Théophile Hudon's study of L'Institut canadien de Montréal et l'affaire Guibord; une page d'histoire (Montréal, 1938) is essential for an understanding of the intricacies of the situation, religious as well as legal. Hudon is prejudiced against Mondelet because of the latter's anti-clericalism; still the book is an excellent account of the Guibord case. P.-G. Roy, Les juges de la province de Québec, 379; F.-J. Audet, "Les Mondelet," Cahiers des Dix, III (1938), 191–216; L.-P. Audet, "Charles Mondelet et l'éducation," RSCT, 3rd ser., LI (1957) sect.I, 1–27; Gérard Malchelosse, "Généalogie de la famille Mondelet," BRH, LI (1945), 51–60, are factual notices of Charles Mondelet and his family and provide the bulk of the secondary material on Charles. E.N.]

Archives paroissiales de Saint-Marc (comté de Verchères, Québec), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures, 1801. BNQ, Société historique de Montréal, Collection La Fontaine, Lettres, 18, 215, 405, 554. Christ Church Cathedral (Montreal), Register of baptisms, marriages, and burials, 21 June 1824. P.-J.-O. Chauveau, L'instruction publique au Canada, précis historique et statistique (Québec, 1876). Report of the state trials before a general court martial held at Montreal in 1838–9, exhibiting a complete history of the late rebellion in Lower Canada (2v., Montreal, 1839). Beaulieu et Hamelin, Journaux du Québec. Chapais, Histoire du Canada. David, Patriotes. L.-P. Audet, "Jean-Baptiste Meilleur était-il un candidat valable au poste de surintendant de l'Éducation pour le Bas-Canada en 1842?" Cahiers des Dix, XXXI (1966), 163–201. Bernard Dufebvre, "Ludger Duvernay et « La Minerve », 1827–1837," RUL, VII (1952–53), 220–29. Victor Morin, "Clubs et sociétés notoires d'autrefois," Cahiers des Dix, XV (1950), 185–218.

MONRO (Munro, Munroe), GEORGE, merchant and politician; b. in Scotland in 1801; m. about 1822 Christine Fisher of Montreal, and was survived by two sons and four daughters; d. 5 Jan. 1878 in Toronto, Ont.

George Monro came to Niagara, Upper Canada, as a child with his parents. He left for York (Toronto) in 1814 with his elder brother John and together they entered the retail grocery business. They separated in 1824, and George continued on his own to develop a successful wholesale enterprise, advertising himself as "Importer of British and India Goods." He also began to take part in the political life of the town.

Throughout his public career Monro was a weak pillar of the Toronto establishment. He attended the Church of England cathedral, St James', was a member of the Church Society and the Bible Society, was a director of the Home District Savings Bank and the British America Assurance Company, and in 1833 was appointed a magistrate. From 1834 to 1845 (except for 1836) he was elected to the city council from the St Lawrence ward. In 1841 he was chosen mayor, after the nomination of George Gurnett* had been successfully challenged on the grounds that he sublet a house for use as a brothel.

During his mayoralty Monro was the "Conservative and Constitutional Candidate" for Toronto's two-seat riding in the Legislative Assembly. He repudiated responsible government as "anti-British and unreasonable," and thought Toronto should have the "carrying trade of the St. Lawrence." When the poll closed after six days, Monro was last, and the other Conservative, Henry Sherwood*, second last; the two Reformers, John Henry Dunn* and Isaac Buchanan*, had to their surprise won.

Among those disappointed by this result was a man named Allen, who recruited some fellow-Orangemen to demonstrate against the Reformers' triumphal parade on Monday, 21 March 1841. The Orangemen gathered at the North of Ireland Coleraine Tavern; about noon they sallied forth to beat up a kilted piper on his way to join the parade and dismembered his instrument. On being told of the assault and asked to provide protection for the parade, Monro replied "You may go to the Devil." The mayor and magistrates had not been unaware that trouble was brewing: at a meeting earlier that morning Monro had suggested calling out the military, but the magistrates preferred to swear in special constables – mostly the same men who had been notoriously partisan during the election of the week before. These constables do not appear to have gone far from the city hall, for it was realized that they were more likely to provoke trouble than to reduce it.

The parade started, but when it reached St James' Cathedral it was pelted with muck and stones and horses were clubbed. The attackers were beaten off and the parade continued. When the carriages bearing the successful candidates passed in front of the Coleraine inn, shots were fired from within and one bystander was killed and others wounded. Alderman John Powell arrived on the scene and read the riot act and Dunn sent two men to the Osgoode Hall barracks for military help. A request from the mayor was needed, so the men had to find Monro (who had mounted a feckless horse in order, he said, to get military help himself) and pressure him into going with them to the barracks and admitting that he was indeed the mayor. The troops then restored order. The provincial government ordered a commission of inquiry headed by William Foster COFFIN, which concluded that the "indecision and remissness evinced by the magistrates . . . amounts . . . to little less than connivance, if not to an actual collusion with the rioters. . . . [The Mayor] is amenable to a charge of dereliction of duty."

Monro petitioned for a committee to investigate the truth of the commission's report, but failed to get a hearing. He completed his year in office and, so little was his reputation apparently sullied by the events of the riot, was sent to England as the bearer of an address to Queen Victoria on the birth of the Prince of Wales. In 1844 Monro stood again as a Conservative candidate, this time in the east riding of York, where he was defeated by James Small*. Monro's supporters then claimed that Small's qualifications were defective, and the assembly found that Monro "was duly elected and ought to have been returned." He ran again in the general election of January 1848 in the same riding, but fell an easy victim to the Reformer, William Hume Blake*, who was in Europe at the time.

This defeat ended Monro's peppery political career, and he lived quietly thereafter. He gave up his business around 1856 and moved to the fashionable new district around the foot of Spadina, where he practised his life-long hobby of gardening. He sat amid his flowers listening to his gardener play the pipes and slowly passing, as the Mail said on his death, "beyond the recollection of the present generation."

R. I. K. DAVIDSON

Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1841, app.S, "Report of the commissioners appointed to investigate certain proceedings at Toronto connected with the election in that city. . . ." Examiner (Toronto), 1841. Toronto Patriot, 1841. City of Toronto poll book: exhibiting a classified list of voters, at the late great contest for responsible government . . . (Toronto, 1841). Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), I. Town of York, 1815–34 (Firth). York commercial directory, street guide, and register, 1833–4 . . ., comp. George Walter (York, [1833]). Toronto city directory for 1872–73 . . ., ed. and comp. W. H. Irwin (Toronto, 1872).

MONTGOMERY, JOHN, tavern-keeper; b. probably 29 Feb. 1788, at Gagetown, N.B., son of Alexander Montgomery; d. at Barrie, Ont., 31 Oct. 1879.

John Montgomery's parents left Stamford, Connecticut, for New Brunswick after the American Revolutionary War, and in about 1798 settled at York (Toronto), Upper Canada. John served in the War of 1812 as a York volunteer on the Niagara frontier, and was present at the battle at Queenston.

Alexander Montgomery had established a tavern at York soon after his arrival, and in 1828 John was keeping the Bird in Hand Tavern, also at York. In the same period he operated a tavern on Yonge Street near Newton Brook (now in the borough of North York). About 1830 he erected Montgomery's Tavern on Yonge Street, a few miles north of York.

Montgomery had sympathized with the Reformers in Upper Canada, perhaps as early as 1824. In 1832 he helped send William Lyon Mackenzie* to England to present petitions to the Colonial Office, and he was later among the Reformers who founded the Bank of the People. He was also a commissioner for the roads of York County and a director of the Mutual Insurance Company. In July 1837, on the eve of the rebellion in Upper Canada, he signed at John DOEL's brewery a declaration of Toronto Reformers and was a member of a vigilance committee named to carry out its resolutions aimed at creating "the effectual organization of the Reformers of Upper Canada." He appears, however, to have quarrelled with Mackenzie, disapproving of the latter's plans for open rebellion.

On 3 December he was informed that his tavern would be the headquarters for the rebels, and was asked to act as commissary. But Montgomery had leased his tavern to John Linfoot by this time. Linfoot was to take possession of the tavern on 1 Feb. 1838, but had moved in on 1 December. While the rebel forces were assembling, Montgomery continued living in one of the rooms of the tavern and was said to have been occupied mainly with moving furniture to his new home. Although he apparently took no active part in the activities of the rebels and is said to have quarrelled at the tavern on one occasion with Mackenzie, his conduct was found at his trial to have been ambivalent.

On 7 December government forces reached the tavern and burned it on the orders of Francis Bond HEAD. Montgomery was arrested, and charged with high treason. Tried before John Beverley Robinson*, he was found guilty and sentenced to be executed, but this sentence was commuted to transportation for life. Montgomery was sent to Fort Henry; he escaped and made his way to Rochester, New York, where he kept a boarding-house, which became a rendezvous of Canadian Patriots, and a grocery store. He was again closely associated with Mackenzie at Rochester and was president of an association for Canadian refugees.

Montgomery was pardoned and returned to Toronto in 1843. He built a large new tavern on the site of the old on Yonge Street, and later operated taverns in Toronto itself; in 1858 he was proprietor of the Robinson House, a "temperance hotel" where liquor was not sold. In 1871 he moved to Headford, in Markham Township, where he was postmaster. Soon after his return to Canada he had submitted the first of a long series of petitions requesting compensation for the loss of his tavern in 1837. He enlisted Mackenzie's help, but only in 1873 was action taken; in that year, Oliver Mowat*'s government established a select committee of the Legislative Assembly which decided that Montgomery's losses had exceeded $15,000; it awarded him $3,000.

Montgomery was married three times, but only the name of Mary Wilmot, whom he married in 1835, is known. When he died in 1879 he was survived by his third wife and six children. He claimed that at his trial, when asked by Robinson if he had anything to say, he replied that he had been convicted by perjured evidence and that "These perjurers will never die a natural death; and when you, sir, and the jury shall have died and perished in hell's flames, John Montgomery will yet be living on Yonge Street." If the prophecy was made, parts of it did come true: two men killed themselves, and Montgomery outlived judge, jurors, witnesses, and prosecutors.

EDWIN C. GUILLET

PAO, Mackenzie-Lindsey collection, clippings, no. 305; Misc. 1959, E. A. Lacey, "John Montgomery, a miscarriage of justice." Globe (Toronto), 15 Jan. 1876. Picton Times, 29 Jan. 1880. Dent, Upper Canadian rebellion. E. C. Guillet, The lives and times of the Patriots; an account of the rebellion in Upper Canada, 1837–1838, and the Patriot agitation in the United States, 1837–1842 (Toronto, 1938); Pioneer inns and taverns (5 v., Toronto, 1954–62), I. E. A. Lacey, "The trials of John Montgomery," Ont. Hist., LII (1960), 141–58. Mrs O. B. Sheppard, "Incidents in the life of John Montgomery during the rebellion of 1837–38," York Pioneer and Hist. Soc., Annual Report, 1926 (Toronto), 11–15.

MOODY, SEWELL PRESCOTT, lumberman; b. probably between 1835 and 1840, perhaps in Hartland, Maine, son of Joshua Moody; m. in 1869 Janet McAuslyn Watson by whom he had two children; drowned in the sinking of the steamer Pacific near Cape Flattery, 4 Nov. 1875, while bound for California on a business trip.

Sewell Prescott Moody is said to have crossed the American continent to San Francisco in the traditional covered wagon with his family when he was 14. He came to New Westminster, B.C., about 1861 and in 1862 formed a partnership with Moses Ireland, who had made a small stake in the Cariboo mines. Ireland later stated that his investment was $2,000 and Moody's, $600. They imported cattle and other supplies and prospered in a modest way. The Moody family had had a long association with the lumber trade in Maine, and in 1862 Moody formed a syndicate that included Ireland, Joshua Attwood Reynolds Homer*, and Captain James Van Bramer to build a steam sawmill at New Westminster. This was the first mill of any size on the mainland of British Columbia. Unfortunately the first vessel to load an export shipment stranded on a sandbar in the Fraser River and remained aground for six weeks. As a result other ships refused to load. Members of this syndicate later became interested in coal seams that had been discovered on Coal Harbour and English Bay, in Burrard Inlet. They incorporated the British Columbia Coal Mining Company in 1865, but nothing came of this venture.

Meanwhile Moody had decided to move his lumbering activities to Burrard Inlet. Late in 1863 he tried to purchase the Pioneer Mills, the first industrial plant on the inlet, but was outbid at the auction. A year later he succeeded in buying the mill, which was cutting lumber under his ownership by February 1865. Though greatly handicapped by the lack of marketing information and exchange facilities, Moody slowly built up the first substantial lumber export business from the British Columbia mainland, and sent shipments to California, Hawaii, Peru, China, Australia, New Zealand, and Great Britain.

In 1866 Moody entered into partnership with George Dietz and Hugh Nelson*, who had operated an express business serving the Fraser River mines. For a time the firm continued to be known as S. P. Moody and Company, but in 1870 the name was changed to Moody, Dietz and Nelson. The additional capital had made it possible to expand the mills. The original plant was driven by water-power, and in 1868 a larger steam mill was added. This was burned in December 1873 but was replaced at once by a new mill powered with the engines of HMS Sparrowhawk, a gunboat recently retired by the Royal Navy. Moody's mills then had a cutting capacity of 112,000 feet in 24 hours.

These mills were on the north shore of Burrard Inlet, within the limits of the present city of North Vancouver. First known locally as "Moody's Mills," the surrounding settlement was officially named Moodyville in 1872. Moody was an enterprising, astute, and perhaps occasionally sharp trader; but he had a puritanical streak and a liking for law and order. Moodyville was a company town, and he ruled it and his men with a firm hand. The sale of liquor was forbidden, and in large part owing to Moody himself Moodyville had the first school, the first religious service, the first library and reading room, and the first Masonic lodge on Burrard Inlet. He also extended the telegraph line from New Westminster at his own expense. Sewell P. Moody thus built a community as well as an important pioneer industrial enterprise.

W. KAYE LAMB

Daily Colonist (Victoria), 12, 13 Sept. 1901. W. A. Carrothers, "Forest industries of British Columbia," in A. R. M. Lower, The North American assault on the Canadian forest: a history of the lumber trade between Canada and the United States (The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Division of economics and history, Toronto, New Haven, Conn., London, 1938). J. S. Matthews, "Early Vancouver: narrative of pioneers" (unpublished typescript, 7v., 1932–56, IV, VI, copies in City Archives, Vancouver, and Library of Parliament, Ottawa). R. L. Reid, Grand Lodge of British Columbia A.F. & A.M.: historical notes and biographical sketches, 1848–1935 (Vancouver, n.d.). F. W. Howay, "Early shipping in Burrard Inlet, 1863–1870," BCHQ, I (1937), 1–20.

MOORE, PHILIP HENRY, farmer, soldier, legislative councillor, and railroad president; b. at Rhinebeck, Dutchess County, New York, 22 Feb. 1799, the third son of Nicholas and Catherine Streit; m. Harriet A. Stone (b. at Fairfax, Vermont, in 1802), and they had six sons and two daughters; d. 21 Nov. 1880 at Saint-Armand-Station, Missisquoi County, Que.

Philip Henry Moore moved with his parents in 1802 to Moore's Corner (later known as Saint-Armand-Station). After attending the district school, he studied at an academy in St Albans, Vermont. As a young man he farmed for a short time and for some years was a merchant in Bedford, Missisquoi County. On 25 July 1829 he was appointed commissioner for the trial of small causes in the seigneury of Saint-Armand, along with Jonas Abbott; he was commissioned the first registrar of Missisquoi County at Frelighsburg on 19 June 1830. He retired from business in 1833 to the ancestral farm two and a half miles north of Moore's Corner and proved to be "a good intelligent farmer": his name appeared for many years on the annual prize list of the county. He served in the local militia, which formed a company of the 4th Bedford battalion, and he took a prominent part in the battle at Moore's Corner in the rebellion of 1837 for which he was officially thanked by Sir John Colborne*, commander in chief. Charged by some with taking too much credit for the success of the battle, he produced documents, printed in the Montreal Herald in March 1838, which confirmed that he had indeed directed his party to the extent he had claimed.

On the union of the provinces in 1841, Philip Henry Moore was called to the Legislative Council, a position he held until confederation. He was active in the council's debates and, with his colleague for Missisquoi, Paul Holland Knowlton*, laboured ardently for decentralization on behalf of their area. Before union the courts, both civil and criminal, had been in Montreal. That city was also the market for the products of Missisquoi County and it was hard to reach, except in winter; yet farmers of the area were unable to sell in the American market because of U.S. tariffs. By 1859 Moore could state that this situation had completely changed: new judicial districts, "municipal, county, township and parish councils," and "a corporate local Legislature" had been established, and by the reciprocity treaty of 1854 agricultural products were admitted into the American market free of duty. Moore insisted also that the Eastern Townships should send their own residents to parliament and "no longer submit to be used as trading capital by political demagogues."

In 1846 Moore had been chairman of the committee instructed to investigate losses of inhabitants of Lower Canada in the 1837–38 uprising. The commissioners' task was not easy. The claimants themselves chose the witnesses, who were often their wives, brothers, or sisters, to testify about the nature of their losses, their conduct during the rebellion, and the accuracy of the amount of reparation being applied for. However questionable this sort of testimony, it was the only evidence available. The investigations lasted until 1851, and Moore worked diligently, as he was in favour of compensation for all those who had suffered losses. In 1849 the parliamentary library had burned and he was deputed in 1857 to visit the United States to procure public documents to replace those lost. His efforts were highly successful.

At confederation he was offered membership in the Legislative Council of Quebec but declined in order to become a candidate for the federal House of Commons. Moore ran as an independent Conservative and was defeated by the Conservative candidate, Brown Chamberlin* of Frelighsburg.

Moore was instrumental in securing the charter for the Montreal and Vermont Junction Railway and gave the railroad the right of way to build across his property. He was president of this railroad until his death. In this activity as in others, he was untiring in promoting the interests and welfare of the people of the Eastern Townships.

Marion L. Phelps

[The author had access to Moore family papers owned by Mrs Charles Moore, Stanbridge East, Que. m.l.p.]

Archives judiciares de Bedford (Cowansville, Qué.), Registre d'état civil, 21 nov. 1880. Brome County Hist. Soc. Museum Archives (Knowlton, Que.), County papers, Missisquoi. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1852–53, app.V.V., "Reports on the rebellion losses, 1837 & 1838." Advertiser and Eastern Townships Sentinel (Waterloo, Que.), 23 Feb. 1860. District of Bedford Times (Sweetsburg, Que.), 14 June 1867. Montreal Herald, 2 Jan., March 1838. Illustrated atlas of the dominion of Canada . . . (Toronto, 1881), iii. Cyrus Thomas, Contributions to the history of the Eastern Townships: a work containing an account of the early settlement of St. Armand, Dunham, Sutton, Brome, Potton, and Bolton . . . (Montreal, 1866), 35. "Honourable Philip Henry Moore," Missisquoi County Hist. Soc., Report (Saint-Jean, Que.), 1907, 51–52. "The Moore's Corner battle in 1837," Missisquoi County Hist. Soc., Report (Saint-Jean, Que.), 1908–9, 67–70.

MOREAU, HIPPOLYTE, secular priest, missionary, canon, vicar general; b. 8 March 1815 at Saint-Luc-sur-Richelieu, L.C., son of Raphaël Moreau and Marguerite Tremblay; d. 30 July 1880 at Montreal, Que.

Hippolyte Moreau received his classical education at the seminary of Saint-Hyacinthe. He was studying theology there, and at the same time teaching junior classes, when in 1838 Bishop Jean-Jacques Lartigue* judged him worthy of succeeding the Sulpician C.-L. Lefebvre* de Bellefeuille, missionary to the Indians of Lakes Timiskaming, Nipissing, and Abitibi. He was immediately elevated to the diaconate and sent to the mission of Lac-des-Deux-Montagnes (Oka) to study the Algonkin language under the direction of Flavien Durocher. On 16 March 1839 he was admitted into the priesthood by Bishop Ignace Bourget*, and returned to Oka to continue his study of Algonkin. In 1840 he undertook his first journey as a missionary, to Timiskaming. From 1841 on he lived at Fort des Allumettes and travelled throughout the vast region of the Ottawas, carrying out his ministry among the Indians and scattered whites. He left this post on 14 Sept. 1844 and was appointed parish priest of Saint-Joseph-de-Soulanges.

During the typhus epidemic that raged at Montreal in 1847, he devoted himself, to the point of exhaustion, to tending the Irish who were relegated to sheds at Pointe-Saint-Charles (Montreal Island); he fell seriously ill with the disease. On 11 Feb. 1848 he became parish priest of Saint-Eustache (Deux-Montagnes County), in succession to Abbé Jacques Paquin. He applied himself particularly to bringing religious education to the poor and ignorant. He paid out of his own pocket for the completion of the presbytery and its outbuildings, and in 1850 he enlarged the convent of the Congregation of the Sisters of Notre-Dame. Two years later he started work on the vault of the parish church.

He left Saint-Eustache in 1853 and became titular canon of the cathedral at Montreal, where for 20 years he was archdeacon; in 1873 he was appointed vicar general, in place of Alexis-Frédéric Truteau. He held this position until his death, which occurred on 30 July 1880 at the Hôtel-Dieu at Montreal, following a stroke he had had a month earlier. His body was buried in the cathedral.

In his Mémoire pour servir à l'histoire du chapitre de la cathédrale . . . , Bishop Bourget testified as follows: "Both as an archdeacon and as a vicar general M. Moreau showed himself skilful, prudent, and wise. In this respect he rendered real service to the bishop. Nor do the nuns of the Hôtel-Dieu forget the services he has rendered them by the skill and devotion with which he has straightened out the matter of their temporal possessions." In all the positions he held, Moreau displayed unusual dedication. He belonged to the class of unassuming workers who are vitally necessary to all institutions, religious or lay, if they are to live and develop.

Léon Pouliot

ACAM, RCD, 94, 95. Rapport sur les missions du diocèse de Québec . . . , no.4 (janv. 1842), 67–74; no.6 (juill. 1845), 112–16. [Ignace Bourget], Mémoire pour servir à l'histoire du chapitre de la cathédrale S. Jacques de Montréal (Montréal, 1882), 180–81. Paroisse de Saint-Eustache, Annuaire de Ville-Marie (Montréal, 1871), 191–93.

MORIN, LOUIS-SIMÉON, lawyer and politician; b. 20 Jan. 1831 at Lavaltrie, Lower Canada, of the marriage of Joseph Morin, a farmer, and Félicité Peltier, niece of Salomon Juneau*, the founder of Milwaukee, Wisconsin; d. a bachelor on 7 May 1879 at Lavaltrie, Que.

From 1841 to 1849 Louis-Siméon Morin pursued his classical studies at the college of L'Assomption, then trained for the profession of lawyer in the office of Côme-Séraphin Cherrier* and Antoine-Aimé Dorion*. He was called to the bar of Lower Canada in 1853, and went into partnership at Montreal with Gédéon Ouimet* and Louis-Wilfrid Marchand*. While still young, he shone in the court-room by his eloquence and skill, especially in criminal cases. He contributed to La Patrie, a journal published in Montreal from 1854 to 1858 which gave moderate support to the Liberal-Conservative coalition.

In the general election of 1854, Louis-Siméon Morin waged a brilliant but unsuccessful struggle in the constituency of L'Assomption against Joseph Papin*, the distinguished Rouge party candidate; he was returned unopposed as MLA for Terrebonne in the general election of 1857, and in 1860 entered the cabinet of John A. Macdonald* and George-Étienne CARTIER as attorney general for Canada East. During the by-election which at that time was necessary after an MLA entered a cabinet, the government's opponents, represented by Godefroy Laviolette*, put up a stiff fight against Morin; he emerged victorious, but was defeated in the 1861 election in the constituency of Terrebonne by Louis LABRÈCHE-VIGER. He then stood in Laval, where he won out over Joseph-Hyacinthe Bellerose*. In 1863 Morin was again defeated in Terrebonne by Louis Labrèche-Viger.

In 1865 the government appointed him French secretary of the commission for the codification of the laws of Lower Canada relating to civil matters, replacing Joseph-Ubalde BEAUDRY, who had been raised to the position of commissioner following the death of Judge Augustin-Norbert Morin*. Morin held this office until the commission completed its task in 1867, on the eve of confederation [see René-Édouard CARON]. Afterwards he lived at Lavaltrie, out of public life. On 27 July 1871 the Quebec government appointed him joint protonotary, with Joseph-Octave Désilets, of the Superior Court, and clerk of the crown for the district of Joliette. He died on 7 May 1879 at Lavaltrie.

In Souvenirs et biographies, 1870–1910, Laurent-Olivier David*, while praising Morin's talents highly, judged him as follows: "He became a minister at the age of 28, he was surrounded by friends and admirers, but he had lost in the hurly-burly of politics the habits of moderation, work, and love of duty that were required if he was to continue to add lustre to his name and bring honour to his country. He showed that he had more talent than character; his best friends were dismayed, the people disappointed."

J.-C. BONENFANT

La Minerve (Montréal), 13 mai 1879. La Patrie (Montréal), 1854–58. Beaulieu et Hamelin, Journaux du Québec, 135. Dom. ann. reg., 1879, 415–16. L.-O. David, Souvenirs et biographies, 1870–1910 (Montréal, 1911), 49–54. Anastase Forget, Histoire du collège de L'Assomption (Montréal, [1933]), 541.

MORRILL, SIMEON, tanner, currier, and businessman; b. in Vermont, 11 Aug. 1793; d. London, Ont., 20 June 1871.

Simeon Morrill was raised in Maine and was a tanner in Kingston, Upper Canada, in September 1817. Nothing else is known about him until his arrival in 1829 in London, Upper Canada, where within a year he had established a tannery. He rapidly expanded this business by adding a factory for boots and shoes, and he was noted as the first businessman in this area to pay cash for hides and as wages. In 1861 he had approximately $20,000 capital involved in his tannery, employed ten persons, and had hides valued at $15,000. He was forced, however, to declare insolvency in 1868, and his affairs were finally wound up in 1876.

As the city grew, so did Morrill's other financial interests: he was a trustee of the London Savings' Bank, 1847–65; in 1853 an incorporator of the London and Port Stanley Railway (which he later served as director), and a trustee of the London Gas Company. He was also a founding member of the Board of Trade in 1857.

Like many other American emigrants to the area, Morrill was a Reformer in politics, and in December 1837 he participated in a midnight meeting of radicals supporting William Lyon Mackenzie*. In a by-election in 1844 he ran against a Tory, Lawrence Lawrason*, to represent London, but, to quote the London Inquirer, "the Reformers evinced great apathy" and he was forced to concede. He was more successful in municipal politics and represented St Andrew's ward on the council for several years. He was elected first town mayor in 1848 and held the office again in 1850 and 1851. As mayor Morrill broke a tie vote on the route of the Great Western Railway in 1851, and the line ran across his property next to his tannery. He was appointed a justice of the peace in 1841. In the 1840s he played an important part in reorganizing the Mechanics' Institute and in establishing the volunteer fire brigade and the Board of Health.

Morrill, a Wesleyan Methodist, was known as a generous contributor to a variety of educational and religious charities. He was particularly active in the London Temperance Reformation Society and his tombstone proclaims that he was "For forty years a consistent advocate of the cause of Temperance." He married first Margaret Andrews, by whom he had a large family, and secondly, Eleanor Beach (c. 1809–78). There were no children from his second marriage.

MADALINE RODDICK

Middlesex County Registry Office (London, Ont.), Joint Stock Company register, Liber A (1851–66), 6. PAC, RG 31, A1, 1861, London (City). University of Western Ontario Library, 234/2 (Proudfoot family papers, William Proudfoot journals, 1832–1850), entries for January 1844; 332/8 (Middlesex County, Ont., Court of Common Pleas, appearance and pleading books, 1874–75, and Insolvency Court register, 1865–81), p.19 and supporting papers.

J. of Education for Ont., XXIV (November 1871). Kingston Gazette, 25 Nov. 1817. London Advertiser, 23 June 1871. [Archie Bremner], City of London, Ontario, Canada; the pioneer period and the London of today (2nd ed., London, Ont., 1900), 35, 84, 105, 119, 132. C. T. Campbell, Pioneer days in London; some account of men and things in London before it became a city (London, Ont., 1921), 53, 92, 122, 125–27. History of the county of Middlesex, 62, 74, 196, 258, 268, 284, 285, 303, 321, 362. Fred Landon, Western Ontario and the American frontier (Toronto, 1941). Augusta Gilkinson, "The Great Western Railway," London and Middlesex Hist. Soc., Trans., II (1909), 31–44. Fred Landon, "London and its vicinity, 1837–38," Ont. Hist., XXIV (1927), 410–38.

MORRIS, MARIA FRANCES ANN (Miller), teacher, artist, and poet; b. in Halifax, N.S., 12 Feb. 1813, daughter of Captain Guy Morris and Sibylla Amelia Maria Sophia Leggett, and descendant of Charles Morris*, chief surveyor of land and second chief justice of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court; d. in Halifax, 28 Oct. 1875. On 7 July 1840 she married Garret Trafalgar Nelson Miller of La Have by whom she had several children.

Maria Frances Ann Morris received much of her training in art from W. H. Jones, an American who was teaching at Dalhousie College and giving lessons in Halifax, and from Professor L'Estrange, an English artist teaching in Halifax. About 1828 she painted Mount Uniacke; the picture is now owned by the Public Archives of Nova Scotia. During the early 1830s, at intervals between her studies, Miss Morris opened and closed three schools in Halifax for teaching drawing and painting to young ladies.

Encouraged by Titus Smith*, a talented local botanist, Maria Morris began to paint the wild flowers of her native land. In 1839 she announced the proposed publication of Wild flowers of Nova Scotia to be sold by subscription. A total of four series appeared comprising 99 sheets and representing 146 species; the third of the series was titled Wild flowers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and the fourth, Wild flowers of British North America. Specimens of her work, sent to London in 1862, arrived too late for the International Exhibition, but were praised by the London press. A collection of the paintings was shown at the universal exposition in Paris in 1867. Maria Morris was the finest artist among a group of Maritime ladies who made floral painting into a 19th-century phenomenon in the area. Wild flowers of Nova Scotia is a pleasing and valuable contribution not only to floral art but also to the study of botanical science.

Maria Morris' talent was not limited to painting, nor was she the only member of her family to possess creative ability. In 1856 she and her sister Catherine published a volume of poetry, Metrical musings, in New York.

CHARLES BRUCE FERGUSSON

[Maria Morris, Wild flowers of Nova Scotia. Parts i and ii of the first series appeared in 1839–40 under the patronage of Sir Colin Campbell* with descriptive texts by Titus Smith, lithographed and coloured in London, and published by C. H. Belcher, Halifax, and John Snow, London. A second series, under the patronage of Sir John Gaspard LE MARCHANT, with text by Dr Alexander Forrester*, and published by A. and W. Mackinlay, Halifax, and John Snow, London, appeared in 1853. A third series, under the patronage of Sir William Fenwick Williams*, with text by Professor George Lawson*, and published by M. L. Katzman, Halifax, and John Snow, London, was issued in 1866. The fourth series, again under Lieutenant Governor Williams' patronage, and with text by Professor Lawson, was published by Reeve and Co., London, in 1867. C.B.F.]

PANS, "Collection of genealogies of Nova Scotian families (Cumberland County)," compiled by T. H. Lodge, 1954. St Paul's Church (Halifax, N.S.), Records. Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 11 July 1840, 30 Oct. 1875, 10 Jan. 1920, 13 Oct. 1924. Christian Messenger (Halifax), 3 Nov. 1875. Colonial Churchman (Lunenburg, N.S.), 23 July 1840. Halifax Daily Reporter, 29 Oct. 1875. Novascotian (Halifax), 23 Sept. 1830; 13 Jan., 24 Nov. 1831; 20 July 1832; 22 Aug. 1833; 25 Dec. 1834; 15 Sept. 1836; 19 Jan. 1837. Times (Halifax), 15 Oct. 1839, 9 June 1840. Exposition Universelle de 1867, Catalogue of the Nova Scotian Department with introduction and appendices (Paris, 1867). W. G. Colgate, Canadian art, its origin and development (Toronto, 1943). W. B. Tucker, The romance of the Palatine Millers; a tale of Palatine Irish-Americans and United Empire Loyalists (Montreal, 1929). E. S. Nutt, "An incident in the golden age of fine art in Nova Scotia," Nova Scotia Journal of Education, 4th ser., III (1932), 71–75. Harry Piers, "Artists in Nova Scotia," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XVIII (1914), 101–65.

MOUAT, WILLIAM ALEXANDER, master mariner and HBC employee; b. in 1821 in London, Eng., son of William Mouat; m. 8 Aug. 1854 at Stepney, England, to Mary Ann Ainsley, by whom he had seven children; d. 11 April 1871 at Knight Inlet, B.C.

William Alexander Mouat went to sea in 1835 and served three years as an apprentice before becoming an officer. He came to the Pacific coast of North America as second mate of the Hudson's Bay Company bark Vancouver (Capt. Andrew Cook Mott) arriving at Fort Vancouver on 27 March 1845. On 28 April he was transferred to the Cadboro as first officer and served in her until the end of February 1847 when Captain James Scarborough "put him off duty." He is believed to have acted as pilot for the Columbia River bar in 1848, and he himself says that in 1849 he was "master of an American vessel at California." In the summer of 1849 he was again serving as first officer under Scarborough, but this time in the Mary Dare at Beaver Harbour, where Fort Rupert was being established by Captain William Henry McNeill of the Beaver. On 30 July 1849 an eye-witness (Charles Beardmore of the HBC) reported to Dr William Fraser Tolmie* that Scarborough had kept Mouat "under arrest during his whole stay here," and that by 25 July Mouat had been "so driven & bullied that he left the ship putting himself under Captain McNeil[l's] protection." Scarborough then "declared him a deserter & broke open his chest & proceeded to the extremity of the law." "We shall be anxious to hear how it is settled," added Beardmore, "as this officer is a favorite with us all." The HBC apparently found for Mouat, since in 1850 he was master of the Mary Dare and took her home in 1853, arriving in London on 27 May 1854. But Mouat was now himself accused by his own first officer of "disgraceful conduct" in making a physical assault on the second officer of the Mary Dare in the presence of the crew. Later episodes in Mouat's career would seem to indicate that although he was a kindly man, generous to the unfortunate, he had a quick temper and would brook no interference in what he considered the performance of his duty.

The outcome of the Mary Dare incident of 1854 is not known, but it was as a passenger on the Marquis of Bute that Mouat returned with a bride to Victoria on 1 April 1855. On 16 April he was given command of the HBC steamer Otter, then plying between Victoria and Fort Langley, and on 27 Feb. 1860 he was made a chief trader. He was master of the Otter until 3 April 1862 when he was transferred to the newly acquired Enterprise for her first trip to the Fraser. When in 1865 gold was discovered on the Big Bend of the Columbia River, he was sent to look into the possibility of steam navigation on the Kamloops and Shuswap lakes and the Thompson River which connected them. He reported the scheme "entirely practicable," and the HBC ordered the Marten to be built at Savona's Ferry.

Early in 1866 the HBC was awarded the contract for direct mail service between Victoria and San Francisco, and Captain Mouat, "one of the most careful and reliable men that ever handled a wheel," was given command of the Labouchere, which he took to San Francisco on 15 Feb. 1866 to be fitted out for the accommodation of passengers. On her second voyage after the refit, on 14 April 1866, the Labouchere was lost off Point Reyes, her captain displaying "admirable coolness, bravery and forethought" in saving his passengers. But the official inquiry censured Mouat for "very gross negligence . . . in not swinging the Labouchere to ascertain the deviation of the compasses before leaving San Francisco, the steering apparatus having been shifted from aft forward" during the refit, and also for not having taken sufficient care of her majesty's mails.

The HBC now placed Mouat in command of the Marten, which made her maiden trip on 26 May 1866, the first steamer to ply the Thompson River. But the Big Bend mines proved a failure, and at the close of the season the Marten was laid up and Mouat was posted to Fort Rupert, where he remained in charge until his death in 1871 while on a canoe trip from Knight Inlet to the fort. Mouat was buried in Victoria, and his tombstone, the inscription almost obliterated, may still be seen in Pioneer Square, adjoining Christ Church Cathedral.

Dorothy Blakey Smith

HBC Arch. A.33/4, f.413; B.113/c/1, f.16; C.1/459; C.1/462; C.1/625, f.208 (log of Otter). PABC, Charles Beardmore correspondence; Thomas Lowe journal, 1843–50; William Alexander Mouat correspondence, 1859–66. British Columbian (New Westminster, B.C.), 28 April 1866. British Columbia Tribune (Yale, B.C.), 28 April, 7, 21 May, 4 June 1866. Cariboo Sentinel (Barkerville, B.C.), 31 May 1866. Colonist (Victoria), 1863–71.

Lewis and Dryden's marine history of the Pacific northwest (Wright). Denys Nelson, Fort Langley, 1827–1927, a century of settlement in the valley of the lower Fraser River (Vancouver, 1927; 2nd ed., 1947), 15–26. Walbran, B.C. coast names. N. R. Hacking, "Steamboating on the Fraser in the 'sixties," BCHQ, X (1946), 1–37.

MULKINS, HANNIBAL, Wesleyan Methodist minister and Church of England clergyman; b. in Upper Canada in 1811 or 1812; m. 19 May 1842, Jane Gray Dennis, by whom he had several children; d. 26 July 1877, at Stapleford, Nottinghamshire, Eng.

Hannibal Mulkins was received on trial in the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada in 1835 and was ordained in 1838. From 1835 to early in 1840 he served on the Yonge Street, Toronto Township, Whitby, Cobourg, Belleville, and Brockville circuits. He was described by John Carroll* as "a very gifted young minister." He was popular and successful, and Carroll mentions that he led "a good revival . . . among the young people" in Brockville. However, in 1840, "taking umbrage at some slight disciplinary proceedings relating to himself," he went over to the Church of England. According to Carroll, he was a useful minister, who did not fall "into ritualistic folly" and always "exhibited a fraternal feeling towards his early fellow-laborers."

Mulkins prepared for orders in the Church of England with the Reverend Edward Denroch, clergyman in charge of the parish at Brockville, and the Reverend Henry Caswell, master of the grammar school. Made deacon by Bishop John Strachan* on 25 April 1841, and ordained priest 9 May 1842, he was appointed travelling missionary in Fitzroy and Pakenham, and was reported as itinerating in the area west of Bytown (Ottawa) along the Ottawa River in the townships of Torbolton, Fitzroy, Pakenham, McNab, and Horton and in some unsurveyed territory. On 1 Jan. 1851 he was appointed by Lord Elgin [Bruce*] to the chaplaincy of the Provincial Penitentiary in Kingston in the place of the Reverend Robert Vashon Rogers, with whom he was involved in a proposal in the mid-1850s to have the Reverend Thomas Hincks, brother of Sir Francis*, appointed to the see of Kingston.

During the years 1869–73 Mulkins spent some time acting as agent in England for John Travers Lewis*, bishop of Ontario, to arrange for the commutation of the grant made to the diocese by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Superannuated from the penitentiary on 1 Nov. 1875, Mulkins left the chaplaincy and emigrated to England. He was appointed curate of Stapleford in the diocese of Salisbury in December 1875, and vicar in 1876.

James J. Talman

Hannibal Mulkins was the author of Report to the Canada Temperance Society on the workings and effects of prohibitory legislation to suppress intemperance in the New England states (Kingston, C.W., 1855). Church (Cobourg; Toronto), 1 May 1841; 1, 29 July 1852; 17 May 1856. Examiner (Toronto), 25 May 1842. Clerical guide and churchman's directory, an annual register for the clergy and laity of the Anglican Church in British North America, 1876, ed. C. V. F. Bliss (Ottawa, 1876). Cornish, Cyclopædia of Methodism, I, 118. Carroll, Case and his cotemporaries, IV, 259–60. J. L. H. Henderson, "John Strachan as bishop," unpublished DD thesis, University of Western Ontario, 1956, 603–5.

MULLINS, ROSANNA ELEANORA (Leprohon), poet and novelist; b. in Montreal, L.C., 12 Jan. 1829, daughter of Francis Mullins, a well-known businessman, and Rosanna Connelly; d. 20 Sept. 1879 at Montreal, Que.

Rosanna Eleanora Mullins was educated at the convent of the Congregation of Notre-Dame in Montreal, which offered schooling and moral instruction to the daughters of the well-to-do. She remained there until some time after 1846 when she published her first poems. Judging from the religious themes, the moral tone, and the vocabulary employed in her poetry, she received a sound instruction in languages and religion. Her love for the teacher who recognized and encouraged her talent is obvious in a poem addressed to her.

At the beginning of her literary career, in 1846, much of Rosanna's prose and verse appeared in the Literary Garland, a small magazine dedicated to encouraging Canadian talent. It regularly published poetry, memoirs, essays, sketches, short stories, and serialized novels of an impersonal, wholesome, and uplifting kind, and was a magazine fit to appear in the parlour of the most demanding and cultivated Canadian family. Other well-known Canadians whose work appeared in the Garland included Susanna Strickland* Moodie, Catharine Parr Strickland* Traill, John Richardson*, William Dunlop*, Mary Anne Madden* Sadlier, and Charles Sangster*. Rosanna, who then signed herself "R.E.M.," published in other magazines and newspapers as well, for example the True Witness [see Clerk], the Journal of Education, and the New Dominion Monthly.

In 1851 Rosanna married Dr Jean-Lucien Leprohon, of an old French Canadian family, who was then practising medicine at Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu. He was a man of culture, as well as of science, and a man of energy, who had found time to publish one of the first medical journals in Canada East, La Lancette canadienne. In 1855 they moved to Montreal, where he became surgeon to an army regiment, a city councillor, professor of medicine, member of the Catholic Committee of the Council of Public Instruction, and a leader in his social circle. He was also made Spanish consul in Montreal and was decorated by that country for his services. Through him, his family, and his friends, Mrs Leprohon came to know intimately the aristocracy of Quebec, and their values, hopes, and aspirations; much of the background for her later novels was gathered among them.

The marriage proved a fruitful one, and 13 children were born to the couple. From her portrait Mrs Leprohon appears an intelligent, self-possessed, handsome woman. Though her literary output was smaller after her marriage, her best work, the novels set in Quebec, was produced then. She died in September 1879, and was buried in Côte-des-Neiges Cemetery in Montreal.

Mrs Leprohon's poetry was collected after her death and published in 1881 in Montreal. It is touched with moral seriousness and didacticism, and the tone of much of it is summed up by a footnote to a poem called "The Boyhood of Jesus": "An old tradition avers that our Saviour was never seen to laugh during his mortal life." Besides many poems of Catholic inspiration, she wrote others describing family life – its happy and its sad moments – and her country. Her best poem, "A Canadian Snowfall" evokes a picture somewhat similar to that in Ralph Waldo Emerson's "The Snowfall," but the likeness may have been accidental. The influence of Thomas Gray is more easily identified, not only in the many morbid themes but in actual turns of phrase. Her nature poetry consists mainly of romantic descriptive lyrics depicting seasonal changes or giving impressions of vistas such as those at Murray Bay (Pointe-au-Pic) or the gorge of the Saguenay River. These poems are Canadian in the sense that they describe Canadian nature, but they are first of all romantic in tone. Her patriotism shows in "The Maple Leaf" and her intense interest in Canada's past in "Jacques Cartier's First Visit to Mount Royal," and others. A small number of poems on Indian themes are difficult to characterize. They deal mainly with death – the deaths of Indian maidens, who somehow assume the attitudes of romantic white heroines. In "The White Maiden and the Indian Girl," R.E.M. compares at length two life styles, and decides that the Indian leads the superior existence – a conclusion which, considering what R.E.M. must have known about the lives then led by Indian women, is romantically dishonest. R.E.M.'s poetry is good technically, and, in places, interesting in theme and content, but it must take second place to her novels of life in early Quebec.

Her first story, "The Stepmother," appeared serially in the Literary Garland in 1847, and the next year, in the same periodical, came "Ida Beresford," which was later translated by Joseph-Édouard Lefebvre* de Bellefeuille into French and ran serially in L'Ordre (1859–60). Other romantic serials appeared in the Garland in 1849, 1850, and 1851.

There appears to be a gap in Mrs Leprohon's output of fiction from 1851 (the year of her marriage and the year the Garland disappeared) until 1859 when "The manor house of Villerai" appeared in installments in the Family Herald. A French translation, by de Bellefeuille, Le manoir de Villerai, came out in book form in 1861. (It was published again in French in 1924.) The story is set in Quebec prior to the English conquest; in it Blanche de Villerai, heiress to a seigneury, finally renounces her aristocratic husband-to-be to a beautiful, saintly peasant girl, Rose Lauson, who has just nursed her through a case of small-pox. It is a romantic novel, marred by intrusions of large wedges of history and folk-lore. The second novel in this new series, which also shows the results of Mrs Leprohon's introduction into the upper levels of French Canadian society, was Antoinette de Mirecourt (published by John Lovell* of Montreal in 1864), which was translated into French and published in book form the following year. It also appeared serially in French in Les Nouvelles soirées canadiennes in 1886 and 1887. A well-to-do country girl comes to Montreal immediately following the British occupation. Her relatives welcome British officers into their society, and the heroine falls in love with one of them, who turns out to be a villain from whom she has to be rescued. This is a romantic, stilted novel, the worst of the later group. Four years later, Armand Durand appeared serially in the Daily News of Montreal. It was published in book form by Lovell in 1868, and in French the following year. This novel concerns two sons of a farmer, one of whom inherits the farm dishonestly; the other becomes a lawyer and he is made the centre of attention as he struggles first to qualify and then to support a silly wife. Mrs Leprohon's final full-length novel, Ada Dunmore, appeared in 1869 in the Canadian Illustrated News and was followed by several other stories in the Canadian Illustrated News and in the Canadian Monthly.

Mrs Leprohon's early fiction, and indeed almost all of it, is filled with tearful partings, broken engagements, timely and untimely deaths, chance meetings, and happy reconciliations: obviously the outpouring of a romantic fancy fed on the novels of her time. But though her novels have little appeal now, they retain some of their charm if taken for what they were: amusement for women readers of early Canada. They are readable, if not believable, episodic (because of publishing demands), but not boring, especially Armand Durand. In her later novels more serious themes appear. Most common is love between people widely separated by background, temperament, or wealth. Her knowledge of Quebec and its history, and her psychological insight into strained domestic arrangements (both of which seem to have appeared after her own marriage) give a refreshing realism to many parts of these novels. She made shrewd use of her observation of her French in-laws, her own sense of class, and her talents as a story teller. In her major novels, she appears in the role of peacemaker between the French and the English, trying to make good manners smooth over ruffled feelings, seeking to explain the feelings of the French Canadian and to make the English appear in an acceptable light. The measure of her success in both languages is to be seen in the number of her publications and in the fact that her works were found worthy of translation and were being reissued as late as 1924. As the first Canadian widely read in both languages she is the precursor of William Kirby*, Horatio Gilbert Parker* and Hugh MacLennan.

J. C. STOCKDALE

Among the writings of Rosanna Eleanora Mullins are the following: Antoinette de Mirecourt: or, secret marrying and secret sorrowing, a Canadian tale (Montreal, 1864); Armand Durand; or a promise fulfilled (Montreal, 1868); "The manor house of Villerai," Family Herald (Montreal), 1859, published in French as Le manoir de Villerai, roman historique sous la domination française (Montréal, 1861; [1884?]; 1924); The poetical works of Mrs. Leprohon (Miss R. E. Mullins) (Montreal, 1881); and two works that she signed "R.E.M.": "Clarence Fitz Clarence," Literary Garland (Montreal), Jan.–May 1851; "Florence, or wit and wisdom," Literary Garland (Montreal), Feb.–Dec. 1849.

The following works provide a complete list of Mme Leprohon's writings: M. M. Brown, An index to the Literary Garland (Montreal, 1838–1851) (Toronto, 1962), 24. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis. Watters, Check list. Watters and Bell, On Canadian literature.

Archives paroissiales de Notre-Dame (Montréal), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures. Morgan, Sketches of celebrated Canadians. A.-H. Deneau, "Life and works of Mrs. Leprohon," unpublished MA thesis, Université de Montréal, 1949. Lit. hist. of Can. (Klinck). Desmond Pacey, Creative writing in Canada; a short history of English-Canadian literature (2nd ed., Toronto, [1961]). V. B. Rhodenizer, Canadian literature in English ([Montreal, ca 1965]).

MUNN, JOHN, merchant and politician; b. in 1807 at Port Bannatyne, near Rothesay, Scotland, son of Stewart Munn and Isabella Fisher; m. in 1838 to Naomi Munden by whom he had one son and four daughters; d. at Southport, Lancashire, Eng., on 29 Sept. 1879.

John Munn was reared in Scotland. After arriving in St John's, Newfoundland, in 1825, he spent eight years in the general trading firm of Baine, Johnston, and Company as a bookkeeper. In 1833, with Captain William Punton, a Scottish master mariner trading out of Greenoch, he moved to Newfoundland's second city, Harbour Grace, purchased property for £515, and set up business as Punton and Munn. The firm started on a small scale with one vessel. After Punton's death in 1845 the firm continued as Punton and Munn until 1872, when the name was changed to John Munn and Company, Munn admitting his son William Punton Munn and his nephew Robert Stewart Munn as partners and transferring the more active duties to them.

Under John Munn's direction the firm had prospered and expanded until it was the colony's largest general supplying and mercantile business outside St John's. It was active in the seal fishery and the Labrador fishery and owned large shipping and other interests in the colony. The shipbuilding yard at Harbour Grace began production about 1838. After his partner's death Munn brought several relatives from Scotland into the business. They suffered a setback in 1858 when their large premises went up in smoke but there was no delay in rebuilding. John Munn and Company increased its business still further in the 1870s when Thomas Ridley and Sons, the other big mercantile house at Harbour Grace, was declared insolvent and the Munn firm bought out the Ridley estate and undertook to supply many of Thomas RIDLEY's former dealers. John Munn helped to found the Union Bank of which he was appointed a director in 1870. Munn's company also owned the Harbour Grace Standard.

Munn's influential position in the trade and fisheries of Newfoundland made him a power in the colony, especially in Conception Bay. Harbour Grace was often referred to as a pocket borough, "Munnsborough," since the Munn-approved candidate usually won an election. Munn himself took an active interest in politics, representing Conception Bay in the Amalgamated Legislature, 1842–48, as a Conservative. On the introduction of responsible government in 1855 he was appointed to the Legislative Council, but he resigned in 1869 when the question of confederation arose. Munn, a prominent confederate, contested the election in 1869 and succeeded in carrying the district of Harbour Grace, thus becoming one of a minority in the House of Assembly. At the dissolution of the house in 1873 he retired from politics.

The leading man in Harbour Grace for over 40 years, John Munn had won respect as an honourable and clearheaded merchant. A Presbyterian, he donated liberally to other churches and organizations, and was a member of the Protestant Board of Education and a director of the Harbour Grace grammar school. When news of his death at Southport, near Liverpool, reached the colony, Harbour Grace and much of Conception Bay put on mourning, with flags flying at half-mast, shops closed, and almost all work suspended for the day.

ELIZABETH A. WELLS

Department of Justice of Newfoundland and Labrador (St John's), Registry of deeds, companies, and securities, Registry of deeds for the Northern District, 1826–88. PANL, Family tree of Azariah Munden (1739–1827) showing descendants of William Azariah Munn, 1864–1940; Family tree of Stewart Munn showing descendants of William Azariah Munn, 1864–1940; Newfoundland, Harbour Grace Sessions Court, Records, 1834, 744. Carbonear Herald and Outport Telephone, 2 Oct. 1879. Harbour Grace Standard and Conception Bay Advertiser, 4 Oct. 1879. Newfoundlander (St John's), 3 Oct. 1879. Newfoundland, Blue Books, 1842–73 (copies in PANL). The Newfoundland almanack, for . . . 1849 . . ., comp. Philip Tocque (St John's, 1849). The Newfoundland Almanac, for . . . 1858 . . ., comp. Joseph Woods (St John's, 1857). W. A. Munn, "Harbour Grace history," chaps. 11–21, in Newfoundland Quarterly, XXXVI (1936–37)–XXXVIII (1938–39).

MUNRO (Munroe), GEORGE. See MONRO

MURDOCH, BEAMISH, writer, lawyer, and politician; b. to Andrew Murdoch and Elizabeth Beamish at Halifax, N.S., 1 Aug. 1800; d. in Lunenburg, N.S., 9 Feb. 1876.

Beamish Murdoch was raised and educated by a maiden aunt, Harriet Jane Ott Beamish, after his father, a merchant, became involved in an expensive lawsuit and was jailed as a debtor for seven years. In 1822 Murdoch was admitted to the bar of Nova Scotia and began a legal practice. He also began to contribute articles to the Acadian Recorder, which was owned by Philip J. Holland (d. 1839), and to the Acadian Magazine or Literary Mirror, which began publication in Halifax in 1826. Although his grandfather, the Reverend James Murdoch, had been a missionary in the Antiburgher wing of the Church of Scotland, Beamish Murdoch was raised in the Church of England and belonged to St Paul's Church. In the disruption of that church in 1824 he joined the faction which included Thomas Chandler Haliburton*, and moved to St George's Church in Halifax [see J. W. JOHNSTON].

In 1826, Murdoch, aided by his uncle, Thomas Ott Beamish, ran for the House of Assembly for Halifax Township. In spite of opposition from the city merchants, he had sufficient strength in the township to carry the election. Murdoch, who in 1824 and 1825 had been vice-president of the Charitable Irish Society, also received aid from the Irish, and in the assembly he worked to remove civil disabilities from the Roman Catholics. He quickly became an active member, generally following Haliburton's lead. Thus, in 1827, when a question arose concerning the right of the legislature to control customs revenue, Murdoch supported Haliburton's proposal that the assembly should petition the crown seeking a compromise measure which would give it some control over future revenue expenditures. Murdoch was irritated over the refusal of the Legislative Council, which included Hibbert N. Binney, the collector of customs, to support the move. He was further annoyed when the upper house failed to support his motion requesting that the crown reverse its decision to collect quitrents. He did not deny the constitutional right of Great Britain to enforce payment but argued that the measure was unjust. A real conflict with the upper house did not develop until 1830 when the two houses clashed over the duty on brandy [see Enos COLLINS]. Murdoch, who followed the lead of Samuel George William Archibald*, regarded the action of the council as unconstitutional and argued that the council's stand denied the lower house the authority which it should possess as the representative of the people.

In the election of 1830 Murdoch ran against Stephen Wastie DeBlois. He received support from Joseph HOWE and the Novascotian despite the fact that Howe had criticized Murdoch during the legislative session of 1830. Prior to 1830 Murdoch had supported public grants to Pictou Academy, but he, like Haliburton, apparently objected to attacks on Bishop John Inglis* by the academy's president, Thomas McCulloch*. Howe, in turn, felt that Murdoch had made unwarranted attacks on McCulloch. Any chance of Murdoch's carrying the election in 1830 was ended when he was provoked into complaining about so-called loyalists who fled the United States to escape bad debts and monopolized public offices in the province. After the election, Murdoch withdrew from public affairs until the campaign of 1836 when he ran, unsuccessfully, against a Reformer. In the 1840 election he ran against Joseph Howe and William Annand* and again was defeated. During the 1840 campaign, Murdoch complained that the Reformers' demands for responsible government threatened the tie with England and would upset the balance in the British constitutional system. By the time he wrote his history of the province, however, he had come to regard cabinet government and self-government as being compatible with association in the British empire.

During his withdrawal from public affairs in the early 1830s, he prepared his four-volume Epitome of the laws of Nova Scotia, printed by Joseph Howe in 1832–33. This work, which involved a detailed study of the provincial and English law, was modelled after Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries. Murdoch's work was well received by the Maritime press and was apparently a significant contribution to both lawyers and law students until the growing body of provincial law made it obsolete and more specialized works made it unnecessary.

Throughout his life Murdoch showed a keen interest in education, in charitable institutions, and in moral issues. In January 1825 he was appointed joint secretary of the Poor Man's Friend Society and in the 1830s he served on the Nova Scotia Philanthropic Society. His interest may have been sparked by the experiences of his father and in 1826 he wrote a pamphlet in which he supported the introduction of a bankruptcy law. Murdoch was an early supporter of temperance and, by 1842, was president of the Halifax Temperance Society, which had been established in 1832. His concern with public education led him to serve on the Halifax Library Committee in the 1840s and 1850s. He assumed a more significant role in provincial education when he became clerk of the Central Board of Education in April 1841. As clerk, he earned an annual salary of £150 and played an important part in the board's attempts to establish a uniform school system in the province. He prepared a summary of the ordinances of the city of Halifax in 1851 and, in October 1852, was appointed recorder for the city with an annual salary of £200. As recorder he was required to offer legal advice to the city and to try cases before the mayor's court.

When he retired in 1860 Murdoch began to prepare A history of Nova Scotia, or Acadie, which was published in installments between 1865 and 1867. He originally intended the history to end with the year 1807 but extended it to the year 1827. He even considered going as far as 1867 but his energy, or perhaps the public response to the first three volumes, was not equal to the task. In his work he adopted a severely chronological approach, with extensive quotations from documents and earlier books. There was no critical appraisal of the documents, nor was there any sense of development through time. Murdoch was so convinced of the universal truth of his beliefs that he expected his reader to perceive the real nature of liberty, loyalty, and progress merely by seeing the actual words of the pioneers. He felt no compulsion to expound on his beliefs, but assumed that they were inherent in the British race. Thus, according to his History, as soon as the English arrived in Nova Scotia, the province began to take on an English aspect. The British belief in law, freedom, and industry helped preserve the province from the convulsions of revolution which racked the United States and was gradually adapted to the local environment. Thus, he was able to reconcile a faith in a Nova Scotian nationalism with a continued loyalty to Great Britain. Intended as a delineation of the Nova Scotian character, Murdoch's work stands as a monument to chronology as history.

K. G. PRYKE

Beamish Murdoch, The charter and ordinances of the city of Halifax in the province of Nova Scotia with the provincial acts concerning the city, collected and revised by authority of the city council (Halifax, 1851); An epitome of the laws of Nova Scotia (4v., Halifax, 1832–33); An essay on the mischievous tendency of imprisoning for debt (2nd ed., Halifax, 1831); A history of Nova Scotia, or Acadie (3v., Halifax, 1865–67); A narrative of the late fires at Miramichi, New Brunswick: with an appendix containing the statements of many of the sufferers, and a variety of interesting occurrences; together with a poem, entitled "The conflagration" (Halifax, 1825).

PANS, Beamish Murdoch papers. Duncan Campbell, Nova Scotia in its historical, mercantile, and industrial relations (Montreal, 1873), 268–77. Directory of N.S. MLAs (Fergusson), 262. G. E. Hart, "The Halifax Poor Man's Friend Society, 1820–27. An early social experiment," CHR, XXXIV (1953), 109–23. D. C. Harvey, "History and its uses in pre-confederation Nova Scotia," CHA Report, 1938, 5–16. D. C. Harvey, "Nova Scotia's Blackstone," Can. Bar Rev., XI (1933), 339–44. Gene Morison, "The Brandy Election of 1830," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXX (1954), 151–83. H. L. Stewart, The Irish in Nova Scotia: annals of the Charitable Irish Society of Halifax (1786–1836) (Kentville, N.S., [1949]), 138–41. Norah Story, "The church and state 'party' in Nova Scotia, 1749–1851," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXVII (1947), 35–57. K. N. Windsor, "Historical writing in Canada to 1920," Lit. hist. of Can. (Klinck), 208–50.

MURRAY, ALEXANDER HUNTER, HBC chief trader and artist; b. in 1818 or 1819 at Kilmun, county of Argyll, Scotland; d. on 20 April 1874 at his home near Lower Fort Garry, Man.

No fur-trader ranged farther over North America than Alexander Hunter Murray. According to his Journal of 1847–48 he had early been in the swamps of Lake Pontchartrain (near New Orleans, La.) and along the Red River in Texas. It is difficult to determine exactly how or when he got there and nothing much is known about his life until he became an employee of the American Fur Company working out of St Louis, Mo. In 1844–45 he was on the upper Missouri River and there he sketched the fur posts of that region: forts Union, Pierre, Mortimer, and George.

Murray left the American Fur Company in 1846 and proceeded north to join the Hudson's Bay Company at Fort Garry (Winnipeg). Because of his experience he was appointed senior clerk and transferred to the Mackenzie River District under the chief factor Murdoch McPherson*. On his way there he met Chief Trader Colin Campbell* of the Athabasca District, whose daughter Anne he shortly married at Fort Simpson. Since there was no clergyman in the area, "McPherson and a Bible" had to serve and the marriage was registered at St John's Cathedral, Red River, on 24 Aug. 1846. The couple descended the Mackenzie River to the mouth of the Peel River, then went to Fort McPherson for the winter.

On 11 June 1847, after leaving his bride at Lapierre House on Bell River, Murray started out to establish Fort Yukon, the assignment for which he is chiefly known. Descending the Bell River to the Porcupine, Murray reached the Yukon River on 25 June and soon began construction just above the junction of the Yukon and Porcupine rivers, at a point slightly north of the Arctic Circle. The fort consisted of three large log structures surrounded by a stockade 100 feet square with a bastion at each corner. Murray and the leaders of the HBC seem to have known that the fort was inside Russian territory, contrary to an agreement between the HBC and the Russian-American Company. As a result, Murray feared an attack by the Russians, but Fort Yukon was beyond the sphere of their trading activity and no Russian made an appearance at the post until 1863, by which time Murray was serving elsewhere. In effect, Murray and the HBC developed and exploited an area where they had no right to be, and this occupation of a profitable territory continued until 1869 when the HBC was peremptorily ejected from Fort Yukon by the United States after the American purchase of Alaska. Their main trade was in marten pelts, but they also took out beaver, fox, and otter.

During the winter of 1847–48, Murray occupied himself with work on the fort buildings, and acquainted himself with the Kutchin or Yukonikhotana Indians who inhabited the area around the fort. He kept a daily journal of his activities which has been published by the Public Archives of Canada along with his sketches of the area and its people. On 5 June 1848, with the returns of the season, he set out for Lapierre House to rejoin his wife; later that year the couple returned to Fort Yukon where Murray was in charge until 1851. A letter from Chief Factor John Rae* to HBC Governor Sir George Simpson* dated 30 Aug. 1850 commented, "Mr. Murray is evidently an excellent manager and an interested person, but unfortunately his men will not stay any length of time with him." Simpson wrote Rae the following 10 December, "I have read a letter from Mr. Murray who gives a great deal of interesting information. . . . [From] his correspondence and the activity with which he conducts the affairs of that section of the business, I should judge him to be a very efficient and intelligent officer." However, by 1851 Murray's health was failing and he had to be relieved of his duties.

After a rest at Fort Garry with his wife and several small children, he was assigned to the post at Pembina and was in charge there for several years. Later he served at Rainy Lake and Swan River before being returned to Pembina where he was advanced to chief trader in 1856. Murray went home to Scotland on furlough in 1857, evidently partly for his health. Fully recovered, he returned to the Red River Settlement and was placed in charge of Lower Fort Garry where he remained until his retirement in 1867. From then until his death in 1874, he lived at his home, Bellevue, on the Red River.

Murray was a man of varied accomplishments. His sketches of fur trade posts and of people give an interesting picture of the times, and his Journal of the Yukon, 1847–48 provides valuable insights into the manners and customs of the Indians of the Yukon, the difficulties of establishing a post, and the policies and methods of the fur trade.

KENNETH L. HOLMES

HBC Arch. B.240/a/1–8 (Murray's journal at Fort Yukon). Murray, Journal of the Yukon (Burpee).

HBRS, XVI (Rich and Johnson). J. S. Galbraith, The Hudson's Bay Company as an imperial factor, 1821–1869 (Toronto, 1957). Richard Mathews, The Yukon (New York, 1968). J. E. Sunder, The fur trade on the upper Missouri, 1840–1865 (Norman, Okla., 1965). M. M. Black, "Alexander Hunter Murray," Beaver, outfit 265 (June 1934), 29–32. Robert Watson, "Chief trader Alexander Hunter Murray and Fort Youcon," Beaver, outfit 260 (June 1929), 211–13. Clifford Wilson, "Founding Fort Yukon," Beaver, outfit 278 (June 1947), 38–43.

MURRAY, HUGH, Papal Zouave; b. 30 April 1836 at Montreal, L.C., son of Hugh Murray and Henrietta Horan; d. February 1874 at Manresa or Bilbao, Spain.

Hugh Murray, an Irishman, received his classical education at the Petit Séminaire in Quebec, probably attracted there by his uncle, Abbé Edward John HORAN, at that time a teacher in the institution. He took his baccalaureate in arts in 1856 and then became a student at the faculty of medicine, but according to the Annuaire de l'université Laval he had already discontinued his medical studies before the opening of the academic year in 1857.

Deeply affected in that year by the deaths of his mother and father within a few months, he planned for a while to become a priest, but grief and constant work weakened his health to such an extent that he had to give up theological studies. In 1859 he was attached to the editorial staff of the Journal of Education (Montreal), which for two years had been appearing under the direction of the superintendent of Public Instruction, Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau*.

Murray was still employed in this way when news reached Canada of the disaster at Castelfidardo on 18 Sept. 1860: the little papal army, commanded by Christophe-Louis-Léon Juchault de Lamoricière, had been vanquished by the Piedmontese troops. The ultramontanes of Canada were horror-stricken: "Piedmont, with unspeakable audacity," Cyrille Boucher wrote in L'Ordre (Montreal) on 5 October, "has invaded the Papal States, against all human and divine rights." The editor in chief of the Courrier du Canada (Quebec), the French legitimist Auguste-Eugène Aubry, prophesied in his journal on 5 Nov. 1860 that "Italian unity" having "never existed," "never will exist."

It was to oppose the progress of King Victor Emmanuel II's "sacrilegious usurpation" that the Papal Zouaves had come into being in March 1860, during a secret interview between the Belgian Redemptorist Victor-Auguste Dechamps, the French general Juchault de Lamoricière, and Bishop Xavier de Mérode, the Belgian minister of the papal arms. From the Catholic countries young men flocked to Rome, eager to place their valour at the service of Pius IX. L'Ordre of 13 Feb. 1861 informed its readers that the name of the first French Canadian to "enlist as a Zouave in the papal troops" was Benjamin Testard* de Montigny, "Montreal lawyer, former student of Université Laval."

Hugh Murray wrote at that time to his uncle Bishop Horan, who took the place of his father, to ask permission to follow Montigny's example. It was immediately granted. On 31 July 1861, having arrived at Rome, he donned the uniform of a Papal Zouave. On 21 Nov. 1866 he was appointed sergeant second class. At Mentana (Italy), in the victory of French and papal troops over the Garibaldians on 3 Nov. 1867, Murray truly distinguished himself by his courage and was one of 57 wounded whom, in addition to 24 dead, the papal column counted after the action. He was mentioned in regimental dispatches, soon received the cross of knight of the Order of Pius IX, and was promoted second lieutenant on 4 April 1868. The Canadian Zouaves presented him with a sword, bearing an inscription on its blade: "To Second-Lieutenant Murray, knight of the Order of Pius IX, first Canadian officer, his compatriots."

Back in Canada, Murray, after recovering from a serious operation, offered his services to the Veuillot of American journalism, James Alphonsus McMaster, owner and editor in chief of the New York Freeman's Journal. But it was not long before Murray the journalist abandoned the writing-desk to put on his Zouave's uniform again. His royal comrade in the Papal Zouaves, Don Alfonso de Bourbon, had offered his sword to his brother Don Carlos, who had proclaimed himself king of Spain as Charles VII but who had to win his throne away from a prince of Piedmont, Amadeo I, the choice of the Cortès. Since the fight was once more, in a way, against Piedmont, Hugh Murray hastened to Spain during the summer of 1873, and there, having soon obtained the rank of captain, he was second in command of a force of 400 Spanish, Dutch, and Belgian volunteers.

The Carlist Zouaves waged war for two years against the liberal troops of Amadeo of Savoy, then of Alfonso XII, distinguishing themselves in many engagements which caused them to be particularly dreaded. It was during one of them, in February 1874, that Murray met a glorious death, either during the siege of Manresa or under the walls of Bilbao.

With him disappeared "the perfect type of Papal Zouave." His generous commitment and courage in the service of the papacy must be praised unreservedly, but his political perspicacity, it must be admitted, was not equal to his warlike ardour. Indeed, Murray never understood the complexity of the Italian national problem; in this respect he was like his comrades, and also like the ultramontanes, whether European or American.

PHILIPPE SYLVAIN

L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 19 mars, 9 avril 1874. Annuaire de l'université Laval pour l'année académique 1856–1857 (Québec, 1856); 1858–1859 (Québec, 1858). Catalogue des officiers et des élèves du séminaire de Québec, 1851–1852 (Québec, 1852); 1852–1853 (1853); 1853–1854 (1854); 1854–1855 (1855); 1855–1859 (1856). Georges Cerbelaud-Salagnac, Les zouaves pontificaux (Paris, 1963). Paolo Dalla Torre, L'anno di Mentana: Contributo ad una storia dello Stato pontificio nel 1867 (Milan, 1968), 314. G.-A. Drolet, Zouaviana: étape de trente ans, 1868–1898 . . . (2ᵉ éd., Montréal, 1898). Édouard Lefebvre de Bellefeuille, Le Canada et les zouaves pontificaux: mémoire sur l'origine, l'enrôlement et l'expédition du contingent canadien à Rome, pendant l'année 1868 . . . (Montréal, 1868). Roberto di Nolli, Mentana (Rome, 1865). Elio Lodolini, "I volontari del Canadà nell'esercito pontificio (1868–1870)," Rassegna storica del Risorgimento (Rome), LVI (1969), 641–87.

N

NEEDHAM, WILLIAM HAYDEN, lawyer and politician; b. 9 Dec. 1810 at Fredericton, N.B., son of Mark D. Needham and his wife, a Miss Fraser of Inverness, Scotland; d. 29 Sept. 1874 at Woodstock, N.B.

William Hayden Needham's father was widely known in Fredericton, both as a participant in municipal politics and as the city's quaint old legislative librarian. William was educated at the Fredericton grammar school and at King's College (University of New Brunswick), though he did not receive a degree. Instead, he turned to law and studied under George Frederick Street*. On 8 May 1832 Needham was admitted attorney and in 1834 he was called to the bar of New Brunswick. He practised in Woodstock, Fredericton, and for ten years in Saint John. On 20 Oct. 1835 in Saint John he married Mary Ann Gale. He settled permanently in Fredericton about 1853. Needham had a province-wide reputation as a lawyer of "much ability" and was, at one time, vice-president of the New Brunswick Bar Association.

Needham was rarely out of politics during his adult years. As a student in 1830 he had taken to the hustings in opposition to his Conservative patron, George Frederick Street; for this activity he was evicted from Street's law office. While in Saint John he struggled for the reform of the city charter. "Almost unaided he fought his measure through, against all the old toryism of the day in and out of Council." By 1850 "Billy" Needham was a popular hero, and in the election of that year, he and five other reformers were returned to the assembly for the Saint John district. A government reorganization in 1851 created a crisis among these reformers. Robert Duncan Wilmot* and John Hamilton Gray* accepted appointments to Sir Edmund Head*'s council. Needham, Samuel Leonard Tilley*, William Johnstone Ritchie*, and Charles Simonds* were indignant, and stated their determination to resign should Wilmot be returned to the house in the election necessitated by his becoming surveyor general. Wilmot's success brought immediate resignations from Tilley, Ritchie, and Simonds, but Needham decided not to follow their lead and remained in the assembly until 1854. The reform press of the time vilified him as a man without principles – a charge that has clung to him ever since.

The government of Edward Barron CHANDLER apparently rewarded Needham by appointing him, in 1853, to the well-paid post of secretary of the law commission which was drafting revised statutes for the province. His contribution to the consolidation and revision of the statutes was considerable. According to the commissioners, Needham was "most able and valuable. . . . His assistance in the art of condensing has materially tended to the accomplishment of so much of our labours."

After his move to Fredericton, Needham entered municipal politics and was six times elected mayor between 1856 and 1868. He re-entered provincial politics in 1865 when he became convinced that confederation was a menace. A most effective speaker, he used colour, wit, and ridicule to destroy the arguments of the confederates – especially their idea that New Brunswick manufacturers could exploit the Canadian market. The move towards confederation meant defeat for Needham in 1866, but he was soon elected mayor of Fredericton again. On 19 May 1869 he was successful in a provincial by-election, but he was defeated in the general elections of 1870 and 1874. Few men, he often said, have "been so often beaten at the polls." On 2 April 1873 he was appointed queen's counsel.

William Needham deserves better treatment than he has received from the 19th-century liberal historians George Edward Fenety* and James Hannay*. His contributions to municipal government and his work for the law commissioners were of major significance. Perhaps most important, however, was his continuing struggle to advance the public school system of New Brunswick. "Educate your people and make them free," he cried in the assembly, "educate the people and make them happy; educate the people and keep them from crime and misery." For this cause he strove until his death. His interests did not stop with the public school system. He also gave continuing support to King's College as a public institution, and throughout the 1840s and 1850s the college needed friends. It had become the despised symbol of the privileged in the eyes of anti-establishment reformers such as Albert James Smith*. In 1854 Smith spearheaded a drive to abolish the institution and the outcome was still uncertain when Needham delivered his stirring "speech that saved the college," concluding that "the institution owed its want of success in a great measure to the hostile measures brought forward in the House year after year instead of assisting it by the proper application of their united individual intellect."

The ordinary people, with whom Needham sympathized, were never forgotten. In his last major speech in the assembly, he spoke in opposition to the practice of imprisonment for debt in a "speech which for earnestness, pathos and masterly eloquence has seldom if ever, been surpassed on the floor of the legislature."

Needham was typical of the politicians of the time who were unable to accept the partisanship of the party system that was evolving during his career. He chose his sides and causes for personal rather than party reasons. This attitude guaranteed him enemies, but even they regarded William Needham as a man of "wonderful versatility and ability."

C. M. WALLACE

N.B. Museum, Marriage register B, 1828–38. Fenety, Political notes and observations; "Political notes," Progress (Saint John, N.B.), 1894 (collected in a scrapbook in N.B. Museum and PAC). Daily Telegraph (Saint John, N.B.), 30 Sept. 1874. Morning Freeman (Saint John, N.B.), 1, 6 Oct. 1874. New Brunswick Reporter (Fredericton), 30 Sept. 1874. Saint John Daily News, 30 Sept. 1874. Can. parl. comp., 1869.

James Hannay, History of New Brunswick, II; The life and times of Sir Leonard Tilley: being a political history of New Brunswick for the past seventy years (Saint John, N.B., 1897). Lawrence, Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton), 502. K. F. C. MacNaughton, The development of the theory and practice of education in New Brunswick, 1784–1904: a study in historical background, ed. with intro. A. G. Bailey (University of New Brunswick Hist. Studies, I, Fredericton, 1947).

NELSON, ROBERT, doctor, member of the assembly, Patriote; b. January 1794 in Montreal, son of William Nelson and Jane Dies; d. 1 March 1873 at Gifford, Staten Island, N.Y.

William Nelson, the son of a commissary in the Royal Navy, and originally from Nesham, Yorkshire, was a teacher in New York, where he married Jane Dies, whose father owned large estates on the Hudson River. After the American Revolution (during which he was probably an officer in the Royal Navy), he moved to Montreal. It was there that his younger son Robert was born.

Robert Nelson studied medicine, first at Montreal under the famous Dr Daniel Arnoldi*, then at Harvard University. On 15 April 1814 he received authorization to practise. War was at its height; the young doctor enlisted in the army and was immediately appointed surgeon in ordinary to the 7th Battalion, called Deschambault's force (after Colonel Louis-Joseph Fleury* Deschambault). Later, in 1824, with these wartime comrades, he was to sign a petition to Lord Dalhousie [Ramsay*], to obtain land that the veterans had been promised. On 26 July 1814 he was transferred to the corps of Indian braves, where an epidemic of what was apparently lithiasis was raging. Nelson retained his affection for the Indians after the hostilities were over. At least until 1826 he worked on a voluntary basis among the 3,000 inhabitants of the reserves at Caughnawaga, Lac-des-Deux-Montagnes (Oka), Saint-Régis, and Saint-François. Twice, in 1821 and at the time of a syphilis epidemic in 1826, he asked Lord Dalhousie, in vain, to appoint him surgeon to the Indians. He also spent some of his time assembling material to be used for a history of the aborigines of America, which he seems never to have completed.

Having gone to live at Montreal, the young doctor rapidly acquired an enormous clientele and a more than creditable reputation. Two of his students were Luc-Hyacinthe MASSON and Charles-Christophe MALHIOT. Nelson was said to be the man for difficult cases, for major operations. He is thought to have been the first man in the country to operate for stones (lithotritis). According to Laurent-Olivier David*, while on a journey in France he interrupted a surgeon who was "perplexed and in danger of following the wrong course," and completed a delicate operation "to the applause of the doctors and students present." In 1827 his brother Wolfred* brought him into politics. He was elected with Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU in Montreal West. In the house he did not particularly attract attention, and, judging that his political duties did not fit in with his profession, he resigned in 1830. Two years later, on the outbreak of the cholera epidemic, he gave his services especially to the immigrants at Pointe-Saint-Charles. In 1834, for reasons that have remained obscure, he returned to politics, representing Montreal West in the assembly. He joined with the members of the Patriote party who refused to vote supplies to the government so long as the latter did not meet their chief requests for reforms. Although Nelson was one of the most vehement speakers in the Patriote assemblies of the counties and one of the most active members of the Comité Central et Permanent du district de Montréal, he did not take part in the 1837 insurrection. He was none the less arrested on 24 November as a suspect, undoubtedly because of his close association with his brother Wolfred, who was present at the battle of Saint-Denis. The next day, however, he was released because of irregularities in the warrant for his arrest. He was indignant and furious. Louis-Joseph-Amédée Papineau*, in his diary, stated that Nelson wrote on the wall of his cell: "The English government will remember Robt. Nelson." It was in this state of mind that he went to the United States at the end of 1837.

Among the other leaders who succeeded in evading the English army were L.-J. Papineau, Edmund Bailey O'CALLAGHAN, the parish priest Étienne Chartier*, Édouard-Étienne Rodier*, Édouard-Élisée MALHIOT, Cyrille-Hector-Octave Côté*, Thomas Bouthillier*, Joseph-François Davignon, and Julien Gagnon. They all arranged to meet on 2 Jan. 1838 at Middlebury, Vermont, to discuss the possibility of another insurrection. The failure of 1837 had profoundly changed the alignments in the revolutionaries' camp. The radicals had taken over the leadership of the movement from the moderates. Among the radicals two tendencies appeared. The first favoured direct and immediate action: the setting up of a provisional government, the proclamation of a republic of Lower Canada, and the invasion of Lower Canada. Robert Nelson, supported by a group including Dr Côté and Julien Gagnon, represented this tendency. Other Patriotes, centring around Papineau, were opposed to any precipitate action without having previously obtained the assurance of formal aid from the government of the United States and the border states. The first group prevailed, and Nelson was elected general of the army and president of the future Canadian republic.

The extreme haste and enthusiasm of Nelson and his followers are no doubt to be explained by their revolutionary fervour and their indignation over recent events in Lower Canada. To these must probably be added their belief that large sectors of the American population would spontaneously support them, and that many would march by their side. This belief is understandable. The northwestern states had numerous reformers who were demanding the abolition of slavery and of imprisonment for debts, the emancipation of women, and the extension of liberty to oppressed peoples. Many of these reformers, imbued with the revolutionary excitement of 1776, were sympathetic to the cause of the Canadian political refugees. Moreover, thousands of American unemployed, who considered the Bank of England responsible for the 1837 recession, were perhaps tempted to take advantage of an opportunity to avenge themselves on Great Britain. At least the Patriotes might believe they would be.

It was with these possibilities in mind that Nelson and his chief lieutenant, Dr Côté, prepared a first invasion for 28 Feb. 1838. After having "obtained" 250 rifles from the Elizabethtown arsenal, Nelson, at the head of 300 to 400 Patriotes, invaded Canada from Alburg, Vermont. As soon as it had cleared the border, the band distributed copies of a declaration of independence. The latter, drawn from the American Declaration of Independence, first enumerated the crimes that Great Britain had committed against Lower Canada, then set forth the right to overthrow the government. There followed 18 declarations, not untinged with propaganda, on abolition of the union of church and state, seigneurial tenure, and imprisonment for debts, the nationalization of the clergy reserves, and so on. The invasion proved to be a total failure. Scarcely had the Patriotes reached Canadian territory when they were attacked and pushed back into the United States. Nelson and others were put in prison for having infringed the American neutrality law. However, they were rapidly acquitted by a jury sympathetic to their cause.

Nelson and his friends realized that even if this failure could be imputed to a lack of preparation and organization, their own lack of discretion was also largely to blame. Hence the formation of a secret society, known as the Frères-Chasseurs. The decision to set this up was also taken with the object of getting round the new neutrality law passed by Congress in March 1838 (but requested two months earlier by the president), a law much more rigorous than the previous one.

The secret society was constituted on the model of an army. At the head of the association was the Grand Aigle, a sort of major-general; under his orders were Aigles of various districts, who were each to organize a company. To do this they chose two Castors – captains, as it were – who in their turn undertook to assume command over five corporals, commonly called Raquettes. The latter each had under their orders nine men, and these formed the corps of Chasseurs proper. The funds necessary for financing the movement were collected from among sympathizers in Lower Canada and the United States.

Nelson entrusted the recruiting to dynamic comrades such as John McDonell, Célestin Beausoleil, and Édouard-Élisée Malhiot, who travelled through Lower Canada setting up lodges and promising arms and ammunition for the great day of deliverance. The wildest and most improbable reports circulated as to the number of Frères-Chasseurs. Sir John Colborne* spoke of several tens of thousands; others commented that each parish in Lower Canada had its lodge.

Whatever the number of Frères-Chasseurs might have been, this army was hardly a disciplined one. Nelson's leadership was not very firm. Aloof, doctrinaire, uncompromising in his ideas, he did not have the unconditional support of those of his compatriots who were the most devoted to the cause. Édouard-Élisée Malhiot, among others, would not soon forget the fate in store for Papineau. Also, Nelson did not manage to eliminate among his associates the conflicts of personality, the personal rivalries, the ambitions that would forever be obstacles to effective action. Anarchy often prevailed in this association, where each member wanted to achieve the most lofty ends.

After long discussions and numerous compromises, Nelson succeeded in getting the date of the invasion and uprising fixed for 3 Nov. 1838. On the third, according to orders, the Patriotes began to assemble in the parishes along the border, Napierville, Lacolle, and Châteauguay, where arms and reinforcements were to reach them from the United States. Impatient, and without necessarily consulting Nelson, groups of Patriotes tried isolated actions. At Beauharnois some easily occupied the seigneury of Edward Ellice* [see D. A. MACDONELL] and others seized the steamship Henry Brougham, with the intention of converting it into a war vessel.

An over-all strategy had, however, been worked out by Nelson and his principal lieutenants. It would seem that after launching an offensive on the American border, by prearrangement with the force of William Lyon Mackenzie*, the Patriotes were to start simultaneous attacks against Beauharnois, Châteauguay, Laprairie, Saint-Jean, Chambly, Boucherville, and Sorel. Nelson himself, at the head of 800 men, was to make use of the Richelieu valley, capture Saint-Jean, and proceed towards Montreal. Montreal, Trois-Rivières, and Quebec were then to be attacked successively. It was hoped that meanwhile the Chasseurs of these towns would revolt from within.

This fine plan was not put into effect. At Montreal the authorities reacted quickly, and arrested several ringleaders. A number of Chasseurs, seeing that the promised arms did not arrive, attacked the Indians of Caughnawaga, with the object of seizing their weapons and ammunition. This was unlucky for them, since many of them were taken prisoner. Meanwhile confusion reigned at Napierville, where Nelson had arrived in the night of 3 or 4 November, not at the head of a band of 800 men but with two French officers: P. Touvrey and Charles Hindenlang*. There he found about 3,000 poorly armed men. And what was more, the American schooner that was coming to bring them arms and ammunition had been intercepted by Canadian volunteers. On the 5th, a detachment of about 400 Patriotes set off for Rouse's Point, to get arms and ammunition that had been hidden there. The American authorities had confiscated them. When they returned, they were thrashed by militiamen.

The operation was turning into a complete fiasco. Nelson, realizing the danger that these incidents represented, and the threat constituted by the movements of regular troops under Colborne's command, decided to direct his men towards Odelltown. It certainly seems that at this moment he contemplated flight. The Patriotes left Napierville on the morning of the 8th and arrived at Lacolle at the end of the afternoon. The story goes that Nelson tried to flee during the night, but that he was captured when he was preparing to get across the border and brought back bound hand and foot. He succeeded in convincing the discontented that he had set out on a tour of inspection. On 9 and 10 November the Patriotes attacked the militiamen at Odelltown. During the decisive engagement that followed the arrival of reinforcements for the militia, the Chasseurs lost 50 men; they then made their way back to the United States. Nelson had fled before the end of the fight.

It is harder to keep track of Nelson after these events. We know however that towards the end of 1838 he called Côté, Gagnon, Malhiot, Ludger Duvernay*, and Robert-Shore-Milnes BOUCHETTE together at Swanton, Vermont. Faced with repression in Lower Canada, the firm opposition of the American government, and, within the last little while, of a large section of the American border population, the Patriote leaders had planned to modify their tactics. They decided to exploit or even provoke border incidents between the United States and Great Britain. They hoped to be able to achieve their ends during a conflict between the two countries. To no avail. The Aroostook "war," and the incident in which Alexander McLEOD was implicated, gave them a faint hope, but London and Washington, eager for peace, settled their differences in 1842 by the Webster-Ashburton treaty.

Ruined, saddled with debts, Nelson decided to go to try his luck in California, where the goldrush was at its height: in a few weeks he acquired a large fortune. However, he lost it through the dishonesty of an agent to whom he had entrusted it. Refusing to return to Canada, where he had been pardoned, he practised his profession in the west until 1863, when he took up residence in New York, in partnership with his son, Eugène (the name of Nelson's wife is not known); Eugène, born on 28 March 1837, had just finished his medical studies in London. In 1866 Robert Nelson published, in New York, Asiatic cholera: its origin and spread in Asia, Africa, and Europe, introduced into America through Canada; remote and proximate causes, symptoms and pathology, and the various modes of treatment analysed. He also translated a medical text and several articles of interest to students of medicine.

According to David, "Robert Nelson was swarthy, of medium height, but vigorous; he had a piercing eye, a keen, searching glance, a severe cast of features. He was a man of few words; his speeches were concise but energetic, he went straight to the point, openly and without mincing matters. He had a forceful, bold, original, adventurous and independent nature, and was headstrong in his opinions and feelings." A portrait dating from the early 1870s shows him wearing a long beard.

RICHARD CHABOT, JACQUES MONET, and YVES ROBY

[The most important genealogical material on Nelson and information about his early career as a doctor and member of the assembly are found in: PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 23; RG 8, I, A1, 507, pp.48, 71–72; I, D7 1694, pp.3–4; RG 10, A5a, 18, 19. La Minerve (Montréal), 10 avril 1873. Audet, Les députés de Montréal, 233–34. L.-O. David, Biographies et portraits (Montréal, 1876); Patriotes. Wolfred Nelson, Wolfred Nelson et son temps (Montréal, 1946). L'Union médicale du Canada (Montréal), II (1873), 188 (obituary). J.M.]

[Information on the events of 1838, the personal rivalries and intrigues that were a continual obstacle to coordinated and effective action, was drawn from ANQ, Collection Ludger Duvernay; the Canadian Antiquarian and Numismatic Journal (1908–1910); and the "Inventaire des documents relatifs aux événements de 1837 et 1838, conservés aux archives de la province de Québec," APQ Rapport, 1925–26, 179ff. Fernand Ouellet's article, "Papineau dans la révolution de 1837–1838," CHA Report, 1957–58, 13–34, also contains material.

Details concerning the period from Nelson's arrest in 1837 until his departure for the United States are found especially in Louis-Joseph-Amédée Papineau's journal, "Journal d'un Fils de la liberté, 1837–1840." The original is in the BNQ and there is a manuscript copy in the ANQ.

Accurate information on the establishing of the Frères-Chasseurs by Nelson is found in: A. B. Corey, The crisis of 1830–1842 in Canadian-American relations (New Haven, 1941). O. A. Kinchen, The rise and fall of the Patriots Hunters (New York, [1956]). Ivahoë Caron, "Une société secrète dans le Bas-Canada en 1838: l'Association des Frères Chasseurs," RSCT, 3rd ser., XX (1926), sect.I, 17–34. Victor Morin, "La « république canadienne » de 1838," RHAF, II (1948–49), 483–512; "Clubs et sociétés notoires d'autrefois," Cahiers des Dix, XV (1950), 199–203.

The Perrault papers in the State Historical Society of Wisconsin contain material on the invasion of 3 November, as do the following: Report of the state trials before a general court martial held at Montreal in 1838–9: exhibiting a complete history of the late rebellion in Lower Canada (2v., Montreal, 1839). L.-N. Carrier, Les événements de 1837–1838 (Québec, 1877), 111–16. Fauteux, Patriotes, 65–74.

Carrier's study and the article by Victor Morin on the "republique canadienne" should be consulted also for the circumstances surrounding Nelson's flight. R.C. and Y.R.]

NICOLLS, JASPER HUME, Anglican clergyman and educator; b. 17 Oct. 1818 on the island of Guernsey, son of General Gustavus Nicolls and Heriot Frances Thomson; d. at Lennoxville, Que., 8 Aug. 1877.

Jasper Hume Nicolls spent a good deal of his early life in British North America where his father was Commanding Royal Engineer successively in Halifax and Quebec. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford (BA 1840), and was made a fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, in 1843. He was ordained deacon in 1844 and priest in 1845. In 1845 Nicolls returned to Canada to become the first principal of Bishop's College, Lennoxville, incorporated in 1843 and about to open. Bishop George Jehoshaphat Mountain*, the president of Bishop's and Nicolls' uncle by marriage, was responsible for Nicolls' appointment, and from 1845 until Mountain's death in 1863, Nicolls had the benefit of his counsel and support.

For 32 years Nicolls successfully directed Bishop's as a liberal arts college and Anglican divinity school. He saw Bishop's as an institution that would provide clergy for the Church of England in Canada and would offer to the country at large a sound and liberal education upon reasonable terms. The institution was to be under Anglican control but open to students of all denominations. In his convocation address at Bishop's in 1860 Nicolls asserted, "We are not ashamed of being what is termed denominational; but we open our doors to all; we have no test on admission; we have no test in granting degrees." He developed a curriculum similar to that in other Anglican colleges in Canada, which consisted of instruction mainly in the classics, mathematics, and divinity.

Influenced by the Tractarian movement during his Oxford career, Nicolls remained throughout his life a high churchman. He showed his Tractarian sympathies in 1845 when William George

Ward, an associate of John Henry Newman, was tried by the Oxford University convocation for making an extreme Tractarian statement and was degraded from his degrees. Nicolls, a member of convocation, supported Ward. Nicolls' churchmanship helps to explain his relations with other Church of England bishops in Canada. He got on well with Francis Fulford*, the bishop of Montreal, who was a high churchman, and badly with Fulford's successor, Ashton Oxenden*, who was sympathetic to the Anglican evangelicals. Politically Nicolls was a Conservative; he strongly favoured English influences in Canada and was much opposed to American ideas and institutions. Like Bishop Mountain, Nicolls was prepared to work with either Conservative or Reform politicians provided they were willing to advance the interests of Bishop's College. Thus he enlisted the good offices of adherents of the Liberal-Conservative party such as Alexander Tilloch Galt* and Timothy Lee TERRILL, the MLA for Stanstead, but also Reformers such as Thomas Cushing AYLWIN and Antoine-Aimé Dorion*. In 1852 Nicolls made strong representations to Lord Elgin [Bruce*] and the Reformist administration of Francis Hincks* and Augustin-Norbert Morin* in his successful effort to secure a royal charter for Bishop's.

Nicolls was a strong believer in the principle that Christian thought should occupy a central position in education at all levels. In his convocation address at Bishop's in 1860, he said, "Let it be the University's privilege to demonstrate that – while man discovers, he discovers what God has made, what God gives him to understand. Universities let us remember are Christian Institutions." Nicolls was prepared to accept state supervision of secondary schools, but thought that the curriculum should contain religious instruction of a non-sectarian type.

Jasper Hume Nicolls was a man of fine character: sincere, straightforward, witty, with a fine sense of humour and great personal charm. In 1847 he had married his first cousin, Harriet Mary, daughter of Bishop Mountain; they had two sons and one daughter.

D. C. MASTERS

J. H. Nicolls, An address delivered before the convocation of Bishop's College, Lennoxville, June 27, 1860 (Sherbrooke, Que., 1860); An address to the teachers of academies in the district of Bedford . . . on the occasion of the formation of a teacher's association, October 29, 1858 (Burlington, Vt., 1859); The end and object of education, a lecture (Montreal, 1857); J. H. Nicolls and John Carry, Essay on the subject of the restoration of the diaconate . . . (Montreal, 1863).

Bassett Memorial Library, Bishop's University (Lennoxville, Que.), Nicolls papers. Clerical guide and churchman's directory, an annual register for the clergy and laity of the Anglican Church in British North America, 1876, ed. C. V. F. Bliss (Ottawa, 1876). D. C. Masters, Bishop's University, the first hundred years (Toronto, 1950), 3–63; Protestant church colleges in Canada; a history (Studies in the History of Higher Education in Canada, 4, Toronto, 1966), 4–5, 8, 15, 65–66, 211; "Bishop's University and the ecclesiastical controversies of the nineteenth century (1845–1878)," CHA, Report, 1951, 36–42; "The Nicolls papers; a study in Anglican Toryism," CHA, Report, 1945, 42–48.

NILES, WILLIAM E., farmer, businessman, magistrate, militia officer, and politician; b. 1799, Coeymans, New York, son of Henry Niles and Hannah Hicks; d. 17 Aug. 1873, London, Ont.

William E. Niles apparently first came to Upper Canada as a child with his brother Stephen to live with an uncle, Willet Casey, in Adolphustown Township. In 1820, Niles, then living at Detroit, was commissioned by Governor Lewis Cass of Michigan to purchase lumber from William Putnam of Putnamville, Middlesex County, Upper Canada. The following year he settled in Upper Canada near the present site of Nilestown, established a farm, erected a sawmill, and later operated a store. His sawmill was to supply "a large proportion of the lumber of which early London was built."

Throughout his life Niles was "a staunch and consistent Reformer." He was chairman on 8 Dec. 1837 of a meeting of leading Reformers in the London area, including John TALBOT, Charles Latimer, William Putnam, and Edward Allen Talbot*, but his political career survived the aftermath of the rebellion. He served on the District of London (later the County of Middlesex) Council from 1842 until 1854, and was warden, 1847–54. He was appointed justice of the peace in 1849 and was made a lieutenant-colonel in the militia in 1851. Niles represented East Middlesex in the Legislative Assembly from 1854 to 1857, elected as a moderate Reformer in support of Francis Hincks*. He upheld the government, which became progressively more conservative, until April 1856 when he crossed over to the opposition. He was not a candidate in 1857. Elected one of the delegates from Middlesex County to the Reform convention of November 1859, he served as chairman of the committee on procedure.

Niles was a strong advocate of the construction of the Great Western Railway and, while warden, was one of its directors. He served as director of the East Middlesex Agricultural Society, as vice-president of the Provincial Agricultural Association, and, in 1866, as trustee of the short-lived Nilestown Oil Company. A landowner in London and Dorchester Township and a contractor, he was also an active promoter of the Agricultural Mutual Assurance Association of Canada (formerly County of Middlesex Mutual Fire Insurance Company), later becoming inspector of agencies with it and with the Isolated Risk Fire Insurance Company of Canada.

In 1821 Niles married Gertrude Dykert (Daggart), also a native of the United States, and sister-in-law of William Putnam, and they had four children, one of whom Annie Maria, married Ellis Walton HYMAN. Raised as a Quaker, William Niles became a Presbyterian and later an Anglican. He was a prominent freemason.

DANIEL J. BROCK

Globe (Toronto), 10 Nov. 1859. London Advertiser, 18 Aug. 1873. London Free Press, 19 Aug. 1873. J. of Education for Ont., XXVI (October 1873), 157. Hudson-Mohawk genealogical and family memoirs, a record of achievements of the people of the Hudson and Mohawk valleys in New York State . . ., ed. Cuyler Reynolds (4v., New York, 1911), I, 400–2. Pioneer life on the Bay of Quinte including genealogies of old families and biographical sketches of representative citizens (Toronto, n.d.), 594–99. History of the county of Middlesex, 74–79, 90, 115, 155, 283, 322–23, 332, 488. Fred Landon, "London and its vicinity, 1837–38," Ont. Hist., XXIV (1927), 410–38.

NISBET, JAMES, first Presbyterian missionary to the Indians in the northwest, founder of the settlement at Prince Albert, Sask.; b. 8 Sept. 1823 in the parish of Gorbals, Glasgow, Scotland; d. 30 Sept. 1874 at Kildonan, Man.

James Nisbet was the son of Thomas Nisbet, a master shipbuilder of Rutherglen on the Clyde, who brought his family to Canada West in 1844 and settled at Oakville on the shore of Lake Ontario. James had served an apprenticeship as carpenter in Glasgow and he worked at this trade for a short time after coming to Canada. He then took the four-year course in theology at Knox College, Toronto, graduating in 1849. He was employed as agent and missionary of the Sabbath School Society of Montreal until January 1850 when he was ordained and inducted as pastor of the Oakville congregation. While at Oakville he did missionary work in winter in distant townships such as St Vincent, Artemesia, and Nottawasaga.

In 1862 Nisbet was selected by the Foreign Mission Committee of the Canada Presbyterian Church to assist the Reverend John Black* at the Red River Mission, and to make inquiries about where and how a mission might be established among the Indians in the Hudson's Bay Company territory. Nisbet reached Kildonan in July 1862 and readily adapted himself to his new work. In 1864 he married Mary, daughter of Robert MacBeth of Kildonan, a member of the Council of Assiniboia; they had four children.

In October 1862 Nisbet sent the Foreign Mission Committee an estimate of the cost of a mission to the Crees at Berens River on the east shore of Lake Winnipeg. Next he suggested the possibility of missions at the Saskatchewan mines near Fort Edmonton and in the Mackenzie River district. In June 1863 he made a personal appeal at the synod meeting in Hamilton but he could not persuade the delegates to incur new liabilities for an Indian mission. Black shared Nisbet's disappointment and he proposed to the synods of 1864 and 1865 that the church consider a mission to the Crees in the North Saskatchewan River valley. Finally the synod agreed that Nisbet be designated to the work of a Saskatchewan mission to be opened in 1866.

Nisbet wanted the mission to be "the itinerant kind" and in addition to an interpreter who would accompany him to different bands he needed a trustworthy person to take charge of the mission station. An ordained man was not available but Nisbet obtained the assistance of two first-rate interpreters. George Flett, brother-in-law of Mrs Black (Henrietta Ross), was to come from Fort Edmonton to Fort Carlton to help Nisbet find a site. Part Cree and interested in the welfare of the Indians, Flett promised to join the mission when his term of service with the HBC ended. John McKay, Mrs Nisbet's brother-in-law, was to act as guide and to supervise the erection of buildings. Like Flett he was part Cree, and he was also a noted buffalo hunter. Two hired men, one of them a brother of Mrs Nisbet, were to help with the work for a year.

The mission party set out from Kildonan by ox-cart on 6 and 7 June and 40 days later reached Fort Carlton on the North Saskatchewan River. There they learned that Flett had not been able to find a band of Crees willing to receive the mission. However, Flett had a farm on the river flats about 60 miles below Fort Carlton and he advised Nisbet to settle there. After inspecting the site Nisbet took his party to the place, which he named Prince Albert. The date of their arrival was 26 July 1866.

The Crees at Prince Albert did not want a mission there because they feared that settlers would come later to take their land and buffalo. Nisbet was patient and tactful, however, and under Flett's guidance he overcame the Indians' reluctance. Gifts of food and clothing completed the work of reconciliation. Land was cleared, hay was gathered for wintering the cattle, and log buildings were erected. In September Nisbet and Flett travelled upstream to hold services at the HBC forts and the Cree camps between Fort Carlton and Fort Edmonton. This was to be the only "itinerating" that Nisbet could manage. Flett did not stay long at Prince Albert and McKay could not be spared from other work. Unfortunately Nisbet did not acquire the proficiency he needed for preaching in Cree.

Nisbet believed that permanent results could best be obtained by gathering the children in a school to be taught "the ordinary branches of a common and Christian education," and to be trained as farmers and skilled tradesmen. The expense of keeping the children in school would not be great once the farming operations were fully established. Indian families were to be encouraged to settle near the mission. In addition to a school for the Indian children Nisbet wanted a school for the children of HBC and mission employees, and he succeeded in getting Adam McBeth, an experienced teacher from Red River, to open the English school in 1867. Nisbet thought that the Indian children should be taught in Cree and only those showing aptitude for learning the language should be taught English. In the summer of 1866 Nisbet himself had tried to teach the syllabic characters to Cree children and he had McKay prepare a Cree reader. Before long, however, he noticed that the Indian children picked up English rapidly and he abandoned the plan of using Cree as a language of instruction. In 1871–72, 26 children were attending the school, but only eight were Indian boarders.

Church services were held in both Cree and English until 1871–72 when English was used exclusively in the morning and English and Cree in the afternoon. In 1872 the religious services were moved from the missionary's house to a church with seating for 120 persons.

The farm played an important role in the life of the mission. It was intended to serve as an example to the Indians and a source of supply for the mission and other stations to be established nearby. Wheat and barley were harvested in 1867 and in 1868 a crop of 600 bushels of wheat was produced from 17 bushels sown. By 1871, 40 acres were in crop and a threshing machine and small iron grist-mill were in use. In "starvation years," as Nisbet dryly reported, the produce from the farm was a greater attraction to wandering bands than the religious instruction available at the mission.

Nisbet continued to plead for the assistance of a second missionary but he did not get one until 1872. In that year also his work was unfairly attacked. On 2 Feb. 1872 the Western Advertiser of Winnipeg carried an article charging favouritism and mismanagement at the Prince Albert mission. The charges were said to be based on the statements of former employees and were serious enough for the Foreign Mission Committee to depute the Reverend William Moore to investigate. He arrived in Prince Albert in September 1872 and found that Nisbet, by his own modest standards, had achieved "a splendid success." However, in Moore's opinion, too much time and energy had been devoted to farming and not enough to evangelism. More teaching should have been done in Cree and more preaching of the Gospel to itinerant bands. Since the farm was no longer needed as a source of supply or for use as a training school he recommended that it be abandoned. The Foreign Mission Committee was already considering changes in the mode of conducting the work and, in full consultation with Nisbet, now decided to close the farming operations.

But this decision was too late to help Nisbet, who had to spend the winter of 1873 at his old home in Oakville. After his return to Prince Albert Mrs Nisbet's health rapidly deteriorated and she was taken east for medical attention. She died at her father's home in Kildonan and Nisbet, worn out by his arduous labours, fell ill and died a few days later.

Nisbet's main achievement was the establishment of a mission base from which evangelical work was carried on as opportunity offered. He was regarded by his contemporaries as "a singularly unselfish and devoted missionary." He did more, perhaps, to pave the way for white settlement in the Saskatchewan district than to prepare the Indians for the arrival of immigrant settlers.

JEAN E. MURRAY

McGill University Archives, James Nisbet, letters, accounts; James Nisbet, diary, Prince Albert, 1868–74; James Nisbet, statement of conditions in Prince Albert, 1875. The Home and Foreign Record of the Canada Presbyterian Church (Toronto), III–XIV (1863–75). G. W. D. Abrams, Prince Albert; the first century, 1866–1966 (Saskatoon, 1966), 2–17. Hugh McKellar, Presbyterian pioneer missionaries in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia (Toronto, 1924), 13–15, 87–91. H. C. Mathews, Oakville and the sixteen; the history of an Ontario port (Toronto, 1953), 267–70. Missionary pathfinders; Presbyterian laborers at home and abroad, ed. W. S. MacTavish (Toronto, 1907), 83–93. E. H. Oliver, "The Presbyterian Church in Saskatchewan, 1866–1881," RSCT, 3rd ser., XXVIII (1934), sect.II, 61–94.

NOAD, JOSEPH, public servant and legislator; b. c. 1797 in England; d. 20 Feb. 1873 in Woodstock, Ont.

Nothing is known of Joseph Noad's background or his career before he arrived in Newfoundland. Just out from England, he was appointed surveyor general of Newfoundland on 20 Aug. 1832. Despite the criticism of a Liberal politician, Dr William Carson*, that Noad had no stake in the colony and could only be interested in his salary and fees, he was appointed by Governor John Harvey* in 1842 to the Executive Council. With the introduction of the new constitution the following year he also became an appointed member of the Amalgamated Legislature [see Kent], from which he resigned in 1845. He continued to sit in the Executive Council until the restoration of the older form of representative government in 1848; he was then appointed to the Council, a body that performed both executive and legislative functions by advising the governor and acting as an upper house. On the introduction of responsible government in 1855 Noad, along with other members of the local oligarchy, was forced to resign his government position.

Noad's major projects as surveyor general were probably street plans for Harbour Grace after the fire of 1832 (Noad Street in that town gets its name from him), and for St John's after the conflagration of 1846. In 1847 Governor John Gaspard Le Marchant wrote of him that "the zealous and indefatigable manner in which this officer has ever discharged his duties is deserving of the highest praise and encouragement." That summer Noad accompanied Le Marchant on a cruise along the south and west coasts of Newfoundland. His report of the survey stressed the importance to the colony of the west coast, then included in the French Shore, stating that the fertility of the soil and the valuable fisheries made the area desirable for settlement.

Noad was also a director of the Newfoundland Steam Navigation Company, a member of the St George's Society, and a leading figure in the small Congregational church to which he had been admitted in 1833. He was twice married. Two sons of his first marriage, both of whom were educated in England, survived him. On 7 July 1835, in St John's, he married his second wife, Emma Gaden Lilly; they had two daughters and one son. At the time of his forced retirement in 1855 Noad, like most of the other pensioned officials, left Newfoundland. He moved with his family to Woodstock, Upper Canada, where he died a poor man.

Elizabeth A. Wells

Congregational Church (St John's), John Jones' journal; register of baptisms. Ontario, Department of Provincial Secretary and Citizenship (Toronto), record of death of Joseph Noad. Oxford County Surrogate Court (Woodstock, Ont.), will of Joseph Noad. PANL, Newfoundland, Dept. of the Colonial Secretary, letter book, August 1830–November 1832, 367; Newfoundland, Governor's office, Dispatches to the Colonial Office, 1824–58, John Gaspard Le Marchant to Sir Henry George Grey, 27 Aug. 1847. PRO, CO 194/114, 73. St David's Presbyterian Church (St John's), Register of interments. Newfoundland, Blue Books, 1838, 1842, 1845, 1847, 1848, 1872 (copies in PANL). The Newfoundland almanack . . . 1849 . . . , comp. Philip Tocque (St John's, 1849). Newfoundland Patriot (St John's), 28 April 1835, 29 Sept. 1840. Public Ledger (St John's), 6 Nov. 1840. Royal Gazette (St John's), 1 Aug. 1843. Times and General Commercial Gazette (St John's), 2 April 1873. Ethel Canfield, "Record of people and personalities of Woodstock," unpublished ms in Woodstock Public Library (Woodstock, Ont.). W. E. Cormack, Narrative of a journey across the island of Newfoundland in 1822 (St John's, 1856), app., "Remarks on part of the western shore of this island by the surveyor general after personal examination in 1847."

NORTHUP, JEREMIAH, merchant, shipowner, and politician; b. at Falmouth, N.S., in 1816, son of John Northup and Agnes Harvey; m. Emily Cochran on 3 Oct. 1848; d. at Halifax, N.S., 10 April 1879.

Jeremiah Northup began his mercantile career as a clerk in the Halifax firm of Charles R. Fairbanks* and Joseph Allison*. In 1837 he and his younger brother, Joseph, joined their father who operated a small grocery store in Halifax. Joseph Northup had a particular interest in agriculture. After the colony's economy improved about 1853, Jeremiah Northup, acting through the family firm, became involved in shipbuilding in the Maitland area of Hants County. He bought his first shares in ships in 1854 and acquired an interest in at least six more during his lifetime. One of his vessels was the schooner Emily, of 334 tons built in 1863; others were the barque Eva, 517 tons built in 1869, the barque Lara, 948 tons built in 1872, and the Senator, 1,474 tons launched in 1878. Unlike Ezra Churchill or Thomas Killam, Northup did not build up a family fleet nor could he be considered a major shipowner of the period. His activities, however, provided connections not only with his fellow Halifax merchants but also with English firms. Thus the type of shipbuilding carried on by Northup maintained an important economic development and supported the general mercantile economy of the province.

Politically a supporter of Joseph Howe, Jeremiah Northup was elected to the provincial house for Halifax as an anti-confederate in 1867. He broke with the provincial government when he supported the "better terms" arranged by Howe in 1869; he also assisted Howe in the campaign which led to the latter's victory in a federal by-election of that year. On Howe's recommendation

Northup was appointed to the Senate in 1870. He did not make a major contribution to the Senate, perhaps because he was becoming increasingly hard of hearing. When he did appear in the chamber, he defended the commercial interests of Halifax and of the Maritimes. He was able to reconcile his political allegiance to the Conservative party and his interest in shipping to support the National Policy in 1878.

After 1870 Northup devoted himself to commercial affairs, particularly to the Ocean Marine Insurance Company, which he had helped establish in 1869. He was a partner in the private company that formed the Merchant's Bank in 1864, joined its board of directors in 1870, and became a vice-president in 1872. The family firm, John Northup and Sons, began to decline after the death of his brother in 1874, and closed at Jeremiah's death in 1879, perhaps because neither brother left children to carry on the business. Jeremiah Northup was reputed, probably with exaggeration, to be one of the richest men in the province, leaving an estate evaluated at $150,000. He ranks as one of the builders of the mercantile economy of Nova Scotia in the 19th century.

K. G. PRYKE

Royal Bank of Canada Archives (Montreal). Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 10 April 1879. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 12 April 1879. Morning Herald (Halifax), 11 April 1879. Memorials of the Messrs Northup (father and sons) (Halifax, 1881). Directory of N.S. MLAs (Fergusson), 269. J. V. Duncanson, Falmouth – a New England township in Nova Scotia, 1760–1965 (Windsor, Ont., 1965), 334–36. G. A. White, Halifax and its business: historical sketch and description of the city and its institutions (Halifax, 1876).

NUGENT, JOHN, journalist and U.S. government agent; b. in 1821 ? in County Galway, Ireland; d. 29 March 1880 in San Leandro, California.

John Nugent's parents brought him to the United States at an early age. In the 1840s he served in Washington as correspondent for the New York Herald. At the decade's end he travelled overland to California, and in 1851 became owner-editor of the San Francisco Herald. In 1856 he opposed the re-establishment of the Vigilance Committee, a business-supported, extra-legal organization for the preservation of law and order. His failure to support it was an unpopular move which led to his newspaper's collapse. It was a blow from which his career never recovered. He continued in journalism, however, and five years later he was Democratic runner-up in an election for the U.S. Senate. He tried, unsuccessfully, to re-establish the Herald in 1868 and, toward the end of the 1870s, worked on his memoirs.

In 1858 President James Buchanan, anxious to determine in what way the recently discovered Fraser River gold-fields affected American interests in the northwest and how Americans were being treated, appointed Nugent, whom he had known in Washington in the 1840s, special agent to New Caledonia (British Columbia). He was to report on the mining operations, assist American citizens, ascertain their number, discover whether they were subject to discrimination, and report what new settlements had been formed in adjacent American territories and what lines of communication existed between them and the British territories to the north. His instructions suggest an interest on the part of the United States government not only in determining whether the rights of American citizens were in need of protection but also in knowing how closely linked to the United States the gold-fields were. Nugent was in British territory from 20 September to 17 November. His first days there revealed no tension between Americans and British. Indeed, many of the restrictions on trade and the movement of personnel up the Fraser, which had concerned Americans and their government, had been removed.

Nugent had, however, a falling-out with Governor James DOUGLAS over the treatment of American citizens in the courts, and in a farewell speech to an audience of Americans in Victoria, he suggested that if the rights of American citizens in the area were ever in jeopardy, the American government would not hesitate to intervene. This provocative utterance reflected Nugent's own interest in the annexation of Vancouver Island and New Caledonia, which he thought would, in the course of time, naturally occur. The British ambassador at Washington reported, however, that the attitude of the American government had been quite correct. Nugent's visit did not have much of an impact on Victoria, and such bitterness as it did arouse was directed at him personally and not at the government he represented.

ALLAN SMITH

Daily Bee (Sacramento, Cal.), 24 Dec. 1884. H. H. Bancroft, Popular tribunals (San Francisco, Cal., 1887). Ormsby, British Columbia. R. L. Reid, "John Nugent: the impertinent envoy," BCHQ, VIII (1944), 53–76.

NUGENT, JOHN VALENTINE, educator, politician, newspaper editor and proprietor, sheriff; b. 1796 in Waterford, Ireland; m. Ellen Maria Creedon of Cork, Ireland, and had several children; d. St John's, Nfld., 12 June 1874.

There is no certain evidence concerning John

Valentine Nugent's early life in Ireland. He seems to have been well educated, having devoted four years to the study of law. According to his political enemies in Newfoundland, he was forced to leave Ireland because of his "violence in politics." After arriving in St John's in May 1833 he opened a private school. Because of his fluency in writing and speaking he soon became the spokesman for the liberal cause, and a man regarded by the conservative as a hot-headed, fiery, restless agitator who systematically attempted to array Catholics against Protestants. Soon after his arrival in Newfoundland Nugent applied unsuccessfully for permission to practise at the bar. He felt that his exclusion was based solely on religion and was therefore unjust.

In 1834 a series of letters signed by "Junius" accusing Governor Thomas COCHRANE of bigotry, injustice, and despotism appeared in the Newfoundland Patriot. Even though Father Edward TROY, chaplain to the Roman Catholic bishop, Michael Anthony Fleming*, admitted authorship, Cochrane attributed the letters to Nugent whose radical political views were already well known. During the 1830s Nugent did contribute much, under various signatures, to the liberal Patriot. Robert John Parsons*, the editor, was later to write that Nugent had been the sole cause of all the resentment against the Patriot, his anonymous letters having been "calculated to incite the people to discord."

In the invalidated general election of 1836 Nugent was elected to the assembly by acclamation for Placentia and St Mary's. In 1837 the fiery Irish schoolmaster was re-elected. Soon he became one of the leaders in the assembly, his radicalism doing nothing to decrease the violence of the struggle between the assembly and the council. He was a member of the delegation to London – with Patrick Morris* and William Carson* – which in 1838 secured the removal from Newfoundland of Chief Justice Henry John Boulton* and ensured that in future the chief justice would not be a member of the council. Unfortunately Nugent, a poor man, found himself stranded with no money to pay for his passage home. After the Colonial Office had refused him a loan, Bishop Fleming, who happened to be in London, helped him out of his difficulty. On his return to St John's, he was appointed solicitor to the House of Assembly. In the summer of 1841 Nugent was one of the delegates appointed by the house to appear in London before the parliamentary select committee on Newfoundland. Although the delegation failed to reach England before the inquiry adjourned, they did present the assembly's case in a series of letters to Lord John Russell.

During the 1842 general election campaign, in which Nugent was a candidate for St John's, he was arrested for non-payment of libel damages. The magistrate – a Protestant Conservative – was reprimanded by Governor John Harvey* for the timing of this arrest; the Liberals, enraged, raised the money for Nugent's bail and had him released; and the three Conservative candidates were defeated. From 1842 to 1848 John Valentine Nugent sat in the Amalgamated Legislature.

Meanwhile he had been combining politics with journalism. When R. J. Parsons of the Patriot was heavily fined and sent to jail for contempt in 1835, Nugent helped to set up the Constitutional Society whose purpose was to free the editor. Briefly in 1837 Nugent was the proprietor of the Patriot. Although Parsons resumed the responsibility of owner after a month, Nugent continued to own the press and types of the Patriot till 1840. Thereupon he became editor and later proprietor of the Newfoundland Vindicator. After the Vindicator collapsed he became editor of the Newfoundland Indicator. Both the Vindicator and the Indicator took an active part in politics supporting the Irish Catholic element.

J. V. Nugent's appointment in 1844 as Newfoundland's first inspector of schools caused much resentment among Protestant Conservatives. When, after a year, he was succeeded by a Protestant, he helped found the St John's Academy, a government-supported school. He was junior master and later head of the Roman Catholic division of the academy, 1845–56. His defeat in St John's district in the general election of 1848 was attributed to the fact that he held this government appointment.

After the introduction of responsible government in Newfoundland, with the Liberals finally in office, John Valentine Nugent was appointed in 1856 sheriff of the Central District, a position he filled until infirmity forced his retirement in 1871.

ELIZABETH A. WELLS

Newfoundland, Department of Provincial Affairs, "List of affidavits of proprietorship of newspapers," 1836–1900. PRO, CO 194/88, 70. Newfoundland, Blue Books, 1837–56 (copies in PANL). Newfoundland, House of Assembly, Journals, 1836–46. Courier (St John's), 9 Aug. 1871. Newfoundlander (St John's), 27 Oct. 1862. Newfoundland Patriot (St John's), 7 July 1835, 3 Feb. 1841. Newfoundland Vindicator (St John's), 1842. Public Ledger (St John's), 19 July, 2 Aug. 1844. Telegraph (St John's), 17 July 1874. Times and General Commercial Gazette (St John's), 21 Oct. 1848. Gunn, Political history of Nfld. Leslie Harris, "The first nine years of representative government in Newfoundland," unpublished MA thesis, Memorial University of Newfoundland, 1959.

O

O'BRIEN, EDWARD GEORGE, soldier, pioneer, and businessman; b. probably on 8 Jan. 1799, at Woolwich, Eng., son of Lucius O'Brien and Mary Callender-Campbell; d. 8 Sept. 1875 at Shanty Bay, Ont.

Edward George O'Brien spent his early boyhood at Cork, Ireland, and went to sea as a midshipman in 1810. He remained in the Royal Navy until 1815 when peace ended hope of promotion. In 1816 he became ensign in the 58th Regiment of foot and went with the regiment to Jamaica. Promoted lieutenant in 1820, he exchanged to the 29th Regiment in 1825, and retired on half-pay in 1826. He returned to sea in the merchant marine.

O'Brien emigrated to Upper Canada in 1829 and took up land near Thornhill. One year later he married Mary Sophia Gapper and, in 1832, left Thornhill and completed a new home, "The Woods," on Lake Simcoe at what came to be called Shanty Bay. O'Brien had been made emigrant agent for Oro Township in 1831. In this capacity he was entrusted with the supervision of a proposed Negro settlement, but the project attracted few settlers and was soon abandoned. As magistrate and commissioner of the Court of Requests, O'Brien played a leading role in the life of Shanty Bay, and he was also largely responsible for the building of St Thomas' Church (Church of England). Commissioned lieutenant-colonel in May 1838, he commanded the 3rd Regiment of Simcoe militia during the aftermath of the rebellion.

About 1845 O'Brien moved to Toronto and became secretary of the projected Toronto, Simcoe, and Lake Huron Union Railway (later the Northern Railway). He also served as secretary of the Provincial Mutual and General Insurance Company. In 1848 he bought a newspaper, the Toronto Patriot, edited first by his brother Lucius James O'Brien*, then by Samuel Thompson*, but he sold it after a few years to Ogle Robert Gowan. About 1858 he retired from active business life and returned to Shanty Bay, where he died. He had several children, one of whom, Lucius Richard O'Brien*, became a prominent painter.

K. R. Macpherson

PAO, [Mary Sophia Gapper (O'Brien)], O'Brien journals, 1828–38. [Mary O'Brien], The journals of Mary O'Brien, 1828–1838, ed. A. S. Miller (Toronto, 1968). Chadwick, Ontarian families, II, 143–44. Davin, Irishman in Canada, 294–99. Henry O'Brien, "Reminiscences of Lake Simcoe," Simcoe County Pioneer and Hist. Soc., Pioneer Papers (Barrie, Ont.), no.3 (1910), 8–11. W. E. O'Brien, "Early days in Oro," Simcoe County Pioneer and Hist. Soc., Pioneer Papers (Barrie, Ont.), no.1 (1908), 22–27.

O'CALLAGHAN, EDMUND BAILEY (Baillie occurs sometimes), doctor, MHA, journalist, and archivist; b. probably on 27 Feb. 1797 at Mallow in Ireland; d. 29 May 1880 in New York, N.Y.

Edmund Bailey O'Callaghan studied medicine first at Dublin in 1820, then in Paris. He arrived at Quebec in 1823, continued his medical studies there, and received authorization to practise in 1827. It was particularly because of his political involvement that he attracted attention; indeed, even in his first months at Quebec he began to work with the earnest and express purpose of making the political and religious life of the capital aware of the Irish fact. As a member and then secretary (1829–33) of the Society of the Friends of Ireland, a founding member (1830) of the Quebec Mechanics' Institute, and president (1833) of the Quebec Emigrant Society, he seems to have devoted all his efforts to reconciling the Irish and the party of Louis-Joseph Papineau. He also promoted a school for Anglophone Catholics in the Près-de-Ville district; and, in his capacity as secretary for the committee of stewards of St Patrick's Church, he was a principal founder of the Irish parish of Quebec.

Even though he had thus ensured for himself "a reputable existence" at Quebec, O'Callaghan, according to Le Canadien of 17 May 1833, decided to move to Montreal and accept the editorship of the Vindicator and Canadian Advertiser, owned by the famous Patriote bookseller Édouard-Raymond Fabre*. He was its editor for four and a half years. At the same time he continued to take an active part in Irish affairs: he joined the Montreal section of the Society of the Friends of Ireland, and was elected a member of the management committee of the normal school at Montreal. In 1834 he allowed himself to be persuaded by Papineau to stand in the county of Yamaska, where he was elected thanks to his leader's support. In the house, he made himself one of the most spirited and fiery defenders of the Patriote party. He was in fact Papineau's right-hand man. After the death of Louis Bourdages* on 20 Jan. 1835, O'Callaghan replaced him as chairman of the grievances committee. Then, at the opening of the 1836 session, when the members of the assembly who supported Papineau appeared at the bar of the council dressed in homespun after the Canadien manner, O'Callaghan was among those whose originality of costume drew the most attention. For several years speeches and writings had been making him just as conspicuous. He was an impassioned speaker, even a demagogue; he could give a fierce retort and wield a bitter and satirical pen. Lord Gosford [Acheson*] and especially Lord Aylmer [Whitworth-Aylmer*] had suffered through his Irish transports. Hence it was not surprising that a crowd of Doric Club members sacked the offices of the Vindicator on the night of 6 Nov. 1837.

O'Callaghan had incited his fellow-citizens to revolt. "Agitate! Agitate!! Agitate!!!" he had written in the autumn of 1837, "Destroy the Revenue; denounce the oppressors. Everything is lawful when the fundamental liberties are in danger." But when the riot broke out at Montreal (and against him!), he left immediately with Papineau for the Richelieu valley, and once a price was put on his head he made his way to the United States. Subsequently, even if he maintained a fairly regular correspondence with Canadian leaders such as Louis-Joseph Papineau, William Lyon Mackenzie*, Édouard-Raymond Fabre, and Louis Perrault, he never set foot again in British territory.

In April 1839, after a stay in New York, O'Callaghan took up residence at Albany. He practised medicine there until 1846, and was a member of the Albany County Medical Society. During this period he became an enthusiastic student of history. Between 1842 and 1844 he published several articles in the Northern Light, a newspaper that upheld the interests of the working class. His house became the meeting-place of the scholars and cultured men of the region. In 1848 he gave up medicine to accept the post of archivist of the state of New York. During the 22 years that followed, he devoted himself with indefatigable energy to the publication of documents relating to the colonial period. His principal works are: History of New Netherlands . . . (1846–48); Jesuit relations of discoveries and other occurrences in Canada and the northern and western states of the Union, 1632–1672 (1847); A list of editions of the Holy Scriptures, and parts thereof, printed in America previous to 1860 (1861); and The register of New Netherland; 1626 to 1674 (1865). He edited the first 11 volumes of the Documents relative to the colonial history of the State of New-York . . . (1853–61), which contain valuable material on the history of the state and which are important in Canadian history as one of the earliest published sources of French documents (translated into English) relating to the frontier conflict of New France and New York and their rivalry over the Ohio country and the pays d'en haut. In addition to other works he edited The documentary history of the State of New-York (1850–51), and the Calendar of historical manuscripts in the office of the secretary of state, Albany, N.Y. (1865–66). He also wrote an introduction, outlining the history of New York from 1691 to 1775, for the Journal of the Legislative Council of the colony of New York . . . (1861).

In 1870, Mayor Abraham Oakey Hall of New York City commissioned him to prepare for publication the proceedings of the municipal council. O'Callaghan therefore moved to New York. Before his death he had succeeded in preparing the text of 15 volumes. Unfortunately, because of budgetary restrictions, these were never published. They are now the property of the New York Historical Society.

O'Callaghan was a serious, thin, pale man, totally lacking in elegance, and with nothing physically attractive about him. The electors of Yamaska had nicknamed him Doctor "qu'a la gale." But according to Joseph-Guillaume Barthe* he was bilingual, a man of great scholarship, who spoke easily and with a real flow of words, and who had a keen eye. His library was particularly well stocked, and he was a highly cultured man. In 1830, at Sherbrooke, he had married Charlotte Augustina Crampe, born in Ireland around 1800. She died on 17 July 1835 as a result of a disease of the lungs. She had given birth to a boy, who survived only a few days. On 9 May 1841, in the United States, O'Callaghan married again; his second wife was Ellen Hawe, who bore him a son; he also died at a very young age.

JACQUES MONET

Edmund Bailey O'Callaghan's main works are: History of New Netherlands; or, New York under the Dutch (2v., New York, 1846–48); Jesuit relations of discoveries and other occurrences in Canada and the northern and western states of the Union, 1632–1672 (New York, 1847); Laws and ordinances of New Netherlands, 1638–1674; compiled and translated from the original Dutch records in the office of the secretary of state (Albany, N.Y., 1868); A list of editions of the Holy Scriptures, and parts thereof, printed in America previous to 1860 (Albany, N.Y., 1861); The register of New Netherland; 1626 to 1674 (Albany, N.Y., 1865).

The following are some of the works he edited: Calendar of historical manuscripts in the office of the secretary of state, Albany, N.Y. (2v., Albany, N.Y., 1865–66); The documentary history of the State of New-York (4v., Albany, N.Y., 1850–51); Documents relative to the colonial history of the State of New-York; procured in Holland, England and France, by John Romeyn Brodhead . . . ed. with Berthold Fernow (15v., Albany, N.Y., 1853–87), I–XI; Journal of the Legislative Council of the colony of New York . . . 1691; . . . 1775 (2v., Albany, N.Y., 1861).

PAC, MG 24, B50 (O'Callaghan papers). State Historical Society of Wisconsin (Madison), Perrault papers. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 10 juin 1880. Vindicator and Canadian Advertiser (Montreal), 1833–37. J.-G. Barthe, Souvenirs d'un demi-siècle ou mémoires pour servir à l'histoire contemporaine (Montréal, 1885), 386. Fauteux, Patriotes. Gérard Filteau, Histoire des Patriotes (3v., Montréal, 1938–39). F. S. Guy, "Edmund Bailey O'Callaghan; a study in American historiography (1797–1880)," unpublished PHD thesis, Catholic University of America, 1935. H. T. Manning, The revolt of French Canada, 1800–1835: a chapter in the history of the British Commonwealth (Toronto, 1962). "M. O'Callaghan et les 'Relations' des Jésuites," BRH, XXXI (1925), 256. A. E. Peterson, "Edmund Bailey O'Callaghan, editor of New York historical records," New York State Hist. Assoc., Proceedings (New York), XXXIII (1935), 64–74. Léon Pouliot, "Note sur Edmund Bailey O'Callaghan (1797–1880)," BRH, XLVII (1941), 18–20. "La Quebec Mechanic's Institute (1830)," BRH, LII (1946), 217–18. P.-G. Roy, "L'auteur des 'Anciens Canadiens' en prison," BRH, XI (1905), 368–69. J. J. Walsh, "Edmund Bailey O'Callaghan, of New York; physician, historian and antiquarian, A.D. 1797–1880," American Catholic Hist. Soc. of Philadelphia, Records, XVI (1905), 5–33.

O'DONOGHUE, WILLIAM BERNARD, treasurer of Louis Riel*'s provisional government; b. 1843 in County Sligo, Ireland; d. 16 March 1878 in St Paul, Minnesota.

William Bernard O'Donoghue moved to New York while still a boy, having witnessed the Irish famine and the Young Ireland rebellion of 1848. He carried with him a strong antagonism towards Great Britain and an equally strong feeling of Irish patriotism. Whether O'Donoghue became an active member of the Fenian Brotherhood at this time, as some authorities suggest, is uncertain, but there can be no doubt that he sympathized with its aims.

In 1868 O'Donoghue met at Port Huron, Michigan, the Oblate Vital-Justin Grandin*, then coadjutor bishop of Saint-Boniface, and offered to serve in the western missions of the Catholic Church. Accordingly he accompanied Grandin to Red River where he became a teacher of mathematics at the college of Saint-Boniface and began to study for the priesthood. A year later he abandoned the soutane to take part in the Métis protest movement organized by Louis Riel in the autumn of 1869. On 16 November he was elected to the first convention of Red River as the representative of Saint-Boniface.

At first O'Donoghue adopted an attitude of moderation, supporting the English-speaking members of the convention in a proposal that the Hudson's Bay Company's Council of Assiniboia should be permitted to continue as the legislative body of the settlement; but on 22 December he helped Louis Riel seize the company's funds at Upper Fort Garry (Winnipeg) and on the 27th he became treasurer of Riel's provisional government. He was elected to the second convention in January 1870 and was confirmed in his appointment as treasurer on 10 February. On the 18th of the same month, he participated, along with Ambroise-Dydime Lépine*, in the capture of a number of Canadians from Portage la Prairie who had planned to overthrow the provisional government.

Nicknamed "Uriah Heep" by his enemies, O'Donoghue was, in fact, less emotional and less timid about bloodshed than Riel. He witnessed the execution of Thomas Scott* but refused to intervene on the condemned man's behalf. He assisted in drafting the first three versions of the Métis List of Rights, but apparently had no hand in the fourth list, carried by Riel's delegates to Ottawa in March 1870. During the remaining months of the provisional government in Red River, O'Donoghue became increasingly dissatisfied with Riel's leadership, which he regarded as too compromising and too pro-British. Nevertheless, he remained with Riel until 24 August, when both he and Riel were forced to flee to the United States, following the arrival of Garnet Joseph Wolseley*'s troops at Fort Garry.

At this point the breach between the two men became an open one. Riel believed that O'Donoghue was more concerned with striking a blow at Great Britain than with relieving the plight of the Métis. This belief seemed justified when, in January 1871, O'Donoghue carried a secret petition to President Ulysses S. Grant asking the United States to intervene in Red River. When Grant refused to act, O'Donoghue turned to the Fenian Brotherhood. He obtained only moral support from the brotherhood, but did succeed in enlisting the active help of two Fenian leaders, John O'NEILL and J. J. Donnelly. Then he drew up a constitution for the proposed Republic of Rupert's Land naming himself as president, and, with O'Neill, led on 5 Oct. 1871 a small force of some 35 men, recruited among the unemployed labourers in Minnesota, across the Manitoba frontier. Riel's influence prevented the Métis from joining him and the so-called Fenian invasion of Manitoba collapsed. O'Donoghue was captured by a group of Métis and taken back to Minnesota.

No proceedings were taken against O'Donoghue in the United States for his filibustering expedition against Manitoba, but in Canada he was expressly exempted from the amnesty granted Riel and Lépine in 1875. As a result of the advocacy of John Costigan*, an Irish-Canadian member of the federal parliament, the Canadian government agreed to extend the clemency of the crown to O'Donoghue in 1877. Following his return to the United States, O'Donoghue had been employed as a teacher in District 13, Dakota County, Minnesota. In 1877 he moved to Rosemount where he ran unsuccessfully for the post of county superintendent of schools. Meanwhile he became engaged to Mary Callan, daughter of James Callan, county commissioner of Dakota County. They were, however, never married. In 1878 O'Donoghue was taken to St Paul where he died of tuberculosis on 26 March 1878. His fiancée died several weeks later on 3 May 1878. The former treasurer of the provisional government was buried in the old St Joseph's cemetery, three miles from Rosemount, the cost of the burial and headstone being borne by his American friends.

George F. G. Stanley

Alexander Begg, Begg's Red River journal (Morton); The creation of Manitoba; or, a history of the Red River troubles (Toronto, 1871). "L'invasion fénienne au Manitoba, un journal contemporain," G. F. G. Stanley, édit, RHAF, XVII (1963–64), 258–68. Dom. ann. reg., 1879, 33, 40, 114, 361. Le Jeune, Dictionnaire, II, 377. J. K. Howard, Strange empire; a narrative of the northwest (New York, 1952). J. P. Robertson, A political manual of the province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories (Winnipeg, 1887), 152. Stanley, Birth of western Canada, 98–174; Louis Riel.

O'HARA, WALTER, soldier; b. about 1789 in Dublin, son of Robert O'Hara and Fanny Taylor; d. 13 Jan. 1874 in Toronto, Ont.

Walter O'Hara's family was from County Galway, Ireland. He graduated in 1806 from Trinity College, Dublin, and took up a military career, serving in the 91st and 47th Foot of the British army and in the 7th Caçadores and 1st Line Regiment of Foot of the Portuguese service. He was twice wounded in the Peninsular War and was perhaps captured after the battle of the Nive. He had "a respectable fortune to expend" in 1826 when he moved to Upper Canada with his wife Marian Murray and settled near York on a farm in what is now the Parkdale district of Toronto. They had a large family.

On 14 June 1827 Peregrine Maitland* appointed O'Hara assistant adjutant general of the Upper Canada militia with the rank of colonel after O'Hara had accepted Nathaniel Coffin*'s invitation to succeed James FitzGibbon*. The post that O'Hara held for 19 years had been created in 1816 when Coffin asked FitzGibbon to work as a clerk in the adjutant general's office. By the time O'Hara was appointed there had been a history of interest in this office and in the composition of the staff by the colonial politicians. When Coffin resigned the post of adjutant general in 1837 O'Hara expected to succeed him. FitzGibbon, however, followed Coffin as acting adjutant general, and in December Richard Bullock* Jr received the post. FitzGibbon and Bullock had wider contacts in the colony outside the militia than O'Hara, who was dismayed at the "anomalous peculiarities of Canadian patronage," by which persons professionally not as well qualified, he felt, but better assimilated into colonial life, were entrusted with the post. He conducted a lengthy correspondence with the imperial authorities in an unsuccessful attempt to redress his grievance. In early December 1837, when William Lyon Mackenzie*'s force gathered north of Toronto, O'Hara led part of FitzGibbon's force that headed north to meet the rebels. Two years later, he asked for a seat in the Legislative Council, but was rebuffed.

In 1846 an act established the province's militia and the post of assistant adjutant general was abolished. O'Hara was not seriously suggested for the new post of deputy adjutant general and appears to have gone into retirement. In 1861, however, when Duncan Macdougall acted as deputy adjutant general for Canada West, he made use of O'Hara's undoubted talents as a staff officer for a brief time.

O'Hara died in 1874 in Toronto, where he had lived from his arrival in Canada except for the years 1841–46 when he lived in Kingston. He was considered as a "chivalrous, high-spirited, warm-hearted gentleman," but he had felt himself victimized in the colony for not receiving the adjutant generalcy in 1837 and for not being regularly employed after 1846. He severely criticized the "exclusiveness of Canadian politics" which, in his opinion, had not allowed him to use his full talents.

Geo. Mainer

PAC, RG 9, II, A1, 2, f.195. PRO, CO 42/470, 119–53. Arthur papers (Sanderson), II, 94. The Gentleman's Magazine: and Historical Chronicle (London), LXXXII (1812), pt.1, 575; LXXXIV (1814), pt.1, 176. Globe (Toronto), 14 Jan., 24 Dec. 1874. Upper Canada Gazette (York), 16 June 1827. Cyclopœdia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1886), 485–86.

O'HEA, TIMOTHY, soldier; b. 1846 in Bantry, County Cork, Ireland; d. November 1874, in the desert of Queensland, Australia.

Little is known of O'Hea's early life or parentage. He joined the 1st Battalion of the Prince Consort's Own Rifle Brigade as a private before the age of 20 and was sent to Canada with his regiment in 1866. On 9 June 1866, during the Fenian uprisings, O'Hea and three other men were guarding a munitions shipment attached to a passenger train carrying 800 German immigrants; the shipment was bound from Quebec to the Lake Erie front. En route, at Danville, in the Eastern Townships, a fire was discovered in the munitions car. The car was disconnected, and before a decision had been made about further action O'Hea took the keys to the burning car from the sergeant in command, opened it, and fought the fire for nearly an hour at great peril to his life. He singlehandedly put out the blaze. On 7 Jan. 1867, at Quebec, he was awarded the Victoria Cross. This was the only instance in which the VC was given for service within Canada and awarded for an act of valour not performed in the presence of an enemy.

Shortly afterwards O'Hea left the army and joined the New Zealand Mounted Police. In June 1874 he moved to Australia where he joined Andrew Hume and Lewis Thompson in a search party looking for a reported survivor of the Ludwig Leichhardt expedition lost some 20 years earlier in the interior of the country. The party set out from Nockatunga station in November, apparently inadequately supplied, and soon met with tragedy. O'Hea and Hume died of thirst; Thompson managed to return to Nockatunga with the report of their deaths. He afterwards led a search party, which found Hume's body but not O'Hea's. O'Hea's body was recovered sometime later apparently by aborigines.

O'Hea is buried at Nockatunga station in Queensland. His VC remained for many years in the National Art Gallery in Sydney, Australia. The gallery was to give it to Canada in 1950, but at the request of Field Marshal Lord Henry Maitland Wilson, Baron of Libya, Canada waived her claim and it was returned to the regimental museum in Winchester, England.

CHARLES A. THOMPSON

PAC, RG 8, I, AI, 1038, pp.47–53. Town and Country Journal (Sydney, Aust.), 9 Jan. 1875. The Australian encyclopædia (10v., Sydney, 1965), II, 331; V, 284; VI, 391. Encyclopedia Canadiana, VIII, 7. A. H. Chisholm, Strange new world; the adventures of John Gilbert and Ludwig Leichhardt (2nd ed., Sydney, 1955), 256–58. "For valour": the V.C.; a record of the brave and noble deeds for which her majesty has bestowed the Victoria Cross from its institution to the present date, ed. J. E. Muddock (London, 1895), 155. Canadian Military Gazette (Montreal), XV, no.19 (1900), 20. A. H. Chisholm, "The V.C. of Timothy O'Hea," Sydney Morning Herald, 25 Feb. 1950. Thomas Dunbabin, "Tim O'Hea's Canadian V.C.," Ottawa Citizen, 10 Aug. 1951.

O'NEILL, JOHN, Fenian leader; b. 8 March 1834 at Drumgallon, County Monaghan, Ireland; d. 7 Jan. 1878 at Omaha, Nebraska, U.S.A.

John O'Neill went to New Jersey in 1848, and after a year of schooling additional to what he had received in Ireland worked at a variety of employments until 1857, when he enlisted in the 2nd United States Dragoons for the "Mormon War." He seems to have deserted and gone to California, where he joined the 1st Cavalry and became a sergeant. He served with this regiment in the Civil War until commissioned in the 5th Indiana Cavalry in December 1862. He showed himself a daring fighting officer, but considered that he did not receive the promotion he merited, transferred to the 17th United States Colored Infantry in the rank of captain, and left the service before the war ended. His marriage to Mary Crow, by whom he had several children, took place about this time.

While working in Tennessee he joined the Fenian Brotherhood, adhering to the party led by William Randall Roberts*, which favoured attacking Canada. In 1866 as a Fenian colonel he led a group from Nashville to take part in the proposed invasion. The person intended to command the operation on the Niagara frontier did not appear and O'Neill took his place. Early on 1 June he led a force, which according to his own account numbered 600 men, across the Niagara River and occupied the village of Fort Erie. The next day he encountered north of Ridgeway a detached column of Canadian volunteers commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Alfred BOOKER consisting mainly of the Queen's Own Rifles, of Toronto, and the 13th Battalion, of Hamilton. In a sharp little fight the Fenians (many of them, like O'Neill, certainly Civil War veterans) routed the inexperienced Canadians, who retreated on Port Colborne. O'Neill withdrew his own force to Fort Erie, where there was a sanguinary skirmish with a Canadian detachment, under John Stoughton Dennis*, which had been landed from a tug. That night, with superior British forces closing in, O'Neill successfully evacuated his men from Canada. Although arrested by an American gunboat which was patrolling the Niagara River, they were shortly released. O'Neill was charged with breaking the U.S. neutrality laws but the charge was dropped.

Ridgeway made O'Neill a Fenian hero. He had won the only success the Fenians ever achieved in their numerous enterprises against Canada. He had handled his force well, and it should be added that he had kept his men under strict control and that there was little looting or disorder. The episode shortly led to the Roberts party of the Fenian Brotherhood appointing him "inspector general of the Irish Republican Army." He took Roberts' place as president at the end of 1867. Negotiations for reunion of his branch of the brotherhood with that formerly headed by John O'Mahony and now led by John Savage failed, and O'Neill proceeded to collect funds and acquire and distribute arms for another Canadian adventure. These activities caused considerable alarm and much defensive preparation in Canada during 1868 and 1869. However, O'Neill's organization had been penetrated by Canadian agents, and in particular one of his staff, Henri Le Caron (Thomas Beach*), was in the employ of Gilbert McMicken*, chief of the Canadian detective police. Early in 1870 O'Neill quarrelled with his "Senate," losing much support. On 25 May, with those portions of the brotherhood still prepared to follow him, he attempted a raid at Eccles Hill on the border near Frelighsburg, Quebec. Ample warning had enabled the Canadian authorities to take precautions. The Fenian vanguard was fired on as soon as it crossed the border, and fled. O'Neill himself was arrested by a United States marshal. At the end of July he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, but with other Fenian prisoners was pardoned by President Ulysses S. Grant in October.

O'Neill renounced the idea of further movements against Canada, but was sought out by William Bernard O'DONOGHUE, a former member of the provisional government headed by Louis Riel* at Red River, and accepted his proposal for an attack on Manitoba. The official Fenian organization rejected the plan; nevertheless on 5 Oct. 1871 O'Neill, with a small number of supporters, seized the Hudson's Bay Company post at Pembina, on ground then considered to be in dispute between Canada and the United States. He was at once arrested by U.S. troops, but was discharged by an American court on the ground that his offence had been committed in Canada. This was his last raid. Seven years later he died of a paralytic stroke while working for a firm of land speculators in Holt County, Nebraska.

It is hard to believe that O'Neill was a man of much intelligence, for the idea of righting Irish wrongs by attacking Canada, of which he was the most active exponent, was essentially stupid. He was egotistical and credulous. He seems however to have been a brave soldier and a sincere Irish patriot. Unlike many Fenian leaders, he was ready to risk life and liberty for the cause he believed in.

C. P. STACEY

John O'Neill was the author of Address of Gen. John O'Neill . . . to the officers and members of the Fenian brotherhood, on the state of the organization, and its attempted disruption (New York, 1868); Message of Gen'l John O'Neill, president, F.B., to the seventh national congress (Philadelphia, 1868); Official report of Gen. John O'Neill, president of the Fenian brotherhood; on the attempt to invade Canada, May 25th, 1870; the preparations therefor, and the cause of its failure, with a sketch of his connection with the organization, and the motives which led him to join it: also a report of the battle of Ridgeway, Canada West, fought June 2d, 1866 . . . (New York, 1870); and a letter in Irish American (New York), 28 Sept. 1867.

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 234–46. G. T. Denison III, History of the Fenian raid on Fort Erie; with an account of the battle of Ridgeway (Toronto, 1866). Irish American (New York), 19 Jan., 2 Feb. 1878. Henri Le Caron [T. M. Beach], Twenty-five years in the secret service (London, 1892). Gilbert McMicken, "The abortive Fenian raid on Manitoba," HSSM Papers, no.32 (1887–88), 1–11. John Savage, Fenian heroes and martyrs (Boston, 1868). DAB.

O'NEILL (O'Neil), TERENCE JOSEPH, soldier, civil servant; b. 1802 in Ireland; d. 21 July 1872 at Gaspé, Que.

Terence Joseph O'Neill arrived in Canada in 1829; he was serving in the British army, a member of the 30th infantry regiment. When he left the army in 1832, he was entitled as a former captain to a land grant. He settled at York (Toronto), and went into partnership with Patrick Burke in a firm of auctioneers.

In 1836 the St Patrick's Society was founded at Toronto, and O'Neill immediately became a member. During a meeting the following year, the president of the society refused to propose a toast to Daniel O'Connell, the Irish leader, and denounced him. O'Neill, after a violent controversy, "could no longer countenance the Orange hypocrites." He therefore left the society's ranks, and a few months later joined William Lyon Mackenzie* and the Reformers for a struggle against the Orangemen. During the election of 1841 he was a campaign worker for Isaac Buchanan*.

Having been appointed, on 14 Aug. 1861, inspector of prisons and asylums in the Province of Canada and in New Brunswick, O'Neill had to live at Kingston for some months each year, but he kept his house at Toronto. His role consisted of making the rounds of these establishments, the most important of which were the Kingston penitentiary and the provincial mental asylum at Toronto.

At this period there was not one of these institutions "whose material resources were complete." Some were waiting for a proper building then under construction, others were occupying quarters ill suited to their purpose, with no hope of getting out of them rapidly. Furthermore, the administration of the penitentiaries lacked firmness: the prisoners bribed their warders, bought on the black market, and indulged in homosexuality. So long as he held the post of inspector, O'Neill made persistent efforts to ensure that work was given to prisoners and that defaulters were whipped.

On 22 May 1868, at the time when a federal commission of directors of penitentiaries was set up, O'Neill was chosen as one of the directors. His great problem was always "What must be done with the prisoners." He accepted the presidency of the commission in 1869, and the following year went to Ottawa to live, with his wife Anne. It was during this same year that the federal government decided to have prisoners work in return for pay; they were thus able to assist their families.

By the time O'Neill died, improvements had been made in the penitentiary system, in particular at Kingston: reforms in discipline and working conditions, improved sanitation in the quarters, separate cells, new buildings. In addition, a reduction in the number of recidivists was apparent. Obviously part of this success is attributable to O'Neill, though it also reflects the prosperity of the country. He was a hard working and well-intentioned official, who had the public interest at heart.

O'Neill died at Gaspé, probably during one of his numerous tours of inspection.

André Martineau

PAC, RG 8, I, AI, 220–21. Canada, Sessional papers, III (1870), pt.1, no.2; IV (1871), pt.6, no.60; VI (1873), pt.6, no.75. Rapport du bureau des inspecteurs d'asiles, prisons, etc., pour l'année 1863 (Québec, 1864), 1–30. Constitution (Toronto), 29 March 1837. Middleton, Municipality of Toronto, I, 181–212.

ONISTAH-SOKAKSIN (Calf Shirt; sometimes called Minixi or Wild Person), leader of the Nitayxkax (Lone Fighters) band of Blood Indians (a division of the Blackfeet), d. in the winter of 1873–74 at Fort Kipp (Alberta).

Calf Shirt was believed to have gained supernatural and ferocious powers from a grizzly bear. A chief who was held in awe by his followers, he, unlike other chiefs, was known for his constant hostility to white traders.

Calf Shirt's name appears first in 1855 when he signed a treaty with the American government on behalf of his band, who commonly wintered along the Belly River. This treaty attempted to establish peaceful relations between the Blackfeet and the United States government, and between the Blackfeet and their enemies, including the Flatheads, Pend d'Oreilles, Kutenais, and Amikwas (Nez Percés). It set aside an exclusive hunting area for the Blackfeet, allowed for the peaceful entry of missionaries and the building of military posts, and provided for an annual annuity of $20,000 for ten years.

In 1865, when two fellow chiefs were murdered by Americans, Calf Shirt led a war party which wiped out a number of pioneers who were establishing a town called Ophir, in Montana Territory. After the raid, plans for building the town were abandoned. Four years later, he tried to kill a Catholic missionary, Father Jean B. Imoda. By 1870, Calf Shirt had become a leading war chief of the tribe, with a personal following of 72 warriors and with 288 persons in his Lone Fighters band.

Initially he had traded with both the British and the Americans, but after his 1865 raid he did business primarily with the Hudson's Bay Company. In 1869, however, Americans built illicit trading posts in the heart of Blackfoot territory (southern Alberta), where they sold whiskey and repeating rifles. During the winter of 1873–74, Calf Shirt visited one of these establishments, Fort Kipp, and was killed by the proprietor, Joseph Kipp, during a dispute about liquor. Calf Shirt's wives, believing he had the power to come back to life as a grizzly bear, began the necessary rituals but were restrained from completing them by other Indians because of the fear they had had for him in human form.

After Calf Shirt's death his band was amalgamated with the Awaposo-otas (Many Fat Horses) band under the leadership of Akakitsipimi-otas (Many Spotted Horses), a wealthy and respected war chief; the new band kept the name of the largest group, Nitayxkax.

Hugh A. Dempsey

H. A. Dempsey, "Blood Indian bands; their identification and history" (unpublished ms in the possession of the author, 1955).

Montana Historical Society Collections (Helena, Mont.), Biographical files, John J. Healy. National Archives (Washington), Census of the Blackfeet Indians, Alfred Sully to E. S. Parker, 16 July 1870. Forest and Stream (New York), 18 July 1903. Fort Benton Record (Fort Benton, Mont.), 31 Jan. 1879. Montana Hist. Soc., Contributions, X (1940), 275. J. C. Ewers, The story of the Blackfeet ([Lawrence, Kansas, 1944]), 39. H. A. Dempsey, "The amazing death of Calf Shirt," Montana; the Magazine of Western History, III, no.1 (1953), 65–72.

O'REILLY, JAMES, lawyer and politician, b. in Westport, County Mayo, Ireland, 1823, son of Peter O'Reilly; m. Mary Jane Redmond in November 1850; d. at Kingston, Ont., 15 May 1875.

James O'Reilly came to Upper Canada in 1832 with his father, who settled in Belleville and there became a merchant before moving to Kingston in 1847. After attending the Hastings County grammar school, James began the study of law with C. O. Benson of Belleville. He continued his studies first with John Ross, then with John Willoughby CRAWFORD and John Hawkins Hagarty*, and was thus introduced to important public men during his training. Called to the bar of Upper Canada in 1847, O'Reilly moved to Kingston. He was a bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada, became a QC in 1864, and in 1870 was admitted to the bar of Quebec. O'Reilly participated in several spectacular criminal cases and, in 1868, successfully prosecuted Patrick James Whelan*, the assassin of D'Arcy McGee*. This trial, a cause célèbre, in which John Hillyard CAMERON acted for the defence, revealed O'Reilly as an able, energetic, and vociferous attorney.

Religion largely explains O'Reilly's political career. President of the Kingston St Patrick's Society, he was an important Catholic layman whose close rapport with the bishop of Kingston, Edward John HORAN, and extensive law practice made him influential throughout eastern Ontario. In 1872, when Catholic leaders insisted on a greater political influence for Catholics, Sir John A. Macdonald* encouraged Catholic Conservatives to run for parliament. O'Reilly responded and was elected MP for South Renfrew in 1872. His term in parliament was uneventful, and in 1874 he declined to seek re-election, claiming that politics interfered too much with his law practice.

O'Reilly served as director of the Kingston and Pembroke Railway. He was an alderman in Kingston from 1850 to 1855, and was its recorder, 1865–69. The town honoured him for raising a militia company during the Trent crisis in 1861. He was anxious to become a judge, and but for his premature death in 1875 he would have preceded John O'Connor* as the first Irish Catholic appointed to an Ontario superior court judgeship.

DONALD SWAINSON

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 188, 194, 204, 228, 339; B (Mackenzie papers), ser.2, 1; MG 27, I, 117 (James O'Reilly papers). PAO, Sir Alexander Campbell papers, 1872. Ottawa Citizen, 1875. Trial of Patrick J. Whelan for the murder of the Hon. Thos. D'Arcy McGee . . . (Ottawa, 1868). Can. parl. comp., 1873. N. F. Davin, Irishman in Canada. Swainson, "Personnel of politics."

OSBORN, SHERARD, naval officer, Arctic explorer, and author; b. 25 April 1822 in England, son of Lieutenant-Colonel Edward Osborn of the Indian army, and of Eliza Todington; d. 6 May 1875 in London, Eng.

Sherard Osborn, nominated first class volunteer in the Royal Navy by Captain William Warren on 30 Sept. 1837, began his career with two long voyages. The first, in 1838–43, was on Warren's ship HMS Hyacinth to the Far East, where he took part in a campaign against Malay pirates in Siam (Thailand) and in Britain's first Chinese war at Canton and Shanghai. The second voyage, in 1844–48, took him to the Pacific on board HMS Collingwood. He was promoted lieutenant on 4 May 1846. Between the two voyages, he spent some months as mate on HMS Excellent at Portsmouth, where he studied gunnery. He profited greatly from these years; his commanding officers cultivated his enthusiasm and talents, and Warren in particular set him an example as a diligent officer and a sympathetic commander.

After leaving Collingwood, Osborn received command of a small steamer, HMS Dwarf, in which he patrolled the coast of Ireland during the insurrection of 1848. He was warmly thanked for his services by local authorities in Ireland and by his own commander-in-chief, and in 1849 he was reported to the Admiralty for gallantry "beyond all praise in remaining by his vessel, the Dwarf, in a sinking state in tempestuous weather."

He returned to England in 1849 to find anxiety about Sir John Franklin*'s missing expedition reaching its climax after the failure of Sir James Clark Ross* in 1848–49. Osborn immediately joined the campaign in favour of a further expedition and volunteered to serve. The Admiralty decided to send out four ships under Captain Horatio Thomas Austin*, and Osborn received command of the 430-ton steamer HMS Pioneer.

The expedition sailed in spring 1850; in the summer its members helped to locate and search the site of Franklin's first winter quarters at Beechey Island; in September the ships were beset and forced to winter off Griffith Island in Barrow Strait. Close at hand were two other expeditions, one commanded by Sir John Ross*, the other by the veteran arctic whaling master William Penny*, who soon became one of Osborn's closest friends. In spring 1851, Osborn led a sledge party southwestward to the western extreme of Prince of Wales Island. This 500-mile journey revealed no undiscovered coasts and other parties covered much greater distances. By far the most important of Osborn's contributions to the expedition were his untiring cheerfulness, and his skilful handling of Pioneer, which proved the superiority of steam over sail in ice navigation. He wrote a popular narrative of the expedition, Stray leaves from an Arctic journal. . . , in which his jovial good humour is everywhere present. Yet the expedition was not altogether a happy experience for Osborn. He often disagreed with Austin, and, when Austin quarrelled with Penny, Osborn made little effort to conceal his much greater respect for the latter. When the expedition returned to England in autumn 1851, Osborn was the only officer whom Austin did not recommend for promotion. A number of his friends, including Penny, wrote to the Admiralty to protest, and Lady Franklin (Jane GRIFFIN), was reported to be upset. Osborn himself remained unmoved, and received the news with a defiant forbearance that was typical: "I am young yet and have room & time enough to win a Post-Captain's commission in spite of Captain Austin or any other Liar in buttons." While the argument continued, Osborn was married, on 8 Jan. 1852, to Helen Harriet Gordon Hinxman.

Meanwhile, the Admiralty decided to send back Austin's four ships with one added vessel, HMS North Star, and they again gave Osborn command of Pioneer. Charge of the whole squadron went to Sir Edward BELCHER.

On arrival in Barrow Strait in summer 1852 the ships separated. Captain Henry KELLETT took two ships to Melville Island, North Star remained as base ship at Beechey Island, and Belcher and Osborn sailed Assistance and Pioneer up Wellington Channel to Northumberland Sound, northwest Devon Island, where they wintered. In spring 1853 Osborn sledged with an officer of Assistance, George Henry Richards*, along the north shore of Bathurst Island and the northeast coast of Melville Island, both previously unexplored. He then parted from Richards and, returning, explored the east coast of Bathurst Island. This journey lasted from 10 April to 15 July and covered more than 900 miles. During July and August the two ships sailed southward, but they were forced by ice to winter again in Wellington Channel. In September 1853 news reached Osborn from the supply vessel HMS Phoenix of his promotion to commander on 30 Oct. 1852. Phoenix also brought out Osborn's brother Noel, who spent the winter as mate on board North Star. In 1854, to Osborn's disgust, Belcher ordered all of his ships except North Star to be abandoned, and the men returned to England in her and in the supply vessels Phoenix and Talbot.

This voyage was undoubtedly the most depressing of Osborn's career. Many of Belcher's officers suffered under his humiliating and dictatorial treatment, but none more than Osborn. In 1853 he complained to Belcher of ill treatment and proposed to refer one difference between them to the Admiralty. From that moment, all the weight of Belcher's wrath fell on Osborn. Richards kept a private journal through 1853–54, which records little else but Belcher's "abuse & insult" and his "malignant hatred" of Osborn. Richards applauded Osborn for "the admirable way he has borne everything," but there is no doubt that the latter's good humour was sorely tested.

After the expedition, Osborn spent a short time in charge of the Norfolk coast guard while he recovered his health. He also began editing Robert MCCLURE's journal of his Franklin searching expedition on HMS Investigator, which was published in 1856 as The discovery of the north-west passage. . . . Early in 1855 he was sent in command of HMS Vesuvius to the Crimean War, where he was promoted captain on 18 Aug. 1855, decorated with the Order of the Bath, awarded the Turkish Medjidie, and made an officer of the Légion d'honneur by France.

The triumph of his return from the Crimea in 1856 was soon marred when his wife, by whom he had had two daughters, left him, or, as he defiantly expressed it, he "got clear of a bad wife by her absconding." (There is no evidence that they were ever divorced.) Yet Osborn was certainly distressed. He was in poor health at the time, and for once he fell to despair: "My Naval career I feel is over," he wrote to Penny. "I had an object and honourable ambition once – it's gone now. I live merely for myself now, and it is little I want." However, he was not yet 35 when he wrote these words, and his long career of naval achievements and unselfish public service had scarcely begun.

In 1857 he commanded HMS Furious and escorted a fleet of gunboats to China, where Britain was again at war. When peace had been concluded, he was active in the development of European trade with China and Japan, and performed, in the words of Lord Elgin [James Bruce*], British ambassador to China, "a feat unparalleled in naval history" by sailing Furious 600 miles up the Yangtze (Ch'ang) River to prove its navigability for much smaller trading vessels. His health deteriorated during this service, and in 1859 he was invalided home. For three years he was obliged to supplement his income by editing some of his journals for publication, and by writing on naval matters, Chinese politics, and Arctic exploration for Blackwood's Magazine. He also contributed papers to the Royal Geographical Society of which he had become a fellow in 1856.

In 1861 he returned to the navy and subsequently began a period of varied activity. He commanded HMS Donegal off the coast of Mexico. In 1863 he took a fleet of ships to Peking in an unsuccessful attempt to cooperate with the Chinese government in the suppression of piracy. In 1865–66 he was agent for the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company in Bombay; in 1867–73 he was managing director of the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company which laid a submarine telegraph cable from Britain to India and Australia. He stood unsuccessfully for parliament in 1868, was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in June 1870, and won promotion to rear-admiral on 29 May 1873.

Polar exploration continued to occupy his mind in this period, however, and he led a successful campaign for the renewal of British Arctic interests. He presented a paper to the Royal Geographical Society in January 1865 arguing for exploration of the unknown region surrounding the North Pole by way of Smith Sound. He repeated his case many times and steadily gained support until, in August 1874, the government agreed to finance the venture, and the expedition of 1875–76 was born. For nine months Osborn, whose health prevented his making the trip, worked with Francis Leopold M'Clintock* and Richards on the Admiralty's Arctic committee advising on preparations for the expedition. On 3 May 1875 he went to Portsmouth to visit George Strong Nares*, commander of the expedition, and his crew. Three days later he died in London, shortly before the departure of the expedition that he, more than anybody, had made possible.

Sherard Osborn was one of the most talented naval officers of his day. Those who knew him paid tribute to his outstanding professional abilities, his courage and determination, his sound judgement, his warm-hearted enthusiasm, and his tireless good humour. He was admired by his fellow officers and by those who served under him. He was steadfast in his opinions, and seldom allowed diplomacy to prevent his expressing them – a feature of his character that brought him into conflict not only with Austin and Belcher, but also sometimes with his closest friends. Lady Franklin, for instance, was deeply upset because he consistently proclaimed Robert McClure – not her husband – as the discoverer of the northwest passage. In addition to Osborn's accomplishments in the field of Arctic exploration, he was a capable administrator, a keen geographer, a prolific writer on many subjects, and an established authority on Chinese affairs; but most of all he was a highly gifted naval officer, a master of all aspects of seamanship.

CLIVE A. HOLLAND

SPRI, MS 116/57/1–10 (ten letters from Sherard Osborn to William Penny, 1850–56); MS 768 (private journal of George Henry Richards aboard H.M.S. Assistance, 17 Aug. 1853–28 May 1854). G.B., Adm., Further papers relative to the recent Arctic expeditions in search of Sir John Franklin and the crews of H.M.S. Erebus and Terror (London, 1855), 187–261. G.B., Parl., Command paper, 1852, [1436], L, 269–935, Additional papers relative to the Arctic expedition under the orders of Captain Austin and Mr. William Penny, 87–103. [McClure], Discovery of the northwest passage (Osborn). Sherard Osborn, Stray leaves from an Arctic journal; or, eighteen months in the polar regions, in search of Sir John Franklin's expedition, in the years 1850–51 (London, 1852); "On the exploration of the north polar region," Royal Geographical Society, Proceedings, IX (1865), 42–70; "On the exploration of the north polar region," Royal Geographical Society, Proceedings, XII (1868), 92–112; "The routes to the north polar region," Geographical Magazine (London), I (1874), 221–25. "Obituary," Geographical Magazine (London), II (1875), 161–70. Times (London), 10, 14 May 1875.

P

PAINCHAUD, JOSEPH, physician and surgeon; b. 23 Jan. 1787 at Quebec, son of François Painchaud, a navigator, and Marie-Angélique Drouin; d. 24 Aug. 1871 at Quebec.

On 9 Jan. 1811, after serving his apprenticeship under Dr James Fisher*, a surgeon attached to the Quebec garrison, Joseph Painchaud was authorized to practise medicine. He was a popular practitioner with the people of Quebec, and from morning to night was to be seen travelling the streets of the city, "usually making his house calls on horseback and wearing long Wellington boots and silver spurs." On 5 June 1815, in the parish of Notre-Dame, he married Geneviève Parant.

In 1820 the Emigrant Hospital was opened in the Saint-Jean district. Painchaud was put in charge of the institution, and practised medicine and surgery there until 1834. In that year the hospital closed its doors, and the patients were transferred to the new marine hospital (called the Marine and Emigrant Hospital), where Painchaud, who had been taken on by James Douglas*, worked until his death [see IFFLAND]. Both by his teaching and by his monetary gifts, he contributed substantially to the progress of the hospital. Thanks to him and Dr Douglas, this institution became not only useful to all Quebec residents, but also "a school of surgery unrivalled on the North American continent." In 1833 Painchaud was named doctor to the community of the Hôpital Général of Quebec, in place of Dr William Holmes. On 29 March 1845, he was one of those who obtained from the government of the Province of Canada the right to establish a school of medicine at Quebec. Painchaud, who had professed obstetrics and epidemiology at the Marine Hospital, gave instruction at the new Quebec Medical School in "the obstetrical art, and [the treatment of] women's and children's diseases."

Throughout his whole career Painchaud endeavoured to develop a team spirit among his confrères. He took an active part in the founding of the Quebec Medical Society in 1826. He was noteworthy for the regular support he gave it, by publishing reassessments and periodical reviews of medical progress in Europe and the United States as well as in Canada. In the same period he was a member of a committee, probably the first, whose purpose was to recommend the setting up of a minimum schedule of medical fees, based on "three different rates for house visits, surgical operations, and deliveries and attendance on board ship." As he also had been on the Quebec Medical Board since 1831, and had presided over it for many years, he had considerable influence with his confrères, governments, and in councils and medical societies. On 31 July 1831, as the most senior "licensed" doctor present, Painchaud was invited to preside at "the general meeting of the licensed doctors, surgeons and midwives living in the district of Quebec, a meeting called by a proclamation of His Excellency the governor in chief." In 1837 the government of the country entrusted him with the post of commissioner responsible for supervising the application in the Quebec region of "the ordinance to prevent unlicensed persons from practising medicine and surgery in the province of Quebec or midwifery in the cities of Quebec or Montreal."

In 1844 Painchaud started a new medical association intended to "give assistance to needy doctors unable to practise their profession either because of advanced age or because of infirmities, or to aid the widows and children, the latter until the age of 21." This plan came to nothing, but in 1846 the doctors and surgeons of Lower Canada met at Trois-Rivières, to set up a society to ensure the regulation, control, and defence of medicine. Dr Painchaud argued vigorously in favour of such an organization, and outlined the reasons for the creation of a college of physicians and surgeons, pointing out in particular that the city of Quebec possessed all the institutions necessary in this respect. "Our hospitals," he stated, "are open to students, and above all we have a Marine Hospital, the leader of the whole province, which for surgery is unequalled on this continent, and which alone attracts students from the four corners of the province." Finally Painchaud's initial proposal, that of 1844, was some years later to "give birth to the Canadian Medical Association."

Joseph Painchaud, an influential member of the most important medical associations in the province, enjoyed great prestige and made a substantial contribution to the evolution and development of Canadian medicine. To relieve the sick, to improve the teaching of medicine, to create and develop hospital establishments: these were his daily concerns.

CHARLES-MARIE BOISSONNAULT

PAC, RG 4, B28, 48, 9 June 1811. Ahern, Notes pour l'histoire de la médecine, 231, 237, 309, 421, 456. C.-M. Boissonnault, "Création de deux écoles de médecine au Québec," Laval médical (Québec), 39 (1968), 547–49. C.-A. Gauthier, "Histoire de la Société médicale de Québec," Laval médical (Québec), 8 (1943), 84–110, 117. Ignotus [Thomas Chapais], "La profession médicale au Canada," BRH, XII (1906), 147–50. Sylvio Leblond, "L'hôpital de la Marine de Québec," L'Union médicale du Canada (Montréal), mai 1951. P.-G. Roy, "L'Hôpital des émigrés du faubourg Saint-Jean à Québec," BRH, XLIV (1938), 200–2.

PAPINEAU, LOUIS-JOSEPH, lawyer, seigneur, politician; b. 7 Oct. 1786 at Montreal, son of Joseph Papineau* and Rosalie Cherrier; d. 25 Sept. 1871 at Montebello, Que.

The Papineau family had begun to emerge from obscurity with Louis-Joseph's father, Joseph Papineau, a surveyor and notary, who on occasion constructed mills and managed seigneuries. He was a politician who himself became a seigneur by purchasing the seigneury of Petite-Nation from the seminary of Quebec in 1802. This acquisition, which was to prove profitable, improved the social status of the Papineau family and coincided with the rise of the liberal professions in French Canadian society. It is therefore not surprising, in view of the central role played by the Papineau, Viger, Dessaulles, Cherrier, Bruneau, and other allied families in the society and politics of Lower Canada, that Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* should have denounced the political ascendancy of this family clan during the 1840s. Whether or not these family groups tended to form a "family compact," they none the less influenced the political destiny of Lower Canada and Quebec throughout the 19th century. The family was, after all, perhaps the most powerful institution in French Canadian society. Louis-Joseph Papineau was born at a time when the values attached to the monarchy and nobility still exercised a potent attraction, and when the acquisition of a seigneury remained a mark of social advancement. The transition from the position of his grandfather, Joseph Papineau, a farmer and cooper, to his own status as a dignified seigneur could not be achieved without a painful psychological adjustment.

A gradual penetration of bourgeois values into the society had its effect on Papineau. Towards the end of the 18th century certain groups, chiefly connected with trade, began to define political and social power in terms of economic criteria. Their attitude towards wealth – the authentic source of prestige and power in their eyes – differed fundamentally from that of the traditional élites, but as years went by it was to acquire an even greater vigour and appeal. It was also in this period that the inferiority of French Canadians in the commercial and industrial sectors really became apparent; the British had become the main holders of wealth and were responsible for the spread of bourgeois values. Papineau's formative years were thus lived amid a changing mentality. His contradictory attitudes, a blend of open hostility and fascination, towards the search for profit that characterized the businessmen and the British, certainly date from this time. "They alone," he wrote about the British, "have the breeding, the fortune necessary for entertaining. No Canadian family can do it. . . . The resources of the country are devoured by the newcomers. And although I have had the pleasure of meeting among them educated and estimable men, who are glad to see me, the thought that my compatriots are unjustly excluded from sharing in the same advantages saddens me when I am at their gatherings. . . ." His ambiguous attitudes with regard to capitalist and seigneurial ownership, individual and collective rights, also illustrate his profound ambivalence towards what the bourgeoisie represented. The son of the notary Joseph Papineau did not join the ranks of the bourgeoisie immediately.

In fact the young Louis-Joseph Papineau was subjected to social pressures of another order. In many respects his family differed little from most peasant families, where the importance of the clan predominates. The family not only provided values and attitudes, it was also a source of prestige. The bonds of affection between its members did not, however, prevent rivalries from abounding. Papineau was to be profoundly marked by this family climate, which he never questioned, at least consciously. In this domain he showed uncompromising loyalty to tradition. For him the family environment was one of affection and security, a refuge if need be from a hostile society. It did not stifle the individual or render him unproductive.

Among the strong influences on Papineau, that of his father and mother was particularly significant. In the few letters the latter has left, she appears strong-willed, cold, at least outwardly, authoritarian, and unswervingly devout. No doubt she loved her children, but her affection bore an austere mask. It was obvious that Papineau would react against the conception of life and religion exemplified by his mother. His subsequent break with Catholicism and his search for a more optimistic vision of the world would indicate as much. Nevertheless, he never succeeded, despite his efforts, in liberating himself from this basic pessimism, which was perhaps innate but which was fortified by his education. He remained all his life an austere man who never attained the moderation and smiling scepticism taught by certain writers whose works he read. His choice of a wife who projected an image rather like his mother's may be considered significant.

His father, a meticulous man, inclined to be gruff and uncommunicative, seems to have shown more benevolence and indulgence in his dealings with his children, particularly with Louis-Joseph, who was also his mother's favourite, according to John Charles Dent*. It is certain that Joseph Papineau did not possess great religious fervour. He renounced Catholicism, probably during the 1810s, and did not return to it until shortly before his death. It should be noted that in addition to having been among the minority who favoured establishing parliamentary institutions, he had proved to be one of the most influential members of the House of Assembly. His efforts to adapt to new institutions and his activity as a member of the house certainly influenced the subsequent choices made by his son. Joseph Papineau was not a radical: he was a monarchist who professed a very moderate liberalism.

Once his primary education was completed, Louis-Joseph Papineau entered the college of Montreal, directed by the Sulpicians. In 1802, following an incident that brought him into conflict with the authorities, his parents sent him to continue his studies at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec. This institution did not aim, any more than the previous one, at forming revolutionary minds, or even minds merely inclined to innovation. The teaching programme could not have been more traditional. The supremacy of Latin was maintained, and the teaching, by its content, was directed towards the rejection of the heritage of the 18th century. Fear of the French Revolution and of its ideas animated the teachers. The cult of authority and obedience sustained an aristocratic and hierarchical vision of society. In a period when parliamentary institutions were opening the way for changes in political behaviour, these clerical establishments imposed on their pupils the theory of the divine right of absolute monarchy. Despite their leniency towards him, it is unlikely that his masters allowed Papineau to make the works of Voltaire, or the Encyclopédie of Diderot and d'Alembert, habitual reading. These books were probably in his father's library. At the seminary, Papineau had the reputation of being a gifted pupil, not much of a worker but a great reader. He was even active within the Congrégation de la Sainte-Vierge. He was to state at the end of his life that he lost his faith at the seminary of Quebec. But in 1833 he praised his father "for the courage he showed in keeping me despite myself at the seminary"; and in 1804 he wrote to his young brother, Denis-Benjamin*, whom he urged to study: "Never have I felt more than I do now what I owe to the seminary." It does not seem that his stay at the seminary of Quebec was marked by open revolt and brutal ruptures. The truth is less obvious and more complex: neither on the religious plane nor elsewhere do his choices appear to have been clear and final.

When he left the seminary in 1804, Papineau hesitated long as to what career to choose; in that respect he was like many graduates of the time, who were ill prepared by the environment and by their education to adapt themselves to social change. In fact the choices were few: once a student had rejected the priesthood, only the liberal professions were open to him. But would Papineau's instability have allowed him to find full satisfaction in a profession even in a more diversified society? He first decided to become a notary, then, modifying his choice, he opted for the profession of lawyer. He received his legal training at Montreal, in the office of his cousin, Denis-Benjamin Viger*, complaining as he did so that he no longer had the time to read. Once authorized to practise law in 1810, he carried on his profession intermittently, and continued to make his dissatisfaction heard. In 1816 he wrote to his brother: "In truth, I am very much a slave at this moment, and that does not endear me over much to a condition with which I was disgusted, but what is to be done?" It was in this period that he began to celebrate the nameless hopes and joys of rustic life. In 1809 he had been elected to the assembly for the county of Kent, thus starting a long political career that was not to come to an end until after 1850: he represented the counties of Montreal West (1814–38), Surrey (1827–28), Montreal (1834–35), Saint-Maurice (1848–51), and Deux-Montagnes (1852–54). No doubt politics allowed him to express certain aspects of his personality, but they left him unsatisfied, eager for the day when he could live in the country with his family and books around him. Yet when he was confined to activities which up to then had been more means of escape than of personal development, the exalted seigneur of Montebello was not to find peace, any more than the disappointed lawyer and the flattered political leader. The sources of his fear were within him: Papineau was and remained an eternal discontent.

Papineau entered the assembly at the height of a political crisis, which had begun in 1805. This crisis, which was unquestionably new, had been marked by the emergence of French Canadian nationalism and political parties. The economic, demographic, and social changes of the first decade of the 19th century were felt as a mortal threat by the elements which were becoming conscious of the existence of a "Canadian nation." The liberal professions, in association with the small merchants, devoted themselves at that time to the defence of the traditional French Canadian institutions and opposed the English merchants, the public servants, the American immigrants, and the so-called "French Canadian traitors." The former, however, went beyond the stage of passive resistance, and, through the intermediary of a political party whose main base was at Quebec, they shaped a strategy and theories which were eventually to give them power and control of patronage. The idea of ministerial responsibility supported this intention, to which the clergy and the old seigneurial families took exception. During the 1810 crisis, a rift was opened between the clerics and the new political élites.

Although his father had warned him against the "so-called reformers" and the "demagogues," and had suggested that he vote on questions according to their merit, Papineau joined the Parti Canadien. The settling of the political crisis in 1810 precipitated the end of the leadership of Pierre-Stanislas Bédard*, and was the beginning of a period during which various claimants disputed for the right to lead this party. Bédard's protracted rancour against the Papineaus suggests that at bottom the latter had little interest in a comeback of the former leader. The conciliatory policy of the governor, Sir George Prevost*, would serve young Louis-Joseph Papineau's ambitions. Its aim was to silence the extremist elements or remove them from the direction of the party. François-Xavier Blanchet*, Gabriel-Elzéar

Taschereau*, Andrew Stuart*, Louis Bourdages*, and Jean-Baptiste-Amable Durocher* did not succeed in commanding attention at a time when Papineau appeared as a moderate. James Stuart*, the most serious candidate, came into direct collision with the governors, and, as Bédard said, could not claim to be a "true blue Canadien," although he was a friend of the "Canadiens." In 1815 Papineau was elected speaker of the House of Assembly, which gave him a salary of £1,000 a year. He was already appearing as the real successor to Bédard.

On 29 April 1818 Papineau married Julie Bruneau, daughter of Pierre Bruneau, a Quebec merchant and an MHA. In the preceding year he had bought the seigneury of Petite-Nation from his father. Despite the rivalries of all kinds which plagued the Parti Canadien, his authority continued to grow with the ever increasing concentration of problems in the Montreal region. The crisis of 1822 over union was to add to his prestige and authority. The merchants' party, previously in a minority in the house, had submitted to the London parliament a bill aimed at bringing about a political union of the St Lawrence valley, an essential condition for the launching of a programme of economic development, and the assimilation of the French Canadians. There was violent opposition in Lower Canada; Papineau and John Neilson* went to London in 1823 to prevent the adoption of such a measure. The groups opposed to the plan of union may have had varying motives, but Papineau and Neilson none the less appeared as the representatives of an extraordinarily large majority of the population. Their mission had relatively little effect on the course of events in England, where the government, in the face of the energetic opposition of certain members of the House of Commons, deemed it wise not to reintroduce the bill, but they nevertheless had the credit for the decision. Papineau, moreover, was able to exploit for political ends the fear generated by this plot, attributed to business circles. On his return he had no difficulty in resuming his position as speaker of the assembly, which Joseph-Rémi Vallières* de Saint-Réal had occupied during his absence.

In 1826 the Parti Canadien became the Patriote party. Not only did it reinforce its regional and local bases, while remaining first a Montreal party in which the Papineaus, Vigers, and Cherriers enjoyed great influence, but it also acquired an organ, the newspaper La Minerve, to be directed by Ludger Duvernay*. Papineau's authority, despite the rivalries that continued in the party, increased as the party's objectives became more extreme. The party brought together "the most diverse elements: the French Canadian middle bourgeoisie, a few English liberals, the Irish, farmers of American origin who had settled in the [Eastern] townships, and the French Canadian peasant classes." Defections were severely punished, and rivals ruthlessly thrust aside. In this connection, Thomas Frederick Elliot wrote in 1835: "I have never seen anyone who appeared more skilled than this Canadian speaker in the contrivances and comportment by means of which a single man dominates the minds of a large number, and he becomes more rooted every day in his authority, as they in their obedience. Such is the man whom a small number of his supporters have the presumption to believe that they can discard when he is no longer useful to them. . . . One look from Papineau would subdue all his Canadian flock." Papineau had thus arrogated to himself the authority he enjoyed, but the authority itself rested on a consensus much less conscious than the one of which the Patriote Abbé Étienne Chartier* spoke in a letter written to Papineau in 1839: "Your misfortune, sir, is to have been spoiled as a result of the extraordinary influence and fame which the Canadiens have deliberately conferred on you, by all flocking round you, and by raising you upon their shoulders, in order that by this fictitious grandeur you might tower above all the Tory luminaries."

The practice, after 1830, of systematic obstruction, which was intended to force the English government to adopt the reforms sought, was imposed by Papineau. But within the Patriote party a wing of authentic liberals was talking about revolutionary action, and placing more and more emphasis on social transformation. La Fontaine, one of Papineau's lieutenants and already one of those aspiring to succeed him, had clearly felt the ambiguities in the ideology of the party and of its leader. In February 1837 he wrote to Henry Samuel Chapman*: "People have reconquered their natural independence by having recourse to arms, and by letting the earth drink the blood of their oppressors. . . . To stir up peoples, one must not rest content with debating purely abstract questions. Something more solid is required. One must touch the sentimental part: the purse. So long as a question of this nature is not raised, agitation cannot be constant and lasting. In the circumstances, I see no question more calculated to lead to this end than the abolition of seigneurial rights. Apart from the seigneurs and the government, everyone desires it, whatever their shade of political opinion. I am therefore firmly resolved to bring this proposal up for discussion at the opening of our next session. . . . The government, the seigneurs and the hauts petits aristocrates of both parties will no doubt oppose it; but the masses will unite and act in concert." Basically, the problem raised by La Fontaine revealed a conflict, still latent, between the dominant element, represented by Papineau, which wished to change the political system without interfering with the social structure, and an active but minority group seeking to bring about a political and social revolution. The Papineau group was firmly opposed to any institutional change, whether it concerned the seigneurial system, or the customary law of Paris, or even the status of the clergy. Thus, when the prospectus for the newspaper Le Patriote canadien, of which Duvernay was publisher, appeared, Papineau wrote to his wife on 29 April 1839: "So long as there is not national representation, which can remedy abuses in provincial, civil or ecclesiastical institutions, we are giving arguments to the government abroad so that it can abruptly destroy structures which, contained within proper bounds, will protect Canadien interests, and which, if overthrown by the fanaticism of Protestants or philosophers, will be so for the benefit not of the people but of those in power." The opposition between the two groups of Patriotes was due not only to differing views of strategies, but also to differing ideologies.

The thinking of a man so unstable as Papineau, and a politician into the bargain, is not easy to describe. If he tended to act as though moved by the most absolute disinterestedness, the purest patriotism, and rigid obedience to sacred principles, he was none the less inclined to present the image of the great democratic liberal battling against obscurantism, corruption, and the oppression exercised by reactionary colonizers greedy for wealth. It was for this cause that he would have willingly agreed to sacrifice his tranquillity and his happiness. This view of him – his own – which was accepted by many people at the time and subsequently, belongs more to myth than to reality. In Papineau, the nationalist, when he was not using new ideologies to support conservative objectives, was usually at war with the liberal and the democrat.

Papineau had taken up French Canadian nationalism as he had found it at the time of Bédard. This nationalism was at first pledged to the defence of linguistic rights and traditional institutions, which were in no way liberal and democratic, quite the contrary. In this connection Papineau, when weighing up the principal achievements of the House of Assembly, wrote: "The ecclesiastical institutions of the country would have been reduced to nothing, the notariat debased, not a single Canadien would be at the bar, and landed property would have been taxed to fatten a crowd of tax-collecting Europeans, if the administration had not been checked by the resistance of an elective Assembly." This judgement revealed more than a state of fact, it expressed a permanent element of Papineau's politics and thought.

Papineau had read the philosophes of the 18th century and the liberal thinkers of his day, and he declared himself a supporter of their doctrines. By his declamations against medieval feudalism, against nobles and aristocrats of all times, even on occasion against the descendants of the old French Canadian seigneurial families, Papineau might appear a bitter adversary of the old regime. His eulogies of the authors of the American Declaration of Independence and of the Declaration of the Rights of Man in France implied that he was in favour of a conception of property as individual and absolute and opposed to the feudal conception. In reality he remained throughout his life a supporter of the seigneurial regime. He would never admit openly that France had introduced feudal servitudes as well as seigneurial servitudes into Canada, and that the regime served as a support for a hierarchical and aristocratic society. This attitude might be explained by the fact that he was a seigneur himself. But Papineau saw in seigneurial tenure not only a traditional but also a national institution. Indeed in 1855 he wrote to Eugène Guillemot, the former French minister to Brazil: "My father had bought the seigneury he sold to me, being prompted and impelled by the desire to save the remains of our Canadien nationality from being stifled by the English government. Systematically the latter denied land to the Canadiens and lavished it upon the men of their own race, but placing it under the operation of English laws, pettifoggers' traps that would have swallowed up our compatriots who were unfamiliar with them." A year earlier he had attacked the Rouges: "The Rouges are hastening their bondage by their anticlericalism and their antiseigneurial attitude, for the clergy and the seigneurs are the country's safeguard." According to him the role of the seigneurial system had been to procure land free for the French Canadians and to protect them against the British, particularly against the merchants, who considered land as property of the capitalist type. Seen in this light the seigneurial system was supposed to act as a brake on the mobility of landed property and on speculation. Instead of concentrating property in a few hands, this system, according to Papineau, tended to divide up the land equally between individuals. The seigneur was not therefore a large landowner to whom a mass of censitaires were subject, but the unremunerated architect of equality. If the enormous abuses committed by the seigneurs of Lower Canada were pointed out to him, Papineau replied that the system had deviated from its intentions, and that all that was necessary was to restore its original purity by legislative and judicial means.

After 1830 Papineau became a democrat. Influenced by Thomas Jefferson and by Jacksonian democracy, he considered North America the natural site for the development of a republic of small landowners. "Canada," he declared in 1833 in one of his speeches, "a country which is impoverished by the harshness of its climate, and in which laws and customs have always favoured the equal division of property, rejects substitutions, condemns the privileges of primogeniture, and should be the last place where such an inept measure should be attempted." Seeking to reconcile his democratic ideas and his attachment to the seigneurial system, Papineau tried to show that the Canadian temperament, the seigneurial system, and democratic ideology all pointed towards the same goal: equality of conditions. This rationalization concerning the seigneurial system and its social intentions was a pure creation of the mind, which was accepted by numerous supporters of the Patriote party. But the liberal wing of the party could not but come into conflict with Papineau on this point. The break occurred after the failure of the first insurrection in 1837. Robert NELSON wrote at that time: "Papineau has abandoned us, and has done so for personal and family motives related to the seigneuries and his inveterate love for old French laws." This uncompromising attachment for the seigneurial regime shows that Papineau was not prepared to consider a recasting of civil law. Despite the admiration that he professed for the Code Napoléon, it is clear that he could not accept the conception of property that had served as a basis for this legal revolution. Papineau recognized it himself: he was a liberal and democrat in politics but a conservative in regard to the "sacred right" of property. No better definition of economic and social conservatism can be found. By refusing to interfere with the seigneurial system, he sanctioned the status and economic privileges of the clergy.

Papineau's thought hardly obeys any formal logic. It fluctuates in accordance with his likings and aversions, conscious or unconscious, with his ambitions, his own interests and those of the people he represented. Canon Lionel Groulx* even speaks of a "nebulous incoherence of thought" that increased with age. All this tallies indifferently with the claims of Papineau, who posed as a rationalist philosopher and never missed an opportunity to point out the strictness and firmness of his principles. This rigid but poorly connected thought, which might be considered the product of conscious opportunism, reflects the complex personality of the man. His religious ideas in particular reveal his profound uncertainty. Gradually, after leaving the seminary of Quebec, Papineau drew away from Catholicism. While still believing in God, he finally rejected all revealed religions. It is obvious, although this is not the chief explanation for his religious evolution, that the influence of the 18th century philosophes and of the La Mennais of Paroles d'un croyant was of capital importance. He found in their works, as well as a stimulus to his anticlericalism, the kind of arguments that would confirm his religious, political, and moral attitude. Violently anticlerical, he showed himself to be also a sharp critic of religious education, the privileges of the church, and the union of church and state. Thus, in the 1831 session, Papineau strongly supported the "notables bill" introduced by Louis Bourdages, which proposed to allow almost all the inhabitants of a parish to share in the administration of the parish council. He denounced the attitude of the members of the clergy who "claimed that they constituted within the state, in civil society, among citizens who were all subject to the laws, a privileged, independent order . . . , and that they could dictate how a part of the fruits of the labour of citizens should be employed." Around 1836, he proposed to place university teaching within the responsibility of "national representation" (i.e., the state): "put under civil, lay control, with full and complete tolerance for all, this establishment [the university] will produce incalculable benefits; under the direction of ecclesiastics of one persuasion or another, such an establishment could not and will not be so liberal." When he returned from exile, he was to declare himself still more an enemy of nobles, priests, and kings, who were naturally in league against liberty and tolerance in all its forms. The Canadian clergy's attitude towards the Parti Canadien and the Patriote movement, and their close association with the state, no doubt helped to increase Papineau's anticlericalism. His religious experience was however accompanied by an authentic questioning of part of the Catholic heritage which had been handed down to every French Canadian of the period. To a certain extent, Papineau, as a political leader, attempted to adjust social institutions to his political and religious beliefs. He certainly envisaged society as a lay society, with churches separate from the state. He put forward and supported several measures with this design in mind. But in this domain he appears to have been surprisingly timid for an avowed liberal. In reality Papineau feared that by modifying the status of the Catholic Church he would play into the hands of the real or supposed enemies of the French Canadian nation.

Papineau saw in Catholicism a national institution, possessing, therefore, the same protective virtues as seigneurial tenure. If he saw the latter as French Canada's buckler against Anglo-Saxon capitalism, the Catholic Church appeared to him as the safeguard of this same nation against the Church of England – "the ally of the persecution that had been contrived against Canadiens" – and against a "Protestant" government. Thus, in 1826, when Papineau, in the debate on the bill that proposed to grant Protestant dissenters the right to keep registers of births, marriages, and deaths, took up the cudgel for the Presbyterians, Methodists, and Jews in the name of religious liberty, it was clear that his first object was to undermine the claims of the Church of England. In that connection, he wrote to his wife: "The fact is that there was an offensive and defensive alliance between Mr. Mountain [Jacob Mountain*, the Anglican bishop of Quebec], and Mr. Sewell [Jonathan Sewell*, the attorney general of Lower Canada], directed against the political and religious rights of Catholic Canadians and of all Protestants other than those who wanted to follow Mr. Mountain." A true liberal, in these matters, would rather have spoken of the responsibilities of the state than utilized arguments drawn from liberalism to defend and extend the privileges of the churches. The truth is that Papineau always closely associated Catholicism and the French Canadian nationality: "I admit, however," he wrote about his cousin in 1821, "that as a neighbour I should have little liking for Bishop [Jean-Jacques Lartigue*], for fear he . . . should take it into his head to preach at me. But as for the progress of the establishment of the Canadien clergy, since their interests are bound up with all other Canadien interests, I would resign myself to this inconvenience, as well as to all the others that I would not like to put up with as a private person but that I accept as a public figure."

Papineau was hurt by the incomprehension of the Catholic clergy, who saw in him only a liberal and a democrat dangerous for the church, and he reproached them for equating "sovereignty of the people" with the overthrow of catholicism, for confusing popular sovereignty and national sovereignty without realizing that their real influence must be based upon the support of the French Canadian nation. In a letter to his wife, dated 9 Nov. 1835, he said: "They [the priests] are either knavish or irresponsible when they fail to see that there is one maxim the English government will never give up, namely the need to denationalize us in order to anglicize us, and that to accomplish this end they attack our church with no less ardour than they do our laws, customs, and language." His obsession with England so obscured Papineau's thinking that he postponed until later, perhaps to the day of independence, the pursuit of his liberal objectives in politico-religious matters. Meanwhile the clergy, under the aegis of Bishop Lartigue, were adjusting their ideology to the new age, without liberalizing it, and undertaking a struggle that in a few decades was to ensure them social supremacy. Papineau did not understand these innovations. Even after his return from exile in 1845, he continued to make similar declarations which, it must be said, were not inspired only by the desire to take back power from La Fontaine. Thus, in 1848, he declared in a public speech: "Our clergy come from the people, live in and for the people, are everything for the people, nothing without the people. Here is an indissoluble alliance. Here is a unity that is strength. . . . Here is a pledge of indissolubility for a nationality. . . . As a politician, I repeat that the agreement and affection between our clergy and our people has been and always will be one of the most powerful elements in the preservation of our nationality." These words throw light on the social conservatism of Papineau, which was incompatible with his religious liberalism. It is here that the contradictions of the man really appear: a deist, he remained nevertheless a prisoner of the social institution, the Catholic Church.

To this social conservatism, of which the seigneur of Montebello, attending church to set a good example to his censitaires, was the symbol, was added an economic conservatism. Certainly Papineau had felt the influence of the French physiocrats, who, opposed though they were to the feudal system, had exalted the prime importance of agriculture in the French economy; but that is not enough to explain his particular emphasis. His economic conceptions were clearly dominated by the idea that the vast majority of French Canadians lived on the land and took a very small part in important commercial activities. For him, agriculture was the predominant economic activity, and any economic policy must proceed from that fact. In a word, the vital objective of French Canadians must be to acquire the land, making use of the framework most suited to its equal distribution and to a humane society: the seigneurial regime. His social ideal was the small farmer, virtuous and, perhaps, enlightened.

Papineau's hostility to commerce was no doubt rooted in tradition, but it also resulted from the fact that large-scale trading was controlled by the British, who were promoters of capitalism in all its forms. He believed that they were endeavouring to build an economy and a society in which the mass of the French Canadian proletariat, both urban and rural, would be dominated by a minority of men of large property of British origin. It was against this eventuality that he fought. It would be pointless to see in him a socialist. When he criticized English tenure and English common law, it was these tendencies that he was condemning. When he objected to the establishment of government registry offices, it was always through fear of the same dangers. Papineau came to the point where he pictured the English business bourgeoisie as an aristocracy of wealth, and therefore an artificial one, which was aspiring to reinstitute in Canada a society founded on inequality. "It seems to me," he said during the debate on the Ninety-two Resolutions in 1834, "that there is nothing baser than the English nobility who come to us in this country, so eager are they to place themselves and to enrich themselves." As his democratic ideas became more deeply rooted, Papineau, the seigneur, saw the merchant classes more and more as the product of an aristocratic plot fomented by England herself. Thus, in objecting to the timber trade, to massive investments in transportation, which was undergoing a total upheaval, and to banks, he had the feeling that he was working against those responsible for the economic bondage of the French Canadians, and he believed also that he was doing away with a developing aristocracy. After recommending to the population that they withdraw their money from the banks, he declared in December 1834, before the electors of Montreal West: "They will call that destroying trade, whereas in reality it will merely be escaping from enemy hands to fall into friendly ones. Producers will continue their habits of work and economy, the only important sources of a country's wealth. Whether there are banks or not, there will not be one acre more farmed, or one acre less. From the moment that there is a surplus of exchangeable produce, the European capitalists, in view of the profit they would derive from it, will have it bought up." This attitude towards banking institutions recalls that of the Jacksonian democrats. In reality the resemblances are only superficial.

This stand is surprising in a man who professed to be the disciple of Adam Smith and Jean-Baptiste Say. In practice, Papineau had retained from his reading of the two economists only their philosophy of free trade. By taking fragments of their thought, he was able, in addition to acquiring allies in England, to combat the protective tariffs on Canadian timber and grain. He needed an effective weapon against the business world, where his chief political opponents were. Finally, even his belief in free trade reveals the ultra-conservatism of his economic thought.

Papineau's nationalism was therefore strongly rooted in his economic and social conservatism. Even on the religious plane, his aims and liberal aspirations were compromised by this dominant attachment to tradition. Seen in this perspective, his political liberalism and his adherence to democratic ideology raise similar questions, for it seems difficult to reconcile fundamental conservatism and doctrinaire liberalism. When we try to determine the roles that these two facets of his thought were called upon to play, the contradiction can be partly resolved. It is clear that in accepting French Canadian nationalism, such as it was at the time of Bédard, Papineau was at the same time endorsing the political strategy which, in order the better to protect the traditional institutional and cultural heritage, aimed at the assumption of power by a "truly national élite." Even if Papineau tended to present himself as the "national leader" and the authorized spokesman of the French-Canadian nation's aspirations and interests, he none the less remained the real representative of a more restricted section of society. His strong ties with the liberal professions, which were aspiring to power and the benefits of patronage, are in this respect most significant. His presentation of himself as a man of principle above factions, as a pure symbol of a will towards national regeneration that was beyond all the pettiness of daily action, came both from his personality and from the image of himself that he wished to project. Papineau, despite a gift for oratory which would have enabled him to put himself on the people's level, was not by inclination a popular speaker. The great majority of his speeches were intended for a more educated group. His political friends even reproached him with not maintaining steady contact with the populace. Thus, when he spoke of the "people" and the "nation," he referred more to a minority that knew the real needs of the worthy masses. His liberalism was therefore in the last analysis bourgeois or even aristocratic. In this sense he belonged to his century.

When Papineau entered politics in 1809, he shared the unbounded admiration of the Lower Canadian élites for British institutions. Montesquieu, Voltaire, and several other 18th century philosophes had already extolled the merits of the English constitution. The English were moreover the first to see in their political institutions a matchless achievement. Papineau wrote: "My education is more English than French. Indeed it is in the English publicists and in the writings of public men that I have studied the English constitution." He took part in the war of 1812 as a militia captain, for at that period Papineau refused to accept republicanism and democracy after the French or American manner. He remained an ardent monarchist, although he had broken with the absolutist tradition. His attitudes towards the "aristocratic branch" may not be clear; on the other hand his belief in the primacy of the "popular branch" grew stronger over the years. From the beginning of his political involvement, his place was among the Reformers. Certainly one can see here the influence of John Locke in particular, but there were other and more varied influences working upon him. Basically, he looked to the constitutionalists and to active politicians, both in the colonies and in England, for the justification of political choices that he had already made. It is in his nationalism that one must seek the principal source of his reform attitudes. During the debate on the Ninety-two Resolutions in 1834, Papineau analysed the political evolution of the colony before the Quebec Act, and noted: "At that period, there were men who claimed their rights as men and as British subjects. It was recognized that there were principles conforming to the law of nations that could not be violated; that there was a population possessing laws, a religion, a language, customs, and institutions that must be preserved." His main interpretation of the granting of parliamentary institutions can be placed in exactly the same perspective: the English government, he declared in 1833, "had just published some sound maxims. They should have added practice to theory, and have given us a political structure by means of which we could have repulsed the assaults attempted against our institutions." According to him, the constitution of 1791 was supposed to give Canadiens a political instrument destined to ensure the survival of their culture and institutions. On the other hand, according to him, the working of these institutions after 1792 had attributed a kind of supremacy to the governors, the officials of British origin, and the English merchants, who had formed an alliance with the two French Canadian groups least conscious of national objectives: the clergy and the old seigneurial families. In his opinion, the political structures had been manipulated by elements that were hostile to or little aware of the real interests of the French Canadian nation. As to the actual representatives of the nation sitting in the assembly, their influence was almost nil. It was because of this subjective way of looking at the balance of political forces that Papineau accepted the idea of the responsibility of the executive. The aim of those who subscribed to this thesis was to get the real power into the hands of those whom he was to call later "the national representation." After his rise to the leadership of the Parti Canadien in 1815, Papineau, always with this perspective in mind, brought the struggle to bear on the control of public funds. While attacking the French Canadian nation's enemies on all possible fronts, he made the voting of supplies the priority question in his political strategy. Behind the discussions of principles and constitutional theories, Papineau, whose interests were linked to those of the liberal professions, led the fight for the conquest of political power. His movement, which was based on liberal ideas, was in essence primarily nationalist. It was this surface liberalism that won him the cooperation of the English radicals.

Until around 1830, Papineau remained convinced the British institutions constituted a perfect framework for the survival and development of the French Canadian nationality. It was sufficient to model the local constitution on that of England, and allow it to evolve according to the same principles. Moreover, the fact of belonging to the empire was a guarantee against the United States, and in general against American influence. In his mind, the good faith of Britain could not be called in question. The opponents of the French Canadians, he thought, resided in Lower Canada. They were at times the governors, ill counselled by their entourage, but particularly the highly placed officials and the merchants. For him, certain groups within the French Canadian nation, such as clerics and nobles, represented a danger, for they did not understand their true interests. There were also those who, for personal motives, rallied to the side in power. If he thundered against all these types of people, he never questioned the validity of the bonds that united Lower Canada to the mother country. Already in 1823, however, on his trip to England, he was struck by the aristocratic character of English society and the poverty of the urban masses, and began to ask himself questions. In Lower Canada too, economic and social uneasiness was spreading discontent in the rural milieux. The overcrowding in the liberal professions, and the instability of the lower bourgeoisie in country districts and towns, also suggested the need for more radical political action. The influence of the Paris revolution of 1830 was another invitation to take a more extreme stand. Increasing social tensions were having a hardening effect in all sections of society. Papineau let himself be carried along by this prevailing mood, which worked in his favour. It must be said that the growth of his ambitions coincided with his successes. Despite the concessions made by England, the beginning of the 1830s saw the stepping-up of demands. Papineau's thought tended to turn in another direction.

From that time on Papineau believed in the existence of a plot between the mother country herself and the internal enemies of the French Canadians, the object being the complete subjection of the latter by the implantation of an aristocratic society in Lower Canada. In December 1834 he declared in Montreal West: "No nation ever knew how to govern another. The affection of the Bretons [affections bretonnes] for Ireland and the colonies has never been anything more than the love of pillaging Ireland and the colonies, which had been abandoned to exploitation by the Breton aristocracy and its creatures." This criticism of the aristocratic character of the British constitution, directed particularly against the Legislative Council, on which sat representatives of the business world, became more and more extensive as the struggle for power became more bitter. In March 1836, after William Lyon Mackenzie*, the leader of the Upper Canada Reformers, and Marshall Spring BIDWELL, the speaker of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, had sent Papineau extracts of the instructions given to the commissioners made responsible for inquiring into the situation in Lower Canada, he violently attacked the English colonial system: "It is only to place in the colonies junior men whom they do not know what to do with in the mother country, it is only to ensure for itself a European influence, that the old colonial regime is preserved. . . . In the Canadas, as in all the other colonies of England . . . there cannot be elements from which to make up an aristocracy or seeds out of which to raise one." Quite obviously, Papineau was seeking to prove that the colonial system was an instrument, by which British institutions could be used to ensure economic, political, and social control for an aristocratic minority imported from Great Britain. His rejection of English institutions was only partial, and to the extent that they served his political objectives he was loyal to them. "There will be found," he wrote, "in the English publicists, in parliamentary histories, in the speeches of [Charles] Fox and others, sublime maxims concerning public law and liberty . . . the enemies of the Canadien name who want to give such narrow limits to English liberty would do much better to go and read them. . . . It is therefore essential for us to recognize in this source the institutions that suit us and that can never be taken from us. From the time that we have belonged to England, we have had the right to institutions as democratic as hers. An attempt has been made to give us an aristocracy, and the system has proved not to be applicable."

Papineau's past distrust of the United States now gave place to unstinted admiration for American institutions. In 1832 Papineau declared himself a republican. The influence of Jacksonian democracy on him is not in doubt; that of Jean-Jacques Rousseau and later of Charles-Alexis-Henri Clérel de Tocqueville is also present. American democracy was, according to him, the reflection of a sort of state of nature peculiar to America. After the American revolution, "pure republicanism" supposedly had flourished in New England, and subsequently spread to all the new states. "But what has been the progress of the United States?" declared Papineau in 1834 during the debate on the Ninety-two Resolutions. "As new agreements have been formulated everything has tended towards democracy. It is therefore in the nature of things that under a government where the influence of birth has been destroyed, where the influence of fortunes is weak . . . it is natural . . . that there should be no privileged classes. . . . If therefore all the changes in this part of the world have been conducive to the establishment of the democratic system, and if those states which have been the last to be established in the west are the most democratic of all, it is evident that this is an order of things special to America, and that one cannot create an aristocracy there."

At bottom Papineau, while retaining from the English constitution what served his political strategy, was to draw from the American model a theoretical justification for the radical transformation of the Legislative Council. The latter would need to be elective because of the fundamentally democratic character of the society of Lower Canada: "The ministers have tried to bring the aristocratic principle into full operation in the Canadas, whose social constitution is essentially democratic, where every one is born, lives and dies a democrat; because every one is an owner; because every one has a small piece of property; because we come into the world, live, and will die in a country that is side by side with the United States." By means of ministerial responsibility, the Patriote party and Papineau would have made sure of the control of the executive and the public service; through an elected Legislative Council and the extension of the elective principle to lower levels, the party would have dominated the second legislative branch and the other sources of power. In the light of this naturally democratic society, where the seigneurial regime, the customary law of Paris, and the privileges of the church would still exist, one can understand that Papineau's opponents should question his real objectives. They would certainly not feel that their economic interests and those of the country would be in good hands if Papineau gained his ends.

The idea of instituting by peaceful means a Lower Canadian republic, of which he would naturally be the president, took shape after 1830. By the practice of obstruction, and in particular by the systematic refusal to vote supplies, Papineau proposed to force the British government to bring about radical changes. Nevertheless, in 1834, as is shown by his speech to the electors of Montreal West, he would presumably have been satisfied with a statute allowing a large measure of autonomy, within the empire, for Lower Canada: "A local, responsible, and national government for each part of the Empire, as regards settlement of its local interests, with supervisory authority held by the imperial government, to decide on peace and war and commercial relations with foreign countries: that is what Ireland and British America ask for; that is what within a very few years they will be strong enough to take, if there is not enough justice to give it to them." The Ninety-two Resolutions introduced in the House of Assembly on 17 Feb. 1834 were intended to make clear Papineau's aspirations and political ideas. These resolutions, prepared by a small committee composed of Papineau, Elzéar Bédard*, Augustin-Norbert Morin*, and Louis Bourdages, contained a summary of the principal grievances of the house and of its most important requests: control of revenue by the legislature, responsibility of the executive, and the election of legislative councillors. In the following year, when a certain number of Patriotes contemplated without apprehension the possibility of a violent confrontation, Papineau wrote: "We will not withdraw the requests we have made for the full measure of our political powers and rights. . . . We hope, but with some unease, that the British government will give us justice. In this hope we will do nothing to hasten our separation from the mother country except to prepare the people and make them ready for an age that will be neither monarchical nor aristocratic." This weakening of the belief in normal political strategies on the part of the Montreal Patriotes continued until 1837, when London, by adopting the resolutions of Lord Russell, categorically rejected the Patriotes' requests, which it deemed excessive. This formal refusal precipitated a confrontation that rapidly took on the character of a revolutionary movement.

Papineau's behaviour during the 1837 insurrection is not very easy to explain. His conduct appeared more ambiguous than ever, and he also took care to destroy the documents that he knew to be compromising. He warned his subordinates to do likewise. After the event, he maintained the following argument: the Patriotes did not intend to revolt; the government, in order to crush them the more effectively, had forced them to defend themselves; and he himself had advised against any recourse to arms. He also declared that he had had no connection with the Banque du Peuple, thereby admitting the justice of the accusations made against that institution. He said that it was only on his way through Saint-Charles that he had gone to the assembly there, and that he had left Saint-Denis at the beginning of the fight only at the express request of Wolfred Nelson*. According to his interpretation, he was supposed to keep himself in a safe place in order to be able to act as a negotiator in case of a defeat. It is obvious that, taken as a whole, this explanation does not stand up against a serious examination of the facts.

During the months of April and May 1837 the Patriotes put their strategy into shape. Unanimity does not seem to have prevailed among them. The radical wing, dominated by people such as Nelson, Cyrille-Hector-Octave Côté*, Édouard-Étienne Rodier*, Amury Girod*, and Thomas Storrow Brown*, certainly opted for openly revolutionary steps. On his side, Papineau represented the more prudent and moderate elements, and appears to have favoured more complicated tactics: that while opinion was being prepared for an armed struggle, action should in the first stage be kept within the bounds of "constitutionality." He thought that by stirring up the population and boycotting taxed products, the English government would finally be forced to give way. Under Papineau's direction, the Comité Central et Permanent du district de Montréal, reorganized on 15 May 1837, was to coordinate the action of the Patriotes throughout the entire province. If however these methods proved ineffective, he would then agree to the use of force. In this contingency, armed revolt was not to take place until December, after the freeze-up. On 10 May 1837 Papineau drew up two wills. In 1839, Abbé Chartier wrote: "It is unfortunate that Lord Gosford [Acheson*] did not put off his attack until after 4 December, the day for which all the leaders received notice to be at Saint-Charles, and when you would have had to sign a declaration of independence: you would not have to defend yourself today against the charge of not wanting a revolution because no contradictory document exists." Abbé Chartier added that he had himself destroyed a note sent by Papineau to the Patriote Jean-Joseph Girouard*. As well as having been widely known among Lower Canadian Patriotes since at least June 1837, this plan had also been communicated to the revolutionaries of Upper Canada.

Similarly, the relationships between the Banque du Peuple, or certain elements of it, and the revolutionary movement are still less clearly established, but they seem more and more plausible. In November 1839 Abbé Chartier wrote: "As for money, was not the Banque du Peuple, which had been in existence barely a year, universally understood to have been established for the purpose of the revolution, and in order to help it? Is it not this motive, which the shareholders skilfully made known, that underlay the rapid success which came to this most patriotic establishment? The cowardly directors of this bank, they too, will have a terrible reckoning to face on the day when payments are due, and they do not seem even to suspect it." Several of the directors and shareholders, the majority friends and relatives of Papineau, were involved in one way or another in the revolutionary events. Before leaving Montreal, Papineau was in continuous contact with his cousin Louis-Michel Viger*, the president of the bank. Questioned in 1840 by Abbé Chartier on his relations with this institution, Papineau replied "that he had always been opposed to setting up the Banque du Peuple, and that he had predicted to Louis-Michel Viger that it would be the tomb of his popularity and even of his patriotism." In short, he did not deny the connections between the bank and the movement. Abbé Chartier ended with the words: "I was very glad to learn that he had nothing to do with this bank, which has so much disappointed the hopes of Canadians." It should also be noted that, during the insurrections, the rumour circulated that if the Patriotes triumphed this institution would become the "national" bank, and the other banks would be eliminated. Likewise, the sudden arrival of Édouard-Raymond Fabre*, one of the directors of the bank, at Saint-Denis, just before the battle, his conversation with Papineau, and his no less sudden departure, raise a number of questions. Charles Dansereau declared in 1840: "To the best of my knowledge, no one came to tell P. [Papineau] and O'Callaghan [Edmund Bailey O'CALLAGHAN] to slip away, and to say that it was Dr. [Wolfred] Nelson's orders. If there had been some one to send Papineau and O'Callaghan away, it could only be Mr Fabre. . . ." Truth to tell, all of this can only serve to supply material for a hypothesis which, if verified, would allow us to uncover certain minority but powerful interests that influenced the course of the revolutionary events, and most probably the supreme commander.

Once the series of great assemblies in the six counties got under way, Papineau quickly lost control of a number of the revolutionary leaders, who openly preached revolt and sought to direct the movement towards a revolution of a social character, which no doubt the directors of the Banque du Peuple and Papineau scarcely desired. For his part, Papineau, even if he recommended sticking to legal means, encouraged initiatives of a revolutionary character by what he said. This was how the Association des Fils de la Liberté came into being: divided into two sections, civil and military, it "reproduced the double intention of the plan of resistance" advocated by Papineau. This surge of agitation reached its highest point at the time of the great assembly at Saint-Charles, which on 23 Oct. 1837 issued a declaration of the rights of man. Papineau went to Saint-Charles accompanied by an armed escort. A few days earlier Papineau's wife had told her son Lactance, a student at Saint-Hyacinthe, that his father might visit him after the assembly. This assembly truly marked a turning-point. For the radical elements it constituted a virtual declaration of independence and the beginning of a trial of strength between them and the government. As for Papineau, he still urged the use of peaceful means. Forgetting the revolutionary nature of several resolutions passed on that occasion, he later reproached the radicals for having prompted the government, by their behaviour, to intervene before the moment appointed for the uprising.

After the Saint-Charles assembly, Papineau's behaviour appears more and more ambivalent. Indubitably he was afraid. In particular the way the liberals acted frightened him, but at the same time served his ends. His interviews with Denis-Benjamin Viger, before his forced departure from Montreal, are significant of the conflicts within the man himself. The government's decision to arrest the leaders and intervene militarily forced him to go to the Richelieu valley. Once he got to Saint-Denis, he acted both as supreme commander, distributing generalships, and as the leader of the civil section. It was probably at the time when these civil and military sections were set up that arrangements were made, perhaps at the direct or indirect suggestion of Papineau himself, to provide cover, in the event of an emergency of a military nature, for the two promoters of the civil section: Papineau and O'Callaghan. Seen from this angle, the visit, after the arrest of Louis-Michel Viger, of Édouard-Raymond Fabre, who no doubt had important news to transmit, may merely have hastened the departure of the two men. Once in the United States, Papineau travelled under an assumed name. Meanwhile he had forgotten his role as a negotiator.

The months that followed marked the break between Papineau and the extreme radical elements of the movement [see NELSON]. The Patriote leader had met influential Americans, who were ready to back a retaliatory expedition. This plan was not adopted at the assembly of refugees held at Middlebury, Vermont, because Papineau refused to accept a declaration of independence involving the abolition of seigneurial rights, customary law, and tithes. His intransigence, more than differences over strategy, explains the profound disagreement that gradually divided the refugees. It is possible that the religious question also counted for something in this conflict. Dr Thomas Fortier, of Gentilly, wrote to Duvernay in 1840: "I am neither a Jesuit nor a bigot; but when one wants to revolutionize an ignorant people, one must be acquainted with its spirit and not offend its prejudices, but rather utilize them as a stimulus – your railing against the clergy and the tithes has spread terror among this body, they have taken alarm; they have had the idea that you would follow the course of the French revolutionaries, that you would despoil them; [Robert] Nelson's proclamation did not reassure them." It is obvious that Papineau was linked with those Patriote elements, clerical or anticlerical, that closely associated religion and nationality. The attitude of Jean-Philippe BOUCHER-BELLEVILLE, who stated around 1840 that anticlericalism was no longer justifiable, since all the parish priests had become nationalists, is significant. That Papineau should have supported the endeavours of Abbé Chartier, who was seeking to modify the anticlerical fever among the refugees, is also revealing. Thus the gap widened more and more between the two groups. Papineau consequently kept aloof from any invasion plan, at the same time as he tried to obtain the support of the French, Russian, and American governments. The insurrection of 1838 took place without his participation. He was opposed to the venture, yet he did not protest when the leaders of the second rebellion used his name as a rallying cry to stir the population to revolt. His brother-in-law, Théophile Bruneau, wrote to Duvernay on 11 Oct. 1838: "I warned Papineau that I had taken the oath of allegiance to Nelson's provisional government, and that I was a member of the secret societies of Albany. . . . I told him further that we were going to use his name freely everywhere, except in the matter of money. . . . So use his name with discretion in New York, I am certain we shall not be disavowed by him."

From the spring of 1838 on, the refugees' hostility towards Papineau increased. Not only did they reproach him with having abandoned the cause, but they attributed to him more and more responsibility for the failure of 1837. Several went so far as to talk about his flight from Saint-Denis. Côté spoke of exposing him publicly. But several refugees tried to stop an action that would harm the movement, because of Papineau's extraordinary popularity among the people. In October 1839 Dr Antoine-Pierre-Louis Consigny wrote to Duvernay: "No one blames Papineau more strongly or detests him more heartily than I do; but for the sake of the cause, I believe it is better to keep silent than to try to lay low the arrant poltroon who is the principal source of all the evils that have weighed so heavily on the country since 1837." After the failure of the second insurrection, the refugees, convinced that Papineau's presence in the United States was a basic obstacle to any revolutionary plan, worked out a plot to get him away to France. Papineau was to win French sympathy for the Lower Canadian cause. On 8 Feb. 1839 he sailed from New York for Paris.

His stay in France, where his wife and three of his children went to join him, produced no political result. Until 1845, Papineau lived there poor and most often alone, but following Canadian events with great interest. He sometimes worked at the Bibliothèque Nationale or the archives, where he copied and had copied documents relating to the French period. He had contacts with liberals, socialists, and even Irish nationalists, and visited Italy and Switzerland. It was not until 1845, two years after his wife's return to Canada, and because of her insistence, that he finally decided to end his exile; he had obtained a full amnesty a year earlier. It was also because of pressure exerted by his wife, and by a certain number of his friends, that he turned towards politics again in 1848. For some time, once he had been elected MLA for the county of Saint-Maurice, he maintained friendly relations with the La Fontaine group. But soon the inevitable divergences came to the surface. Papineau did not readily tolerate being one man in a crowd, and his political beliefs appeared irreconcilable with those of his chief La Fontaine.

To begin with, Papineau refused to accept the union of the Canadas, which he regarded as a disgrace. For him the future, since the defeat of 1837, lay rather in the direction of annexation to the American republic. Though his nationalism remained as uncompromising as before, he proclaimed more loudly than ever the strength of his democratic beliefs. It is true that the notion of annexation to the United States occasionally led him to question himself as to the repercussions that this fusion into the great American universe might have on French Canadians. In this connection, he had written to his wife in May 1838: "But Canadiens are so much an unusual people on this continent, that it is painful to think of the necessity of a dispersal in which they would not recover the combination of circumstances that has given them their moral and religious habits, their language, their laws, and a nature as happy, gay and sociable as theirs is. There is no Englishman who does not derive the greatest advantage from settling in any part of independent America, or who has not the most legitimate reasons for doing so. For such people emigration leaves no true cause for regrets." But these momentary misgivings rapidly disappeared before the unbounded admiration that he had for American institutions, and before his hatred of "aristocratic England." Socially and even culturally, Lower Canada, once it had become an American state, would have in his estimation every chance of flourishing in this prophetic environment. Since Papineau could not approve of the abolition of the seigneurial system, which the supporters of La Fontaine demanded, his conflict with the latter gave rise to violent attacks on both sides. As for a number of Papineau's former collaborators, among them Wolfred Nelson and Duvernay, they now considered the future of Lower Canada to lie within the empire. What was more important, they commanded the support of public opinion, both from the élites and from the masses. Ministerial responsibility seemed to them the best solution to the French Canadian problem as a whole. Beaten, Papineau still supported the annexationist movement of 1849, but gradually withdrew from politics. From 1852 to 1854 he was an MLA for the county of Deux-Montagnes, but he did not stand in the election of 1854. During the last part of his life, he devoted his time to his seigneury at Montebello.

After his return from France, Papineau had renewed contact with his seigneury. The prospects of development had become good because of the growing number of censitaires and the possibilities in the area for lumbering. From then on Papineau took an active interest in his fief. Certainly he was not the seigneur that he dreamed of being: the protector of the good, happy peasant and the guardian of equality. He looked after his interests with care, prosecuted recalcitrant censitaires, and utilized for his own benefit the rich resources offered by the forests that covered a great part of Montebello's 178,000 acres. As one might expect, he objected with the utmost vigour to the movement in favour of the abolition of the seigneurial system. Just before 1854, disregarding his past prejudices because he was afraid to lose part of his possessions, he even went so far as to ask that his fief be converted into free and common socage.

Papineau had always wished to live in the country, with his wife and surrounded by his books. By his marriage with Julie Bruneau he had had three boys and two girls, but only the two latter remained by his side. Ezilda and Azélie, who was to marry Napoléon Bourassa*, had like their mother no wish to live on the seigneury. In order to attract them, and perhaps imbued with the desire to project a magnificent image of himself, Papineau built a luxurious manor-house. Yet he did not succeed in conquering their repugnance. This last period of his life was marked by frustrations and domestic misfortunes.

Politically he changed little. He continued to denounce responsible government as a hoax, and the advent of confederation as one more attempt to perpetuate English monarchical and aristocratic institutions in Canada. The movement that produced the Institut Canadien, of which he was an honorary member, seemed to him more promising, but it did not satisfy him fully. He expressed his disagreement with the antiseigneurialism and anticlericalism of this movement, which in reality was only a small minority group, no doubt a very active and noisy one, but one that was incapable of making common cause with the great mass of people that bowed to the conservatism of the liberal professions and to an ultramontane clergy. From 1850 until his death in 1871, Papineau, without succeeding in solving his contradictions, remained the prophet of annexation and democracy. To the great indignation of the priest of the parish, the seigneur of Montebello refused to return to the faith of his youth and died loyal to his deist convictions.

FERNAND OUELLET

[An exhaustive bibliography of materials on Papineau would have to mention most of the large series of documents covering at least 1810–50. Only the most essential items are listed here. The best source is doubtless the ANQ. The Collection Papineau, which in 1961 was one of the richest private collections in Canada, provides the basis for any study of Papineau. His letters to his wife for the period 1820–62 have been published in APQ Rapport, 1953–55, 187–442; 1955–57, 255–375. Julie Papineau's correspondence from 1823 to 1862 has also been published in APQ Rapport, 1957–59, 55–184. At the ANQ there is as well: QBC, Procureur général, Événements de 1837–1838; the papers of Ludger Duvernay; and a copy of the correspondence of Charles-Ovide Perrault* in the Édouard-Raymond Fabre papers. The National Library (Ottawa) and the PAC also have some Papineau papers, mostly correspondence. Other archival collections are also important.

At the ASQ, the Verreau collection includes the Viger papers which give much interesting information in the series of manuscript volumes by Jacques Viger* entitled "Ma Saberdache".

At the PAC, the following papers are useful: MG 24, B1 (Neilson collection); B6 (Denis-Benjamin Viger papers). The large series of official correspondence and correspondence of the bishops also provide information, and to trace the career of a man in public life special attention must be given to the numerous newspapers of the period.

Papineau's "Histoire de l'insurrection du Canada," published in Paris in May 1839 in the Revue du Progrès, is also an important historical document. F.O.]

Several biographies of Papineau have been published: Eve Circé-Côté, Papineau, son influence sur la pensée canadienne; essai de psychologie historique (Montréal, 1924). L.-O. David, Les deux Papineau (Montréal, 1896); L'honorable Ls.-Jos. Papineau (Montréal, 1872). Alfred Duclos de Celles, Papineau 1786–1871 (Montréal, [1905]). Robert Rumilly, Papineau (Montréal, [1944]). Benjamin Sulte, "Papineau et son temps," Mélanges historiques, Gérard Malchelosse, édit. (21v., Montréal, 1918–34), XIII.

For complementary information the following should be consulted: Papineau; textes choisis, Fernand Ouellet, édit. (Cahiers de l'institut d'histoire, 1, Québec, 1964). Gérard Filteau, Histoire des Patriotes (3v., Montréal, 1938–39). Lionel Groulx, Notre maître le passé (3 sér., Montréal, 1924–46), 1 (3^e éd.), 189–213; 2 (2^e éd.), 69–133; 3, 245–54. A. R. M. Lower, Colony to nation; a history of Canada (1st ed., Toronto, 1946). Edgar McInnis, Canada, a political and social history (new ed., New York, 1961). Monet, Last cannon shot. Fernand Ouellet, Histoire économique; Louis-Joseph Papineau, a divided soul (Canadian Hist. Assoc. Historical booklets, 11, Ottawa, 1961). Marcel Trudel, L'influence de Voltaire au Canada (2v., Montréal, 1945). Mason Wade, Les Canadiens français de 1760 à nos jours (L'Encylopédie du Canada français, III, 2^e éd., 2v., Ottawa, 1966), I. Fernand Ouellet, "Les insurrections de 1837–1838: un phénomène social," SH, no.2 (November 1968), 54–82; "Papineau dans la révolution de 1837–1838," CHA, Report, 1957–58, 13–34; "Papineau et la rivalité Québec-Montréal (1820–1840)," RHAF, XIII (1959–60), 311–27.

PARÉ, JOSEPH-OCTAVE, secular priest, canon, secretary of the bishopric of Montreal; b. 16 May 1814 at Saint-Denis-sur-Richelieu, L.C., son of Léon Paré and Marie-Angélique Grenier; d. 20 Jan. 1878 at Sault-au-Récollet, Que.

At his baptism Joseph-Octave Paré received the first name of Bishop Joseph-Octave Plessis*. In 1827 he began his classical studies at the seminary of Saint-Hyacinthe, and spent his last year at the seminary of Quebec. Having decided on the priesthood, he subsequently studied theology at Saint-Hyacinthe and taught at the same time, as was customary. He was pleased to be able to say that Alexandre-Antonin Taché*, the future archbishop of Saint-Boniface (Man.), was one of his pupils.

Joseph-Octave Paré had already become valuable to Bishop Jean-Jacques Lartigue* at the secretariat of the bishopric when he was ordained priest on 22 Sept. 1838. In 1841, when the cathedral chapter was instituted, he became its chief canon, and in the same year accompanied the new bishop of Montreal, Ignace Bourget*, to Europe. Before returning to Montreal, Bourget made Paré and Michael Power* his chargés d'affaires, with the mission of obtaining from the Colonial Office a written statement that the secretary would undertake not to obstruct the steps being taken by Bourget to set up an ecclesiastical province in Canada. Having done this, Power and Paré went to Ireland to recruit English-speaking priests for the diocese and to consult the bishops on various points of discipline.

In 1856 Paré returned to Europe to visit the great basilicas of the old continent, and to determine which one might serve as a model for the future cathedral of Montreal. St Peter's in Rome was his choice. He then had the thankless task of collecting the funds for this undertaking.

Being solely responsible for the secretariat from 1845 to 1876, Paré knew Bishop Bourget more closely and over a longer period of time than did any other person. The two men were not always of the same opinion. If the bishop of Montreal accepted his secretary's views on singing, the liturgy, and the plan of the new cathedral, he disagreed with him as to the measures to be taken to finance the construction of the edifice. However, Paré always carried out Bourget's decisions with unimpeachable fidelity.

Joseph-Octave Paré was remarkable for the perseverance and good humour with which, for nearly 40 years, he served Lartigue and Bourget. He took an active part in the charitable work, the labours, and the successes of Bourget, whose humiliations he also shared. In the spring of 1877, when Bishop Bourget retired to the Saint-Janvier residence at Sault-au-Récollet, Paré went with him. It was there that on 20 Jan. 1878 he died, attended by his venerable friend; he was buried in the vaults of the cathedral at Montreal.

The chorus of praise that was heard at his grave, which Bourget has preserved for us in a biographical account, bears witness to the fact that his contemporaries had understood the magnitude of the services rendered by Joseph-Octave Paré to the cause of the church in Montreal.

Léon Pouliot

ACAM, RCD, 137; RDM, 7; RLB; 901.079. J.-B.-A. Allaire, Histoire de la paroisse de Saint-Denis-sur-Richelieu (Canada) (Saint-Hyacinthe, Qué., 1905). [Ignace Bourget], Mémoire pour servir à l'histoire du chapitre de la cathédrale S. Jacques de Montréal (Montréal, 1882), 157–70; Notice historique sur la vie de M. Joseph-Octave Paré . . . (Montréal, 1878). Léon Pouliot, "Mgr Bourget et la reconstruction de la cathédrale de Montréal," RHAF, XVII (1963–64), 340–62, 471–89; XVIII (1964–65), 30–38.

PARENT, ÉTIENNE, journalist, lawyer, member of the assembly, public servant, and essayist; b. 2 May 1802 at Beauport, L.C., son of Étienne-François Parent and Josephte Clouet; d. 22 Dec. 1874 at Ottawa, Ont.

The name of Étienne Parent is less famous than those of political personalities who were his contemporaries, such as Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU or Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*. A few flattering terms applied to him are all that remain: the Victor Cousin of America, the Nestor of the press. Paradoxically, there is as yet no biography of him, and one can only speculate as to the reasons for this silence. Is it because the major part of Parent's work consists of innumerable newspaper articles, and that articles are less accessible to curiosity than books or texts of speeches? Or is it that the debates for which Parent's generation felt such passion have lost their brilliance, dimmed by the stormy ideological conflicts of the second half of the 19th century? Or is Parent's "moderation" responsible for the less arresting quality of his thought by comparison with the exalted rhetoric of the leaders of the 1837–38 rebellion? No doubt varying degrees of probability can be attached to each of these hypotheses, but it seems that the relative oblivion into which he has slipped is due above all to the fact that the essential function of his ideas was to give inspiration, and less credit has been accorded to them than to the political and social achievements of which they were the source.

In fact, Étienne Parent's thought dominated the first half of the French Canadian 19th century. This man incarnated as did no one else the ambitions of a new social type, that of the intellectual and political élite, which at the turn of the 19th century was replacing the gentleman class of landowning seigneurs, and, along with the ecclesiastical leaders, resolutely taking hold of the destiny of the French Canadian people. He was to be called "Père Parent," so much did he appear to be a prototype and an example.

Robust shoulders, a sturdy neck, a massive head with a high, broad brow framed in thick hair, an authoritative, even bitter mouth, clamped tight upon unshakeable convictions, eyes whose unwavering look passed beyond an invisible audience, preoccupied it would seem to outdistance his thoughts in order to hasten the affirmation of conclusions already foreseen, desired, and decided upon: such is the impression given by the clear lines of a portrait of Parent in his maturity. A mere glance at this face makes one forcibly aware of certain essential characteristics of the personality: assurance, sturdiness, and determination. One feels, before learning it through the written word, that Parent was a man of the soil; that before handling ideas he had handled oxen and plough; that this reflective look had long been accustomed to the horizons of a countryside full of promise. It is no surprise to learn through his son-in-law Benjamin Sulte* that he was "endowed with a Herculean constitution"; that he could "work 18 hours a day"; that "he produced by himself almost as much as all the journalists of Quebec put together." One may furthermore easily accept that all his gifts were intellectual, and that he was awkward or clumsy in society. Moreover, all his life he suffered from an inability to talk readily. The essence of Parent's life is that he transcends his period by his intelligence and frankness. He was one of the first to give thought to the destiny of French Canadians. With unrivalled lucidity and vigour, he defined "national" objectives which were to sustain not only his generation but succeeding generations for more than a century.

Through two centuries of ancestors, Parent had his roots in the soil of Quebec. He belonged to the sixth generation of Parents in Canada. The forebear, Pierre Parant, who came from Mortagne in Perche, France, emigrated to New France on 9 Feb. 1634 with a group of settlers brought by Robert Giffard*. Following him, an uninterrupted line of Parants or Parents farmed the land on which he had settled at Beauport, some miles down river from Quebec on the north bank of the St Lawrence.

Étienne Parent was the eldest of a family of 15 children, nine boys and six girls. As soon as his age permitted, he helped on the farm and attended a primary school at Quebec. His intelligence attracted attention. Although his parents were not rich, in 1814, when he was 12 years old, they sent him to the college of Nicolet for his secondary education. He had as fellow-students a future bishop, Charles-François Baillargeon*, 16th bishop of Quebec, and a future judge, Charles-Elzéar MONDELET. He spent five years at Nicolet. He was studious and methodical, and won several prizes. Each summer he became once more the young farmer turning his strength to the labours of the fields. In 1819 he left Nicolet, and went to the seminary of Quebec to continue his studies. The teaching at the seminary was strongly influenced by the Cartesianism perpetuated in a textbook of the old régime, La Philosophie de Lyon. The ideas of Bonald enjoyed great popularity there, and much store was set by Bossuet's Discours sur l'histoire universelle. Students' exercise books of the period reveal that instruction in history disparaged France and praised England. Young Parent read all the books available in the library, and those lent by certain teachers. His memory was prodigious, and, according to one anecdote, he had among other feats learned a lecture on Bossuet by heart. He stood out from his comrades by the soundness of his judgement, his literary bent, and the precision of his ambitions. He was considered a young man who "gave promise of living by his pen" – an unusual phenomenon in his time.

The opportunity came his way when he was still at the seminary. Times were alarming for French Canadians. The threat of a union of the two Canadas had been voiced in 1805 and again in 1807; a first proposal had been put forward in 1810. Governor Sir James Henry Craig* had suspended the newspaper Le Canadien in 1810. About the same time Papineau and John Neilson* joined the Parti Canadien, and in 1817 Le Canadien was revived; it was called the "Petit Canadien" to distinguish it from the "Grand," which had existed from 1806 to 1810. At the seminary, Parent struck up a friendship with Augustin-Norbert Morin*, who contributed to the Petit Canadien. Morin obtained the collaboration of Parent, who published his first articles in the paper in 1819. Even before the end of his studies, Parent's career was under way. The seminary, however, had other ideas, and forbade this activity. For that reason or some other, we do not know, Parent left the seminary in 1821, on the eve of his final examinations. His family then offered him employment, which he accepted, with a maternal uncle, Michel Clouet, a hardware merchant on Rue Buade in Quebec. This task soon wearied him, and he decided to return to the family farm to help his father in the fields. There in August 1822 destiny came to seek him: the owner and the editor of Le Canadien, Dr François-Xavier Blanchet* and Flavien Vallerand, offered him the editorship of the newspaper; Augustin-Norbert Morin, who had held this position since December 1820, had had to leave Quebec to study law at Montreal. The two men stressed the political situation: a new threat of union of the two Canadas was worrying French Canadians; a bill to this effect had just been announced in London. Parent hesitated, reflected, accepted. At 20 years of age he became editor of Le Canadien.

The post was an enviable one, although not lucrative. Above all it was unstable, being threatened from both outside and inside. Le Canadien still opposed the dominant oligarchy, but no longer commanded the support of all members of the Parti Canadien. From his first appearance on this disputed tribune, Parent showed himself a fighting journalist. The characteristics that were to prevail throughout his life asserted themselves firmly: his astounding capacity for work, the rigour of his dialectic, the unshakeable persistence of his convictions. In vehement articles he fought and helped to bring about the failure of the plan of union, withdrawal of which Papineau and Neilson were to try to obtain when they went to England in 1823. Parent insisted on complete respect for the constitution of 1791, and demanded recognition of political liberties that had been flouted. Then, in 1823, La Gazette de Québec (which had been started in 1764) became a political paper and an organ of the Parti Canadien. In March 1825 Le Canadien, deserted by its supporters, was forced to go out of circulation.

Parent set about consolidating his knowledge and at the same time varying his activities. From 1825 to 1829 he studied law as a student in the office of Joseph-Rémi Vallières* de Saint-Réal, and later in that of Charles-Eusèbe Casgrain*. To support himself he had to give French lessons. In the autumn of 1825 he was taken on as editor of the French section of La Gazette de Québec. He was soon holding a number of offices: in 1827 he was appointed deputy French translator and law officer of the assembly of Lower Canada. On 11 May 1829 he was called to the bar of Lower Canada. Shortly afterwards, on 30 June, he married Marie-Mathilde-Henriette Grenier, daughter of Gabriel Grenier, a Beauport cooper. Five girls and one boy were born of this marriage; Joséphine-Henriette was to marry Antoine Gérin-Lajoie*, Mathilde-Sabine was to marry first Évariste GÉLINAS on 3 Sept. 1862 at Quebec, then Guillaume-Sylvain de Bonald* on 17 Feb. 1885, and Marie-Augustine was to marry Benjamin Sulte on 3 May 1871 at Quebec.

Lower Canada experienced more and more difficult years. In the 1830s a generation of ardent young Patriotes threw themselves into the political struggle, several as members of the assembly, where they became rivals of their great elders. In 1826 Augustin-Norbert Morin had started the paper La Minerve, to support the Patriote party and teach French Canadians "to resist any usurping of their rights." The 1830 revolution in France kindled admiration for the Men of July. Ardent spirits were rallied by the person and the voice of O'Connell in Ireland. The names of La Mennais, Lacordaire, and Montalembert acquired a magical quality. It was said that La Gazette de Québec was no longer sufficiently alert, and an attempt was made to start a new newspaper. As Parent had been refused a salary increase at La Gazette, the decision was speeded up. With the help of René-Édouard CARON, Jean-Baptiste Fréchette, Elzéar Bédard*, and Hector-Siméon Huot, he collected the necessary capital and undertook to revive Le Canadien once again. The paper was to be a bi-weekly, and would have its office at the "political centre of the district of Quebec," on the Côte de la Montagne. The guiding spirit was to be Étienne Parent.

The first number of the third Canadien appeared on 7 May 1831. As a motto, Parent took the watchwords: "our language, our institutions, our laws," which, he wrote, would be all his life his own "polestar." His first article had the appearance of a manifesto: "It is the lot of the Canadiens to have not only to preserve civil liberty, but also to struggle for existence as a people. . . . No middle course, if we do not govern ourselves we shall be governed. . . . Our politics, our aims, our sentiments, our wishes and desires are to maintain all that constitutes our existence as a people, and, as a means to that end, to maintain all the civil and political rights that are the prerogative of an English country. . . ."

On 4 June Parent launched the idea of a national, political, and patriotic association that would be under the patronage of St John the Baptist. The association was founded a few years later (1834) by Ludger Duvernay*. In every manner and by every means Parent endeavoured to rouse the communities of Quebec. He also published poetry and songs that quickly became popular, particularly the song of the Chouayen which poured scorn on cowards and defeatists. As a result of articles criticizing the Legislative Council in the Vindicator and La Minerve, Daniel Tracey* and Ludger Duvernay were kept in prison at Quebec from 17 Jan. to 25 Feb. 1832; on their return to Montreal, it was Parent who presented Duvernay with one of the two medals struck to commemorate this imprisonment.

These were the most crowded years of Parent's career, during which he sought to give expression to the consciousness of the French Canadian people at the same time as he informed and guided it. A philosopher by training, a journalist by temperament, a fighter by necessity, he made the fervour of his convictions felt in the pages of Le Canadien. In an open, disinterested fashion, with independence and competence, he treated all the burning questions that the political events of the day gave rise to, pointing out dangers, demanding justice, and standing as an advocate of law and order. At this time Papineau was still a "constitutionalist," and Parent's views coincided with his. "Parent," Joseph-Guillaume Barthe* wrote, "is in journalism what Papineau is at the parliamentary tribune." Papineau was the political leader of the Patriote party, Parent its intellectual leader. His house in the Upper Town of Quebec, on Rue Saint-Joseph (now Rue Garneau), and later each of those he was to live in at Toronto, Montreal, and Ottawa, was the familiar meeting-place of all those who had some standing in the political world.

The profession of journalist, however, was not in itself a sufficient source of livelihood. Parent had to accept other offices. Already a translator and legal officer of the assembly, he was appointed on 30 Jan. 1833 first titular librarian of that body. He was also made responsible for overseeing the printing and proof-reading of the Journaux de la chambre d'Assemblée du Bas-Canada. All these posts brought him the modest salary of $800. His two reports as librarian (7 Jan. 1834 and 27 Oct. 1835) described the deplorable state of the library, proposed purchasing volumes that were "urgently needed," announced that he had established a new catalogue, and recommended leaving the library open "until dusk" to help those who could not frequent it during the day. At the end of 1835, deeming his salary inadequate, he gave up his post as librarian, and shortly afterwards was appointed clerk of the assembly.

The political situation was deteriorating more rapidly. An economic crisis from 1833 to 1836 caused serious unrest, which was not unrelated to the agitation of the years 1837–38. A large number of the Ninety-two Resolutions presented to the assembly in 1834 by Papineau, Bédard, and Augustin-Norbert Morin were derived from Parent's Le Canadien. These resolutions prompted Britain to send a royal commission, in 1835, to inquire into the situation in Lower Canada. The report of this commission gave rise to Lord Russell's deplorable resolutions of May 1837. In August the last session of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada was held. Public protest meetings took place in increasing numbers from spring to autumn. Then occurred the bloody clash between the Fils de la Liberté and the Doric Club at Montreal (6 November), the six counties' address (13 November), the uprisings at Saint-Denis (23 November), Saint-Charles (25 November), and Saint-Eustache (14 December), and the flight of Papineau.

The stands Parent took and the statements he made in Le Canadien of that period, particularly during the grim year of 1837, would merit being reported month by month and day by day. He devoted earnest efforts to demanding changes in the constitution, supporting the struggle against established authority, and clarifying what form the necessary reforms should take. Like Dr Elzéar Bédard at Quebec, who was the political leader of the moderates, he advocated only legal courses of action against the government. In 1835 he had parted company with Papineau and Morin when they began to urge people to violence. He was a patriot, but he condemned agitation. "We are not ready," he wrote on 24 April 1837, "for independence; let us have patience, let us prove ourselves, the law will resume its course; let us assure citizens that impartial juries will be maintained and protected; let us work for improvements in the common weal that have been suspended for years; let us educate the people in its affairs: let us open the schools that have been closed as a result of political upheaval." Again, in May of 1837: "We cannot follow them when they say that our submissiveness should henceforth be determined by our numerical strength, combined with the sympathies that we shall find elsewhere." And once more, in June 1837: "We in no way wish to share the terrible responsibility assumed today by our former brothers in arms and their partisans: we impute to them the blame for all the blood that will be shed . . . against them alone must rise the wailings of widows, mothers, and orphans, and the lamentations of a whole people brought to social abasement."

Parent incurred the reprobation of several Montreal Patriotes. La Minerve insulted him, and in the autumn of 1837 reproduced the decree of the Comité Central et Permanent which declared him a "traitor to the nation." He nonetheless persisted in denouncing excesses both on the governmental and on the Patriote side, and thus earned the ill feeling of every one. "There is no middle course left: either the leaders of the unrest of which we are beginning to taste the poisoned fruits knew that they would let loose in society the most disastrous passions, or they had not foreseen it; in the first case they have rendered themselves guilty of a great villainy, in the second, they have shown a great lack of foresight, which must cause them to be declared unworthy to guide the people's destinies" (25 Sept. 1837). After the battles at Saint-Charles and Saint-Eustache, Parent remained silent until the end of 1837. He was horror-stricken by the tragic events, whose consequences he had, alas, predicted.

When he took up his pen again it was to plead in favour of the exiles, who had nevertheless treated him as a renegade; it was to try to repair the evil and to urge Britain to understand the lesson of 1837. He demanded a responsible government, as the only means by which long-accumulated grievances could be met. "We have merely the name and shadow of a constitutional government," he wrote on 14 Feb. 1838. A few weeks after the departure of the governor, Lord Gosford [Acheson*], the 1791 constitution was suspended. Government was reduced to a Special Council directed by Sir John Colborne*.

Parent greeted hopefully the arrival of Lord Durham [Lambton*] on 27 May 1838. Despite everything he retained his faith in British justice. As soon as Durham left, at the beginning of November of the same year, a new insurrection broke out and was savagely put down by Colborne: villages were sacked, nearly a thousand persons were imprisoned, three French Canadian judges, Philippe Panet*, Elzéar Bédard, and Joseph-Rémi Vallières de Saint-Réal were suspended, 12 Patriotes were condemned to death. In the face of these outrages, Parent's voice became scathing. "The groans of the oppressed," he wrote on 24 Dec. 1838, "awaken remorse in the hearts of the oppressors, and bring a blush to their faces. . . . We should like to spare England the unenviable honour of seeing its name associated with that of Russia, the 'executioner of Poland.' There is all our crime. It is a great crime, we admit, in the eyes of all those who are plotting the annihilation of the Canadien people."

Two days later, on 26 Dec. 1838, he was arrested, at the same time as the printer of Le Canadien, Jean-Baptiste Fréchette. He was accused of "seditious schemings" and taken to the prison at Quebec. Despite his endeavours to obtain a trial, he remained there until 12 April 1839. His release was secured by a writ of habeas corpus. The cold and bad conditions in the prison made him almost deaf, and he was to remain afflicted with this infirmity until the end of his life. Even in prison he continued to direct Le Canadien and publish articles in it, thanks to an ingenious stratagem like that resorted to by the young Duc d'Orléans at Clairvaux: regularly a young messenger, Stanislas Drapeau*, brought to him in prison a faked tart that contained newspaper clippings, news, and messages; by the same means, Parent sent back outlines of articles and corrected proofs. When he came out of prison he did not regain his post as law officer, and concerned himself only with Le Canadien.

Durham's report was published in England on 8 Feb. 1839. Étienne Parent translated it and published it in sections in Le Canadien. The report left him disillusioned. He wrote in April 1839: "If the report has been drafted with as much good faith as is said, it is a fresh proof that the English cannot pronounce an impartial judgement between us, poor French Canadians, and our adversaries, who have the good fortune not to be stricken like us with original sin." The report proposed the union of the two Canadas, a measure that aimed at nothing less than the assimilation of the French Canadians. Faced with this almost inevitable eventuality as a result of union, Parent adopted a fatalistic attitude. In a series of articles that appeared in Le Canadien between May and November 1839, he set forth arguments in a process of reasoning that took him from sorrowful resentment to resignation, and finally to a conditional confidence. "We invite our compatriots," he wrote on 13 May 1839, "to make a virtue of necessity, not to struggle wildly against the inflexible course of events. . . . We have always considered that our 'nationality' could be preserved only with the sincere tolerance, if not the active help of Great Britain, but efforts are being made openly to extirpate that nationality from this country. . . . [The task facing] us French Canadians, whom England is sacrificing to the demands of a favoured minority regardless of acts and guarantees that were equivalent to a sworn social contract, is to show, as one of the parties in the political marriage that is imposed on us, that we are prepared to bring to the proposed union all the goodwill necessary to make the alliance as profitable and as happy as possible, while expecting reciprocity from the other party."

Parent's dialectic was not without moments of stupefaction, even of revolt. In December 1839 and January 1840 he gave a bitter account of the debates in the assembly of Upper Canada on the plan of union proposed by the governor, Lord Sydenham [Thomson*]. He remarked on the distrust, even the contempt of the Upper Canadians, and noted the injustices and oppression that union might bring for his compatriots. For a while he was fiercely anti-unionist. In January 1840, with François-Xavier Garneau*, he headed a committee of 40 prominent citizens which was responsible for collecting signatures on a petition against union. They obtained 39,928 signatures [see Caron]. The Act of Union was, however, approved in England on 23 July 1840, and on 28 August Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine, prompted by Parent's initial thesis, published in L'Aurore des Canadas his "Address to the electors of Terrebonne," a programme-manifesto that accepted the principle of union and recommended collaboration with the Upper Canadian Reformers, with the object of gaining ministerial responsibility. Parent published the address in Le Canadien of 31 August, and again began to hope for the possible effectiveness of union. On 20 October, with an electors' committee of Quebec, he contributed to an "Address to the electors of the whole province," which favoured union and endorsed La Fontaine's programme. Despite these political vicissitudes, he continued to concern himself with the intellectual progress of his compatriots. For a long time Le Canadien had been receiving newspapers from Paris, and had been reproducing numerous articles from them in its columns. In the autumn of 1840 Parent and Jean-Baptiste Fréchette decided to use these articles as material for a special journal, which would also publish Canadian works "bearing the mark of excellence." They launched Le Coin du feu, a weekly review that lived only a year, from 21 Nov. 1840 to 13 Nov. 1841.

The Act of Union was proclaimed in Canada on 10 Feb. 1841. In the first assembly elections for the new United Canada (or Province of Canada), Parent stood as a candidate in Saguenay County, and was returned by a majority of three votes on 8 May 1841. He attended the first two sessions of the new parliament at Kingston, from 14 June to 18 Sept. 1841, and from 8 Sept. 1842 to 12 Aug. 1843. In Le Canadien he persisted in his arguments that the greatest possible advantage should be taken of the union, pleaded for the equality "of the two populations and the two countries," and urged confidence in the government. He was the invited speaker on the occasion of the first celebration of Saint-Jean-Baptiste day at Quebec, on 24 June 1842. He submitted to the assembly a bill proposing that French be recognized as an official language. His partial deafness prevented him, however, from discharging his responsibility as a representative of the people in the way he would have liked. When the office of superintendent of public instruction was created, the governor, Sir Charles Bagot*, offered Parent the direction of the French section of the province, but Dr Jean-Baptiste MEILLEUR was finally chosen. La Fontaine, who had just formed a cabinet, invited Parent to assume another high public office: on 14 Oct. 1842 he was appointed clerk of the Executive Council. He had to leave Le Canadien, which he had directed for nearly 15 years. On 21 Oct. 1842 he published in it his last article, a "farewell to his readers." He was 40 years old. A second stage in his career was beginning: that of public servant, writer, and lecturer.

A nomadic existence also began for him, for he had to follow the shifts of the seat of government of the Province of Canada: Kingston until 1843, Montreal from 1844 to 1849, Toronto from 1849 to 1852, Quebec from 1852 to 1855, Toronto from 1855 to 1859, and again Quebec in 1859. His duties brought him into direct contact with the decisions and the trend of the union government. But though he observed the evolution of politics from close at hand, he remained an impartial critic. A friend of La Fontaine, he played the part of a mentor towards him. His existence was less agitated than before, but he continued to be the strenuous worker he had always been. He read copiously. He contributed occasionally to Le Canadien in 1847, and again from 1851 to 1854. He was a professor in so far as one could be at a time when the former Lower Canada did not yet possess a university. The Institut Canadien was founded at Montreal in 1844 by enthusiastic young intellectuals (Parent's future son-in-law, Antoine Gérin-Lajoie, was its first secretary); the courses and lectures it offered and its library made it the equivalent of a French Canadian university. It was while the seat of government was at Montreal that Parent undertook, before the members of the institute, the series of lectures (or public addresses, as they were called) that constitute a major part of his work. His ideas were taking a different turn, and his style was changing. The journalist gave free rein to the philosopher. Now that the constitutional struggles were over, he concerned himself with the development of the French Canadian people. In his lectures to the Institut Canadien of Montreal he tackled the following subjects: "L'Industrie considérée comme moyen de conserver notre nationalité" (22 Jan. 1846); "Importance de l'étude de l'économie politique" (19 Nov. 1846); "Du travail chez l'homme" (23 Sept. 1847); "Considérations sur notre système d'éducation populaire, sur l'éducation en général et les moyens législatifs d'y pourvoir" (19 Feb. 1848); and "Du prêtre et du spiritualisme dans leurs rapports avec la société" (17 Dec. 1848). Before a literary society, the Club Social, he gave another talk, on "La presse."

In 1847 Parent advanced to further stages in the governmental hierarchy: on 22 May he was appointed assistant secretary of the Province of Canada, at the same time as an English-speaking colleague, Edmund Allen Meredith*. Later, at Quebec, in the winter and spring of 1852, he delivered four other lectures designed for various professional groups: "De l'importance du commerce" (15 Jan. 1852); "De l'intelligence dans ses rapports avec la société" (22 Jan. and 7 Feb. 1852); and "Le sort des classes ouvrières" (15 April 1852). In the same year Le journal de l'instruction publique published an article of his on "Pierre Bédard et ses deux fils." Through these audiences, as previously through those of Montreal, Parent spoke to the French Canadian people as a whole, solemnly calling on them to work for their material and intellectual advancement. He was already one of the most respected and heeded among the older members of the French Canadian élite. Since the ministry of La Fontaine and Robert Baldwin* and the actual recognition of ministerial responsibility in 1848, the struggles of even the recent past had grown blurred in people's memories. He was the friend of all of his contemporaries – journalists, politicians, civil servants – who had some standing in public life.

This phase of Parent's existence has no history other than that of a conscientious public servant. In 1866 he once more accompanied the government, when it went to Ottawa for good. On 29 May 1868 – a new step upward in public administration – he was appointed undersecretary of state in the federal government, a post he was to occupy until retirement in 1872. He then lived two more years. Parent, who had never ceased to be a believer or to attend church, had nevertheless, in Benjamin Sulte's words, "long maintained a scepticism, which worried him." He edified his friends who visited him regularly during the three weeks of his last illness. He was already deaf, and a rapidly developing cataract made him almost blind. He spoke of nothing but the rebellion of 1837–38 and the prison where he had been detained. He passed away on 22 Dec. 1874 at Ottawa. His wife survived him by 16 years and also died at Ottawa, at the age of 86.

Étienne Parent's life is surprising in its continuity, despite its two phases marked by the activities of the journalist and those of the public servant, two phases which moreover coincide in a strange way with two periods in the evolution of the French Canadian people. As astonishing in their consistency are the dominant elements of his thought, which, enriched by the fuller information and the broadening and deepening influences brought to it by events, remained centred around one unshakeable preoccupation: his concern for the destiny of the French Canadians.

In seeking to determine the forms this concern took, one must not lose sight of the ecology, social structures, and mentality of Quebec society, and particularly the political situation, at the time when Étienne Parent was born. He was of the second generation after the conquest. When he was a student at the seminary (1820), Papineau, at 34, had been a member of the assembly for 11 years and speaker of the assembly for five. Papineau was at the pinnacle of his political glory. He was the most illustrious combatant in the epic parliamentary struggles which, over the almost 30 years the constitutional regime of 1791 had been in force, made the claim for redress of violated rights heard. The first period of Parent's professional life and ideology was marked by the bitterness, pugnacity, and aggressiveness that the continuation of these struggles required. However, once Parent became convinced, after the equivocations and dramas of conscience occasioned by the setting up of the union government, that the new regime allowed hope for political stability and self-government, he conceived his task and that of his compatriots to be to consolidate and use political power with an eye to the cultural autonomy and "national" interest of French Canadians.

Accordingly, Parent, the man who favours continuity, stands in contrast to Papineau, the man who chooses separation. In them also two mentalities are opposed, two visions of the French Canadian world that were associated with two regions, with two cities that had long been the poles around which the dialectical tensions of French Canadian society had been fashioned: Montreal and Quebec. Montreal was the commercial metropolis, the city of competition, the place of symbiosis where two Canadian peoples, the English-speaking and the French-speaking, confronted each other; Quebec was the fortress city, the political and religious capital, the "citadel of memory." Parent represented a certain Quebec way of being a French Canadian. More profoundly, and the one trait accentuated the other, he was a man of the soil. Without attaching undue importance to atavism or to environmental influences, it is impossible not to recognize in Parent a man who, born on the land, and having worked on the land, identified himself with the small paternal homestead that remained in his eyes a microcosm of the great.

Parent also owed to his country origin his physical attributes and several moral and intellectual characteristics. A desperately hard worker, he detested idleness. He was perseverance itself. Consequently he was opposed to any form of defeatism. If these attitudes are not taken into account, one can scarcely understand some of his ideological positions. He was sceptical of if not hostile to the seigneurs or the descendants of the nobles of the old regime, because he blamed them for having been idle, for having lacked the ability to be architects of social progress; it was they who must be held responsible for the backwardness and inferiority of French Canadians in the economic and industrial spheres. Likewise, Parent was ruthless towards all those who, taking their example from the seigneurs, made themselves the instruments or accomplices of the new master, those whom the people had christened chouayens and whom Parent lampooned in a scathing song. Finally, it is in this same light that one must interpret Parent's opposition to all those who after 1837 advocated the annexation of Canada to the United States: annexation appeared to him a solution of least resistance, a lack of faith in the national destiny.

Étienne Parent's thinking, it must be repeated, turned around an immovable centre: the "national" idea. Before him and at the same time, many other politicians, Patriotes, and publicists had spoken of the "nation," but beneath this concept was as a rule a lyrical, sacred entity, of a more or less abstract character. Parent's talent and originality lay in having been the first to become aware of the realities of the French Canadian nation, and to propound a definition of them in a coherent body of doctrine. The formulation of this doctrine was a gradual one, and reflected the two periods of his life. From the beginning, however, its elements were clearly defined.

It was a nationalism above all sensual, being anchored in the soil and in the past. It was also juridical and constitutional, like that of the first Papineau. By the Quebec Act, French Canada concluded with England a "true social contract," by the terms of which it was entitled to "self-government." Using the same logic as the first French Canadian assemblymen after 1791, Parent was convinced that French Canadians must have an effective share in the government of their Lower Canada. He knew the philosophy and recognized the value of the institutions of British parliamentarianism: he demanded that they be applied to the realization of the social contract, and that they not be vitiated by an immoderate oligarchy or by a discretionary power. It was on this that his acceptance of union was later to be postulated: the conviction that each of the two Canadian peoples would be able to govern itself within the same constitutional framework. To this extent, Parent's nationalism was loyalist, if one understands that this loyalism was a means towards the achievement of national survival. Furthermore, this nationalism had scarcely any link with France. Rather it was part of a conception of a natural right of a people to realize its own destiny. It belonged first and foremost to a theological and providentialist conception. It is God "who creates nationalities so that they may live." Parent's nationalist profession of faith was a cult, "a religion."

These basic ideas, latent in the articles of Parent's first period, became evident in the lectures of the second. In them the influences that had contributed to shaping his ideology also stood out more clearly. A variety of paths criss-cross in this ideology, yet they blend in sweeping designs often lyrically conceived. With the providentialist vision of history inherited from Bossuet, Parent combined philosophical credos from the age of enlightenment. A reader of Rousseau, he believed in the fundamental goodness of man. Having read the works of Condorcet and Buchez, he was convinced of the inevitability of an indefinite progress of human nature and of society, a progress and improvement that were "intended by God." From La Mennais he derived the titles and inspiration for at least two of his lectures. He was acquainted with the writings of the socialists, Saint-Simon, Fourier, and Louis Blanc, and not infrequently passages of his lectures bore the imprint of a utopian ideal. In all that concerned economic matters, he was a disciple of the physiocrats and a determined supporter of free trade. A long thesis would be required to do justice to the whole of Parent's view of society, which led him to consider society as collective man in the service of individual man, actuated by a spirit of fraternity, whose progress was attainable only through an equilibrium that respected the double principle, material and spiritual, of human nature. In short, Parent's "moderate" thought looked for a harmony, analogous to the ambition of Comte's social view, between order and progress.

Parent wanted each of his lectures to bear on a theme "closely related to our nationality," and used his ingenuity to illustrate in them how this nationality should express itself and progress. Now that the house of government had "become habitable," politics must turn to the material and intellectual questions on which the social and economic advancement of a young country depended. Parent identified areas of disquiet, made diagnoses, and prepared plans of action. French Canadians must without delay initiate themselves in political economy: their elders had performed their task, and the younger must now perform theirs; the former had been orators defending popular rights and from now on "enlightened economists" were needed. The new age would be one of industry. The new nobles of America were the industrialists. French Canadians should pay honour to industry by their acts; if they did not "the mass of the people . . . exposed to the influence and denationalizing action of the leaders of industry of the rival race . . . will with time lose their national character." Hence the necessity for a system of education planned to meet the specific needs of the French Canadian people, and not "inspired by foreign canons," for like Montesquieu Parent knew that laws can neither be exported nor imitated from country to country. He proposed free compulsory education. A sometimes utopian intellectual, he put forward a general plan of education of which the aim was nothing less than the creation of "a class of intellectuals" to whom alone public administration would be entrusted. He spoke of popular education, and as he used it this term had a resonance very close to the one it has now: newspapers, "the people's book," must discuss economic questions and all the problems with which an enlightened social life requires familiarity.

Hence Étienne Parent was at one and the same time a realist, a utopian, a Cassandra, and a planner. Several of his prognostications and suggestions, particularly in the spheres of economics and education, have remained topical, without alas awakening much response until the end of the century, or even until the present day. His arguments were to be repeated by Robert-Errol Bouchette* and Édouard Montpetit*. With uncommon perspicacity, he was able to elaborate a nationalist doctrine that was complete even in its economic and cultural components. The style in which he expressed himself may seem today either too dry or too lyrical. The period rather than the man is responsible. It is remarkable that through the rhetoric of the day so much of his breadth of vision and originality appears. Few of his contemporaries could remain on his level. Few men could write, as he could: "For myself, I have never understood that God would have imposed work upon man as a punishment."

JEAN-CHARLES FALARDEAU

There are unpublished works of Étienne Parent at the PAC, ANQ, and ASQ. These archives, as well as the AAQ, AJQ, and ASN, have material on Parent. For more information on the documents in the archives, consult: Urbain Blanchet, "Étienne Parent, ses opinion pédagogiques et religieuses," unpublished DES thesis, Université Laval, 1965.

Interesting information on Parent is found in P.-E. Gosselin, "Étienne Parent et la question politique au Bas-Canada de 1836 à 1838" (unpublished typescript at the Bibliothèque du séminaire de Québec, Québec, 1939). [J. G. Lambton], Le rapport de Durham, M.-P. Hamel, édit. et traduct. ([Saint-Jérome], Qué., 1948). J.-G. Barthe, Souvenirs d'un demi-siècle ou mémoires pour servir à l'histoire contemporaine (Montréal, 1885). F.-X. Garneau, Histoire du Canada depuis sa découverte jusqu'à nos jours (4e éd., 4v., Montréal, 1882–83), III. Antoine Gérin-Lajoie, Dix ans au Canada de 1840 à 1850; histoire de l'établissement du gouvernement responsable (Québec, 1888). P.-E. Gosselin, Étienne Parent (1802–1874) (Classiques canadiens, 27, Montréal et Paris, 1964). Marc Lebel et al., Aspects de l'enseignement au petit séminaire de Québec (1765–1945) (SHQ, Cahiers d'histoire, 20, Québec, 1968). Monet, Last cannon shot. P.-E. Parent, Histoire généalogique des familles Parent-Grenier, Fournier dit Préfontaine et Lamarre ou Delamarre (Ottawa, 1931). Benjamin Sulte, "Étienne Parent," Mélanges historiques, Gérard Malchelosse, édit. (21v., Montréal, 1918–34). Turcotte, Canada sous l'Union. Mason Wade, Les Canadiens français de 1760 à nos jours (L'Encyclopédie du Canada français, III, 2e éd., 2v., Ottawa, 1966), I. Marcel Cadieux and Paul Tremblay, "Étienne Parent, un théoricien de notre nationalisme," L'Action nationale (Montréal), XII (1939), 203–19, 307–18. Bernard Dufebvre, "Étienne Parent, le « renégat »," RUL (Québec), VII (1953), 405–12. Roger Duhamel, "Le journalisme," Cahiers de l'Académie canadienne-française (Montréal) no.3 (1958), Essais critiques, 126–30. Fernand Ouellet, "Étienne Parent et le mouvement du catholicisme social (1848)," BRH, LXI (1955) 99–118. Gérard Parizeau "Mon ami Étienne Parent," L'Action universitaire (Montréal), II (1935–36), 50–51, 64. Léon Pouliot, "Une leçon d'histoire d'Étienne Parent," BRH, LX (1954), 71–73. Antoine Roy, "Les Patriotes de la région de Québec pendant la rébellion de 1837–1838," Cahiers des Dix, XXIV (1959), 241–54.

PARKIN, JOHN BUCKWORTH, criminal lawyer; b. 1816 at Dewsbury in Yorkshire, Eng., of the marriage contracted on 15 Sept. 1814 by the Reverend Edward Parkin and Sarah Cullen; d. 16 Dec. 1875 at Quebec.

John Buckworth Parkin arrived in Canada with his parents in September 1819. He attended the school at Chambly run by his father, the Church of England minister there; then in 1834 he went to England to study law and arts. Trained in classics and with a good knowledge of English and French literature, Parkin was called to the Quebec bar on 23 Feb. 1837, after working at Montreal in the office of the future judge William King McCord*.

For a short while Parkin was in turn a circuit court judge, a commissioner of bankruptcy, an acting judge in the superior court, and president of the Quebec bar (1862); above all he acquired a great reputation as a defence counsel in criminal cases. At Quebec, where he lived, his name was linked particularly with three trials. In January 1858 he managed to have Captain John Charles Rudolph cleared of a charge of manslaughter; Rudolph was in command of the Montréal on 26 June 1857 when it was destroyed by fire off Cap Rouge near Quebec causing the death of about 250 persons. Thomas Crozier, an English soldier who killed a sergeant in July 1862, was found guilty only of manslaughter. Parkin obtained the same verdict for Robert Murphy, a carter who had killed a policeman in 1875. This was his last victory. He died on 16 Dec. 1875 at Quebec.

He married Katherine Bradley, by whom he had seven children, among them a son, Edward Bradley Parkin, who also became a lawyer. A few days before his death Parkin was converted to Roman Catholicism, and received a Catholic burial in St Patrick's Church.

J.-C. BONENFANT

Le Canadien (Québec), 20 nov. 1875. Morning Chronicle (Quebec), July 1862, 17 Dec. 1875. Quebec Mercury, July 1857, January 1858. P.-G. Roy, Les avocats de la région de Québec, 339. Storied Quebec (Wood et al.), IV, 283–84. Charles Langelier, "J.-B. Parkin, c.r.," BRH, III (1897), 82–89, 98–106. T. R. Millman, "Edward Parkin, first S.P.G. missionary at Chambly, 1819–1828," Montreal Churchman, XXVII (1939), no.6, 16–17; no.7, 7, 19.

PEARKES, GEORGE, lawyer and public servant; b. in 1826 in Guildford, Surrey, Eng.; m. 30 April 1869 at Victoria, B.C., Mary Elizabeth Dorman; d. 18 March 1871 in Victoria.

Nothing is known of George Pearkes' family background or of his upbringing. His correspondence demonstrates, however, that he was a well-educated man with a gift for clear analysis. He probably studied law in England but does not seem to have been admitted to the bar there. Pearkes immigrated first to eastern Canada, later to California, and finally arrived in Vancouver Island in 1858. Here he became the colony's first practising solicitor and was appointed the first notary public by Governor James DOUGLAS on 3 Aug. 1858. On 28 August the governor named him the first crown solicitor and attorney (analogous to attorney general) for the colony. As such he accompanied Douglas to Fort Hope that year, where he and two others were commissioned by the governor as competent judges to hear a charge of murder.

George Pearkes spent most of his years on Vancouver Island in private practice. His original law partnership with Elisha Oscar Crosby was dissolved on 31 Jan. 1859; he was later associated with William Saunders Sebright Green, the arrangement ending 12 July 1866, and on 28 Oct. 1870 he formed his final partnership with Edwin Johnson. Probably arising from his early sojourn, Pearkes had a familiarity with the laws of California and on 27 Dec. 1859 he was appointed a commissioner for that state. For almost a year in 1865–66 he was acting registrar general for Vancouver Island while the permanent incumbent, Edward Graham ALSTON, was on leave.

At his untimely death the Victoria Colonist said of George Pearkes: "A prominent member of the Masonic Fraternity, and a zealous promoter of every public movement or patriotic enterprise, the earnest friend of every private charity, he has succeeded beyond what is the lot of most men in making himself useful and respected in this day and generation."

ALFRED WATTS

PABC, George Pearkes correspondence. PRO, CO 478/3. Cariboo Sentinel (Barkerville, B.C.), 8 April 1871. Colonist (Victoria), 27 Dec. 1859–21 March 1871. Victoria Gazette, 3, 28 Aug., 28 Sept., 4 Nov. 1858; 1 Feb. 1859.

PEDLEY, CHARLES, historian and Congregational clergyman; b. 6 Aug. 1820 in Hanley, Staffordshire, Eng., son of James Pedley and Alice Curtain; d. at Cold Springs, Ont., on 22 Feb. 1872.

Charles Pedley, whose father was an engraver, entered Rotherham College in Yorkshire in 1844. During his student years he spent a summer vacation as a supply minister in Hamburg, Germany.

In 1849 he married Sarah Stowell, the eldest daughter of his tutor at Rotherham. In the same year he received a call from the Congregational Church at Chester-le-Street, Durham. After nine years in Durham he was asked by the Colonial Missionary Society to go to St John's, Newfoundland; in 1857 he and his family moved there.

During his Newfoundland years he took an active part in the community and delivered a series of lectures on David Livingstone's travels, the proceeds from which he donated to the Colonial Missionary Society. He seems to have been popular with people of all faiths, and his engaging personality as well as his evident intellectual interests were probably responsible for the encouragement he received from Sir Alexander Bannerman*, governor of Newfoundland, when he undertook to write a history of Newfoundland. He returned to England in 1863 to oversee the publication of this work, which was dedicated by permission to the Duke of Newcastle [Clinton], principal secretary of state for the colonies.

Pedley's History of Newfoundland . . . is attractively written. He went to some pains to give due recognition to earlier writers on the subject, John Reeves* and Lewis Amadeus Anspach*, and criticized another whom he accused of "over credulousness." He shows considerable tolerance for other races and other beliefs. Bannerman had put at his disposal "many-thousand pages" of documents and, despite his period's limited knowledge of the early explorers, Pedley's book is generally useful. His interest in his subject was more than factual, which adds to the readability of the book, as may be seen from the following extract: "The French nomenclature is not confined to the South of the island, but is also found . . . scattered on the n. e. shore, and it must be confessed that the names thus derived are less coarse and homely than many which are of English origin, among which we meet with such as 'Old Harry,' 'Pipers-Hole,' 'Hell Hill,' 'Seldom-come-bye,' 'Come-by-chance' and other like suggestive, but unpoetic, sounds."

Whilst in Newfoundland Pedley travelled both in the United States and in Canada. He attended the ninth annual meeting of the Congregational Union of Canada in 1862. At that meeting he was invited to assist at the service and apparently decided that he would eventually settle in Canada.

When Pedley moved his wife and seven sons there in 1864 he did so with no certainty of a church. He was eventually appointed as a substitute in Guelph while the regular minister was on missionary service in British Columbia. When the incumbent returned, Pedley was once more out of work, with an ailing wife and a hungry family. His son remembered that "there were times when we had little but turnips to eat . . . we boys were having the time of our lives but father was breaking his heart."

Finally in January 1866 a call came from Cold Springs. There his wife died leaving him with a large family to care for by himself. He undertook their education, and raised several ministers and missionaries, a school teacher, and a civil servant. At Cold Springs he was a vigorous and popular minister, and in May 1866 took on the church at Cobourg as well. During his ministry he made his church self-supporting.

Pedley seems to have been an unhappy and unfortunate man, his intellectual capacities not challenged enough by his work or by his associates. Although welcomed by the Congregational Union when he came as a visitor from Newfoundland, once he had moved to Ontario he was made to wait several years before he was accepted as a member. One wonders if this delay was the result of his showing impatience or arrogance. When finally accepted he seems to have been appreciated and was scheduled to lead the opening service at the next meeting of the Congregational Union of Canada when he died suddenly at the age of 51.

Minerva Tracy

Charles Pedley, The history of Newfoundland from the earliest times to the year 1860 (London, 1863). Congregational Church (St John's), Register of baptisms. UCA, Interview with the Reverend J. W. Pedley by C. E. Silcox, 16 Dec. 1930; letter from Miss Stowell, Charles Pedley's sister-in-law, to the Reverend A. M. Fenwick. Colonial Missionary Society, Reports (London), XXI (1857)–XXXVI (1872). Edward Ebbs, "Notes of missionary meetings, Western District, no. 2," Canadian Independent (Toronto), XI (1865), 286–89. Morning Chronicle (St John's), 4 April 1872. Public Ledger (St John's), 5 April 1872.

PELTIER, HECTOR, doctor and teacher; b. 15 Sept. 1822 at Montreal, L.C., son of Toussaint Peltier*, lawyer, and Émélie Herigault; d. 29 Jan. 1878 at Montreal, Que.

At the age of 16, Hector Peltier went to France to study philosophy at the Collège Henri IV in Paris. He began medical studies in Paris, went to Edinburgh to complete them, and after two years obtained his doctorate there. On 21 Feb. 1846, after his return to Canada, he received authorization to practise medicine, and was appointed professor of physiology in the new Montreal School of Medicine and Surgery, which had been established three years earlier.

No doubt because of his European training, Peltier was closely connected with the evolution of the medical profession in Montreal. For example, he was one of the 180 signatories who sought from the parliament of the Province of Canada official recognition of the study and practice of medicine; this was granted in 1847.

In 1849 Peltier was instructed, with Dr Louis Boyer, to present to the Hôtel-Dieu of Montreal a draft agreement, soon to be realized, for the organization of clinical instruction for the school's pupils. On 13 June 1850 the school delegated him to appear before the committee of parliament on private bills, in order to obtain amendments to its charter which would allow it to issue certificates to practise. This request was refused; indeed, in 1853, 27 Montreal doctors, joined by those of the Université Laval, presented to the assembly a report demonstrating that to grant to non-university institutions the authorization to issue licences to practise would be to lower the level of the profession.

Since 1847 McGill University had been giving the students of the school their final teaching and conferring diplomas on them. Consequently it did not appreciate the school's request to have its charter modified. Faced with the repeated annoyances created for it by McGill, the school decided to affiliate with some other better disposed university. After fruitless negotiations with the Université Laval and the University of Ottawa, the school, through the intermediary of Hector Peltier and Pierre Beaubien*, submitted to Victoria University (Cobourg) a draft agreement which was immediately accepted. On 10 Sept. 1866, the Montreal School of Medicine and Surgery became the Faculty of Medicine of Victoria University, which was Methodist. "A fine subject of scandal for which moreover the school would be blamed during conflicts with Laval," wrote Dr Roger Dufresne in 1946. "Some would then feign belief that under the Methodist dispensation the faith of the French Canadian Catholic students must certainly be endangered! Yet the only individuals exposed to this peril were the professors who were responsible for going, once a year, to have the names and official signatures affixed to diplomas printed beforehand at Montreal."

Their situation, however, did not entirely satisfy the directors of the school, who renewed their petition, through Peltier and Beaubien, to the Quebec MLAS, for a university charter for Montreal. In view of the opposition of Bishop Elzéar-Alexandre Taschereau*, of Quebec, this petition was dismissed. In 1872 the Jesuits presented a bill to found a university at Montreal, and the reply was again negative. These repeated and unavailing steps pitted against each other the cities of Quebec and Montreal, the politicians and the religious authorities, the Gallicans and the Ultramontanes. Therefore in 1872 Le Franc-Parleur published over the signatures of Beaubien, the president of the school, and Peltier, his secretary, the following declaration: "After all our previous steps and our dealings with the Université Laval, we have decisive reasons to wish never to have anything further to do with the Université Laval or with its teaching. . . . However, we feel the urgent need of a Catholic university for Montreal."

This struggle between Montreal and Quebec was taken to Rome, and Bishop Ignace Bourget* had to request the Jesuits to withdraw their bill. Dr Hector Peltier was a witness of part of this painful story: he learned of the decision to establish a branch of the Université Laval at Montreal and the first bargainings by the Quebec rector, Thomas-Étienne Hamel*, to get the teaching of medicine organized at Montreal.

On 6 Jan. 1878 the founding of a Catholic university at Montreal was celebrated. Dr Peltier attended the banquet; his confrères expected a speech from him, but he kept silent. Perhaps he had a presentiment of the cerebral haemorrhage that was to strike him down a few days later when he was finishing a class.

One of the leading figures of Montreal in his time, Peltier in 1852 had married, at Notre-Dame de Montréal, Suzanne Ellen Van Felson, daughter of a judge, George Van Felson*.

LOUIS-PHILIPPE AUDET

AJM, Registre d'état civil. Le Collège des médecins et chirurgiens de la province du Québec, 1847–1947 (Montréal, [1947]). Rumilly, Hist. de la prov. de Québec, I, 242–43. Roger Dufresne, "L'école de médecine et de chirurgie de Montréal, 1843–1891," L'Union médicale du Canada (Montréal), nov. 1946, 1314–26. L.-D. Mignault, "Histoire de l'école de médecine et de chirurgie de Montréal," L'Union médicale du Canada (Montréal), oct. 1926, 597–674.

PINSENT, ROBERT JOHN, magistrate and judge; b. in 1797 in the Conception Bay area of Newfoundland; d. 28 Nov. 1876 at Pimlico, London, Eng.

Robert John Pinsent's family was one of long standing in the Conception Bay area of Newfoundland. As the son of a prominent family he was probably sent to England to be educated. He married Louisa Broom; their only known child, Sir Robert John Pinsent*, played a distinguished role in Newfoundland's legal and political life.

Robert Pinsent was appointed a stipendiary magistrate at Brigus in 1836 and in 1843 received a similar appointment at Harbour Grace. In 1851 reports reached the Newfoundland government that there were serious difficulties in St George's Bay on the island's western coast. Until 1850 St George's Bay had been within the area of "non-settlement" according to treaty arrangements with France, and Newfoundland had had neither magistrates nor excise officers there [see KENT]. In 1850 James Tobin became magistrate and collector of customs for the area and the people were called upon to pay taxes including boat and net taxes. The French, however, continued to fish alongside them without paying taxes; in fact they were paid a bounty for their catch by the French government. The people of St George's Bay protested; the resulting arrests, fines, and transportations to gaol in St John's provoked outbursts – the magistrate was stoned, public meetings were held, and petitions were signed. On 15 July 1851 the government appointed Robert John Pinsent and Captain George Ramsay as justices of the peace for Newfoundland and its dependencies, and sent them to St George's Bay on Ramsay's ship, Alarm, to investigate the disturbances. On Pinsent's appointment the Roman Catholic Newfoundlander commented, "We entirely concur in the fitness of the selection of Mr. Pinsent; the well-earned reputation of this gentleman being an excellent voucher for the impartial and efficient discharge of his responsibility."

Pinsent and Ramsay spent several weeks at St George's Bay and recommended that the Catholic magistrate, James Tobin, be replaced by a "Protestant of good plain sense, having a patient temper and a tolerable acquaintance with the law." Governor John Gaspard LE MARCHANT ignored the recommendation, stating that "although Tobin was not an over-judicious person, his removal would be the cause of a quarrel [as] he is a bitter Catholic and a friend of the Roman Catholic bishop who would espouse his cause."

In 1861 Pinsent was involved in a particularly difficult situation in Harbour Grace. On nomination day, 26 April 1861, after three controverted elections to the assembly since 1859, intense party strife, complicated by religious animosity, caused a serious riot, despite the presence of some 100 soldiers from St John's. Pinsent, having read the riot act to no avail, attempted to persuade the mob to disperse. An accusation of negligence was later brought against him by the Protestant inhabitants as a result of his refusal to request that the troops break up the armed crowd of between 300 and 400. Pinsent claimed that he understood his only alternative was to order the troops to fire "and that last and deadly resort I did not feel warranted in adopting . . . as although the damage to property was considerable, little or no personal violence was inflicted on anyone." The Executive Council sent Joseph Peters, the stipendiary magistrate of Old Perlican, to Harbour Grace to act with Pinsent, but Pinsent refused to recognize Peters in his official capacity. The council then decided to remove Pinsent although "in view of his former services, he was to receive some other suitable appointment."

By 1862 Pinsent was a member of the Legislative Council and in 1863 he was named judge of the court of Labrador, a post he held until his retirement in 1874. In 1866 he took a leading part in organizing a meeting of St John's merchants and other citizens to prepare resolutions in opposition to the proposed confederation of Newfoundland with the other provinces of British North America.

Throughout his life Pinsent was an active member of the Church of England community and a member of the Newfoundland Church Society. As one of a family long established in the Conception Bay area and having connections with leading families in St John's, Pinsent fitted into the role of outport squire and magistrate, respected by both Catholics and Protestants. His unwillingness to take harsh measures during the riotous proceedings in Harbour Grace in 1861, although justly resulting in his removal as magistrate, indicates his humane attitude and his concern for the outport people.

ELINOR SENIOR

PANL, Newfoundland, Executive Council, Minutes, 1861, 563–629. PRO, CO 194/133–194/134, 194/135–194/136. Newfoundland, House of Assembly, Journal, 1852, appendix. Evening Telegram (St John's), 28 April 1893. Newfoundlander (St John's), 10, 24 July 1851. Newfoundland Patriot (St John's), 30 June 1866. Public Ledger (St John's), 27 June 1865. Royal Gazette (St John's), 12 Dec. 1876.

POOR, JOHN ALFRED, lawyer, editor and pamphleteer, railway entrepreneur; b. 8 Jan. 1808 at East Andover, Maine, second son of Dr Silvanus Poor and Mary Merrill; d. 5 Sept. 1871.

The Poor family came to Massachusetts as Puritan immigrants in 1638. John Alfred Poor's father was a physician and he was raised in comfortable New England surroundings. After teaching school for one winter in Bethel, Poor entered the Bangor law office of his uncle, and was called to the Maine bar in 1832. Married three times (Elizabeth Adams Hill, 8 July 1833; Elizabeth Orr; and Mrs Margaret Robinson Gwynne, 19 July 1860) he had one daughter by his first marriage.

Over six feet tall and weighing 250 pounds, Poor impressed his contemporaries with his prodigious energy, his rapid manner of speaking, and his violent temper. As a young Bangor lawyer, Poor served as counsel for the great New England politician and family friend, Daniel Webster. He participated in city government and was a founder of the local literary and debating society and the Bangor Social Library. "I honor the men," he wrote in 1871, "who have acquired success in the useful arts, as the great benefactors of their age. I have honoured Watt, Arkwright, Stephenson, Fulton and Whitney more than any of the heroes of war."

Poor had been present at Boston in April 1834 when the first locomotive ran in New England. He did not forget that experience: "It gave me such a shock that my hair seemed to start from the roots rather than to stand on end; and as I reflected in after years, the locomotive engine grew into a greatness in mind that left all other created things far behind it as marvels and wonders." Railways became the great challenge of Poor's life. At this time his own state of Maine, looked upon as an appendage of Massachusetts, was undeveloped; Portland, its major city, had been bypassed in the commercial expansion that was bringing prosperity to Montreal, New York, and Boston. In 1844 Poor published a plan for a railway network, centring on Portland, which would provide Montreal with an ice-free port on the Atlantic and link Montreal and Halifax by a trunk line from Montreal to Maine intersecting in Portland with another trunk line following the New England–Maritimes coast from Massachusetts to Nova Scotia.

His first task was to convince Canadian entrepreneurs and politicians of the superiority of the port of Portland. Ice-free, it was 100 miles closer to Montreal than Boston and half a day closer to England by steamer. While the American portion of the route between Montreal and Portland was still being surveyed and a company organized and chartered (on 10 Feb. 1845), Poor spoke in Eastern Townships communities through which the railway would pass. With the support of Sherbrooke, the Montreal Gazette and Herald, and the new laws which permitted Canadian goods to cross American soil in bond, Poor hurried to Montreal in February 1845 to meet that city's Board of Trade. There he won support for his Portland project over a trunk line from Montreal through Vermont to Concord and Boston. In 1846 construction began on the St Lawrence and Atlantic Railroad and its American counterpart, the Atlantic and St Lawrence, of which Poor was one of the directors from 1846 until probably 1853.

In 1853 Poor and his Maine associates leased the entire railway to William Jackson, Thomas Brassey, Samuel Morton Peto, and Edward Ladd Betts, the English contractors. The Portland entrepreneurs considered the lease and the subsequent incorporation of the Atlantic and St Lawrence into the Grand Trunk Railway as a great coup since, as Poor's daughter explained, "the city retained both its road and its money." Portland was now the Atlantic terminus of an international system that would soon stretch to Detroit and Lake Huron. Reminiscing in later years, Poor took full credit for the success of the railway, which he called "the work of my own mind exclusively."

Poor was also instrumental in the choice of gauge for the Canadian trunk line. By the mid 1840s Boston entrepreneurs in Maine used a gauge of 4′6″. To ensure Maine's independence, Poor favoured a broad gauge of 5′6″. In 1847 he journeyed to Montreal and helped persuade the Canadian government to overrule its earlier commitment to the Boston interests and to accept the broad gauge. Again in 1851 he appeared before a parliamentary committee in Toronto and helped influence the choice of the broad gauge for the Great Western Railway. After his death, and at great cost, the Grand Trunk Railway adopted the narrow gauge of the American railroad system.

Poor's success in the trunk line to Montreal only heightened his interest in railways. In 1849 he moved to New York where he purchased the New York Railroad Journal. Returning to Portland in 1850, he became associated with a number of railways and to promote his projects he edited a newspaper, the State of Maine, from 1853 to 1859, when he merged it with the Portland Daily Advertiser. An active lobbyist, Poor was well known in Washington and corresponded with Canadian politicians such as Joseph HOWE and John A. Macdonald*. Poor developed close contacts with Montreal entrepreneurs such as George Moffatt*, Peter McGill*, John YOUNG, Alexander Tilloch Galt*, and John Torrance*. In 1854 he and his Portland associates joined with Allan Napier MacNab*, Augustin-Norbert Morin*, Jacob DeWitt*, Galt, Henry Smith*, Jean Chabot*, John Young, and Ira Gould to present a petition to the Legislative Assembly of Canada on behalf of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for an international railway system from Portland to Montreal, Sault Ste Marie, and along the south shore of Lake Superior to the Missouri River.

With the beginning of construction in 1846 on the St Lawrence and Atlantic Railroad and on the Atlantic and St Lawrence, Poor turned to the proposed coastal trunk line, the European and North American Railway. To offset interest in Britain and the Maritimes in a railway from Halifax to Quebec, having defence as its primary purpose and running far from the American border, Poor proposed an international line from Halifax to Truro, Moncton, Saint John, Bangor, and Danville Junction, Maine, where it would join the trunk line between Portland and Montreal. To promote it, in July 1850 he organized an international convention in Portland [see Edward Barron CHANDLER]. Steamships and railways, he wrote in the invitations, have made the citizens of Montreal, Portland, Halifax, Boston, Saint John, and New York "to all intents and purposes one people, speaking a common language and struggling for the same destiny. National hostility has given way to commercial and social intercourse and under whatever form of government they may hereafter exist, they can never again become hostile or unfriendly."

With international cooperation and the unity of Anglo Saxons his political theme, Poor promoted his railway commercially by advocating it as the shortest route to Europe. He proposed a port on the Cape Breton coast and steamship service to Galway, Ireland. The Cunard or Collins steamers and the Midland Railway of Ireland would form part of a system to reduce the passage to London. Poor communicated with both the British and the American governments concerning mail contracts.

Poor's dream of a commercial empire centred on Maine never materialized. Political instability in the Maritimes, and the failure of Joseph Howe to win guarantees from the British government for lines from Halifax to Quebec and Portland in 1851, made progress difficult. With the lapsing of British interest the Intercolonial Railway rose as another competitor for Poor's international railway. Nor did Poor have great success in promoting the railway in his native state; as one scribe noted, the Poor plan, "though it might dazzle talkers, did not convert investors." Before 1863 some 200 miles of railway had been constructed by the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. In that year the railway was granted a loan of 800,000 acres from Maine and a $500,000 loan from Bangor; New Brunswick granted a charter the same year and a subsidy of $10,000 a mile to build from Saint John to the Maine boundary. Construction finally began in Maine in 1867 and the railway was completed in 1872. Poor had been president of the European and North American Railway since 1853, but in 1866 he was forced out of the presidency on a question of contracts and because of opposition from Bangor's citizens.

Poor's attitude to British North America must be interpreted in terms of his determination to advance the interests of Maine. A strong supporter of reciprocity, he proposed its expansion into a North American Zollverein with the Great Lakes as an "open Mediterranean Sea." The Civil War and confederation soured Poor's hopes of achieving the European and North American Railway by cooperative measures. Abandoning the rhetoric of continental goodwill, Poor urged the American government to build the railway from Bangor to the international boundary as a defence project. As an alternate, he appealed for federal assistance to the European and North American Railway as Maine's compensation for its losses in the Maine–New Brunswick boundary dispute of 1842.

Poor's attitude to confederation reflected his growing animosity to Britain and his feeling that British North America would ultimately join the United States. Again his railway interests were a determining factor. Alice Stewart's interpretation that Poor assessed the anti-confederate group in New Brunswick as more favourable to his railway interests seems valid. Certainly, the Intercolonial Railway promised in the confederation agreement would provide vigorous competition to his international trunk line along the coast. After confederation Poor again favoured amicable relations between Canada and the United States. However, his resources were failing by this time; partially blind and unable to write after 1866, he died of a heart attack on 5 Sept. 1871.

John Alfred Poor's efforts to promote his state had a great influence on the pattern and gauge of Canadian railways. A continentalist, he considered politics and nationalism to be secondary factors that could be supported or abandoned as his business interests demanded. His career raises the question of whether his Canadian counterparts and Canadian railway entrepreneurs in general have in fact been the great proponents of "the national dream."

BRIAN J. YOUNG

[Primary material on John Alfred Poor consists of five boxes of letters, receipts, and clippings held by the Maine Historical Society (Portland). Scattered letters of Poor are at the PAC, in the Galt papers (MG 27, I, D8), Macdonald papers (MG 26, A), and Howe papers (MG 24, B29).

Poor wrote a large number of pamphlets, and most of these are available in his private papers at the Maine Historical Society. An inventory of these pamphlets was prepared by Poor's daughter, Laura Elizabeth, in The first international railway and the colonization of New England; life and writings of John Alfred Poor (New York, 1892). The most important of the pamphlets are the following (place of publication not always known): Extracts from report of directors of St Lawrence and Atlantic Railroad Company in favor of a line to the east from Danville Junction to Bangor, and St John, New Brunswick (1848); The first colonization of New-England: an address, delivered at the erection of a monumental stone in the walls of Fort Popham, August 29th, 1862, commemorative of the planting of the Popham colony of the peninsula of Sabino, August 19, O.S. 1607, establishing the title of England to the continent (New York, 1862); The future of North America: a letter to the Chicago Ship-Canal Convention suggesting a Zoll-verein with Canada (1863); Memorial of John A. Poor in behalf of the European & North American Railway Co., and for a state policy favorable to immigration and the encouragement of manufacturers . . . (Augusta, 1861); Memorial to thirty-first legislature of Maine in relation to the European and North American Railway for shortening the transit of mails between New York and London (1852); No restriction on railway transit. Argument of John A. Poor before the joint standing committee on railroads, ways, and bridges, delivered in the Senate chamber of Maine, Feb. 14, 1865 (Bangor, 1865); Petition to the parliament of Canada praying for a charter for the Northern Pacific Railway Company, Quebec (Portland, 1854); Plan for shortening the time of passage between New York and London, with map: petition to the legislature of Maine in aid of the European and North American Railway (1850); Proceedings of Portland convention, etc., European and North American Railway (1850); "Project of a railway from Montreal to the Atlantic coast at Portland, Maine," Sherbrooke Gazette, 5 Sept. 1844; Report to the legislature of Maine of commissioners on the coast defences of Maine, and documents relating thereto, in favor of building the European and North American Railway as a military railroad (1862); The trans-continental railway. Remarks at Rutland, Vermont, June 24, 1869 (Portland, 1869).

The only substantial biography of Poor is in the book edited by Laura Elizabeth Poor. Important references to Poor are found in the transportation studies: E. C. Kirkland, Men, cities and transportation; a study in New England history, 1820–1900 (2v., Cambridge, Mass., 1948); S. H. Holbrook, The story of American railroads (New York, 1947); and G. P. de T. Glazebrook, A history of transportation in Canada (The Relations of Canada and the United States, Toronto, 1938).

Of direct interest but limited value are two theses: Elda Gallison, "The short route to Europe, a history of the European and North American Railroad," unpublished MA thesis, University of Maine, 1950. D. B. Pillsbury, "The history of the Atlantic and St Lawrence Railroad Company," unpublished MA thesis, University of Maine, 1962.

Poor's role in the confederation period is treated by A. R. Stewart, "The State of Maine and Canadian confederation," CHR, XXXIII (1952), 148–64.

E. E. Chase, Maine railroads; a history of the development of the Maine railroad system (Portland, 1926). A. G. Bailey, "Railways and the confederation issue in New Brunswick, 1863–1865," CHR, XXI (1940), 367–83. B.J.Y]

POPE, WILLIAM HENRY, lawyer, land agent, journalist, politician, and judge; b. 29 May 1825 at Bedeque, P.E.I., elder son of Joseph Pope* and Lucy Colledge; d. 7 Oct. 1879 at St Eleanors, P.E.I.

William Henry Pope received his early education in Prince Edward Island and proceeded to higher studies in England, from which his father had emigrated in 1819. William read law at the Inner Temple in London, then returned to his native colony to article in the office of Edward Palmer* in Charlottetown; he was called to the bar in 1847. He married Helen DesBrisay in 1851, and they had two sons and six daughters; their elder son, Joseph Pope*, became private secretary to and biographer of Sir John A. Macdonald*.

Like many contemporary lawyers in the colony, William Pope also became a land agent. His legal practice and his land business remained his principal activities until he entered journalism and government office in 1859. His father, a shipbuilder and politician, was a prominent member of the local élite which originally served primarily as an intermediary between the absentee landowners of the Island and their tenants; consequently, William Pope gained important clients, such as Captain Cumberland, Lady Cecilia Georgiana Fane, and Charles Worrell. It was as Worrell's agent that Pope acquired lasting unpopularity on Prince Edward Island. In 1854, after the Liberal government had passed a land purchase act, Worrell's trustees, on the Island, decided to advise him to sell. They delegated one of their members, Theophilus DesBrisay*, Pope's father-in-law, to gain Worrell's acquiescence. DesBrisay persuaded Worrell to give up his estate to the government for £10,000, but withheld this news from the other trustees. He then, apparently with no justification, informed Worrell that the government no longer wished to buy the property. Worrell now suggested that the estate be offered to a certain potential buyer for £9,000, but DesBrisay failed to make the offer. Having thus by his own authority suppressed both possible transactions, he next advised Worrell to discuss the matter with Pope – who happened to be on his way to England.

Worrell, impatient to be rid of his debt-encumbered and far-away estate, readily accepted Pope's offer of £14,000. On 28 Dec. 1854 Pope and his financial backers – his father, his father-in-law, and one George Elkana Morton of Halifax – resold the property to the government for £24,100. The Liberals had been persuaded to pay what they knew to be an exorbitant price by Pope's thinly veiled threats to take the tenantry on his new estate to court for payment of arrears in rent. The property consisted of five adjacent townships, numbers 38 to 42, in northern Kings County, and such a proceeding would have caused riots. In addition, DesBrisay allegedly extorted £1,700 from Worrell for his "services." However, the failure of Pope and his associates to transfer all of the promised 81,303 acres to the government led to the refusal of the latter to pay the final £3,000 of the purchase-price. Although his actions became public knowledge, Pope never took the trouble to deny vigorously the essentials of the case against him; as he was capable and politically ambitious, it is probable that he would have contested them could he have done so successfully. The result of this jobbery, unique in its magnitude for this period on the Island, was that his public reputation was permanently scarred.

As the 1850s progressed, William and his younger brother James Colledge Pope* became increasingly active in the Conservative party, which was then in opposition. When the Liberal government under George COLES was defeated in 1859, James, an assemblyman, was named to the Executive Council, and William, who was a member of neither branch of the legislature, was appointed colonial secretary. William's appointment was in accord with the policy of "non-departmentalism" practised by the new government. The Tories claimed that the Liberals had instituted a "spoils system," with the legislators themselves as the prime recipients of patronage, and they had promised to exclude representatives of the people from public offices of emolument, which were supposedly to be filled by non-partisans. Pope was immediately recognized by the Liberals as the most influential of the new government's public officials. Two months earlier Edward Whelan* had written that "Mr. Pope is a man whom the Tories rather fear than respect . . . he has more cunning, more perseverance in pursuit of his object (no matter what it is,) and more real talent than any other man in his party."

William Pope had already assumed a strategic position within the ruling élite. Shortly after the election of 1859, Duncan MacLean, the editor of the Islander, the leading Conservative newspaper in the colony, had died, and Pope had been appointed his successor by John Ings, the Islander's publisher and the new queen's printer. As an editor, Pope maintained the important position of his paper, and, in the tradition of MacLean, carried on a running battle with Whelan, the publisher and editor of the Examiner. Pope and Whelan were controversialists by nature, and they exhibited an interesting contrast in abilities: Whelan was a master of literary style and the pungent epigram; Pope, whose style was more laboured, exhibited precise logic and flawless argument. Together, they provided the Island public with an invaluable political dialogue.

The most momentous and lingering issue in Island politics prior to confederation was the land question. Pope's position was that although leasehold tenure was "obnoxious" and had "injurious" effects upon the colony, whatever was to be done must be done "without infringing the rights of property." The absentee landlords were "not blamable for the existence of the leasehold system"; rather, the "great injustice" had been inflicted by the imperial government in 1767 when it imposed the system upon the Island. The current owners had full legal title to their holdings, and hence all benefits to their tenants must come "by the favor of the Proprietors." Radical schemes such as escheat were out of the question: "the rights of property – sacred in all civilized countries – will be inviolably preserved." The proper course for the tenantry was to enter into "friendly negociation [sic] with the Proprietors." The new Tory government, intimately connected with men of position and wealth, was ideally suited to play the role of mediator between landlord and tenant.

But it was not over the Worrell estate, or the land question in general, that Pope gained his greatest fame – or notoriety – on the Island. The Conservative victory of 1859 had been accomplished largely through skilful exploitation of Protestant anxieties over the Bible question, in which Pope himself had not taken an active part, and the result had been division of the electorate almost entirely on religious lines. Although William Pope had been born into a Methodist family, he was widely known to be an "infidel" – the contemporary Island name for atheists, agnostics, Unitarians, and apostates – and he did not have strong convictions about the intrinsic rightness or wrongness of either Protestantism or Roman Catholicism. After 1860, or when the role of the Bible in the district schools had been defined to the general satisfaction of all concerned, Pope and the premier, Edward Palmer, saw no reason for the estrangement between their party and the Roman Catholic Church to continue. In early 1861 Palmer and his chief lieutenant in the cabinet, Colonel John Hamilton Gray*, made two clandestine attempts to gain the friendship of the Catholic hierarchy by offering certain concessions in the field of education; both efforts failed, largely because of ill fortune.

Meanwhile, William Pope stumbled upon a third opportunity for reconciliation. By chance, Bishop Peter MacIntyre* mentioned to him that he planned to present a petition to the government asking for endowment of the Roman Catholic St Dunstan's College. Pope then promised to approach the government and its friends, in order to canvass support for the grant in advance, if the bishop would postpone presentation of his petition. MacIntyre agreed, and Pope proceeded to consult with the Executive Council, the caucus, and members of the Protestant clergy. With the exception of Palmer and Gray, no one gave him much encouragement; indeed, most of those with whom he spoke said they would oppose the endowment under any circumstances.

When Pope reported his bad news to MacIntyre, the latter became angry, and declared that in the next election he would mobilize the Island's Roman Catholics as never before in order to defeat the all-Protestant government. Pope apparently believed that the bishop was in earnest, and consequently changed his mind about the direction that relations between the Conservatives and the Catholic population should take. The Tories, it seemed, would have to rely upon a purely Protestant appeal if they were to retain the support of a majority of Island electors. In the summer of 1861, Pope published a series of "Letters to the Protestants of Prince Edward Island." His political message, expressed in the first letter, was that "as parties now stand, ANY GOVERNMENT OTHER THAN AN EXCLUSIVELY PROTESTANT ONE, MUST OF NECESSITY BE VIRTUALLY A ROMAN CATHOLIC ONE." The letters that followed became abusive of Catholic beliefs, referring to the Real Presence as "a God made of a little flour and water," and warning Protestants that the Council of Trent had pronounced non-believers in the Eucharist "accursed." "Pope's Epistles against the Romans," as Whelan labelled the series, marked the beginning of 18 months of religious disputation in the Island press. The main protagonists were Pope and the rector of St Dunstan's, Father Angus MacDonald*. A formidable polemicist, who always acted in full consciousness of his objectives rather than an excess of zeal, Pope was rapidly becoming the most controversial public figure in the colony, and the bête noire of the Liberals.

Father MacDonald and William Pope had already clashed in public concerning the temporal powers of the papacy, and now, in the latter part of 1861, the rector took up the defence of his church. Matters became more serious in February 1862 when MacDonald, in referring to some abusive anonymous correspondence in David Laird*'s Protestant, declared that the letters in question were obviously written "by some low rabid character who holds the same position in the literary world, that a rowdy, blackleg, or pimp does in the social one." Such a person, said the rector, was W. H. Pope. This prompted Pope to write an open letter to MacDonald, in which he quoted St Jerome to show that Roman Catholicism and ignorance were natural concomitants, cited Baronius to prove that the early popes were "harlot chosen," and finally asked whether, like the augurs of ancient Rome, Father Angus laughed at the credulity of those who believed that "a little wheaten flour" could become God. In the same number, "A Protestant," who in reality was William Pope, submitted a price-list of indulgences and dispensations, dated 1514. After these inflammatory epistles, Pope retired from the quarrel.

MacDonald added a new dimension to the feud in the summer of 1862 by asking both the lieutenant governor, George DUNDAS, and the secretary of state for the colonies, the Duke of Newcastle [Henry Pelham Clinton], to dismiss Pope from office because of his attacks upon Roman Catholic beliefs. The attempt was unsuccessful, and after the furor surrounding it had subsided – MacDonald published his letters and Pope replied – the vendetta dropped out of public sight for two months. Then in September Pope wrote an editorial claiming: "The grand aim of the Roman Catholic Clergy on this Island is to obtain a grant for their College of Saint Dunstan. This they cannot procure unless the present Government can be ousted." The Liberal press and MacDonald replied by asserting that the government itself had intended to endow the college. Pope denied this, and gave his full version of the conversations of the spring of 1861, which had not hitherto been made public.

In the course of his disclosures, Pope drove his accusers from the field; it was a devastating display of the logical powers of his mind, and it meant that the Palmer government retained the confidence of Island Protestants. The results of the controversies generated by the revelations of September and October were momentous: an ultramontane newspaper was founded, the militant Presbyterians and Orangemen were mobilized against "Romish aggression," and the Conservatives won the general election of January 1863 on the religious-educational issue. William Pope entered the lists, and successfully contested Belfast, the most Presbyterian constituency in the colony. Once elected to the assembly, Pope joined the Executive Council, and remained colonial secretary, as non-departmentalism was abandoned after a trial of four years.

The session following the election was tempestuous from start to finish. William Pope, at the apex of his power and influence in Island politics, was brimming with calm spite, for he was aware that MacDonald was again writing – although in vain – to London to have him removed from office. On St Patrick's Day, Pope introduced a bill to incorporate the colony's Grand Orange Lodge, and the ferocity of the debate which followed has probably never, before or since, been equalled in the legislative history of the Island. The nadir was reached when George William Howlan*, a Catholic Liberal, accused Pope of having said outside the house "that a Catholic woman going to confess to a priest was the same as taking a mare to a stallion." But the "religious question" had by this time reached a peak in intensity; within a few months it appeared to have burned itself out.

In the meantime, the land question remained unsolved. The Palmer government had in 1860 arranged for the appointment of a distinguished three-man commission, whose recommendations had been disallowed by the London government, at the urging of the proprietors. In the summer of 1863, the Island government, now led by Colonel Gray, renewed its efforts to settle the issue, and delegated two leading cabinet members, Pope and Palmer, to go to England to confer with the Colonial Office and the landlords. The two delegates proceeded to London, and on 13 October presented Newcastle with a new set of proposals; he immediately passed them on to Sir Samuel Cunard*, who at that time owned one-sixth of the land in the colony, and who was acting on behalf of a group of proprietors. Since it appeared that the negotiations would be lengthy, Palmer sailed for the Island in early November, leaving Pope alone to deal with the British government and Cunard. The Colonial Office expected little difficulty in handling Pope for they had formed an unflattering opinion of him through the unseemly vendetta with MacDonald; on 14 September the permanent undersecretary had written that "the appointment of Mr. Pope does not look as if this matter [the delegation] could come to much."

However, when Cunard and his associates refused the October proposals, Pope responded vigorously. He wrote detailed and well-documented replies to Cunard's statement, and declared that "high as may be the respect entertained for the legal rights of the land owners, there are cases in which they should give way to the requirements of 'public policy.' " For example, there was no possibility that full arrears in rents could be collected; the whole purpose of the delegation was to get the landlords to consent to a compromise. The consequence of intransigence, Pope predicted on 13 Jan. 1864, would be "those much to be dreaded evils, which necessarily result from wide-spread agrarian agitation." Events soon proved him correct: the tenants of the Island were already forming a new and militant organization, the Tenant League, whose members were pledged to resist payment of rents. The commission and the delegation had failed, and by August 1865 troops were required to maintain the legal rights of property in Prince Edward Island [see HODGSON].

When the question of a union of the British North American colonies arose in 1863 and 1864, William Pope was one of the very few Islanders to advocate it enthusiastically. He attended both the Charlottetown and the Quebec conferences, and was an honorary secretary of the latter. Soon after the Quebec Conference, he found himself at odds with Palmer, who opposed confederation, and who attempted to regain the premiership at the expense of Colonel Gray. In mid-December 1864, Gray resigned under pressure; but Palmer failed to become president of the Executive Council, because William Pope came to the defence of the colonel. At issue was Palmer's consistency on the confederation question, and Pope pursued him with the cold fury and relentless logic which he had unleashed upon MacDonald in September and October 1862. Pope won the argument, but in the longer perspective Palmer could claim a considerable victory: the Conservative party would not now lead the Island into confederation. With this in mind, and aware that public opinion supported Palmer rather than himself and William Pope, Gray refused to resume the premiership or a seat on the Executive Council.

A makeshift government, led by James Pope, took office. Although his brother was now premier, William became increasingly isolated within the cabinet. During the 1865 session, when James was on the point of moving the house into committee on the Quebec terms, William presented eight pro-confederation resolutions before his younger brother could speak. James accused William of having, "to say the least of it, acted most uncourteously." The defeat of William's resolutions, and the acceptance of James's counter-resolutions, were foregone conclusions, but the incident served to widen the breach between the colonial secretary and his colleagues. The finishing blow came in the 1866 session, when William was absent on a trade delegation to Brazil: James Pope presented the "No terms Resolution" on confederation, expressing the belief that union with Canada was not a foreseeable possibility. Shortly after his return, William resigned as executive councillor and colonial secretary, in protest against this position.

The rest of William Pope's public career is anti-climactic when contrasted with the immense power and influence which he had wielded in the first half of the 1860s. He remained editor of the Islander until Ings sold the newspaper in October 1872, but he did not even contest the election of 1867 which the Tories lost badly. The party was hopelessly fragmented by the confederation question; Gray and James Pope also declined to run.

From this time until his appointment to the bench in 1873, William Pope concentrated upon two objectives: the entry of the Island into confederation, and, as the means to this end, the rebuilding of the Conservative party on a strong confederate base.

The Tories were in a sad state, but the Liberal government was vulnerable because they had their own serious divisions over the land and school questions. The session of 1868 revealed a deep fissure in their ranks over whether to give public aid to Roman Catholic schools, including St Dunstan's, under the control of Bishop McIntyre. William Pope had already shown renewed interest in the college's financial problems; in February he had declared in favour of a grant, without mentioning any conditions to be met. He warned of the tendency of the age to infidelity, and recommended that Roman Catholics "force" the school question upon the government.

Pope – who had with his usual coolness and deliberation changed his political strategy, not his religious convictions – kept constant pressure on the government throughout early 1868, and eventually published a draft bill that embodied the amendments he desired in the education act. In November 1868 James Pope contested a by-election in Prince County, Fifth District, on the promise to give public aid to all "efficient" schools. Despite the active support of MacIntyre, the Islander, the leader of the opposition (T. H. Haviland* Jr), and the approval of Gray, James lost badly. Consequently, the Popes decided to let the school question stand for the present. Their attempt to inaugurate a new party system on the basis of a partnership between the Conservative confederates and the Roman Catholic Liberals had been premature.

Nonetheless, William Pope did not give up his advocacy of confederation. He continued to write editorials on the subject, gave public lectures, kept in contact with John A. Macdonald, and sent memorials and pamphlets to London. The election of 1870 provided the opportunity for forging the new alliance. Palmer and David Laird, the leaders of the anti-confederate faction within the Conservative party, were defeated, and James Pope, now ambivalent on the confederation issue, was returned to the assembly as leader of the party. The Liberals had won by the margin of 17 to 13, but they immediately shattered on the rock of the school question, largely owing to the inept leadership of Robert P. Haythorne*.

Soon after the Liberals split, James Pope joined with George Howlan and his followers to form a coalition government. But in the meantime, William Pope had prepared a rationale for his brother to refuse the Roman Catholic demands, which, if met, might have split Pope's group: no Protestant Conservative had submitted the subject of denominational grants to his constituents at the late election, and nothing, William said, could be done without a mandate from the people. Yet the Popes did not follow the example of the Protestant Liberals, and close the door for all time – denominational grants were not rejected in principle. The basis of the new alliance was mutual self-denial: no action would be taken on the confederation or school questions until they had been presented to the electorate. The Tories had won over the Roman Catholic legislators and returned to power; one of William Pope's objectives had been accomplished.

Less than three years after its formation, the Pope-Howlan coalition led the Island into confederation. In early 1871 a sudden desire for a railway swept the Island, and the coalition responded by passing appropriate legislation. The new project, which William Pope had been advocating for several years, drove the colony to the brink of bankruptcy; by early 1872 public alarm was so great that James Pope was forced to call an election, in which his government was badly defeated. However, the damage to the Island's finances was irreparable: Haythorne and Palmer, the strongly anti-confederate leaders of the new government, conceded defeat in February 1873 and delegated Haythorne and David Laird to go to Ottawa to negotiate terms. When they returned, a new election was called, which was won by James Pope on the promise of better terms.

With the coming of confederation in July 1873, the Macdonald government appointed William Pope judge of the Prince County Court. He had an outstanding record on the bench: of several thousand decisions, only two were appealed, and in both cases he was upheld by the provincial Supreme Court. During his career as a lawyer and jurist he was twice (in 1861 and 1878) asked to undertake the revision and consolidation of the Island's statutes.

William Henry Pope died on 7 Oct. 1879 as the result of a stroke suffered a few days earlier. He had been a truly remarkable Islander. As well as being an outstanding member of his chosen profession, he had a wide variety of interests and connections. At the time of his death he was planning to write a history of the Island; he had done primary research in the archives of the Colonial Office and elsewhere during trips to the mother country. In London itself, he was three times (in 1863, 1866, and 1870) elected as one of the 15 honorary non-British members of the Athenaeum Club; he was also a friend and correspondent of some of the most distinguished Englishmen of the period.

By the standards of the day, his tastes were quite extravagant, and despite his shrewdness, he was a poor manager of his personal finances. His sudden death left his family in difficult circumstances.

William Pope's principal vocations were politics and journalism. With undoubted abilities he was for years considered to be the most influential member of his party. When his brother was premier, it was often said that "William made the snowballs and James threw them." William was at the centre of the bitter religious-educational controversies of the early 1860s. He was also the Island's most forceful and persistent advocate of confederation, and he masterminded the creation in 1870 of a new Tory party, which was destined to be the vehicle for the entry of the Island into confederation. Most famous off the Island as a father of confederation, it was, nevertheless, in the role of political manipulator that Pope was best known at home. In short, from the late 1850s to the early 1870s, William Henry Pope was the éminence grise of the Conservative party of Prince Edward Island.

Ian Ross Robertson

[There are two collections of W. H. Pope papers; the larger is in PAC, MG 27, F2, and the other in the possession of General Maurice Pope of Ottawa to whom the author is indebted for his permission to examine the material and for a helpful interview on 20 May 1968. PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), includes a number of Pope-Macdonald letters written between 1870 and 1876. Pope appears to have been Macdonald's closest ally on P.E.I. Letters referring to Pope's financial problems can also be found in PAPEI, Henry Jones Cundall, letter books, 1874–78. The papers of administration for Pope's estate are in Prince Edward Island, Supreme Court, Estates Division. Prince Edward Island, Executive Council, Minutes, 1863–66, the years during which Pope was a member of the Executive Council, can be found at PAPEI. The Grand Orange Lodge of Prince Edward Island allowed the author to examine its records. Its Annual Report, 1865, refers to Pope as "Brother, the Honorable W. H. Pope," indicating that he was, at least temporarily, an Orangeman. Scattered references to Pope can also be found in PRO, CO 226, throughout the volumes covering the years 1857 to 1873. For details of the sale of the Worrell estate see CO 226/88, 248–69, 446–65; for Pope's views on the defences of P.E.I. see CO 226/102, 294–97. See also: Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Debates and proceedings, 1856, 61; 1857, 105; 1863–65, especially 1864, 16; Journals, 1863–65, especially 1864, app.W. Abstract of the proceedings before the Land Commissioners' Court, held during the summer of 1860 to inquire into the differences relative to the rights of landowners and tenants in Prince Edward Island, reporters J. D. Gordon and David Laird (Charlottetown, 1862), 13, 30, 237 (copies in PAC, PAPEI, and Redpath Library at McGill University).

Islander (Charlottetown), 1859–71, provides the most comprehensive picture of the political positions and attitudes of W. H. Pope. The most valuable source for tracing the progress of the Pope-Palmer delegation of 1863–64 is a series of 19 letters written between September 1863 and February 1864 and published in the issue of 26 Feb. 1864. Pope's own description of the objectives of the delegation is given in the issue of 21 Aug. 1863. For examples of Pope's efforts on behalf of confederation see Islander, 10 Feb. 1865, in which he published a lecture he had given on the subject. The issue of 21 June 1867 gives Pope's opposition to the efforts of the Coles government to obtain a loan in aid of settling the land question. The issues of 24 Nov. and 1 Dec. 1865 explain Pope's purposes as a member of the 1865–66 delegation to Brazil; see also 18 May 1866 and 19 Feb. 1869.

In 1862 and 1863 the Examiner (Charlottetown) and the Vindicator (Charlottetown) published a considerable number of anti–W. H. Pope articles. Some are interesting and useful for the factual material they contain on Pope's life, for example, Vindicator, 27 March and 26 June 1863. Its 7 Nov. 1862 issue carried the proceedings of a libel suit launched by Pope against Edward Whelan.

Obituaries of William Henry Pope will be found in Examiner, 7 Oct. 1879; Patriot (Charlottetown), 9 Oct. 1879; Pioneer (Montague, P.E.I.), 10 Oct. 1879; Gazette (Montreal), 20 Oct. 1879 (reprinted from Island Argus (Charlottetown), 14 Oct. 1879, which does not survive).

The main studies of interest include: Bolger, PEI and confederation, which gives a full account of Pope's role as a father of confederation: see especially 90–99, 113–14, 155–60. Duncan Campbell, History of Prince Edward Island (Charlottetown, 1875), 163–66. Careless, Brown, II, 155, gives George Brown's impression of the W. H. Pope household. W. L. Cotton, Chapters in our Island story (Charlottetown, 1927), 80, briefly mentions one of Pope's early business ventures. Creighton, Road to confederation, 13. MacKinnon, Government of PEI. MacMillan, Catholic Church in PEI, chap. 13–17, 20, 23, and 24, give a partisan and sometimes misleading account of Pope's involvement in the church-state issue. Past and present of Prince Edward Island . . . , ed. D. A. MacKinnon and A. B. Warburton (Charlottetown, [1906]), contains three relevant articles: "The Pope family" (which does not include a consideration of W. H. Pope but provides valuable background material on his family), "W. H. Pope," and W. L. Cotton, "The press in Prince Edward Island." Pioneers on Prince Edward Island, ed. Mary Brehaut (Charlottetown, 1959), 13. J. B. Pollard, Historical sketch of the eastern regions of New France, from the various dates of their discoveries to the surrender of Louisburg, 1758: also Prince Edward Island, military and civil (Charlottetown, 1898), 200. [Joseph Pope], Public servant: the memoirs of Sir Joseph Pope, ed. and completed by Maurice Pope (Toronto, 1960), contains several interesting personal sidelights on W. H. Pope. Waite, Life and times of confederation, 8, 51–52, 180. W. M. Whitelaw, The Maritimes and Canada before confederation, with intro.

by P. B. Waite (Toronto, 1966), 198. D. C. Harvey, "Dishing the Reformers," RSCT, 3rd ser., XXV (1931), sect.II, 37–44, gives an account of the genesis, growth, and eventual death of the system of "non-departmentalism" under which Pope held office for four years. Robertson, "Religion, politics, and education in PEI," assesses Pope's role in the issues centring on religion and education in chap. 4–8; see also 153–54, 166, 167 174, 289. I.R.R.]

PORTER, JAMES, Congregational clergyman and educator; b. at Highgate (in London), Eng., 16 May 1812; d. at Toronto, Ont., 18 April 1874.

James Porter studied in London at University College and at Coward Theological School, graduating in 1836. In the same year he married Agnes Dryden, by whom he had several children, and entered the ministry of the Independent (Congregational) Church, serving in Lancashire, Dorsetshire, and Devonshire successively.

In 1843 he was called by Dr Henry Wilkes* of Montreal, the superintendent of missions for Canada East and Canada West for the Colonial (later Commonwealth) Missionary Society, to the oldest church of that society in New Brunswick, that of Sheffield. After nine years in Sheffield he became the superintendent of education for the colony. A year and a half later, in 1853, he left this post to found a newspaper in Saint John, the Saint John Free Press. When that failed in 1854 he went back to preaching, lecturing, and writing, particularly for the temperance cause. He supplied the Congregational church in Windsor, Canada West, for six months, but returned to Saint John and again vacillated between the ministry and secular work. In 1857 he received a call from the London Congregational Church, Canada West, and moved there with his family. A year later, in June 1858, he became superintendent of public schools for the city of Toronto, succeeding George Anthony BARBER.

As superintendent (later inspector), Porter was responsible for examining prospective teachers, and for the appointment and inspection of teachers. He also oversaw the curriculum of the schools and their erection and maintenance. He retained the post until his death, 16 years later, and saw his charge grow from 35 teachers and 2,500 pupils to 65 teachers and 8,500 pupils. Many innovations in the curriculum were made, including the introduction of music, drawing, the military cadet system, and night classes. He remained a minister in the Congregational Church, worshipping in Zion Church, Toronto, and later in Bond Street Church.

He was a devoted and "a sound and accurate scholar," sensitive to the task of his teachers and with a high regard for the responsibilities of public office. He won the esteem and respect of all. His obituary contains this fine tribute: "He was a scholar, a Christian and a gentleman."

EARL B. EDDY

Canadian Independent (London; Toronto), XX (1874), 352–54. Harbinger (Montreal), II (1842), 181. Toronto, Local Superintendent of Public Schools, Reports, 1859–70; Inspector of Public Schools, Reports, 1871–74. Middleton, Municipality of Toronto, I, 541–43.

PRAT, JEAN-BAPTISTE, (also known as John Pratt), businessman, industrialist, and financier; b. 20 July 1812 at Berthier (Berthier County), L.C., son of Jean-Baptiste Prat, a merchant, and Louise Paillé (Paillard); d. 22 July 1876 at Montreal, Que.

Jean-Baptiste Prat's forefather Jean Duprat was originally from Agenais, France. In 1833, after attending a commercial school at Berthier, Jean-Baptiste Prat rejoined his elder brother Charles-Ferdinand, who was running a general store at Quebec. In the same year they went into partnership, and their firm took the name of C.-F. Pratt & Frère; Jean-Baptiste was also responsible for opening a branch at Trois-Rivières. In 1839 he established himself at Montreal, and launched a third firm there, which traded in wholesale leather under the name of John Pratt & Cie. Success was not long in coming. From then on the Prat brothers specialized in leather goods. They started a tannery, which employed several dozen men, at Roxton Falls (Shefford, Que.). Leather was widely used at that time, particularly for footwear, harnesses for draught-animals, parade-horses, the cavalry and the mounted police, and seats for cabs and carriages.

As time passed Jean-Baptiste, or John Pratt, closely involved as he was in the city's business life, became a member of the boards of directors of several important companies, which were generally set up under English names, such as Canadian Rubber (today Dominion Rubber Company), Montreal Weaving, Citizens' Insurance Company, Montreal Cotton, and finally Dominion Oilcloth and Linoleum. He was also president of the Banque du Peuple, a truly French Canadian institution, which was founded in 1833 and remained in operation until 1895, and presided over the destinies of the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, which in 1913 became the Canada Steamship Lines [see SINCENNES]. Jean-Baptiste Prat was a Montreal harbour commissioner in 1863, and again in 1874 under Alexander Mackenzie*'s government, and was still holding this office at the time of his death. He was a liberal in politics, and a loyal supporter of Antoine-Aimé Dorion* and his group.

Prat assigned part of his fortune to charitable institutions, and paid for the education of several young people. Thus he supported a school of elementary and industrial draughtsmanship, founded and directed by Abbé Joseph Chabert, a Frenchman who had taken refuge at Montreal and who, despite his title, was not a priest.

According to Le National, Prat's opinion, in Canada, "enjoyed unquestioned authority wherever business dealings were involved. He was one of the most outstanding businessmen in his country and even in North America." The journalists of the day said that he was a millionaire. However, the inventory of his possessions drawn up in November 1876 by the notary Léonard-Ovide Hétu shows that in reality his fortune amounted to $625,000; it was divided between real estate – more than a half – and shares in banks or commercial companies. Half of these shares were American securities, which were at that time devalued by two thirds because of "the prevalent commercial and financial crisis," as the attesting notary recorded.

In 1840, at Montreal, Jean-Baptiste Prat had married Mathilde Roy, widow of the unfortunate Charles-Ovide Perrault*, lawyer and assemblyman for Vaudreuil, who was killed in November 1837 at the battle of Saint-Denis. They had four daughters and three sons. In 1861 the eldest girl, Mathilde, married Désiré Girouard*, an eminent jurist.

JEAN-JACQUES LEFEBVRE

AJM, Greffe de L.-O. Hétu, 27 nov. 1876 (inventory of John Pratt's estate). Journal de Québec, 25 juill. 1876. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 3 août 1876. Atherton, Montreal, III, 120–24. L.-A. Rivet, "John Pratt: artisan de l'essor économique des nôtres au siècle dernier," La Presse (Montréal), 30 mars 1950.

PRESCOTT, Sir HENRY, officer in the Royal Navy and colonial administrator; b. at Kew, England, on 4 May 1783, son of Admiral Isaac Prescott; m. in July 1815 to Mary Anne Charlotte d'Auvergne by whom he had at least one daughter, the poet Henrietta Prescott Lushington; d. in London on 18 Nov. 1874.

Henry Prescott entered the Royal Navy in 1796 aboard Formidable; he was commissioned lieutenant in 1802 and promoted commander in 1808. Most of Prescott's naval service during the Napoleonic wars was in the Mediterranean; in fact his rapid elevation to post rank in 1810 was a reward for gallantry at Amantea, Italy, in the same year. Captain Prescott was on naval duties in Brazilian waters and in the Pacific until 1825 when he returned to England and was paid off.

The last of the 19th-century naval governors of Newfoundland, Henry Prescott received his appointment in 1834. He arrived in St John's on 3 Nov. 1834, the week of Thomas COCHRANE's departure, an exodus which must have warned him that the eminence of his position would not necessarily protect him against mud-slinging opponents. Prescott inherited from Cochrane a disturbed social and political situation. It was scarcely possible for the new governor to set a foot in the right place in a colony where Anglo-Irish quarrels were complicated by Catholic-Protestant enmity, and which was embittered by disagreements between merchants and fishermen and by West Country versus native rivalry for public office.

Prescott immediately sought ways to reduce the political and religious tension in the colony; he discontinued the libel case which Cochrane had begun against Father Edward TROY, and tried deperately to play the role of a disinterested administrator between the opposing factions in church and state affairs. His neutral position was soon compromised, however, by the unseemly quarrels between the Catholic bishop, Michael Anthony Fleming*, and Chief Justice Henry John Boulton*, the uncompromising spokesman of the establishment. Boulton, a Protestant, urged a revision of the laws governing fishermen and merchants which would be favourable to the merchants, whereas Bishop Fleming supported the local fishermen. A quarrel between a Protestant firm, Slade, Elson and Company, and Catholic fishermen at St Mary's in 1835 precipitated an open conflict between the chief justice and the bishop. Prescott, a man of compromise, considered both dangerous. He had at first established friendly relations with the bishop but within a year of his arrival he was embroiled with him and was openly accused of being a captive of the merchants who dominated the colonial economy and the Executive Council, such as John MUNN, Thomas BENNETT, and William Thomas*. The judgement of D. W. Prowse* that Prescott "disliked Boulton, but appears to have been either unable or unwilling to control him" is far from accurate, for the governor with a letter to the colonial secretary, Lord Glenelg [Charles Grant], on 5 Jan. 1838 initiated proceedings leading to the removal of the fractious chief justice from the bench and the council on 5 July. Prescott also encouraged the home government to seek the removal of Bishop Fleming. In the latter attempt he was unsuccessful and the attempt increased his disfavour among Catholic radicals. Prescott nevertheless participated in later efforts of the home government to induce the pope to remove Fleming. In 1840 only the spiritual accomplishments of the bishop saved him from dismissal, and it appears that following his summons to Rome in that year his political influence declined.

Prescott's administration must be judged within the context not only of the problems which troubled all British North American colonies in the 1830s, but also of Newfoundland's limited experience in constitutional government. A legislature had been functioning for barely two years when Prescott arrived, and the problems which bedevilled his rule were part of the warp and woof of the colony's life. He was damned by either side for his part in the removal of Boulton and the silencing of Fleming; by the Catholic-controlled assembly (after 1837) for his partiality to the Protestant-controlled council, and by the latter for his appointment of the Catholic radical, Patrick Morris*, to the council in 1840 in an effort to improve the Catholic position on that body. He was criticized by the Colonial Office for advocating an improvement of the garrison to aid the civil power (although there was a lack of police and a continuing situation of danger), and yet also for not sending troops to Bay Roberts during the highly disturbed election of 1840 in time to prevent an outbreak of violence. There were certainly achievements in his régime: the setting up of the first non-denominational elementary schools in 1836 by the first education act in Newfoundland, a continuation of Cochrane's road-building efforts and in 1837 the appointment of the colony's first road commissioners, and the encouragement of agriculture to supplement the unpredictable fisheries. But these were supported, opposed, or evaluated on narrow political and religious grounds. That Prescott was not a trained colonial administrator is obvious, but that he possessed considerable sagacity and judgement is indicated by his important dispatch of 4 July 1839 to Lord Normanby [Sir Constantine Henry Phipps], in which he set forth what was, on the whole, a prudent policy to meet the degenerating political situation. Prescott called for an imperial act to enforce the provisions of the Newfoundland Representation Act of 1834, so that Newfoundland would be divided into more districts and a property qualification for representatives in the assembly would be established. By a supplementary letter he recommended simultaneous nomination and polling days throughout the colony.

In the summer of 1838 events occurred in St John's which finally caused Prescott to attempt to resign. John KENT, member of the amalgamated legislature, and Edward Kielly, government medical officer, had a disagreement on the streets of St John's which led Kent to complain to the assembly that Kielly had been guilty of a "gross breach" of its privileges. Dr William Carson*, the speaker of the assembly, called Kielly before the house demanding an apology. The ensuing dispute over the jurisdiction of the assembly went to the Supreme Court of Newfoundland in the autumn, which ruled against Kielly and therefore in favour of the assembly. Prescott, appalled at the overbearing conduct of the assembly in defence of its privileges, had earlier prorogued the house for a week, and in January 1839 resigned. Glenelg did not accept his resignation, and later backed his action. (The whole case was finally settled before the Privy Council on 11 Jan. 1843 when the queen was asked to reverse the decision of the Newfoundland Supreme Court.)

In 1841 Prescott was in England to participate in a parliamentary inquiry, which subsequently led to a modification of Newfoundland's constitution. The Colonial Office did not accept his advice on the reform of the constitution, and on principle Prescott resigned again in May. This time his resignation was accepted, partly as a result of the home government's agreement with Sir Richard Henry Bonnycastle*, who supported the appointment of a civil administrator. Prescott was succeeded by Sir John Harvey*, and returned to naval life.

Prescott was awarded the captain's good service pension in 1841, promoted rear-admiral in 1847, and for a few months was a lord of the Admiralty until in December he accepted the post of admiral-superintendent of the Portsmouth Dockyard, which he held until 1852. He became a vice-admiral in 1854, an admiral in 1860, and admiral of the blue in 1862; he was nominated KCB in 1856 and GCB in 1869, and for a time was JP for Surrey.

FREDERIC F. THOMPSON

PRO, CO 194/90–194/111. Times (London), 20 Nov. 1874. DNB. G.B., Adm., Navy lists (London), 1844–74. John Marshall, Royal naval biography . . . (2v. and supps, London, 1823–30), supp. 2, 197. O'Byrne, Naval biog. dict. Gunn, Political history of Nfld. Prowse, History of Nfld.

PRÉVOST, HORTENSE. See GLOBENSKY

PRICE, WILLIAM EVAN, businessman and politician; b. 17 Nov. 1827 at Quebec, son of William Price*, the first of his family in Canada, and Jane Stewart; d. 12 June 1880 at the family residence of Wolfesfield, at Quebec, and buried in Belmont cemetery.

When he was still young, William Evan Price joined the enterprise for the commercial exploitation of timber that had been established by his father in the Saguenay region, and comprised numerous centres of production spaced out between Lac Saint-Jean and Sault-au-Cochon (today Forestville), on the north shore of the St Lawrence. He was a bachelor and his usual pied-à-terre was at Chicoutimi; from there he went to the various lumbercamps, sawmills, and ships' loading points where his presence was required.

Less of a hustler than his brother David Edward*, who concerned himself with organization and numerous external activities, William Evan concerned himself particularly with maintenance of the undertaking and effective supervision of operations. However, he allowed himself to be drawn towards politics, like his brothers David Edward and Evan John*. In the federal election of 1872 he stood as Conservative candidate against Pierre-Alexis TREMBLAY, in Chicoutimi-Saguenay County. A circular sent to his electors recalled discreetly the part he had taken in social works, stressed the economic importance of the Price firm for the region, and promised to press for the building of the railway that was to link this region with the capital of the province; representing an almost entirely Catholic population, although Protestant himself, he undertook furthermore to support Catholic schools with his influence, and to follow "always and above all, in politics, the advice of the bishops and priests." He was elected on 10 September, and was a member of the House of Commons until the dissolution of parliament on 2 Jan. 1874.

On 20 July 1875 William Evan was elected as a Conservative to the Legislative Assembly of Quebec to represent the same county. He did not attend the 1875 session, but from 1876 to 1878 he served on several special committees, in particular the committee on railways, canals, telegraph lines, mines, and manufactures, and the committee on agriculture, immigration, and colonization. In 1878 and 1879, when the ministry of Henri-Gustave Joly* stayed in power only by a slim majority, Price's vote with the liberals was sometimes decisive. Because of ill health, which obliged him to make protracted stays in Georgia, he resigned on 13 Feb. 1880; he died four months later.

William Evan Price, who was cultured and benevolent, and a man of refined behaviour, received French language newspapers, was a member of the Mechanics' Institute and of the Chicoutimi library, and director of the Agricultural Society. In addition he maintained friendly relations with the bishop and the majority of the priests in the region, and enjoyed the respect of his employees and of the people. He showed himself generous and ready to help the unfortunate. The old folk who knew him called him "the best of the Prices." In 1882 a monument was raised to him at Chicoutimi; it also bore the name of his father, who had died in 1867.

VICTOR TREMBLAY

The Price papers, property of the Price Company Limited (Quebec), contain valuable information on the activities of the Price family; they are being reclassified by the company at this time and the author was unable to consult them.

ASHS, Documents, adresse aux électeurs, 1872; Documents, témoignage de J.-A. Gagné, 22 août 1872; Documents, Institut des artisans de Chicoutimi; Dossiers Price, nos.4, 6, 16, 17, 70, 325; Mémoires d'anciens. Quebec, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1875–80. Le Canadien (Québec), 28 août, 27 oct., 30 oct. 1872; 20 oct. 1873; 14 juin, 16 juin 1880. Le Courrier du Canada (Québec), 4 oct. 1872; 14 juin, 6 août 1880; 5 juill. 1881; 7 juill. 1882. L'Électeur (Québec), 25 juill. 1881. Journal de Québec, 7 juin 1870; 24 sept., 4 oct., 7 oct., 28 oct. 1872. Le Nouvelliste (Québec), 26 févr., 14 juin 1880; 7 mai 1881. Desjardins, Guide parlementaire, 188, 223, 281. Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81, 426–27. P.-G. Roy, Fils de Québec, IV, 94–95. Inauguration du monument érigé à Chicoutimi à la mémoire de William Evan Price, 24 juin 1882 (Québec, 1882), A. R. M. Lower, "Lumbering in eastern Canada; a study in economic and social history," unpublished PHD thesis, Harvard University, 1928. Rumilly, Hist. de la prov. de Québec, I, II. Storied Quebec (Wood et al.), I, 384–85; IV, 403–5. Tremblay, Histoire du Saguenay. "Les disparus," BRH, XXXII (1926), 126.

PROULX, LOUIS, secular priest, educator, writer, parish priest, and vicar general; b. 10 April 1804 at Baie-du-Febvre (Baieville, Yamaska County), L.C., son of Louis Proulx and Élisabeth Grondin; d. 6 July 1871 at Sainte-Marie (Beauce County), Que.

After completing his classical education at the seminary of Nicolet, Louis Proulx taught from 1826 to 1830 at the seminary of Saint-Hyacinthe, where he even assumed responsibility for the direction of studies and discipline. Meanwhile, on 28 Sept. 1828, he was ordained priest at Boucherville (Chambly County). His wise leadership, as well as his brilliant talents, led his superior at Nicolet, Abbé Jean Raimbault, to send him in 1830 to assist Abbé Charles-François Painchaud*, the founder of the college of Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière, and to restore discipline there; the unskilful leadership given by the famous Abbé Étienne Chartier* had reduced the institution to a state of indescribable chaos. Proulx was successful, but remained there only three years.

He was parish priest of Saint-Pierre-les-Becquets (Nicolet County), also serving Deschaillons (Lotbinière County), from 1834 to 1835, and parish priest of Saint-Antoine-de-Tilly (Lotbinière County) from 1835 to 1847. He was then summoned to the archbishop's palace at Quebec by Archbishop Pierre-Flavien Turgeon*, to be his adviser and perhaps eventually his coadjutor. Indeed he possessed the qualities necessary in a great bishop, but, as he was also outspoken, opponents ready to divert him from this path were not lacking. In 1850 he was made parish priest of Notre-Dame de Québec, an office which had become vacant through the departure of the future coadjutor, Bishop Charles-François Baillargeon*.

During his stay at Quebec, Proulx became aware of a new talent, that of writer and polemicist. Under the pseudonym of Marteau, in the Journal de Québec, he attacked the radical ideas of L'Avenir. He also complained about the Irish immigrants, who had found shelter in large numbers in the parish of Notre-Dame de Québec; he taxed them with being ungrateful and unduly demanding in the matter of the services he or the curate rendered them at their mission in Rue Champlain. These difficulties with the Irish increased his sensitivity, and the slightest opposition from the archbishop's palace became to him hostility and ostracism. Fourteen months after becoming parish priest of Quebec, feeling himself misunderstood, he asked for "a humble post in the country." Shortly afterwards, the parish priest of Sainte-Marie de Beauce, Abbé Joseph Auclair*, was replaced by Proulx; this replacement, a distinctly surprising one, weighed as heavily upon Proulx as if it were a banishment. At that time the prejudices against Beauce were such that it was a long while before the parish priest could accept his exile and resign himself finally to it.

While at Quebec, Louis Proulx had contributed to the founding of two religious communities. In 1849 he helped to establish, at Quebec, the congregation of the Sisters of Charity, of the Hôpital Général in Montreal, under the direction of Mother Marie-Anne-Marcelle MALLET; he was their first chaplain and director. In the same year he persuaded Marie Fitzbach, later Mother Marie du Sacré-Cœur, to found a house of refuge for female prisoners; on 12 Jan. 1850 the house of the Bon-Pasteur admitted its first boarder, and six years later the congregation of the Sisters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary was established by canon law.

In 1857, at Sainte-Marie, following plans of the architect Charles Baillargé*, Proulx began the construction of a new stone church with Gothic lines, which everybody regarded as a folly. It was blessed on 20 Oct. 1859, and the interior was completed during the period 1862 to 1864. A new sacristy was built at the same time, and in it were placed an organ and altars carved by François-Xavier Berlinguet*.

Louis Proulx was a great builder and also a great educator. As soon as he arrived at Sainte-Marie he found himself involved, together with Elzéar-Henri JUCHEREAU Duchesnay, in the difficult task of reviving the schools (1850–55), after the crisis that was known as the "guerre des éteignoirs" [see Jean-Baptiste MEILLEUR]. To satisfy the important persons of the region, Proulx raised the level of study and introduced the teaching of music into the convent for girls, which was directed by the nuns of the Congregation of Notre Dame. In 1855 the size of the convent had to be doubled. In the same year, after obtaining a grant through Jean-Baptiste Meilleur's influence – obtaining a grant was no easy matter then – he enlarged the old school for boys, making of it a college which he entrusted to the Brothers of the Christian Schools.

In May and June 1871 Louis Proulx was deputed by the archbishop of Quebec, Elzéar-Alexandre Taschereau*, to go to settle the financial difficulties of the college of Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière. He did so, but it cost him the remainder of his strength, which was already undermined by toil and sickness. On his return to Sainte-Marie he took to his bed and died a month later; he was buried in the parish church. He had been appointed vicar general in 1867 under Bishop Baillargeon.

Louis Proulx was intelligent and had an open mind. He was outspoken with everybody, even his superiors. But he was apt to take offence and to be contradicted was almost unbearable to him.

HONORIUS PROVOST

AAQ, Registres des lettres des évêques de Québec, 24, 25, 28, 29; Sainte-Marie, II. ANQ, QBC, Instruction publique. Archives de la Fabrique Sainte-Marie (Beauce, Qué.), Cahiers de prônes; Comptes et délibérations, II, III. L'Asile du Bon-Pasteur de Québec d'après les annales de cet institut (Québec, 1896). Une fondatrice et son œuvre: mère Mallet (1805–1871) et l'Institut des sœurs de la Charité de Québec, fondé en 1849 (Québec, 1939). Wilfrid Lebon, Histoire du collège de Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière (2v., Québec, 1948–49), I, 431–34. Honorius Provost, Sainte-Marie de la Nouvelle-Beauce; histoire religieuse (Québec, 1967).

Q

QUERTIER, ÉDOUARD, Catholic priest, temperance advocate; b. 5 Sept. 1796 at Saint-Denis-sur-Richelieu, L.C., the second of 17 children of Hélier Quertier, a sacristan, and Marie-Anne Ariail; d. 17 July 1872 at Saint-Denis-de-Kamouraska, Que.

Édouard Quertier studied at the seminary of Nicolet from 1809 to 1815, and in Abbé Paul-Loup Archambault's words he was "the best in his class." In 1815 he enrolled for theology at the seminary of Quebec, which he left three years later. In 1820 he was at Sainte-Marie-de-la-Nouvelle-Beauce, where he was working as a tutor. He then decided in favour of law and in 1822 went to work in Charles Panet's office at Quebec. Two years later, being destitute, he was forced to abandon his legal training and asked to return to ecclesiastical life. Bishop Joseph-Octave Plessis* decided to admit Quertier only after he had had two years for reflection; during this period the young man directed the parish school of Saint-Antoine at Rivière-du-Loup (Louiseville). Finally, on 9 Aug. 1829, on the threshold of his 34th year, Édouard Quertier was ordained priest at Quebec by Bishop Bernard-Claude Panet*.

With "an athlete's build, a rugged face, heavy and prominent features, an imperious look, hair flowing from under the black skull-cap," Abbé Quertier was a remarkable man. In October 1831, after 26 months as a curate, he was appointed first resident parish priest of Saint-Antoine, on Île aux Grues (Montmagny County). "A charming little spot," Quertier wrote. "An old hovel for a lodging, the only trouble being that as it had to be half repaired twice in three years, I had to retire to the attic of my little sacristry. If I was not able to build a presbytery, everyone knows who thwarted my endeavours at that time, and everyone also knows that for the sake of peace I gave in and withdrew." The parish priest was in conflict with Abbé Charles-François Painchaud*, the owner of the site where the parish church and presbytery were built, who fiercely upheld his rights. "All the trouble . . . falls on the great benefactor of the island [Painchaud]," the parish priest wrote to Charles-Félix Cazeau*.

In the spring of 1833 Abbé Quertier visited the Mingan missions (Saguenay County); he returned to his island and lived there, grumbling the while, until 1834, when Bishop Joseph Signay* yielded to his complaints and appointed him parish priest of Saint-Georges de Cacouna. Would he be there "the angel of peace and the agent of reconciliation" that his bishop hoped for? At this period the civil and ecclesiastical powers were continually at variance. A bill designed to modify the composition of the parish council assemblies, by giving more representation to the important persons of the parish, had been presented to the Legislative Assembly during the session of 1831 and rejected by the Legislative Council; it had set the state against the church, at least in the minds of the public, by the stir it had created. Quertier was warned that at Cacouna he would be caught between two opposing groups: one in favour of building in the village itself a church intended to replace the old chapel, the other of building this new church in the country. "It is only a matter of softening and overcoming the prejudice of the people far removed from the place decided upon . . . [which is] so difficult, especially when one proceeds legally." Quertier did partly satisfy his bishop's expectations: after seven years as parish priest he had to his credit a new presbytery in the village and a renovated chapel.

As early as 1835, while he continued to assure Bishop Signay that "peace is made and almost solidly established," the priest was seeking his recall. Every now and again, in pages of bitter claims and mocking insinuations, the prolific letter-writer renewed his pleas. Finally in 1841 he received a reply, but not to his liking. In September 1841, for the second time in 12 years of ministry, Abbé Quertier was called upon to set up a new parish, that of Saint-Denis-de-Kamouraska. "How did I accept this arid rock? . . . When I arrived [in October], there was not even a piece of board on which to place a bed or a table. I had to go down the slope and rent a small house, or rather a cabin. No matter! I waited there until my lodging was acceptable."

It was however from this isolated corner that Quertier's fame was to spread. At Saint-Denis he was to realize the greatest achievement of his career, the founding of the Société de Tempérance, or Société de la Croix Noire. Since 1839 outstanding preachers, including Bishop Charles-Auguste-Marie-Joseph de Forbin-Janson* and Charles-Paschal-Télesphore Chiniquy*, had been protesting against the scourge of alcoholism. But it was Quertier who could claim the credit, in 1842, of drawing up the statutes of the temperance society, formulating the oaths of its new crusaders, and setting up as a symbol a bare black cross. The following year Quertier was able to write: "Temperance prevails everywhere. Each house is decorated with a blessed cross, the reminder of our undertakings." In 1844, the same happy affirmation: "Everything is peaceful here. I can attribute only to our society of the cross our real tranquillity, in the midst of the discords of our neighbours. . . . This blessed cross . . . must speak with its mighty language."

From 1847 on, Abbé Alexis MAILLOUX assisted Quertier. He came to be considered his most powerful collaborator, even his master. Gradually, through Quertier's action, the preaching of total abstinence spread far beyond the confines of Saint-Denis and even of the diocese of Quebec. Quertier's marvellous eloquence made him famous: in the pulpit he became in turn "the man of fire," the passionate orator, the suave preacher or the learned catechist: "There were often more people at catechism than at mass . . . ," noted the minister. "The church is often so crowded that one can barely get through." Popular belief attributed miraculous virtue to the black cross, and the Quertier rosary was thought to have extinguished fires and cured sick people.

Although the priest's memory is still revered, history must perforce acknowledge that the man was difficult: unstable and always fretful, violent by nature, given to finding fault with the neighbouring parish priests, and unreliable in his estimation of the politicians of the time. Quertier had his knuckles rapped many times by the heads of the diocese, and he made life hard for certain of his contemporaries, including the seigneur of La Bouteillerie, Pierre-Thomas Casgrain, the MLA Pierre Canac, dit Marquis, and the merchant Jean-Charles Chapais Sr.

After 15 years of parish ministry at Saint-Denis, Abbé Quertier, "old [and] worn out," obtained his retirement, which was spent in calm and serenity. As his hair whitened, the violence of the man lessened, but the faith and zeal of the priest did not decline. He died in Saint-Denis and was buried under the sanctuary of the church. Today his statue looks down from the bare hill that he climbed more than 100 years ago.

JULIENNE BARNARD

AAQ, Cahier Signay, p.196; Registres des lettres des évêques de Québec, 15, f.295; 16, f.260; 19, f.252; Séminaire de Nicolet, I, 217, 238. Archives de l'évêché de Sainte-Anne (La Pocatière, Qué.), Isle aux Grues, I, 10; Saint-Denis, I, 66, 71, 82, 100. AJQ, Greffe d'Étienne Boudreault, 9 sept. 1822. Archives paroissiales de Saint-Denis (comté de Kamouraska, Qué.), Registre des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures, 1872. Archives paroissiales de Saint-Denis (comté de Saint-Hyacinthe, Qué.), Registre des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures, 1872. "Inventaire de la correspondance de Mgr Bernard-Claude Panet, archevêque de Québec," Ivanhoë Caron, édit., APQ Rapport, 1934–35, 350.

J.-B.-A. Allaire, Histoire de la paroisse de Saint-Denis-sur-Richelieu (Canada) (Saint-Hyacinthe, Qué., 1905), 256. Julienne Barnard, Mémoires Chapais; documentation, correspondance, souvenirs (4v., Montréal et Paris, 1961–64), I, 191–237; II, 17–22, 36–39, 60, 191–92, 321–24, 346–49. N.-E. Dionne, Vie de C.-F. Painchaud; prêtre, curé, fondateur du collège Saint-Anne de la Pocatière (Québec, 1894), 399–404. J.-A.-I. Douville, Histoire du collège-séminaire de Nicolet, 1803–1903, avec les listes complètes des directeurs, professeurs et élèves de l'institution (2v., Montréal, 1903). Inauguration du monument Quertier; quatrième croisade de tempérance (Québec, Kamouraska, 1925).

R

RAE, JOHN, economist and author; b. 1 June 1796 in Footdee, a suburb of Aberdeen, Scotland, son of John Rae and Margaret Cuthbert; d. 12 July 1872 at Staten Island, New York.

John Rae, the second youngest of seven children, was the son of a well-to-do merchant and shipbuilder who suffered financial reverses and became bankrupt in 1820. Rae's childhood was marred by marital discord in his family, and some undefined mental or physical problem barred him from normal activity and encouraged his interest in intellectual pursuits very early.

Rae entered Marischal College in 1809 or 1810 and in 1815 was granted an MA. In this period he was keenly interested in science and invention, and he invented a number of devices including an apparatus for measuring ocean currents and a device for feathering paddle wheels on steamboats. He became a medical student at the University of Edinburgh in 1815 and continued his studies there until 1817. His dissertation, entitled "De vita," expounded some novel views on human society and natural science. Rae's opinion was that the medical and physiological theories of the time were irrational and burdened with traditional non-scientific notions. His theories of the origin and development of man – based on his understanding of the extreme antiquity of the earth – his experimental bias, and his belief in the virtues of comparative studies, placed him in opposition to established doctrines. He recognized that it would be imprudent to challenge the medical profession in Edinburgh and, as a result, postponed the presentation of his thesis pending further study. It was never presented and he never received his medical degree. Rae toured Norway in 1818 and probably spent some time in Paris pursuing his interest in the study of natural science. He married at about this time but all that is known of his wife is that her name was Eliza.

Rae had expected that he would inherit one of his father's estates and be able to devote his life to study. His father's bankruptcy and the loss of the property changed his plans; in the spring of 1822 he and his wife emigrated to Canada. He later wrote: "I exchanged the literary leisure of Europe for the solitude and labors of the Canadian backwoods." Rae went first to Montreal where his older sister, Ann Cuthbert*, was living. She had published two books of poetry, in 1815 and 1816, and through her second husband, merchant James Fleming, provided Rae with an entrée into the intellectual and commercial life of Montreal. He doubtless knew John Fleming*, the brother of James, an author and political commentator of some force who was an early president of the Bank of Montreal. He soon left Montreal, however, to open a boys' school in Williamstown, Upper Canada, in 1822, giving as his references the Reverend Henry Esson*, of the St Gabriel Street Church in Montreal, Alexander Skakel* of the Royal Grammar School in Montreal, and the Reverend John Mackenzie*, Presbyterian minister in Williamstown.

Williamstown had the largest Presbyterian congregation in Canada at that time and Rae became a spokesman for the Presbyterian Church in Canada in Connection with the Church of Scotland. He was intimately involved in the clergy reserves controversy, and in 1828 he published a long open letter in the Canadian Miscellany to E. G. Stanley (later the 14th Earl of Derby) on the disputes between the Church of England and the Presbyterians in Canada. Rae argued that the revenue from the clergy reserves, if managed properly and supplemented by modest public contributions, would provide ample support to both the Church of England and the Presbyterians. He also claimed that the use of 21-year leases was unsuitable in an undeveloped country and proposed instead leases extending from 70 to 100 years. This would provide an inducement for the heavy investment in clearing wild lands. Rae served briefly as one of the coroners of the Eastern District (Stormont, Dundas, and Glengarry counties), and may have practised medicine in Williamstown.

While living in Williamstown Rae travelled extensively throughout Upper Canada investigating its geology and economic prospects. In 1832 he petitioned the lieutenant governor of Upper Canada, Sir John Colborne*, for financial support for his explorations and research and announced his intention of publishing a work on the present state and resources of the colony. He intended initially to include an appendix dealing with the theoretical aspects of economic development and with Upper and Lower Canada's economic relations with England.

In 1832 and 1833, Rae contributed a number of polemical letters to the Montreal Gazette on current affairs. A vigorous letter on colonial policy late in 1832 attacked the faction which would destroy the ties between Canada and Britain. This was an emotional appeal for loyalty which buttressed his view that the economic development of the colony depended on the maintenance of the close commercial relations. Shortly after, he wrote two letters vigorously supporting high levels of immigration and attacking the anti-British group who were fearful of the effects of pauper immigration. Rae also contributed a bitter essay on the inadequacies of the educational system of Lower Canada early in 1833: he denounced the education bill of 1832 for its restrictive and parochial character and for its completely inadequate provisions for encouraging the supply of competent teachers.

Rae continued the work on his book meanwhile. He visited Boston in 1834 and with the encouragement of a number of Boston literati, including Alexander Hill Everett, the editor of the North American Review, decided to issue the appendix first as a separate publication. It appeared in 1834 with the title Statement of some new principles on the subject of political economy exposing the fallacies of the system of free trade, and of some other doctrines maintained in the "Wealth of Nations."

The main achievement of this remarkable and brilliant book was to present a theory of economic development and to analyse the influences governing the accumulation of capital. Rae's view was that individuals could become rich by acquiring greater shares of existing wealth but that nations had to create new wealth before they could become richer. They could only do so with the help of the "inventive faculty." It was thus of cardinal importance to encorage invention and to facilitate the transference of new industrial techniques from one country to another. His concept of external economies could be used to justify the adoption of protective duties, bounties, and other forms of state intervention. Rae's analysis of capital accumulation rested heavily on his concept of the "effective desire of accumulation," governed by the following influences: first, "the prevalence throughout the society, of the social and benevolent affections, or, of that principle, which, under whatever name it may be known, leads us to derive happiness, from the good we communicate to others"; second, "the extent of the intellectual powers, and the consequent prevalence of habits of reflection, and prudence, in the minds of the members of the society"; and third, "the stability of the condition of the affairs of the society, and the reign of law and order throughout it." Rae's analysis of the role of invention, of durability in capital formation, and of the economic role of the state was admirable from both a technical and a literary point of view. Many of the ideas he advanced remain applicable to the problems of developing countries in the mid-20th century.

Rae's book was not an easy one to understand and attacked the entrenched views of the followers of Adam Smith. As a result it did not achieve any popular success and did not bring Rae the acclaim he had hoped for. In England, Rae's criticism of some of the established economic doctrine and his espousal of state intervention to foster new technologies were received coldly and he was, for the most part, dismissed as presumptuous. So far as Rae's protectionist sponsors in the United States were concerned, they found his arguments too moderate and reasoned, and unsuited to the shrill and simple-minded controversy in which he had become involved. This cool reception was matched by indifference in Canada, not surprising in view of the colonial mentality and primitive economic ideas which prevailed at the time. There were two favourable references in the Montreal Gazette but this is the only direct and recognizable impact which Rae's book had on economic thought in Canada in the 19th century. Twenty years after its publication Rae wrote to John Stuart Mill about his book, "I have not looked at it for many years, and have no copy of it." His disappointment with the reception of his book was great but, having to earn a living, he turned again to schoolteaching and, late in 1834, was appointed headmaster of the Gore District grammar school in Hamilton. He remained in this position until 1848.

Rae was active in the work of the Hamilton Literary Society, which was one of the centres of intellectual life in the community. He began a lifelong friendship with Hugh Bowlby WILLSON after moving to Hamilton. Roderick William Cameron*, the son of Duncan Cameron*, and at one time a pupil of Rae's in Williamstown, moved to Hamilton to begin a distinguished mercantile career; their friendship was to last until Rae's death. Rae was also well known to Sir Allan Napier MacNab* and claimed the acquaintance of Sir Francis Bond HEAD. Rae's loyalist sentiments remained firm in the face of the reform agitation of the mid-1830s. During the armed insurrection in December 1837 Rae joined the militia to help suppress the rebels and participated in a number of skirmishes on the Niagara frontier.

During his life in Hamilton, Rae's intellectual activities continued unabated. In the summer of 1840 an announcement appeared in several newspapers that Rae's book "Outlines of the natural history and statistics of Canada" would be published in England. The manuscript was evidently rejected and later submitted for publication in New York where it was lost. He experimented with balloons using solar heat (the first recorded aeronautical experiment in Canada) and published the results in the American Journal of Science and Arts (New Haven) in 1838. He became involved in the educational and religious controversies which bedevilled Upper Canada in the 1840s and wrote a number of spirited articles in this field. He also contributed several graceful essays to the Literary Garland of Montreal and entered into a controversy in 1845 over the geology of North America with the Reverend William Turnbull Leach* in the British American Journal of Medical and Physical Science.

Beginning in 1832, the Presbyterians were concerned about the lack of a theological seminary in Canada. In 1837, as a stopgap, arrangements were made to have four young candidates for the ministry begin their studies under John Rae at the Gore District school. In 1842, when Queen's College at Kingston opened, four of Rae's students were among those enrolling in theology. On two occasions, in 1841 or 1842 and in 1845, Rae applied for a teaching post at Queen's but was turned down.

In the late 1840s Rae's relations with the trustees of the Gore District school became strained. He had become involved in the controversy with the educational authorities, spearheaded by Church of England Bishop John Strachan*, concerning the attempts to impose centralized control over the operations of the grammar schools. The board of trustees of his school, at one time dominated by Presbyterians, had changed as a result of the disruption of 1844 and Rae found himself under the control of an unsympathetic board consisting of the Reverend John Gamble Geddes*, a Church of England minister in Hamilton, and Dr William Craigie*. There were allegations about Rae's "inefficiency" as a teacher, as well as disagreement over religious matters and accommodation. The upshot was that the trustees closed the school, effectively dismissing Rae. Rae moved to Boston and then to New York where he took a teaching post. In August 1849, Rae's wife, who had stayed behind in Hamilton, died of cholera and in December Rae set off for the gold fields in California. He spent some time in Panama en route and remained in California until the spring of 1851 when, finding the gold fields unrewarding, he sailed to the Hawaiian Islands.

At some time prior to 1847, Nassau William Senior, the English political economist, acquired a copy of Rae's book and praised it highly to John Stuart Mill. Mill recognized Rae's significant contribution to the theory of capital and incorporated some of Rae's views in his Principles of political economy. Mill wrote: "in no other book known to me is so much light thrown, both from principle and history, on the causes which determine the accumulation of capital." Professor Francesco Ferrara of the University of Turin also recognized the quality of Rae's work and translated it into Italian in 1856. Copies of Rae's Statement of some new principles were scarce and its general theme was known mainly because of Mill's copious quotations. Rae himself learned of Mill's interest in 1853 and exchanged some interesting correspondence with him in 1853 and 1854.

Not long after Rae's arrival in the Hawaiian Islands he settled down on the island of Maui and began to operate a small school. He was appointed medical agent of the Board of Health in 1853 and acquired a farm in Hana. Late in the 1850s Rae was made district judge of Hana, a notary public, and a coroner. He became a close friend of Robert Crichton Wyllie, a fellow-Scot and the Hawaiian minister of foreign relations, and strongly supported Wyllie in his contests with the American missionaries. Early in 1861 he completed a long and profound article on the legislative system of the Hawaiian Islands, published in six instalments in the Polynesian. In the fall of 1862 Rae also contributed to this newspaper an essay on the "Polynesian languages," in which he developed the theory that human speech originated in facial gestures. The essay was praised by Mill, who felt that the paper would "place Dr. Rae very high among ethnologists and philologists," and by Friedrich Max Müller. Rae continued to develop his ideas on this subject and a long manuscript on languages was found among his papers. It was so badly mixed up that it could not be properly assembled and it has since been lost. He wrote voluminously on the geology of the Hawaiian Islands and enunciated some novel views on tides and volcanoes.

In the summer of 1871 Rae returned from Maui to spend his remaining years on Staten Island with his lifelong friend, Roderick William Cameron. The next summer, in his 77th year, Rae died and was buried on Staten Island in an unmarked grave.

In 1897, Charles Whitney Mixter, a student at Harvard University, published an article in the Quarterly Journal of Economics on Rae in which he ascribed to Rae some of the views of Eugen von Böhm-Bawerk set forth in the Positive Theorie des Kapitals. The resemblance was exaggerated but stimulated Böhm-Bawerk's interest and led him to include a long chapter on Rae in the second edition of his Geschichte und Kritik der Capital-zins-theorien (1900). Irving Fisher wrote an appreciative note about Rae in 1897 and dedicated his book The theory of interest (1930) "To the memory of John Rae and Eugen von Böhm-Bawerk who laid the foundations on which I have endeavoured to build." He described Rae's Statement of some new principles as "truly a masterpiece, a book of a generation or a century."

R. Warren James

[John Rae's principal work is Statement of some new principles on the subject of political economy exposing the fallacies of the system of free trade, and of some other doctrines maintained in the "Wealth of Nations" (Boston, 1834). Other works are "Letter to the Honourable Mr. Stanley, on the relative claims of the English and Scotch churches in the Canadas," Canadian Miscellany (Montreal), I (August 1828), 129–60; "How ought the clergy reserve question to be settled?" Canadian Christian Examiner and Presbyterian Magazine (Niagara, Toronto), III (1839), 217–23, 237–42, 269–74; "Thoughts on the system of legislation which has prevailed in the Hawaiian Islands for the last forty years; on the evils that have arisen from it; and on the possible remedies for these evils," Polynesian (Honolulu), 2, 9, 16 Feb., 16, 30 March, 20 April 1861; "Polynesian languages," Polynesian (Honolulu), 27 Sept., 4, 11 Oct. 1862; and "Laieikawai: a legend of the Hawaiian Islands," J. of American Folk-lore (Boston), XIII (1900), 241–60.

The following works which were signed "J.R." have been attributed to John Rae: "Loyal address to the king," Montreal Gazette, 24 Dec. 1832; "The opposition to emigration," Montreal Gazette, 19 Jan. 1833; "Emigration – Mr. Evans' letter," Montreal Gazette, 26 Feb. 1833; "Remarks on the education bill," Montreal Gazette, 19 March 1833; "Plagiarism," Literary Garland (Montreal), I (1838–39), 561–62; and "Genius and its application," Literary Garland (Montreal), II (1839–40), 33–36.

The following unsigned writings have been attributed to John Rae: "Sketches of the origin and progress of manufactures and of the policy which has regulated their legislative encouragement in Great Britain and in other countries," Canadian Review and Literary and Historical Journal (Montreal), II (1825), 122–33; and "On the state and prospects of education and learning in the Canadas," Canadian Miscellany (Montreal), I (May 1828), 33–45.

Rae's Statement of some new principles was translated into Italian by Francesco Ferrara as Dimostrazione di taluni nuovi principii sull'economia politica . . . (Biblioteca dell'economista, 1st ser., XI, Turin, 1856). C. W. Mixter republished Rae's book as The sociological theory of capital; being a complete reprint of the new principles of political economy, 1834 (New York, London, 1905). The biographical preface was very valuable but unfortunately Mixter edited and rearranged Rae's text clumsily and produced a distorted version of it. The Statement of new principles was reprinted in its original form and Rae's other writings collected and edited by R. W. James in John Rae, political economist; an account of his life and a compilation of his main writings (2v., Toronto, 1965), which also includes a study of Rae's life and work and extensive bibliographical references.

John Rae's manuscripts on geology are deposited with the National Library, Ottawa. C. D. W. Goodwin, Canadian economic thought: the political economy of a developing nation, 1814–1914 (Duke University Commonwealth-Studies Center pub., 15, Durham, N.C., London, 1961). Helmut Lehmann, John Raes Werk, seine philosophischen methodologischen Grundlagen . . . (Dresden, 1937). J. A. Schumpeter, History of economic analysis; edited from manuscript by Elizabeth Boody Schumpeter (New York, 1954). R.W.J.]

RAINY CHIEF. See SOTAI-NA

REBOUL, LOUIS-ÉTIENNE-DELILLE, priest, Oblate of Mary Immaculate, and missionary; b. 4 Dec. 1827 at Saint-Pons (department of Ardèche), France, son of Louis-Antoine Reboul and Augustine-Marie Guillon; d. 2 March 1877 at Mattawa (Nipissing District), Ont.

Louis-Étienne-Delille Reboul, son of one of the most well-to-do and reputable families at Saint-Pons, studied at the Petit Séminaire of Bourg-Saint-Andéol and at the seminary of Viviers (1847–50), then entered the noviciate of the Oblates at Notre-Dame-de-l'Osier in the department of Isère, where he made his profession on 8 Dec. 1851. He finished his studies at Marseilles, and on 27 June 1852 was ordained priest by Bishop Charles-Joseph-Eugène de Mazenod.

Reboul worked for some months at Notre-Dame-de-la-Garde at Marseilles, then left for Canada. He was sent to Bytown (Ottawa), was assistant to Bishop Joseph-Bruno GUIGUES in the surrounding missions, and devoted himself to ministering to a parish at South Gloucester (Russell County) from 1853 to 1855 and at Rivière-du-Désert (Maniwaki, Gatineau County) in 1855 and 1856. During the summers of 1854 and 1855 he worked in the Indian missions of Témiscamingue, Abitibi, and James Bay.

In the winter of 1854 Reboul undertook his first mission to the lumbercamps. He went as far as the Creuse (Deep River, Ont.) and Noire (Black River) rivers, visited the various camps of young lumber-cutters, and offered them the help of religion. He went through some 60 lumbercamps, occupied by more than 1,500 persons. In the summer, the missionary would meet these men again in the Ottawa region. Reboul became head of the mission to the Ottawa lumbercamps in 1858, and continued its work for several months each winter until his death, which occurred during one of his trips.

The rest of the year he lived at Ottawa, where he devoted himself to ministering to a parish and to the spiritual and temporal care of travellers, to whom he became a legendary apostle. He denounced unscrupulous innkeepers, and worked to break up brawls among the members of his flock and preserve peace between Catholics and Protestants. He also served the little chapel of Notre-Dame-des-Voyageurs, which had been set up at Hull for the men of the lumbercamps.

Hull grew in size after 1860; a great number of the loggers lived there with their families. The Oblates made the village a mission, and Reboul was entrusted with ministering to all the Catholics there. In 1868 he undertook the construction of a spacious church, a presbytery, and some schools. He completed all these projects without going into debt, through his ability to obtain gifts by subscription and with the help of Bishop Guigues and money from the parishioners.

In 1871 the Oblates agreed to look after the parish, and sent Reboul to reside there. He was the heart of the locality, and its father; he took an interest in everything and shrank from no task; he became president of the school commission, promoted the building of a bridge, and had an active part in obtaining a charter for the town in 1875. From 1866 to his death, Reboul also exercised his ministry at the monastery of the Good Shepherd Nuns at Ottawa.

An upright, frank, and honest man, Reboul won the affection and respect of all. Lac Reboul (Winawiah), in the region of Grand Lac de Victoria (Témiscamingue County), a school, a street, and a park in Hull recall his name.

GASTON CARRIÈRE

Archives générales O.M.I. (Rome), Dossier Louis-Étienne Reboul; Dossier Florent Vandenberghe (copies in AHO (Ottawa)). Archives provinciales O.M.I. (Ottawa), Dossier Ottawa; Dossier 1re maison; Dossier Hull; Dossier Université d'Ottawa (copies in AHO (Ottawa)). Journal de l'Ardèche (Privas), 11 avril, 12 avril 1877. Notices nécrologiques des O.M.I., III, 353–81. Carrière, Histoire des O.M.I., V, VII; Le père Louis-Étienne Reboul, oblat de Marie-Immaculée; organisateur de la vie religieuse à Hull et apôtre des chantiers (Ottawa, 1959). J. K. Foran, "In the path of the pioneer priest," The Owl (Ottawa), VII (1893), 126–28.

REES, WILLIAM, physician and surgeon; b. *c.*1800, son of Evans Rees of Bristol, Eng.; d. unmarried 4 Feb. 1874 in Toronto, Ont.

William Rees studied medicine in England under Sir Astley Cooper and came to Canada in 1819. He was assistant health officer at the port of Quebec until 1822 when he was commissioned to take medical charge of transport to England. In 1829 he moved to York (Toronto) and, after examination by the Medical Board of Upper Canada in January 1830, he purchased the practice of John Porter Daly. With the exception of a brief sojourn in Cobourg in 1832 Rees lived the rest of his life in Toronto. In 1834 he advertised a course of lectures which he hoped would form the beginning of a school of medicine. He ran unsuccessfully in the first riding of York for election to the Legislative Assembly in that year. During the Upper Canadian rebellion he was appointed surgeon to the guard-ship at Toronto and assistant surgeon to the regiment of Queen's Rangers.

Rees advocated throughout his career numerous measures for social reform and the development of public service. When he began his practice in Toronto he advertised that he would vaccinate the poor and give them medical advice free of charge. In 1837 he constructed a wharf and public baths on the waterfront at Toronto for the use of immigrants. At various times he promoted the establishment of an orphans' home, a female aid society, sailors' homes, a juvenile reformatory, an industrial farm, an institution for the treatment of alcoholics, a military and marine frontier force for defence and to provide training for indigent juveniles, a humane society to reward heroic rescue acts and to punish cruelty to animals, a medical dispensary and vaccine institution for the poor, a provincial board of prison and sanitary inspectors, a provincial museum with botanical and zoological gardens, and new waterworks and a street railway for Toronto. Primarily as a result of his efforts, the Provincial Lunatic Asylum was established in 1841 and he was appointed its medical superintendent.

Before taking up his appointment Rees toured Europe at his own expense consulting authorities on institutions for the care of the insane and on the latest methods of treatment. Until an asylum could be built an old jail was used to house the insane under Rees' care. The number of inmates was initially 17 but it grew rapidly, and a wing of the vacant parliament buildings and a house had to be used until the asylum was ready for occupation.

In the course of his duties Rees received a blow on the head from one of the inmates, an injury which left him with greatly impaired eyesight and incapable of performing his duties or returning to private practice. He was replaced as superintendent of the asylum by Dr Walter Telfer in 1844 and thereafter lived in semi-retirement in his cottage on the waterfront adjacent to his wharf. He wrote frequently to the government seeking a pension in compensation for the time spent in organizing the asylum and for the injury he had suffered, or proposing administrative reforms and an appointment for himself in connection with the proposed changes. Although he had the support of a majority in the legislature, his efforts to obtain a government appointment were unsuccessful and the only compensation he received was a lump sum of $1,000 in 1864.

Many of the administrative reforms he suggested were ultimately implemented. His contemporaries, however, held divided opinions about him. Dr Christopher Widmer* was opposed to his appointment as superintendent from the outset and informed Robert Baldwin* that Vice Chancellor Robert Sympson Jameson* of the Court of Equity had "smuggled him into office." "The cure of the insane," Widmer asserted, "should certainly be consigned to a practical man with a philosophic knowledge of the treatment of insanity." Even before Rees' injury, Widmer was urging his dismissal and in 1851 opposed the attempt to obtain a pension for Rees as "the most impudent effort ever projected." In a memorandum prepared for William Canniff*, Clarke Gamble stated that Rees "was a learned man on some things, but an eccentric and most sanguine man," and added "he was appointed to the superintendence and management thereof upon the principle, I suppose, of setting a madman to watch a madman." On the other hand, Rees' superintendence of the asylum was commended by a number of British and American medical authorities and Henry Scadding* informed Canniff that "he was of a speculative disposition, and a man of unusual intelligence." In supporting his application for a pension the Dominion Medical Journal referred to him as "one of the oldest and most respected practitioners in this Province."

WILLIAM ORMSBY

William Rees, The case of Doctor William Rees, late physician to the Provincial Lunatic Asylum, Toronto, C.W.: memorial to his excellency the governor general in council . . . (Quebec, 1865).

MTCL, Baldwin papers, entries for Christopher Widmer. PAC, RG 5, C1, 1841–42, nos.1982, 2392, 2642, 2884, 3418, 3424, 4167, 4505, 4643A, 5095, 5120; 1846–47, nos.16587, 17398; 1847–48, nos.17997, 18467, 18817, 19837, 20053; 1849, no.467; 1850, nos.602, 669; 1851, nos.1506, 1667; 1852, no.1032; 1853, no.540; 1854, no.1528; 1857, nos.613, 1086; 1858, no.811; 1860, no.889; 1861, nos.229, 513, 682, 1004; 1862, nos.987, 1042, 1091, 1264, 1484; 1863, no.1470; 1864, nos.444, 819; RG 7, G20, 1843, no.2719; 1844, no.3473; 1855, no.6261; 1862, no.10139; 1865, nos.969, 1009, 1297, 12036, 12039; 1866, nos.575, 933; 1869, no.979 1/2. PAO, Toronto City Council papers, 1 June 1837; 5 June, 12 July 1843; 26 Dec. 1848; 3, 26 Nov. 1849. Canniff, Medical profession in Upper Canada, 570–73.

REGNAUD, FRANÇOIS-JOSEPH-VICTOR, teacher, surveyor; b. 1799 in France; d. 28 Feb. 1872 at Montreal, Que.

Nothing is known of François-Joseph-Victor Regnaud's childhood and adolescence. In a speech at the opening of the École Normale Jacques-Cartier at Montreal on 3 March 1857, he recalled that he had been appointed by the minister of Public Instruction in France to set up and direct, at Montbrison, one of the first normal schools for primary teachers. The subjects taught there were reading, writing, grammar, arithmetic, the metric system, surveying, the history and geography of France, and geometrical drawing.

Regnaud's success no doubt prompted the minister of Public Instruction, François Guizot, to recommend him to Abbé John Holmes*, who in 1836 was looking for a teacher for the normal school that Lower Canada wanted to establish at Montreal. After an interview with the candidate, Holmes concluded that he possessed "merit, capability, experience, an excellent character, unwavering virtue, and unshakeable principles of uprightness and religion." He gave him an examination, and noted that he was not "sufficiently well grounded in mechanics, chemistry, natural history, agriculture and horticulture, civil law, and religious instruction." François Regnaud arrived at Montreal on 15 June 1837, and was appointed head teacher of the new École Normale de Montreal for a period of five years at the annual salary of £245, plus accommodation.

The normal school opened its doors on 5 September, and after a fashion courses were given there for five years. The political events of the time did not unduly interfere with the school's activities; it seems however that the moment was scarcely auspicious for the setting up of a normal school which would have some prospects of surviving, at least according to the formula of 1836 – a two-denominational school open to both Catholics and Protestants.

When the school was closed on 23 Feb. 1842, Regnaud became a government surveyor. In 1857 the new École Normale Jacques-Cartier entrusted him with giving a course in pedagogy and applied mathematics. However, he did not abandon surveying, since his reports show that he carried on this profession until 1870.

François Regnaud understood the cardinal importance of normal schools; he stated that these "institutions were the corner-stone, the foundation stone of primary teaching." He gave his complete support to the Association des Instituteurs of the École Normale Jacques-Cartier, attended its conferences regularly, and presented reports on the best method of teaching history, the advantages of teachers' associations, and the importance of using the same books in all normal schools.

Canada was for François Regnaud a second country, towards which he displayed affection and where he gave the best of himself. What judgement of him can be made? According to Auguste Gosselin*, Regnaud "was a skilful teacher, a distinguished man, especially in mathematics. He was also a perfect Christian. He lacked only one thing, apparently, the ability to keep discipline, the principles of which he had, moreover, himself established at the school."

In France, François Regnaud had married Antoinette Gay, who died in Montreal at the age of 88. They had three children.

Louis-Philippe Audet

AJM, Registre d'état civil. Institut pédagogique national (Paris), Lucien Simiand, Monographie de l'école normale d'instituteurs de Montbrison. JIP, 1857, 63–64; 1858, 11; 1859, 25–26, 57–58, 70–73, 95–98, 135–38; 1860, 46; 1866, 128; 1867, 106; 1868. Audet, Le système scolaire de la province de Québec, VI, 115–80. P.-J.-O. Chauveau, L'instruction publique au Canada, précis historique et statistique (Québec, 1876), 71. Adélard Desrosiers, Les écoles normales primaires de la province de Québec et leurs œuvres complémentaires, 1857–1907 (Montréal, 1909). André Labarrère-Paulé, Les instituteurs laïques au Canada français, 1836–1900 (Québec, 1965), 49–117. Robert Rumilly, Henri Bourassa, la vie publique d'un grand Canadien (Montréal, 1953), 9–10. Auguste Gosselin, "L'abbé Holmes et l'instruction publique," RSCT, 3rd ser., I (1907), sect.I, 127–72.

REID, HUGO, educator and author; b. 21 June 1809 in Edinburgh, Scotland, third son of Dr Peter Reid and Christian Arnot; d. 13 June 1872 in London, Eng.

Hugo Reid spent an active and useful life in Great Britain and North America lecturing in science, language, and logic and writing on a wide variety of subjects. A distinguished alumnus of the High School in Edinburgh, he lectured in Glasgow, Carlton, Mile End, Brighton, and Liverpool and became principal of People's College, Nottingham. He was a member of the Lothian and Philosophical societies of Glasgow and of the Hunterian Society of Edinburgh. In 1839 he married Marion, eldest daughter of James Kirkland, a Glasgow merchant. They had one child, a daughter.

In November 1855 Hugo Reid went to Halifax where he became principal of the high school and of the junior school which began in Dalhousie College on 15 Jan. 1856. He was also professor of logic, general grammar, and English, dean of the faculty, and chairman or principal of Dalhousie when it resumed university courses in October 1856. The university then had a faculty of five and a student enrollment of 15. By 1857 two of the professors had resigned and again the decision was made to discontinue university work. Reid remained as principal of the Collegiate School until 26 Jan. 1860 when he resigned. At this point the governors of Dalhousie, who were receiving no cooperation from the community, decided to give the one remaining professor six months notice and to cease operations completely, "perhaps the darkest period in the history of Dalhousie."

While in Halifax Reid wrote and published several works including Elements of geography adopted for use in Br. America . . . and Remarks on university education in Nova Scotia. He was a founding member and secretary of the Nova Scotia Literary and Scientific Society and a frequent contributor to its Transactions. In 1858 he gave a series of lectures to the Halifax Mechanics' Institute, and later prepared and published a map of Nova Scotia. Following a visit to relatives in the United States, he returned to Great Britain where he continued to write and publish until his death.

CHARLES BRUCE FERGUSSON

A list of Hugo Reid's works can be found in British Museum catalogue. See also: PANS, Correspondence of Hugo Reid, 1856–59. Edinburgh Courant, 21 June 1872. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 18 Dec. 1855; 1 Jan., 26 June, 16 Sept. 1856; 23 Jan. 1858. D. C. Harvey, An introduction to the history of Dalhousie University (Halifax, 1938). G. G. Patterson, The history of Dalhousie College and University (Halifax, 1887).

REILLY, EDWARD, journalist and politician; b. 1839 or 1840 in Prince Edward Island; d. 29 March 1872 in Charlottetown, P.E.I.

After a brief career as a teacher in the rural schools of Prince Edward Island, Edward Reilly became a journeyman printer in Charlottetown in the offices of David Laird*'s Protestant and Edward Whelan*'s Examiner. On 17 Oct. 1862 he founded the militantly ultramontane Vindicator, which was to provide an alternative to other Island newspapers – reading matter "of a dangerous character, filled with moral poison." Although Reilly was the publisher of the Vindicator, in later years he denied having been the editor; it was widely suspected at the time that this position was held by Father Angus MacDonald*, rector of St Dunstan's College. The Vindicator, a weekly, specialized in vitriolic denunciations of various public figures, such as William Henry POPE, David Laird, the Reverend George Sutherland*, and the lieutenant governor, George DUNDAS. In 1864, Joseph Webster, master of the Normal School, brought Reilly to court for an article which suggested that Webster had had improper relations with his female students. The case ended with a full apology by Reilly in October 1864. He discontinued publication of the Vindicator at that time, but one week later founded another weekly, the Herald, of which he was both editor and publisher. In 1870 he took partners into the venture, one of whom appears to have been John Caven, a professor at St Dunstan's.

Although Reilly remained sympathetic to the demands of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in educational matters, he began to seek a wider base of support. He adopted a vigorously pro-tenant position on the land question, and denounced the Quebec resolutions of 1864 as a "scheme of spoliation" for the Island. He claimed that union would make Islanders pay for expenses such as continental defence and the Intercolonial Railway without commensurate benefits. In particular, he objected to the failure of the confederation proposals to provide for the liquidation of leasehold tenure, agreeing with George COLES and others that resolution of the land question was a sine qua non of entry.

Reilly's adamant opposition to confederation brought him into conflict with Edward Whelan, the leading Roman Catholic public man of the colony, who ardently supported the Quebec plan. The two men also clashed on the explosive subjects of Fenianism and the Tenant League. Whelan utterly condemned both movements, but Reilly was non-committal. The younger man was clearly challenging Whelan's hold on the Catholic population, particularly those who were tenants, or Irish immigrants, or both. When a general election took place in February 1867, Reilly ran against Whelan in Kings County, Second District, although both were Liberals; Reilly lost, but greatly reduced Whelan's majority. After the election, which the Liberals won, Whelan was appointed queen's printer and was obliged to face the electorate again in a by-election. This time, Reilly dealt Whelan his first defeat in 21 years of politics. Eight days after Whelan's death on 10 Dec. 1867, Reilly succeeded him as queen's printer; he won the by-election called in early 1868.

Reilly remained queen's printer until 1870, when the Liberals split over the school question. He then followed George Howlan* and all but one of the Roman Catholic Liberal assemblymen into a coalition led by Conservative James Colledge Pope*. The basis of the alliance was a mutual self-denying pledge signed by the Catholic Liberals and the Conservative leaders, some of whom were confederates: nothing would be done on the school or confederation questions until they were submitted to the people at the polls. In the change of government, Reilly lost the queen's printership because a prominent Tory, Frederick de St Croix Brecken*, threatened to resign should he retain the office. A year later, Reilly left the coalition and returned to the Liberals in protest against the government's railway policy. Although he had supported the legislation when it was first introduced, he now feared it would be the means of forcing the Island into confederation. As it turned out, he was correct, although he did not live to see his prophecy fulfilled. On the morning of 29 March 1872 at his house in Charlottetown he died suddenly of heart disease, leaving his wife Hannah.

Edward Reilly was a controversial person, particularly in his early years as a journalist. After entering the assembly, he became more restrained and employed milder language in the Herald editorials. When he died, at the age of 32, he was one of the most effective debaters in the assembly, as well as a prominent journalist. On the day before he died, he had been nominated for the election of 4 April, which his party won. There can be no doubt that had he lived he would have been a leading public figure for many more years.

IAN ROSS ROBERTSON

Prince Edward Island, Supreme Court, Estates Division, will of Edward Reilly. Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Journals, 1867–72; Debates and proceedings, 1867–72. Examiner (Charlottetown), 9 Jan., 24 July 1865. Herald (Charlottetown), 1864, 1866–68, 1870–71. Island Argus (Charlottetown), 2 April 1872. Patriot (Charlottetown), 30 March, 4 April 1872. Vindicator (Charlottetown), 1862–64. MacMillan, Catholic Church in PEI, 219–20, 260–61, 271–75. Robertson, "Religion, politics, and education in PEI," chapt. 6–8.

RENAUD, LOUIS, merchant and member of the Legislative Council; b. 3 Oct. 1818 at Lachine, near Montreal, L.C., son of Jean-Baptiste Renaud, a voyageur, and Marie-Reine Garriépy; d. 13 Nov. 1878 at Sainte-Martine (Châteauguay County), Que.

After a brief primary education, and when he was quite young, Louis Renaud had to work to support his sick father. With his brother Jean-Baptiste, he first became a carter. The two Renauds were still plying their trade, the registers of Notre-Dame de Montréal testify, when they were married at the same wedding service, 18 Jan. 1841. Jean-Baptiste married Sophie Lefebvre, daughter of Jean-Baptiste Lefebvre and Appoline Abraham, and Louis (to whom the registers add the name Paul, which is not found on his baptismal certificate) married Marie-Anne Pigeon, daughter of Félix Pigeon and Véronique-Aimée Trudelle. By the age of 20 Louis had saved up enough to enter business, and at 30 he possessed a sizeable fortune. He went into partnership with his brother Jean-Baptiste, who was later to set himself up at Quebec and establish there the firm of J.-B. Renaud and Company, and exported on a large scale to the English market and to the United States, where their company had agents in most large towns. Around 1856 he became a partner of John YOUNG, an important politician from 1851 to 1872 and one of the most influential businessmen in British North America. The two men engaged in commercial operations that were extensive for the period. Their dealings in England, France, and the United States rivalled those of the largest British and American firms. It is recorded that in certain years they amounted to 20 million "piastres."

Renaud specialized in the grain trade, and the majority of the merchants in Lower Canada to whom he advanced money and goods became his agents. The master of the grain and flour trade in Lower Canada, he was able to set prices. He was at the height of his career when unfortunate transactions by one of his agents in the United States compromised his credit, and forced him to sell depreciated American shares at a loss. An immense fortune disappeared, but he succeeded in meeting all the demands of his creditors. He lived out his life in moderately easy circumstances at Sainte-Martine, where he owned a great amount of land.

In politics Louis Renaud played a discreet role, which his contemporaries considered important. The Legislative Council of united Canada having become elective, he was returned in 1856 for the division of Salaberry by a majority of 1,200 votes over his adversary, Joseph Doutre*, a lawyer and one of the leaders of the Rouge party. In the autumn of 1864 he was re-elected by acclamation. When in 1867 confederation came into being, he was summoned by royal proclamation to sit in the Senate. The poor state of his health and in particular his failing eyesight forced him to resign in 1873, and he was then replaced by his son-in-law. By his first marriage he had had 11 children; his only daughter, Zoé-Aimée, married François-Xavier-Anselme Trudel*, and one of his sons, Napoléon, after serving as a papal Zouave, succeeded him at the head of his business. In March 1864 he married again, his second wife being Hélène Chicoux-Duvert, widow of Charles-Joseph-René Drolet; she survived him. Louis Renaud's funeral was held at the church of Notre-Dame de Montréal, and the burial took place at Côte-des-Neiges.

At the time of his death La Minerve wrote on 15 November: "He made the name of Canada known to advantage on the English and French markets, through commercial operations that revealed him as a man of exceptional genius." In 1875, a few years before his death, one of the principal chroniclers of Montreal, the Reverend John Douglas Borthwick*, devoted a highly laudatory biography to him, containing these words: "Although his childhood was lacking in any form of instruction, he succeeded, thanks to superior intelligence, indomitable energy, a very strong constitution, and almost superhuman labour, in acquiring knowledge and experience which soon made him a master in the realm of commerce. Few have equalled and perhaps none have surpassed him as far as accuracy in sizing up a situation, speed of conception, and rightness of judgement are concerned." Throughout his whole career Renaud was a friend of George-Étienne CARTIER, whose politics he supported and who used to consult him; Borthwick was thus led to write: "Although he was a man of little culture, his experience, advice, firmness, and energy have often exercised a decisive influence on the politics of his time."

J.-C. BONENFANT

La Minerve (Montréal), 15 nov. 1878. Borthwick, Montreal, 110. É.-Z. Massicotte, "Deux grands négociants," BRH, XLII (1936), 339–40.

REYNARD, ALEXIS, missionary lay brother of the congregation of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate; b. in Castillon, diocese of Nîmes, France, 28 Sept. 1828, son of Alexis-Joseph Reynard and Victoire Dugas; d. at House River, a tributary of the Athabasca, about 20 July 1875.

Alexis Reynard had an elementary schooling and worked as a vine dresser on the family farm. He made his vows with the Oblate congregation on 9 May 1852, and was appointed in 1853 to the missions of Athabasca. The 1850s were a period of expansion of Oblate missions in the North-West, culminating in the establishment of Saint-Cœur-de-Marie at Fort Good Hope near the Arctic circle on the lower Mackenzie River.

Brother Alexis served under Mgr Vital-Justin Grandin*, Mgr Henri Faraud*, and Mgr Isidore Clut*. He became a skilled carpenter, stoneworker, voyageur, and gardener. All the buildings at La Nativité mission, Lake Athabasca (today Fort Chipewyan) and at Providence mission (on the present-day Mackenzie Highway near Yellowknife, Northwest Territories) were built by him. His performance of these duties permitted the priests to devote themselves to their spiritual duties. Along with his great strength and vigour, he "had the gentleness and guilelessness of a child."

From the time he joined the order, Brother Alexis hoped to be ordained a priest. He frequently approached his superiors, at first without success. Then he received permission to study Latin under Father Grandin at La Nativité. But on the advice of his superiors, he finally withdrew his request for ordination. It was concluded in 1861 that his very goodness would make it impossible for him to direct a mission. This was a bitter disappointment to Brother Alexis.

During the last decade of his life Brother Alexis was in poor health, yet he continued with his usual arduous duties and in 1868–69 assisted in constructing the buildings at Providence for the Grey Nuns. From 1870 to 1874 he served at Notre-Dame-des-Victoires mission at Lac la Biche.

In 1875 another group of Grey Nuns left Saint Boniface to serve in their northern establishments, and Brother Alexis was sent from La Nativité to prepare transportation and accompany them north from Lac la Biche. His companions on the way south were two Métis families and an orphan, Geneviève Duquette, whom the Grey Nuns were sending to Lac la Biche. The guide was an Iroquois Métis, Louis Lafrance, a servant of La Nativité. Although professing to be a good Catholic he had an uncontrollable and vengeful temper. Even Brother Alexis had reprimanded him.

The party left La Nativité on 1 June and after a difficult trip reached Grand Rapids on the Athabasca about 18 June. Here the Métis families refused to go farther until the river subsided. But Brother Alexis was determined. He would have left the orphan with the Métis, but Lafrance insisted that he would guide them both to the mission, about 100 miles south. In August, at the House River, a short distance above Grand Rapids, the remains of Brother Alexis were discovered by a party from the Lac la Biche mission. There was unmistakable evidence that Lafrance had murdered the brother, dismembered the body, and eaten it. Lafrance had then proceeded with the orphan to the Peace River, where she suffered the same fate. Retribution followed. One night a camp of Beaver Indians shot a marauder – Lafrance.

Thus ended Brother Alexis' long and arduous career in the service of the missions of the North West. His remains were buried at Lac la Biche, but were later removed to be with those of other martyrs at the Oblate mission in St Albert, Alberta.

LEWIS H. THOMAS

[P.-J.-B.] Duchaussois, Apôtres inconnus (Paris, 1924), 220–27. Morice, Hist. de l'Église catholique, II, 54, 193, 379–82. A. Philippot, Une page d'histoire des missions arctiques: le frère Alexis Reynard O.M.I. (1828–1875), premier "apôtre inconnu" du Grand Nord canadien (Lablachère, France, 1931).

RICHARD, LOUIS-EUSÈBE, merchant, legislative councillor; b. 1 March 1817 at Saint-Grégoire-le-Grand (Nicolet), L.C., son of Charles-Auguste Richard, merchant, and of Marie Hébert; d. 13 Nov. 1876 at Princeville, Que.

In 1840 Louis-Eusèbe Richard came to settle in the township of Stanfold, to the west of the road leading to Saint-Norbert-d'Arthabaska, and opened a general store there; he thus became the second merchant of the township. He had foreseen the importance which the spot he had chosen would assume, and he placed himself at the head of a movement that brought about a modification in the route of the Grand Trunk Railway (from Richmond to Lévis) in the Arthabaska region. As he also traded in wood, the building of this line allowed him to enlarge his fortune appreciably. Thus, according to the notary François-Xavier Pratte's registry, in 1844 Richard began to "lend money" on recognizance, and until 1871 he arranged purchases, sales, transfers, conveyances, and other remunerative contracts.

In 1862 Louis-Eusèbe Richard, at the request of a large number of influential electors in the division of Kennebec, stood as a candidate for the office of legislative councillor against Charles Cormier*, the first mayor of Plessisville. Having to contend with the influence of the representatives of three counties, Henri-Gustave Joly* de Lotbinière (Lotbinière), Noël Hébert (Mégantic), and Jean-Baptiste-Éric Dorion* (Drummond-Arthabaska), and being up against a very highly regarded and respected man, he was defeated by a majority of 275 votes, even though he obtained the greatest number of votes in the two counties of Arthabaska and Lotbinière. In 1874 he accepted the seat left vacant by the resignation of the Honourable Isidore Thibaudeau*, the Legislative Council having ceased to be elective in 1867. Richard does not seem to have concerned himself very actively with politics, but he was known to be a Conservative.

On 15 Jan. 1841, Louis-Eusèbe Richard had married Hermine Prince, of Saint-Grégoire-le-Grand. After raising a large family, he left a sizeable fortune to his wife and four children, among them Édouard*, who was MLA for Mégantic from 1872 to 1878 and author of Acadie, reconstitution d'un chapitre perdu de l'histoire d'Amérique.

Louis-Eusèbe Richard belonged to one of the most highly respected families in old Acadia. "A man of uncommon vigour, of great intelligence, of proverbial honesty, he won the esteem of all those who, through ties of kinship, or business relationships, or friendship, were fortunate enough to know him." It was in his honour that in 1848 St Eusèbe was given to the parish of Stanfold as its patron saint.

ALCIDE FLEURY

Archives judiciaires d'Arthabaska (Qué.), Registre d'état civil, Saint-Eusèbe-de-Stanfold, 13 nov. 1876. AJTR, Registre d'état civil, paroisse Saint-Grégoire-le-Grand, II, 99; IV, 147. C.-É. Mailhot, Les Bois-Francs (4v., Arthabaska, Qué., 1914–25), II, 308–15.

RICHARDSON, JAMES, naval officer, office holder, Methodist minister, and bishop; b. 29 Jan. 1791 at Kingston, province of Quebec, son of James Richardson, a naval officer, and Sarah Ashmore, both from England; d. 9 March 1875 in Toronto, Ont.

James Richardson, who became a leading Methodist and a staunch Canadian, was born, appropriately, in the year of John Wesley's death and of Upper Canada's formation. He was educated in the Kingston schools, and in 1809 entered the Provincial Marine, receiving a lieutenant's commission in 1812. He served with distinction during the War of 1812–14, losing his left arm in 1814 at the battle of Oswego. In 1813 he had married Rebecca, daughter of John Dennis, a York (Toronto) loyalist; two children survived him.

A veteran and an Anglican, Richardson was appointed after the war as a magistrate and collector of customs at Presqu'ile. He might well have remained there, an honoured citizen and a useful functionary, but along with many others he was swept up in the post-war resurgence of Upper Canadian Methodism. He was converted at a quarterly meeting held in Haldimand Township in 1818: "God shone into my heart and I saw light in his light, 'My chains fell off, my heart was free.' " He concluded at once: "This people shall be my people, and their God my God," a conviction from which he never wavered throughout his life, and one which led him quickly into a new and difficult career.

The Methodist leaders, always alert to recruit men of character and education for lay and ministerial office, pressed Richardson to become a local preacher in the conference year of 1822–23 and in 1825 he was taken on trial for the itinerant ministry. Without hesitation he gave up his appointments and his comfortable life to minister in company with Egerton Ryerson* to his first circuit, that of Yonge Street and York (Toronto), stretching from Lake Ontario to Lake Simcoe. But he was not destined to continue long in this humble role. Well before his ordination in 1830 he had emerged as an important figure in a religious community that had reached a critical stage in its development.

In the late 1820s and early 1830s Canadian Methodists, who began as a part of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, were obliged to reshape their relationship with their British and American brethren, and to play an active part in the political controversies besetting Upper Canada. Although Richardson believed, and evidently continued to believe, that the episcopal polity of American Methodism was the nearest to Wesley's design, he agitated vigorously for the establishment of an autonomous Canadian conference in 1824. He also seems to have supported the move to independence in 1828 when the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada was formed. Conversely, he was reluctant, along with many of his colleagues, to accept the union with the British conference in 1833 because it would break the continuity between American and Canadian Methodism, and, more significantly, because he anticipated that the Tory proclivities of the Wesleyans would undermine the Canadian conference's political credibility.

Richardson's attitude toward the position of his church in society was probably not untypical among native Canadian Methodists. A fervent patriot – ready to enlist against the Fenians in 1866 – who did not wish to weaken the British connection, he was nevertheless convinced that Canadians should settle their own problems in their own ways. An evangelical Christian, his primary concern was not the pursuit of ecclesiastical or political goals but the salvation of souls, an end which he believed could best be achieved through the complete separation of church and state and the full acceptance of the voluntarist position. As editor of the Christian Guardian he upheld this view; he would later also welcome the secularization of the clergy reserves and oppose the commutation clause in the act of 1854 by which the Wesleyan Methodist Church, along with others, was paid a lump sum in return for surrendering its claims on the reserves fund.

Richardson became the editor of the Methodists' Christian Guardian for 1832–33, but declined re-election as editor in 1834. He continued to hold other important offices in the conference between 1833 and his resignation from the conference in 1836, and he was a member of the committee which drafted plans for and initiated the building of the Upper Canada Academy (later Victoria University). In the interval, however, the conference had restricted the privileges of the local preachers, a group for whom Richardson felt much concern and sympathy. Moreover, at the behest of their Wesleyan associates, it had begun, in sharp contrast to its previous course, to curry favour with the local goverment and to equivocate on the vexed question of public grants to religious bodies. This change of front, coupled with the realization that the parent Wesleyan conference had accepted such assistance, exposed the Canadian conference to much abuse from the Reform press and politicians. Richardson and others who were convinced that their church should adhere to the voluntarist position and at least maintain political neutrality were humiliated by this course of action. His determination to put integrity above denominational unity produced increasingly strained relations between him and such senior colleagues as John and Egerton Ryerson and Ephraim Evans*. Hence by 1836 he no longer felt at home in the conference and decided to leave quietly. He was already so alienated by 1835 that he refused to contribute to the funds of the Upper Canada Academy.

In the year following his resignation Richardson apparently considered a career in American Methodism and to that end he held a temporary pastorate in Auburn, N.Y. Upon his return to Upper Canada he became a minister in the newly constituted Methodist Episcopal Church (the earlier church of this name having become the Wesleyan Methodist Church), the haven of those who for various reasons refused to accept the 1833 union. From 1840 to 1852, however, he was chiefly employed as agent of the Upper Canada Bible Society. It was not until 1858 that he was ordained a bishop to assist his aged friend, Bishop Philander Smith*. Despite growing infirmity he retained this office until his death; one of his last acts was to ordain Albert Carman* as his assistant and eventual successor.

Bishop Richardson presided over an important branch of Canadian Methodism at a significant point in its evolution, and thus helped to determine the shape of such influence as Methodism had on the broader growth of his country. In 1867 the Methodist Episcopal Church was the second largest Methodist body, but it was essentially confined to Ontario. It was if anything more evangelical than the larger Wesleyan denomination, strongly anti-liturgical, and possibly less sophisticated generally. It continued to oppose state support for religious enterprises and in particular separate schools. Despite its episcopal polity, the line between Methodist Episcopal laymen and clergy was drawn as imprecisely as in the earlier days of Methodism. Above all, the Episcopal Methodists considered themselves the Canadian Methodists as indeed they were in background and outlook in so far as Ontario was concerned.

Richardson's principal contribution was to maintain the distinctive features of Methodist Episcopal organization and teaching, and at the same time to encourage those in his church whose interest was the constructive dissemination of their views rather than destructive opposition to the dominant Wesleyan Conference. Thus, by 1875, the two churches were growing together, as was symbolized by the holding of a memorial service for the bishop in the Wesleyans' Metropolitan Church in Toronto. Bishop Carman, whose orientation was akin to his predecessor's, would bring about formal union in 1884 and in so doing would infuse the new Methodist Church with many of the values cherished by his brethren.

In his church and in the community, James Richardson was held in high esteem as a humble, kindly, and saintly individual whose life was "manly and devoid of display." He impressed on his countrymen that distinctive mixture of religious, moral, and patriotic values cherished by so many native Canadian Methodists. Neither a great scholar nor a great preacher, he had nonetheless the gift of "plain yet forcible and majestic speech." He detested "sham everywhere" and "could not for a moment bear it in religion." To Carman, "If James Richardson was a man of God, he was also a man for the world," an "advocate and defender of the rights of man." "Liberty of conscience and liberty of worship were cardinal doctrines of his religious and political faith," as was concern for the moral character of society. Hence he promoted the work of the Bible Society, and vigorously supported the Temperance Reformation Society. As president of the York Pioneer Society he helped to arouse interest in the historical development of that Upper Canada whose life was almost coterminous with his own.

G. S. French

[There is no collection, unfortunately, of James Richardson papers. For his letters and statements one must look to the Christian Guardian (York) in the year of his editorship, 1832–33, and to the Canada Christian Advocate (Hamilton, Ont.) in the period of his episcopate, 1858–75. Thomas Webster, Life of Rev. James Richardson, a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada (Toronto, 1876), is naturally highly partisan, as is its introduction by Richardson's successor, Albert Carman. As a corrective, one should consult John Carroll's lengthy review in the Canadian Methodist Magazine (Toronto), IV (1876), 513–23. G.S.F.]

James Richardson, Incidents in the early history of the settlements in the vicinity of Lake Ontario (n.p., n.d.). Canada Christian Advocate (Hamilton, Ont.), 17 March 1875. Globe (Toronto), 13 March 1875. The minutes of the annual conferences of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada, from 1824 to 1857 (2v., Toronto, 1846–63), I. Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, III, 60–65. Carroll, Case and his cotemporaries. Anson Green, The life and times of the Rev. Anson Green, D.D. . . . (Toronto, 1877). Sissons, Ryerson.

RIDLEY, THOMAS, merchant and politician; b. in England or Ireland in 1799; d. Upper Tooting, Surrey, Eng., 20 March 1879.

Thomas Ridley came to Newfoundland to work for his uncle William Bennett, a merchant with premises at Adams Cove, Carbonear. By 1824 they had formed a partnership, Bennett and Ridley, which lasted until the late 1820s. Ridley, having married a daughter of a well-to-do Liverpool family, was joined by her relative Thomas Harrison in the firm of Thomas Ridley and Company, with headquarters at Harbour Grace but with stores as well at Carbonear and Western Bay. In spite of the fire of 1832 which destroyed much of Harbour Grace, Ridley built up a flourishing business. In the late 1830s Ridley established a partnership with Gilbert Henry Harrison and James Harrison – Ridley, Harrison and Company. After the death of Gilbert H. Harrison in 1849 this partnership was dissolved and Ridley took his two sons, Thomas Harrison and William, into the business as Ridley and Sons.

Several incidents in the 1830s, a decade marked by bad feeling between fishermen and merchants, show that Thomas Ridley was especially unpopular. In February 1832 after the sealers' strikes and riots at Harbour Grace and Carbonear, all the merchants made concessions except Ridley. As a result a mob of fishermen boarded and partially destroyed Ridley's schooner, the Perseverance. In the 1836 general election Ridley was forced to withdraw as a candidate because of violence and intimidation. Then in the Conception Bay by-election of December 1840, while trying in his capacity as a magistrate to keep order, Ridley was hit over the head and nearly killed. The times, nevertheless, were changing. In 1842 Ridley was elected to represent Conception Bay in the Amalgamated Legislature. From 1843 to 1848 he also sat as a member of the Executive Council.

After 1850, with Thomas Harrison Ridley emerging as the most prominent member of the family, Ridley and Sons expanded and played a leading role, second only to that of John MUNN's firm, in the development of Harbour Grace as the commercial centre of Conception Bay. They set up a branch at Catalina, took part in the seal hunt, carried on extensive operations on the Labrador, and began to develop the winter codfishery at Rose Blanche. In the fall of 1870 the news that Ridley and Sons were in trouble came as a shock both to their creditors and to the many fishermen who were depending on them for winter supplies. In spite of efforts to keep the business going, Ridley and Sons were declared insolvent in 1873. They sold out to the Munns and moved back to England where Thomas Ridley died.

ELIZABETH A. WELLS

PANL, Harbour Grace Sessions Court, Records, 1825–35. Department of Justice of Newfoundland and Labrador (St John's), Registry of deeds, companies, and securities, Registry of deeds for the Northern District, 1826–88, I, II, IX, X, XI, XIII, XVIII, XIX; Registry of deeds for the Central District, XXII, 341. Newfoundland, Blue Books, 1842, 1843 (copies in PANL). Conception-Bay Man (Harbour Grace, Nfld.), 7 April 1858. Newfoundlander (St John's), 29 April 1879. Newfoundland Patriot (St. John's), 12 Dec. 1840. Royal Gazette (St John's), 24 Aug. 1843. Times and General Commercial Gazette (St John's), 11 Nov. 1848. Leslie Harris, "The first nine years of representative government in Newfoundland," unpublished MA thesis, Memorial University of Newfoundland, 1959, 114.

RIDOUT, GEORGE, lawyer and judge; b. Quebec, 1791, second son of Thomas Ridout*, surveyor general of Upper Canada, and of Mary Campbell; d. at Clinton, Ont., 24 Feb. 1871.

George Ridout attended John Strachan*'s school at Cornwall from 1805 to at least 1807, in company with the sons of many other families prominent in early York (Toronto). He subsequently studied law in the office of John Macdonell*, who was appointed attorney general in 1812, and was admitted to the bar 4 Jan. 1813. The next year he attended the court at Ancaster as acting solicitor general. In 1820 he became a bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada and continued to serve in this capacity for the next 50 years until his death. He succeeded Dr William Warren Baldwin* as treasurer of the law society in 1829 and served in this position until 1832, during this time presiding over the planning and construction of the original building of Osgoode Hall, perhaps the most important of the early buildings still surviving in Ontario. He also took a lead in establishing the library of the law society. Ridout was appointed judge of the Niagara District Court in April 1828, and reappointed to this office in April 1832.

Ridout served with the York volunteers during the War of 1812–14, and took part in the battle of Queenston Heights as 3rd lieutenant in the grenadier company of the York militia. He was taken prisoner of war on 27 April 1813 when the Americans occupied York. He maintained his interest in military matters in subsequent years and served as colonel of the East York militia.

Ridout took an active part in the social life of York. Dorset House, the substantial home he built about 1820, was long a landmark of the community. However, although the Ridouts were one of the oldest families in York, their frequently independent views were suspect to some of the other early established families. This rivalry and tension, in particular between the Ridouts and the families of William Dummer Powell* and William Jarvis*, found expression in the duel between John Ridout, George's brother, and Samuel Peters Jarvis*, son of William, in 1817, in which John was killed, and it was a factor throughout the social and political career of George Ridout.

In politics Ridout was a moderate, in general supporting constitutional reform and the position of W. W. Baldwin and his son Robert*; his family was connected with the Baldwins by marriage. He was defeated in his own attempts at office: in the elections for the legislature in 1816 when he sought to succeed his father as the representative of Simcoe and the East Riding of York and was beaten by Peter Robinson* who had the support of Strachan; and in the elections for city council in Toronto in 1837 at the time of his dispute with the lieutenant governor. However, he often gave active and effective support to the candidacy of others: for example, to Robert Baldwin in his successful attempt to unseat Sheriff William Botsford Jarvis* in the elections for the House of Assembly in 1830, and to Robert Baldwin Sullivan* in 1835 in his successful campaign to replace William Lyon Mackenzie* as mayor in Toronto's second municipal election.

Ridout was dismissed on 12 July 1836 from the offices of judge of the Niagara District Court, colonel of the East York militia, and justice of the peace by Sir Francis Bond HEAD, who "as Lieutenant-Governor, by the advice of my Council, deliberately selected him for punishment, as the most intemperate of my opponents." The charges, which Ridout denied, were insult to the person and office of the lieutenant governor and disloyalty to the policies of the crown. The dismissal became a cause célèbre in the colony and at the Colonial Office, and it was one of the major political issues in Upper Canada during the subsequent 18 months leading up to the outbreak of rebellion in December 1837. Responding to a petition from Ridout, the colonial secretary, Lord Glenelg, ordered his reinstatement. Head declined and submitted his resignation rather than comply with this instruction, "it being utterly impossible for me to obey this order, and retain my authority in the province." The resignation of the lieutenant governor, primarily on this issue, and on the related issue of his refusal to name Marshall Spring BIDWELL a judge as Glenelg wished, was in fact accepted in a dispatch from London, dated 24 Nov. 1837, a week before the rebellion broke out in Upper Canada, where people were still unaware of this development. The dispute over Ridout's appointments, rather than the rebellion, was thus the main cause of Head's resignation, and, as such, a significant episode in Canadian history.

Ridout also played an active part in municipal affairs. He was a prominent member of the York Board of Health, proposing the establishment of a receiving house for cholera patients during the epidemic of 1832, and presenting a report in the same year which focussed public attention on the weakness of the board because of its lack of funds and insufficient legal authority. He was a strong advocate of the merits of retaining York as the capital of the province and helped to draft legislation to incorporate and enlarge York as a city under the name of Toronto. The choice of the name Toronto in 1834, in preference to the name of York, reflected the long-standing preference of the Ridouts for the original Indian name and was one of the bones of contention between them and some of the more Tory pioneer families.

Ridout's varied business interests included participation in 1822 in the founding of the Bank of Upper Canada, of which he became a director. He was elected a member of the board of the City of Toronto and Lake Huron Railway in 1845.

George Ridout married twice: first, Dorothy McCuaig of Boston; secondly, Belle Nelson. He had one daughter by his first marriage and four daughters and four sons by his second. His older brother Samuel* was sheriff of the county of York and his younger brother Thomas Gibbs* was for many years cashier of the Bank of Upper Canada.

THOMAS H. B. SYMONS

MTCL, Baldwin papers. PAO, Ridout papers; Sir John Beverley Robinson papers; John Strachan papers. Head, Narrative. Ten years in Upper Canada in peace and war, 1805–1815; being the Ridout letters . . ., ed. Mathilda Edgar (Toronto, 1890). Town of York, 1793–1815 (Firth). Town of York, 1815–1834 (Firth). Chadwick, Ontarian families, I, 36–43. W. R. Riddell, The legal profession in Upper Canada in its early periods (Toronto, 1916), 68–85.

RIDOUT, GEORGE PERCIVAL, merchant and politician; b. Bristol, Eng., 21 Aug. 1807, son of George Ridout and Mary Ann Wright; d. unmarried, in Toronto, Ont., 28 June 1873.

George Ridout, Sr, emigrated from Bristol in 1820, going first to Philadelphia, then in 1826 to York (Toronto), where his uncle Thomas Ridout*, the surveyor general, secured for him a position in the government service. His two oldest sons, George Percival and Joseph Davis, remained in the United States; by 1826 they were employed there by Tarratt's, iron and hardware merchants of Wolverhampton, England. G. P. Ridout, after joining Tarratt's in Philadelphia, had moved to New York, where Joseph Davis joined him. G. P. Ridout moved to York in 1828 and began legal studies. Tarratt's sent J. D. Ridout to Boston in 1830, but in 1831 he moved on to York. There, in 1832, with the support of Tarratt's, the two brothers opened Ridout Brothers and Company, wholesale and retail iron and hardware merchants. Wholesaling was just developing in Toronto in the early 1830s, and the Ridouts were the first specialized hardware merchants there. Their mercantile training and British backing, linked to the rapid growth of the market, enabled them to build one of Toronto's largest hardware houses in the next two decades.

G. P. Ridout soon became active in local politics. A moderate conservative, he often fought with Toronto's more extreme Tories, including William Henry BOULTON and Henry Sherwood*. He captained a company of York volunteers in 1837 and in the 1840s opposed the rebellion losses bill and also British free trade, along with many other Tories and moderates who feared the breaking of the British connection. Nevertheless, he worked energetically in 1841 to elect two Sydenham [Thomson*] Reformers, Isaac Buchanan* and John Henry Dunn*, in Toronto. Three years later he stood for Toronto himself as a moderate supporter of Sir Charles Metcalfe*, but opposition from extreme Tories forced his withdrawal before polling day. In 1844 he was elected president of the Toronto Board of Trade, a post he held until 1852. He now pursued his public career vigorously. He was president of the St George's Society from 1845 to 1847; in 1851 he secured election to the Toronto City Council and the board of trustees for Toronto public schools and was narrowly defeated when he ran for mayor in 1851.

In 1851 he won a Toronto seat in the assembly, where he acted as an independent Conservative and took a particular interest in issues concerning Toronto's trading community. Thus he sought amendments to the Upper Canada assessment act, the Grand Trunk Railway charter, and the usury laws; and he opposed Francis Hincks*' tariff and efforts of Montreal interests to promote a commercial empire focussed on Montreal. He also advocated the abolition of Sabbath labour. In the 1854 election, though he won the support of Conservative businessmen, he found this too narrow a political base and was defeated in Toronto by two other Conservatives, John George Bowes* and John Hillyard CAMERON. He did not seek election again.

Unlike his brother, Joseph Davis, and many other Toronto merchants in these years, Ridout did not play a central role in forming new companies, but in 1853 he did become governor of Toronto's British America Assurance Company, a post for which his mercantile and political positions qualified him well. He retired from the hardware business in 1866, leaving his brother to carry it on, and devoted himself wholly to the insurance company. In 1871 he became its manager as well and held both posts until his death.

DOUGLAS MCCALLA

Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1852–53. [Hugh Scobie], "Letters of 1844 and 1846 from Scobie to Ryerson," ed. C. B. Sissons, CHR, XXIX (1948), 393–411. Town of York, 1815–1834 (Firth). Globe (Toronto), 1850–60. Rowsell's city of Toronto and county of York directory, for 1850–1 . . ., ed. J. Armstrong (Toronto, 1850). Brown's Toronto general directory, 1856 . . . (Toronto, 1856). Brown's Toronto general directory, 1861 . . . (Toronto, 1861). Hist. of Toronto and county of York, II, 137–39. D. C. Masters, The rise of Toronto, 1850–1890 (Toronto, 1947). Douglas McCalla, "The commercial politics of the Toronto Board of Trade, 1850–1860," CHR, L (1969), 51–67.

ROBERTSON, ANDREW, lawyer, author and compiler of legal works, governor of McGill University; b. 1815 at or near Stuartfield, in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, son of James Robertson; d. 21 March 1880 at Côte-Saint-Antoine, Montreal, Que.

Andrew Robertson was 17 when his father decided to leave Scotland with his family and emigrate to the United States. The Robertsons lived for some time at Derby, in Vermont, before crossing the border and settling at Sherbrooke, where James Robertson acted for more than 25 years as minister of the Congregational Church.

On 28 Sept. 1841 Andrew Robertson was called to the bar at Montreal, after working as a clerk in the office of the future judge Charles Dewey Day*. Two of Andrew's brothers, George R. and William Wilcox*, followed his example and became lawyers; another, Joseph Gibb*, held the post of treasurer of the province of Quebec. Their sister Margaret* followed a literary career.

Andrew Robertson took up residence at Montreal, where, with his brother George and then with his brother William Wilcox, he conducted a prosperous legal practice (A. and W. Robertson), and for a period of nearly 20 years (1852–71) was an active member of the council of the bar. He held in succession the offices of council member, examiner, treasurer, and bâtonnier (1866–67). On 12 Feb. 1864 he was appointed queen's counsel. From 1856 to 1867 he collaborated with Judge Joseph-Ubalde BEAUDRY in the compiling of the Lower Canada Reports/Décisions des tribunaux du Bas-Canada. This collection sought to make known to lawyers and to the public the most important rulings in civil matters; it constituted a valuable reference work for members of the bar, who were able to base their cases or judgements on precedents. In 1864 Andrew Robertson brought out an important work entitled A digest of all the reports published in Lower Canada to 1863, which contained a summary of all legal rulings published up to that time.

Andrew Robertson, a governor of McGill University, bequeathed part of his estate to the library of the Faculty of Law, to enrich its collections. After several years of intensive work and research, he gradually lost his sight. He died at Montreal at the age of 65. It is not known whether he married.

JEAN-PIERRE CHALIFOUX

Andrew Robertson, A digest of all the reports published in Lower Canada to 1863 (Montreal, 1864). PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 26, pp.40–43. Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81, 428. Pierre Beullac et É.-F. Surveyer, Le centenaire du Barreau de Montréal, 1849–1949 (Montréal, 1949), 69–71. Lareau, Hist. de la littérature canadienne, 389–91.

ROBERTSON, JOHN, businessman and politician; b. in Perthshire, Scotland, in 1799; d. at Lawford Place, Mannington, Essex, Eng., on 3 Aug. 1876.

Before immigrating to Saint John, New Brunswick, in 1817, John Robertson married Sophia Dobie of Lancashire; they had six children. Starting as a clerk in Saint John under his uncle, Robert Robertson, he later became a super-cargo for Thomas Millidge* on vessels trading from Saint John to Newfoundland and the West Indies. When Millidge retired, Robertson joined Angus M'Kenzie to form the company of M'Kenzie and Robertson and to continue the business. Robertson formed partnerships with one or two others and by mid-century had become an independent entrepreneur in a variety of pursuits, not only in Saint John but throughout the province and internationally.

Early in his career Robertson became interested in the prosperity of Saint John and the province of New Brunswick. He ran unsuccessfully for the New Brunswick assembly in 1832. In 1836 he was appointed mayor of Saint John, and from 1837 to 1867 he was a leading spokesman for the city in the New Brunswick Legislative Council. He was, at the same time, a magistrate for Saint John. He was active in the Chamber of Commerce, often as president or a member of the council. He supported numerous projects such as the 1835 harbour bridge and the Saint John to Shediac railway. In 1859 he was one of the commissioners who recommended the removal of the provincial capital from Fredericton to Saint John. That same year he castigated the government for eliminating winter dredging in the harbour.

Robertson's own businesses were thriving all the while. Typical of his operations was a sawmill at Saint John which was "one of the most complete on the continent." It was destroyed in a spectacular fire on 5 May 1852. His interests included extensive mercantile transactions, lumbering, shipbuilding, shipping supplies, banking, insurance companies, and railways. He was president of the Victoria Coal Mining Company, a director of the Maritime Bank of the Dominion of Canada, local director of the Bank of British North America, and a director of the European and North American Railway Company. He was, in addition, the honorary New Brunswick director of the Atlantic telegraph company of 1858. He supported this project because he did not want it to bypass New Brunswick, a circumstance, he wrote, "I would think a great pity." Because of such international contacts he was appointed consul in Saint John for Uruguay and Argentina.

Robertson was also active in the New Brunswick militia. He served in several regiments and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel of the Saint John City Light Infantry. When the British were preparing to send troops to Canada following the Trent affair, he was in London where he presented the advantages of using Saint John as their eastern terminal. Not the least of these was the New Brunswick militia, and the facility with which British troops were cleared through New Brunswick on their way to Quebec was in large part the result of careful planning and coordination by the local organization. The high regard in which Robertson was held can be measured by the support he received from the officers and men for promotion over a senior officer in 1863.

In New Brunswick Robertson was regarded as a competent and indefatigable Scot who exhibited all the hospitality and independence usually associated with the type. A letter he wrote to Samuel Leonard Tilley* illustrates the point: "The taking of a man's property without his consent, yea against his will, is a violation of his just right." This was a firm comment on the method of government expropriation for railway purposes. Yet he saw the necessity for government regulations, especially of "banks and other corporations to ascertain the true state of such institutions." In some respects he exhibited the paternalism of the laird, both in the hospitality he extended to his guests and in his real concern for the downtrodden. In 1862 he spearheaded a drive to raise money for Lancashire workers who were put out of work through lack of American cotton for the mills. His sympathy did not extend, however, to the owners and their "over-speculation in mills and manufacturing." The real enemy to him was "the unmitigated selfishness of the Manchester School" who "expect the world to consume their cotton output [on] such terms as they would dictate – but besides and beyond all this they expect the Country to find their Raw Materials – to keep their mills going on terms that would leave them a profit no matter who suffers." He was particularly aware of the dangers this system held for the colonies which "have suffered . . . by the Manchester School Legislation more than once." Robertson's efforts were directed toward increasing the trade of the colonies, even if it meant protection or closer integration into the American economy.

In 1867 Robertson was appointed to the Canadian Senate. He retired to Great Britain in 1874 and there served as a director of the Imperial Bank at Lothbury. He kept close contact with Canada, especially with St Andrew's Church in Saint John where he had been an active layman and to which he continued to extend financial aid. At his death he left a North American estate alone of $390,000, and part of this was bequeathed to St Andrew's.

Robertson's career had been long, active, and prosperous. "His great success made his opinion a law to others on more matters than those of business."

C. M. Wallace

N.B. Museum, John Robertson estate papers, 1877–93; Tilley family papers, 1854–67. PAC, MG 27, I, D15 (Tilley papers), 1854–67. Saint John Daily News, 5 Aug. 1876. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson). Can. parl. comp., 1873. D. R. Jack, History of Saint

Andrew's Church, Saint John, N.B. (Saint John, N.B., 1913).

ROBINSON, WILLIAM BENJAMIN, politician; b. 22 Dec. 1797 in Kingston, U.C., youngest son of loyalists Christopher Robinson* and Esther Sayre; d. 18 July 1873 in Toronto, Ont.

In the year after William Benjamin Robinson's birth the family, which included two older brothers, Peter* and John Beverley*, moved to York (Toronto); the father died when the youngest son was less than a year old. The family seems to have lived in scanty comfort but in 1802 Esther married Elisha Beman, a mill-owner and merchant in Newmarket who had earlier been a tavern-keeper in York. It was at Newmarket that William was brought up and educated by his mother.

In his youth William was influenced by his brother Peter who took a special interest in him. Peter wrote in 1816 that "William is a very steady good lad, is with me now, and I mean to give him every opportunity of improving himself." When Peter moved from Newmarket to Holland Landing, William took over the mills and stores built by their stepfather, and on 5 May 1822 he married Elizabeth Ann Jarvis, daughter of William Jarvis*, provincial secretary of Upper Canada. They had no children. In 1833 they moved to Holland Landing, taking over the house that Peter had built there. It became the usual stopover for travellers north.

William also followed Peter into the fur trade, in the firm P. and W. Robinson. He established two trading-posts in the Muskoka district, one on an island, later called Yoho, in Lake Joseph, and the other on Georgian Bay at the mouth of the Muskoka River. He was described as being "one of the chief Indian traders throughout northern Ontario, a most intelligent and well-informed gentleman," and his reputation for fair dealing gave him a position of influence among the Indians.

In 1828 William, who like his brothers was strongly Tory in his sympathies, contested the first election for the Legislative Assembly in Simcoe County after its separation from York County. He lost to John Cawthra by nine votes, but won in the elections of 1830 and 1834. Lavish grants of lands in Medonte and Nottawasaga townships to Tory supporters just before Francis Bond HEAD's "bread and butter" election of 1836 were credited with helping Robinson defeat Samuel Lount*, who soon after supported the agitations of William Lyon Mackenzie*. In the assembly Robinson succeeded in having passed an act for macadamizing the York roads and in raising a loan of £10,000 for improvements in his constituency.

A new sphere of activity had opened for Robinson in 1833 when the assembly appointed him with Absalom Shade* and John Macaulay* as commissioners to superintend the expenditure of a grant voted for the improvement of the Welland Canal. Robinson acted in a supervisory capacity for the canal for many years, his instructions being "to give his personal attendance on the canal until it was rendered navigable." He carried out his duties with vigour (living in St Catharines from 1837 to 1843), and took charge of all contracts and disbursements.

In the first election after the union of Upper and Lower Canada in 1841 Robinson was defeated in Simcoe by Elmes Steele* of Medonte in a bitter contest in which the militia was notified to stand by. Out of the assembly, he negotiated in 1843 the first of the "Robinson Treaties" with the Indians, whereby over 700 acres of the District of Simcoe were "set aside to be held in trust for the use of the Chippewa Tribe of Lake Simcoe." Chief William Yellowhead* was a signatory.

In 1844 Robinson was re-elected to the assembly for Simcoe, and he held this seat until 1854. On 20 Dec. 1844 he became inspector-general in the government of William Henry DRAPER, with a seat on the Executive Council. Robinson, however, strongly opposed Draper's bill in 1845 to establish a provincial "University of Upper Canada," endowed partly from the grants made to King's College, the Church of England university. Although Draper was willing to postpone the bill, Robinson resigned from the Executive Council in March 1845 as a matter of principle, an action which gained him praise from the Globe and other Reform newspapers as "the only honest politician" in the ministry. After the failure of Draper's university bill Robinson refused to re-enter the Executive Council, but in 1846 accepted the post of chief commissioner of public works which he retained until the formation of the Reform ministry of Robert Baldwin* and Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*. His position enabled him to push forward many improvements in his constituency, such as the important road to Penetanguishene in 1846, the Ridge Road between Barrie and Orillia in 1848, and surveys of the county.

In 1850 Governor General Lord Elgin [Bruce*], prompted by Chief Justice John Beverley Robinson and by Bishop John Strachan*, was anxious to appoint William assistant commissioner of public works to help relieve his financial difficulties, but Baldwin rejected the suggestion as a violation of his principle of giving patronage only to his supporters. Instead, the ministry commissioned Robinson, who was already well known to the Indians, by order in council on 11 Jan. 1850 to negotiate "for the adjustment on [the Indians'] claims to the lands in the vicinity of Lakes Superior and Huron, or of such portions of them as may be required for mining purposes." In the late 1840s the Indians living on the northern shores of lakes Huron and Superior had become concerned that, although the government had not arranged treaties with the tribes, location tickets were being issued to mining companies. An armed skirmish in 1848 at one of the Quebec Mining Company's locations forced the government to act, and Alexander Vidal* and Thomas Gummersall ANDERSON reported on a proposed treaty in December 1849.

Robinson, who had earlier submitted a memorandum to the government on possible ways of settling the issue in the region of the upper lakes, made two trips to the Sault Ste Marie and Michipicoten areas in April and May 1850 to sound out Indian leaders and Hudson's Bay Company officials. Final negotiations took place at Sault Ste Marie and two treaties were signed; on 7 September the Indians of Lake Superior surrendered the land from Batchawana Bay to Pigeon River, and on 9 September the Indians of Lake Huron under Chief Shinguacouse gave up the area between Batchawana Bay and Penetanguishene. The Robinson treaties ended the difficulties on the upper lakes and were later used as models, but Robinson himself looked upon them as being "based on the same conditions as all preceding ones." The treaties included provisions for the traditional "treaty money" cash payments (£2,000 in each of these cases), payments of annuities of £1 per Indian per year, the setting aside of reserves, and the retention of hunting and fishing rights throughout the surrendered tracts. The Indians would not interfere with mineral exploration and were to be entitled to royalties from any mineral deposits found on their own reserves. An "escalator" clause provided for an increase in the annuity payments should the value of the surrendered lands increase considerably; this was a unique feature of the treaties of 1850.

After 1845 Robinson's attention in the assembly centred on the affairs of the Church of England and on measures to improve transportation facilities in the colony. He opposed Baldwin's 1849 University of Toronto Act which secularized King's College, and the following year he signed a petition to Queen Victoria requesting a royal charter for a new Church of England college. In 1850 and again in 1851 he voted against resolutions put forward by the Reform government to secularize the clergy reserves; and in the latter year he took an active part in proposals to construct an intercolonial railway linking Canada and the Maritimes. When the first separate school act for Canada West, introduced in 1855 in the Legislative Council by Étienne-Paschal Taché*, reached the assembly, Robinson voted with other Tories and with George BROWN and Mackenzie in opposing it, even though he gave nominal support to the Liberal Conservative ministry of Allan MacNab* and Taché. He was a consistent supporter of the British connection. Although he had spoken against the union of Upper and Lower Canada both before and after the visit of Lord Durham [Lambton*], and voted for dissolution of the union in 1851, he moved resolutions in the assembly expressing loyalty to the crown and the constitution during the annexation crisis of 1850. He became one of the commissioners of the Canada Company in 1852 and senior commissioner in 1865 on the death of Frederick Widder*.

The representation act of 1853 divided the Simcoe County seat; Robinson was elected by acclamation in Simcoe South in 1854, but in 1857 was defeated by an opponent of long standing, Thomas Roberts FERGUSON. He did not run again. After the death of his wife in 1865 he travelled abroad and on his return in 1867 lived in Toronto.

William Benjamin Robinson did not achieve the prominence of his two elder brothers but he carried out the various responsibilities that came his way with energy and ability, and honourably stuck to his convictions. He shared what came to be known as "the Robinson charm," a rare humour, and a zest for living that made him a delightful companion.

JULIA JARVIS

PAC, RG 10, A8, 266, 511–14. PAO, Charles Clarke papers; Sir Aemilius Irving papers; Jarvis-Powell papers; Sir John Beverley Robinson papers. Barrie Herald, 12 July 1854. Christian Guardian (Toronto), 26 March, 17 Sept. 1845. Church (Toronto), 3 July 1851. Cornwall Observer, 10 April 1845. Globe (Toronto), 25 March 1845, 22 May 1855. Kingston Herald, 25 March 1845. Mail (Toronto), 19 July 1873. Toronto Herald, 31 March, 3 April 1845. Toronto Mirror, 20 June 1856. [Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty). Canada: Indian treaties and surrenders . . . (3v., Ottawa, 1891–1912), I, II. Robina and K. M. Lizars, In the days of the Canada Company: the story of the settlement of the Huron tract and a view of the social life of the period, 1825–1850 (Toronto, Montreal, 1896). Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Appendix to journal, 1836. Armstrong, Handbook of Upper Canadian chronology. Political appointments, 1841–1865 (J.-O. Coté). Wallace, Macmillan dictionary.

Dent, Last forty years. R. K. Gordon, John Galt (University of Toronto Studies, Philological series, 5, Toronto, 1920). Hunter, Hist. of Simcoe County. Julia Jarvis, Three centuries of Robinsons: the story of a family (Toronto, 1967). C. W. Robinson, Life of Sir John Beverley Robinson, bart., C.B., D.C.L., chief justice of Upper Canada (Toronto, 1904). The University of Toronto and its colleges, 1827–1906, ed. W. J. Alexander (Toronto, 1906). [Julia Lambert], "An American lady in old Toronto: the letters of Julia Lambert, 1821–1854," ed. S. A. Heward and W. S. Wallace, RSCT, 3rd ser., XL (1946), sect.II, 101–42.

ROBLIN, JOHN PHILIP, farmer, politician, and public servant; b. in Sophiasburgh Township, U.C., 16 Aug. 1799, son of Prudence Platt and Philip Roblin, loyalist, who came to Adolphustown Township from New Jersey in 1784 and who later settled on Long Reach in Sophiasburgh at a place which became known as Roblin Mills; d. at Picton, Ont., 12 Nov. 1874.

John Philip Roblin was educated at the local school taught by Jonathan Greely. As a young man he cleared and farmed land in Ameliasburgh Township, but he moved to Hallowell Township in 1847 and in 1858 to the town of Picton. From an early age he took an active part in public life in Prince Edward County. He was appointed a justice of the peace in 1834. As a captain of the 2nd Battalion of Prince Edward militia he commanded a troop of cavalry during the winter of 1837–38. From 1848 to 1856 he was lieutenant-colonel commanding the battalion. He was first warden of the district of Prince Edward, 1841–42.

Roblin represented Prince Edward in the House of Assembly of Upper Canada from 1830 to 1836. Defeated in 1836, he again sat for Prince Edward in the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada from 1841, when he defeated David Barker Stevenson*, to 1846. In the latter year he resigned his seat to become registrar of Prince Edward County, crown lands agent, and collector of customs at Picton.

Roblin began his political life as a Reform supporter of Marshall Spring Bidwell and Peter Perry*, but, like his younger cousin David Roblin*, he eventually became somewhat disillusioned with the Reform Party of the 1840s and 1850s, and especially with the policies of George Brown whom he considered too moderate and to be "working for the Tories."

He was a staunch Wesleyan Methodist. From at least 1848 until 1863, he was a member of the senate of Victoria College at Cobourg, Ontario.

J. K. Johnson

Lennox and Addington Hist. Soc. (Napanee, Ont.), III (Thomas Willet Casey papers), 2, pp.11585–600; IV (Roblin family papers) 1, pp.14993–15002 (copies at PAC). PAC, RG 9, I, B5, 6; C4, 4; C6, 8; RG 68, 1. PAO, Legislative Assembly papers, biographical sketches of the members of the assembly, 1792–1840, comp. J. S. Carstairs and W. D. Read. J. of Education for Ont., XXVIII (1875), 12. Armstrong, Handbook of Upper Canadian chronology.

RODIER, CHARLES-SÉRAPHIN, merchant, lawyer, philanthropist, mayor of Montreal, and legislative councillor of Quebec; b. 4 Oct. 1797 at Montreal, L.C., son of Jean-Baptiste Rodier, blacksmith, and Julie-Catherine Le Jeune; d. 4 Feb. 1876 at Montreal, Que.

Charles-Séraphin Rodier was the grandson of Pierre Rodier, a native of the Dauphiné, who fought in the Seven Years' War and remained in Canada after 1759. One of 16 children, he was born in the Saint-Joseph section of Montreal, and was baptized as Charles only, the Séraphin being added at a later date. Of his early life little is known; he attended the Sulpician college of Montreal, 1809–10, and entered the dry goods business about 1816, opening a shop on St Paul Street. He was the first merchant in the city to import his own goods direct from Great Britain and France, working through agents in London and Liverpool, and also making regular trips across the Atlantic to obtain the lowest prices. He crossed the ocean some 40 times between 1819 and 1832. Before long he branched into the wholesale trade and by the time he retired in 1836, evidently anticipating the coming troubles, he had amassed a considerable fortune.

Rodier then began a new career: along with the future judge, Samuel Cornwallis Monk*, who became a lifelong friend, he studied law under Alexander Buchanan*. Rodier was admitted to the bar in 1841, but did not practise to any great extent except to appear for friends or in charity cases. Instead he turned to various speculations; in these he was generally successful, for he left an estate that was estimated to be worth over half a million dollars. His first speculative venture, during which he nearly ran into great difficulties, was his acquisition of the Hotel Rascoe. Rodier was also a director of the Banque Jacques Cartier.

He was one of those who petitioned for Montreal's first municipal charter of 1831 and was an elected councillor while it was in force, 1833–36. Although he was the only member of the council to vote for open meetings he was not a political radical, unlike his cousin Édouard-Étienne Rodier*. As he said in private, "You are wrong, my friends, the time is not ripe." After the first charter was allowed to lapse, he was appointed one of the justices of the peace to administer the city in 1837 and served as president of that body. In February 1839 he was further commissioned as one of the investigators "Concerning losses sustained during the Rebellion," in which capacity he decided some 400 cases [see Philip Henry Moore].

When Governor Charles Edward Poulett Thomson* appointed a council to administer Montreal under the revived municipal charter of 1840, Rodier was again a member, serving until a council was elected in 1843. He was then out of municipal government for some years. Nevertheless, he served as a harbour commissioner from 1840 to 1850, and as such was responsible for consolidating and refinancing the debt in 1845. For some years after 1844 he was also one of the commissioners who arranged for the foundlings and indigent sick in the Montreal district.

In 1858, when Henry Starnes* retired from the office of mayor, Rodier contested the election against John James Day, one of the aldermen. Day had alienated some of his potential voters by supporting Thomas D'Arcy McGee* in the provincial election of 1857–58 and Rodier was elected by 3,132 votes to 2,329. He was re-elected in 1859, 1860, and 1861. In 1859, he defeated Côme-Séraphin Cherrier* easily by 1,558 to 194; however, there was a major effort by Benjamin Holmes*, supported by the Montreal Gazette, to unseat him in 1860 and he won by only 24 votes. In 1862 he was defeated by Jean-Louis Beaudry* by 1,235 to 903 in a light vote in a "dull and flat" contest.

As mayor, Rodier was particularly proud of the improvement he made in the city's financial position and of the role he played in having new docks built. Rodier's mayoralty further saw the completion of the Victoria Bridge (1859) [see James HODGES], the beginning of a public transportation system (1861), and the building of the Crystal Palace. On the other side of the balance was the great flood of April 1861, when the water rose 24 feet above average and a quarter of the city was inundated. Rodier himself distributed food for the stranded from a skiff. The major social event of his mayoralty was the arrival of the Prince of Wales in August 1860, on his tour of Canada. The city was refurbished and Rodier greeted the prince in new robes, chain of office, and sword, copied from those of the lord mayor of London; his attire won him the nickname "The Peacock" from his political opponents. Afterwards he renamed his Rue Saint-Antoine house "Prince of Wales Castle" and had a statue of the prince erected on a turret. Later he also received François d'Orléans, Prince de Joinville, and Prince Alfred of Saxe-Cobourg-Gotha, another son of Queen Victoria. The Montreal Daily Witness, in evaluating his career, said that "as Mayor he kept firm control on the reins of power, and made himself respected in the Council."

After his defeat in 1862 Rodier retired from politics until 1867, when he was appointed to the new Legislative Council of Quebec as member for the De Lorimier division. There he sat as a Conservative and gained a reputation for both eloquence and financial acumen. Throughout his life he was connected with the militia, being commissioned ensign and acting as quartermaster of the Montreal 2nd Battalion in 1821, rising to lieutenant in 1828, captain in 1831, major in 1847, and finally lieutenant-colonel of the 7th Montreal Battalion in 1862.

He was also active in religious charities. In 1843, a year after the Jesuits had returned to Canada, he provided them, without charge, with their first Montreal noviciate in a portion of his own Rue Saint-Antoine mansion, which they used until 1851. In 1868 he turned part of his premises over to the Grey Nuns as the Bethlehem Asylum for orphans and in 1872–73 he built them a larger building on Richmond Square. He presented them with this property, valued at $35,000, and also endowed the orphanage both then and in his will. Further he arranged for the Sulpicians to provide aid and medical treatment for the poor in part of the orphanage, and endowed the Good Shepherd Nuns. It was at his suggestion that St James Cathedral was located in Dominion Square.

On 8 Sept. 1825, at Notre-Dame Church, he had married Marie-Louise (d. 14 April 1879), the daughter of Paul Lacroix. The family were Alsatians whose original name was Von Kreuz. Two sons and a daughter died young, but two daughters outlived him. Senator Charles-Séraphin Rodier* (1818–90), an industrialist and a leading figure in Montreal, was his nephew.

A man who made a success of several careers, and was famous in the city for his correctness of dress and his courteous manner, Rodier often had an original way of doing things and could be eccentric. His long and varied career provides a good example of how the conservative businessmen of the pre-rebellion days could adapt themselves to new circumstances, and play an important role in the era after responsible government: the Patriotes of 1837 would have seen him as a traitor, but one of his pallbearers was Antoine-Aimé Dorion*. As Le Nouveau Monde stated in his obituary, he was "one of Montreal's most respected citizens; his fine and charitable nature has long earned him the esteem of his fellow citizens."

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

AJM, Greffe de A.-C. Décary, testament de C.-S. Rodier, 22 janv. 1876. AVM, Biographies de maires. Gazette (Montreal), 5 Feb. 1876. Montreal Daily Witness, 12 Feb. 1862, 5 Feb. 1876. Montreal Gazette, 6 March 1858; 13 Jan. 1860; 24, 25 Feb. 1862. Le Nouveau Monde (Montréal), 5 févr., 9 févr. 1876;

15 avril 1879. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 24 févr. 1876.

Can. parl. comp., 1875, 458–59. Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 239. A la mémoire de l'honorable Charles-Séraphin Rodier, avocat, ex-maire de Montréal, membre du Conseil législatif de la province de Québec, lieut.-colonel du 7e bataillon, fondateur de l'asile de Bethléem (s.l., s.d.). Atherton, Montreal, II, 208; III, 85–86. Histoire de la Corporation de la Cité de Montréal, depuis son origine jusqu'à nos jours . . . , J.-C. Lamothe et al., édit. (Montréal, 1903), 58–59, 161, 200–1, 204, 207, 281, 283, 286. F. W. Terrill, A chronology of Montreal and of Canada from A.D. 1752 to A.D. 1893, including commercial statistics, historical sketches of commercial corporations and firms and advertisements . . . (Montreal, 1893), 230, 236–67. E. A. Collard, "Mayor's house," Gazette (Montreal), 25 Jan. 1969. J.-J. Lefebvre et Thérèse Cromp, "Nos disparus," La Revue du barreau de la province de Québec (Montréal), XVIII (1958), 407–9. É.-Z. Massicotte, "Deux Rodier," BRH, XLIV (1938), 120–22.

ROEBUCK, JOHN ARTHUR, politician; b. 28 Dec. 1802 at Madras, India, fifth son of Ebenezer Roebuck, civil administrator in India, and Zipporah Tickell; d. 30 Nov. 1879 in London, Eng. In 1834 he married Henrietta Falconer, who, with a daughter, survived him.

On his father's early death, John Arthur Roebuck's mother took him to England in 1807; she made a second marriage there to John SIMPSON and members of the family emigrated to Upper Canada in 1815, where they initially owned an estate at Augusta, on the St Lawrence between Prescott and Brockville. In 1824 John Arthur returned to England and entered the Inner Temple, being called to the bar in 1831 and eventually appointed QC in 1843. He became MP for Bath in 1832 and, as a disciple of Jeremy Bentham, adopted radical views, supporting vote by ballot, an elective magistracy, a national system of secular education, disestablishment of the Church of England, the removal of all civil and religious disabilities, and a reduction in the powers of the House of Lords. Although his radicalism mellowed in later years, he remained strongly out of sympathy with the Whigs, denouncing them as an exclusive aristocratic faction that insincerely employed democratic slogans for party purposes.

In 1834 Roebuck moved in the House of Commons for the appointment of the committee which inquired into the affairs of Canada in that year. He did not speak on Canadian affairs on any other occasion between 1832 and 1835, when, perhaps because of Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU's connection with the radical Joseph Hume, he became agent in England for the assembly of Lower Canada, and, acting in effect as Papineau's personal representative, advanced in parliament and in the press the demands of the Canadian reformers for an elective legislative council and for local control over all provincial revenues and crown lands. Despite Papineau's appreciation of his efforts, the assembly did not meet his expenses and a debt lasted for some years. One of a small group of outspoken radicals, Roebuck vigorously condemned Whig policy towards Canada as embodied in Lord John Russell's resolutions in March 1837, and, though he had lost his parliamentary seat in an election later that year and was no longer Lower Canada's agent, he was allowed in 1838 to speak at the bar of both houses in opposition to the bill to suspend the Canadian constitution. Roebuck never doubted the value of colonies to Britain, but he demanded the reform of the existing system of imperial administration at home and overseas. Fearing also the annexation of the Canadian provinces by the United States, he advocated that Britain grant the colonists a greater degree of self-government and form a North American federation, views he set out in The colonies of England, published in 1849.

Roebuck was again returned to parliament by Bath, 1841–47, and by Sheffield, 1849–68 and 1874–79. In 1855 he was appointed chairman of a parliamentary select committee whose report condemned ministerial incompetence in the conduct of the Crimean War. To the annoyance of his friends and supporters, he championed the south in the American Civil War and defended Austrian rule in Italy. In 1878 he was made a privy councillor by a Conservative government.

Roebuck, short in stature, was self-confident and impulsive in expressing his opinions. The destructive criticism and bitter invective of his speeches were appreciated more by popular audiences than by the House of Commons, where the strength of his language tended to harm rather than promote the causes he espoused and his irritability was reputed to be more in evidence than his undoubted intellectual powers. His independence of party ties and conscientious exposure of shams and abuses suggested to the English public a person of great integrity, but he remained one of the most wayward politicians of his time.

PETER BURROUGHS

J. A. Roebuck, The colonies of England: a plan for the government of some portion of our colonial possessions (London, 1849); History of the Whig ministry of 1830 to the passing of the Reform bill (2v., London, 1852); [ ] Life and letters of John Arthur Roebuck . . . , ed. R. E. Leader (London and New York, 1897); Radical support to a Whig ministry (n.p., 1836). Pamphlets for the people, ed. J. A. Roebuck (2v., London, 1835).

PAC, MG 24, A19 (Roebuck papers), 1. Times London), 1 Dec. 1879. DNB.

ROGER, CHARLES, historian and journalist; b. Dundee, Scotland, 14 April 1819, son of Charles Roger and his first wife Ann Cruikshank; d. perhaps in 1878.

Charles Roger Sr moved from Perthshire to Dundee where he was successively a tobacco merchant and city librarian. His son, Charles, matriculated at St Salvator's College in St Andrews University in 1832–33 and studied first for the ministry and then for the medical profession. In September 1835, however, he gave up his studies and enlisted in the Royal Artillery at Perth. He was first enrolled as a gunner in the 7th Battalion, but in 1836 was transferred to the 4th Battalion where he was promoted bombardier in 1839 and corporal in 1841. From 1836 to 1839 he was stationed at Halifax, Nova Scotia, and from then until 1842 he was at Quebec City. When he was discharged, at his own request, in July 1842, his conduct was shown as "exemplary" and he was allowed £25. (He should not be confused with the Charles Rogers of the 95th Foot who was cashiered by court martial in 1842.)

Roger, a Presbyterian, married Dorothy MacRobie at Quebec on 29 Feb. 1840; they had at least five sons and four daughters. He apparently remained in Quebec City after he left the army, and by 1847 he was superintendent of the library for the Quebec Library Association. In 1849 he left this post to work for the Morning Chronicle (1849–53) and then briefly for the Quebec Gazette. Although he is often given as an editor of the papers, he was not the editor-in-chief for either. On 30 March 1854, with the help of subscriptions raised by friends, he began his own paper, the Observer, which expired in 1855. By 1856 he was back working for the Quebec Gazette, but in the next year he was again superintendent for the Quebec Library Association before moving to Port Hope, Canada West.

It was in Quebec that Roger began writing works on Canadian history. His first and best known work was The rise of Canada, from barbarism to wealth and civilisation (1856), of which only one volume covering the period 1534 to 1824 was ever published. The projected second volume, which would have brought the history up to 1837, was apparently never written, probably because of the appearance of John Mercier McMullen*'s history in 1855. Roger worked in haste, relying on only a few sources, particularly Robert Christie*'s history of Lower Canada; he has received more credit from the critics for his energy than for his merits. Yet the work is well written. It concentrates most heavily on the modern period, and as the title indicates, it is a tale of progress. The next year he wrote Stadacona depicta; or Quebec and its environs, the title obviously influenced by the Reverend Newton Bosworth*'s study of Montreal. Roger's work is a history and description of the city as it was in 1842, based on Hawkins's picture of Quebec; with historical recollections (Quebec, 1834), by Alfred Hawkins*, along with further information on conditions in 1857. Roger probably also prepared an historical guide Quebec: as it was, and as it is, of which there were five editions between 1857 and 1867, the first four appearing under the name of Willis Russell*.

Once resident at Port Hope, Roger founded another newspaper, the Atlas, which was described succinctly as "a venture of C. Roger & Co., in 1858 which stood a short battle." He then moved to the small village of Millbrook, some 15 miles to the north, where he apparently published a newspaper, again called the Observer, for some years.

Roger next turned up in Ottawa where he was a clerk in the post office from about 1866 to 1874. He resumed his literary efforts, and in 1871 produced another historical guide book, Ottawa past and present. He also wrote a series of letters to the Ottawa Times describing a visit to England in 1872–73, which were later reprinted in pamphlet form as Glimpses of London, and Atlantic experiences. It was while in England in 1873 that he was elected a fellow of the Royal Historical Society, probably under the aegis of its secretary, his cousin the historian Charles Rogers, who was the most important of the several members of his family with literary interests.

What happened to Roger after his return from England is obscure; he disappears from the Ottawa city directories after 1874. W. S. Wallace* shows the date of his death as 1878, but Roger continued to appear as a correspondent of the Royal Historical Society until 1880. He disappears after this date.

Although a minor figure Charles Roger is interesting as one of the earliest Canadian historians and as an example of the type of wandering, unsuccessful newspaper editor who appears so frequently in 19th century Canada.

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

Charles Roger was the author of Glimpses of London and Atlantic experiences; or, an account of a voyage to England . . . in the winter of 1872–73 (Ottawa, 1873); Ottawa past and present, or a brief account of the first opening up of the Ottawa country, and incidents in connection with the rise and progress of Ottawa city and parts adjacent thereto . . . (Ottawa, 1871); The rise of Canada, from barbarism to wealth and civilisation (Quebec, 1856); Stadacona depicta: or Quebec and its environs historically, panoramically, and locally exhibited (Quebec, [1857]); and was probably the author of Quebec: as it was, and as it is, or, a brief history of the oldest city in Canada, from its foundation to the present time, with a guide for strangers to the different places of interest within the city and adjacent thereto, prepared for Willis Russell (1st ed., Quebec, 1857; 3rd ed., 1860; 4th ed., 1864; 5th ed., 1867). Morning Chronicle (Quebec), 1849–53. Quebec Gazette, 1853, 1856. No copies of the newspapers Roger edited are known to exist.

PAC, RG 31, A1, 1871, Ottawa city, Wellington ward. PRO, WO 69/107; WO 71/314. Beaulieu et Hamelin, Journaux du Québec, 204. Boase, Modern English biography, III, 254; VI, 493. Canada, an encyclopædia, V, 161. Illustrated historical atlas of the counties of Northumberland and Durham, Ont. (Toronto, 1878), x. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, 324. Norah Story, The Oxford companion to Canadian history and literature (Toronto, London, New York, 1967), 723. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 642. Lareau, Hist. de la littérature canadienne, 181–83. Lit. hist. of Can. (Klinck), 215–16. Horace Têtu, Historique des journaux de Québec (2^e éd., Québec, 1889), 41. Charles Rogers, "Notes on the history of the Scottish branch of the Norman house of Roger," Historical Society Trans. (London), I (1872), 357–88. F. C. Wurtele, "Our library," Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Trans., new ser., XIX (1889), 31–73.

ROLETTE (Rollette), JOSEPH, fur-trader and legislator; b. 23 Oct. 1820, Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, son of Jean-Joseph Rolette* and Marguerite Dubois; d. 16 May 1871, Pembina, North Dakota.

Joseph Rolette Jr was the son of a pioneer French Canadian fur-trader of the upper Mississippi River region. After his education in New York under the guardianship of Ramsay Crooks, the president of the American Fur Company, for whom his father worked, he returned west to Fort Snelling (St Paul), Minnesota. In 1840 he was employed by the American Fur Company in the Pembina area under the supervision of one of its partners, Henry Hastings Sibley*, who was in charge of the fur trade of the northern Minnesota district. With his uncle, Henry Fisher, Rolette established a cart route between Pembina and St Paul as part of a plan of drawing furs from the Hudson's Bay Company territories to the St Paul market.

By 1844 Sibley had formed new business associations, including a partnership with Norman Wolfred Kittson*. A post was established at Pembina, and Rolette, both clerk and trader, was placed in charge of it and several other posts along the international frontier. Three years later, during the fierce competition between American traders and the HBC for the border fur trade, he burned a post which the latter's traders had established near Pembina. In 1853 Kittson moved his headquarters west to St Joseph (Walhalla), North Dakota. Rolette remained at the Pembina post, and when Sibley and Kittson withdrew from the border area the following year because they could not compete with the high prices which the HBC offered in its campaign to defeat them, he was left in charge as a semi-independent trader. By this time he had invested his own money in the fur trade as well as in land speculation in the Pembina area. Rolette lost heavily in both enterprises and by 1857, a year of depression, he was almost penniless.

In 1852 Rolette had been elected one of two representatives of the Pembina district to the territorial legislature of Minnesota and in 1856–57 was a member of the territorial council. He served later as postmaster at Pembina and from 1866 to 1870 was a United States customs officer. Throughout his life he was associated with this border community, and was a well-known and hospitable host to travellers in the Red River valley, as well as a familiar figure in the Red River Settlement where his children were educated. In 1845 he had married at Saint-Boniface Angélique Jérôme, a French-Chippewa woman; they had 11 children.

During the Red River disturbances of 1869–70 Rolette was one of a group of "correspondents" forwarding information on the events at Red River to the St Paul newspapers. They sought to make the disturbances a movement which had as its purpose independence or annexion to the United States. Along with other Americans in the Red River Settlement and at Pembina, including Enos STUTSMAN, he endeavoured to induce Louis Riel* to bring the settlement into the American union.

Rolette is remembered as a jovial and spirited frontier figure of enterprising and aggressive methods. Whether in an Indian fight, in relations with the Métis population, or in the highly competitive fur trade, he was both a capable and a daring adventurer.

HARTWELL BOWSFIELD

Begg's Red River journal (Morton), 9, 86, 165, 349. Minnesota Hist. Soc. Coll., XXIV (1912), 654. Manitoban (Winnipeg), 27 May 1871. Joseph Tassé, Les Canadiens de l'Ouest (2^e éd., 2v., Montréal, 1878), I, 211; II, 31–40. A. C. Gluek, Minnesota and the manifest destiny of the Canadian northwest; a study in Canadian-American relations (Toronto, 1965), 85, 116–17. J. P. Pritchett, "Some Red River fur-trade activities," Minnesota History Bulletin (St Paul), V (1923–24), 401–23. G. B. Winship, "Early politics and politicians of North Dakota," University of North Dakota, Quarterly J. (Grand Forks), XIII (1923), 254–67.

ROSS, BERNARD ROGAN, HBC chief trader and naturalist; b. 25 Sept. 1827 at Londonderry, Ireland, son of James Ross and Elizabeth Rogan; d. 21 June 1874 while visiting Toronto, Ont.

Bernard Rogan Ross was educated at Royle College, Londonderry, and entered the service of the Hudson's Bay Company at the suggestion of Sir George Simpson* who had met him at the Londonderry home of his uncle, Dr Frank Rogan. Coming to Canada too late in the season to proceed to the northwest, Ross taught school in Cornwall until the spring when he went to Norway House. His posting to that place as an apprentice clerk is listed in the minutes of the Council of the Northern Department of the company held at the Red River Settlement in June 1843. While with the company Ross served at many posts including Norway House, York Factory, Fort Simpson, Fort Norman, and Fort Resolution. In 1856 he was appointed a chief trader and from 1858 to 1862 was at Fort Simpson in charge of the Mackenzie River District. He retired in 1871. In 1860 he had married Christina Ross, daughter of chief factor Donald Ross*; they had three children.

Ross was in the Red River Settlement at the time of the disturbances of 1869–70 and according to Alexander Begg*, the diarist, was one of an unofficial group which advised against the formation of a provisional government. This group suggested that the HBC continue to govern and that the people elect an executive council to negotiate with Canada the terms by which they should enter confederation.

Ross's primary significance is in the field of natural history rather than the fur trade. Like many company men he contributed much to the early scientific knowledge of the northwest. While at Fort Simpson he made valuable collections of mammalia, insects, and birds, forwarding specimens to the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, the Royal Scottish Museum in Edinburgh, and the British Museum in London. Ross's Goose was named after him in 1861. He was a foundation fellow of the Anthropological Society in 1863, and became a fellow of the Royal Geographical Society the following year. In addition he was a corresponding member of the New York Historical Society, a correspondent of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia in 1861, and of the Natural History Society of Montreal. A list of some of his scientific papers is found in the Catalogue of scientific papers (1800–1863) compiled by the Royal Society of London and published in 1871. A short essay on the fur trade and transportation in the north, which he wrote when he was 18, was published in the Beaver in 1955.

HARTWELL BOWSFIELD

PAM, Biographical files. Begg's Red River journal (Morton). HBRS, XVI (Rich and Johnson). [B. R. Ross], "Fur trade gossip sheet," Beaver, outfit 285 (spring 1955), 52 (originally published in the Fort William Daily Times-Journal, 27 Dec. 1928). B. W. Cartwright and Angus Gavin, "Where the Ross' Geese nest," Beaver, outfit 271 (Dec. 1940), 6. Robert Kerr, "For the Royal Scottish Museum," Beaver, outfit 284 (June 1953), 32. J. M. Sherk, "HBC pioneer Bernard Rogan Ross," Beaver, outfit 257 (Dec. 1926), 25.

ROSS, JAMES, teacher, public servant, journalist, and lawyer; b. 9 May 1835 at Colony Gardens, the family house in Red River Settlement, son of Alexander Ross*, former chief trader of the Hudson's Bay Company, and Sarah, who may have been a daughter of an Okanagan Indian chief; d. 20 Sept. 1871 probably at Colony Gardens.

James Ross was educated at Red River and at Toronto. The Reverend David Anderson*, bishop of Rupert's Land, later wrote that Ross was "a distinguished scholar at the Red River College of St. John's . . . who afterwards went through a very creditable academic career at the University of Toronto." He entered the university on a scholarship in 1853, received awards each year, and upon graduation in 1857 won three medals, two gold and one silver. For a brief time after graduation Ross seriously considered entering the Presbyterian ministry, but an opportunity to teach at Upper Canada College changed his mind. However, the death of an older brother, William, in 1856, followed by the death of his father in the same year, left the affairs of his family in a tangled condition. Ross and John BLACK, the two executors, disagreed about the settlement of the estates and Ross was forced to return to Red River. Before leaving Toronto, Ross married Margaret Smith on 18 May 1858; five children were born of this marriage. Upon his arrival at Red River Ross found himself confronted by extremely complex family problems and, though he did his best to resolve them, these problems plagued Ross and complicated his relations with other members of the family until his death. Shortly after his return, on 12 May 1859, Ross was appointed postmaster of the Assiniboia at a salary of £10 per annum.

In 1860, Ross joined his brother-in-law, William Coldwell*, and William Buckingham*, two former Toronto journalists, as part owner and an editor of the Nor' Wester, the first newspaper in the Red River Settlement. In October 1860 Buckingham withdrew and Ross' interest in, and work for, the Nor' Wester increased. During 1861 the Nor' Wester published, in 16 instalments, "History of the Red River Settlement," written by Ross, a work of considerable interest for it contains much information about the settlement which is not readily accessible elsewhere. Not long after Ross joined the Nor' Wester, the paper carried an editorial criticizing the Hudson's Bay Company and the system of government at Red River. As a result, Ross and the paper were identified with the "Canadian party." This did not, however, prevent the Council of Assiniboia from appointing Ross sheriff and governor of the gaol in the spring of 1862. But Ross continued to antagonize the local authorities.

During the summer of 1862 the Sioux massacred many American settlers; to avoid reprisals by American troops they fled into British territory and encamped not far from the Red River Settlement. Their presence caused much alarm in the settlement. Under these circumstances the Council of Assiniboia circulated a petition calling for the imperial government to send out troops for the protection of the settlers. In the Nor' Wester Ross immediately launched a counter-petition, not only calling upon the imperial government to dispatch troops to Red River but also requesting "such changes in the system and administration of the local government as will remove the present discontent and dissatisfaction. . . ." This was too much; by a unanimous vote of the council on 25 November, Ross' appointments as postmaster, sheriff, and governor of the gaol were terminated. Ross, however, continued his attacks; a number of meetings were held at which he denounced the local government and urged the settlers to sign the counter-petition. Eventually Sandford Fleming* forwarded the counter-petition to the colonial secretary, the Duke of Newcastle [Henry Clinton].

Ross again identified himself with the anti-government forces during the trial of the Reverend Griffith Owen Corbett*. Corbett, who had supported the counter-petition, was brought to trial on the charge of having attempted to perform an illegal operation upon his maid servant. Ross saw in this the persecution of Corbett for the latter's opposition to the government and consequently played a leading role in the defence of Corbett, thereby adding to his reputation as an opponent of the existing government.

Ross' association with the Nor' Wester had placed him squarely among the members of the Canadian party. When Ross withdrew from the Nor' Wester late in 1863, in anticipation of his return to Canada, the manner in which he withdrew reinforced his connection, for his place was soon taken by Dr John Christian Schultz* who was regarded by many as the leader of the Canadian faction at Red River.

Leaving his wife and children behind him, Ross departed from the settlement in the spring of 1864 and returned to Toronto to study law. Margaret and some of the children joined him when it became evident that his stay in the east would be a long one. On 5 July Ross became a clerk for John McNab, attorney, and in August of the same year he wrote and passed examinations for admission to the Law Society of Upper Canada. Ross pursued other studies also and in June of 1865 he received an MA from the University of Toronto.

While carrying on his studies Ross had to support his wife and family; not unnaturally he turned to journalism. Given his association with the Nor' Wester, Ross had little difficulty in establishing a connection with George BROWN and the Globe; he maintained this connection until September 1864, when he accepted a position with the Hamilton Spectator which he held until the spring of 1865. At that time, having decided to settle permanently in Canada, Ross returned briefly to the Red River in order to clear up his personal affairs. Upon returning to Toronto in the late summer of 1865, Ross bought a house and went to work for the Globe. As a journalist in Canada from 1865 to 1869, Ross continued his attacks upon the HBC, and became known as a staunch proponent of the annexation of the company's territories by Canada.

As his stay in Canada lengthened it became increasingly evident that Ross was unhappy; he was cut off from most of his family and from many of his friends; moreover, as his letters indicate, he became more and more concerned over the cost of living in Toronto. Then too, there were still disputes over his father's estate which could only be resolved in the Red River Settlement. Late in the summer of 1869 Ross sold his house in Toronto and, accompanied by his family, he set out for the Red River. The early fall saw Ross back in Colony Gardens and thus in a position to play an important role in the dramatic events of 1869–70.

After Louis Riel* and his followers forced William McDougall*, the governor from Canada, to return to Pembina on 21 Oct. 1869, elections were held in all the Red River communities to choose representatives to consider Riel's proposal for establishing a provisional government. James Ross was elected to represent the people of Kildonan. In the meetings which followed, Ross became "the spokesman for the English as definitely as Riel was for the French." Ross and the majority of the English representatives did not sanction the establishment of a provisional government because they believed that such an act would be illegal. Instead they proposed that a more representative government, under the authority of the HBC, should be established. However, while Ross differed from Riel on the course of action to be taken, he firmly believed that it was essential for the English settlers to cooperate with the French in order to prevent the outbreak of civil war in the Red River. It is evident that his was a wise and statesmanlike position, and in adopting it Ross helped to prevent disaster overtaking the people of the settlement. But by taking this stand Ross found himself diametrically opposed to his former friends in the Canadian party; from their point of view Ross' action was little short of treason, and they never forgave him for it.

Following the intervention of Donald Alexander Smith*, special commissioner from the Canadian government, it was proposed that a convention, composed of representatives from each part of the settlement, should meet to discuss the terms on which the people of Red River would enter confederation. Ross was the unanimous choice to represent the parish of St John's. The delegates met from 26 Jan. to 11 Feb. 1870, and selected Ross as a member of the committee of six chosen to draft the List of Rights. Throughout the debate which followed the presentation of the committee's report, Ross was not only the leading spokesman for the English representatives, but served as translator of the speeches of the French delegates. Often he led the opposition to the proposals stemming from Riel's suggestion that Red River should enter Canada as a province. Ross argued that it would be more in the interest of the people of Red River to enter as a territory and the convention supported him on this issue. But though the debate was often heated and emotional Ross' efforts helped to prevent a complete break between the English and French representatives. Riel, as president of the provisional government, recognized the value of Ross' efforts and appointed him chief justice in his administration.

It appears that Ross had been drinking heavily for some time and during this tense period his drinking increased; consequently for weeks in the late spring of 1870 Ross did little and he had no impact upon developments. In the late summer he went to Toronto, ostensibly on personal business, but his letters reveal that he wanted to be absent from the settlement when Colonel Garnet Joseph Wolseley*'s expeditionary force arrived. He was afraid that his actions during the previous winter might be misunderstood by the Canadians. He wrote his wife that he would return only after things had settled down and he suggested she state that his actions had been determined by his efforts to prevent bloodshed. While in Toronto, Ross took every opportunity to explain the policy he had followed during the critical days at Red River.

When Ross finally returned in the middle of October 1870, the newly established province was relatively peaceful. This was only a momentary lull before it was disturbed by both provincial and federal election campaigns in 1870 and 1871. Dr John Schultz was a candidate for the federal constituency of Lisgar, and Ross, convinced that the actions of Schultz during the winter of 1869–70 had nearly provoked civil war, threw himself into the campaign to oppose his election. First Ross supported Dr Curtis James Bird and campaigned vigorously to rally the old settlers behind Dr Bird. When the latter withdrew from the contest after being elected to the provincial assembly, Ross gave his support to Bird's replacement, Colin Inkster*. All Ross' efforts were in vain, for Dr Schultz won an easy victory.

Courts were soon established in Manitoba, and Ross decided to return to the legal profession. On 8 May 1871, he became the third man to be admitted to the bar of Manitoba, but he had little opportunity to practise in the new province. In the tension of the election campaigns Ross had again taken to drink and during the summer his health began to decline rapidly. Pulmonary disease, of which there was a history in the family, may have caused his death.

W. D. Smith

PAM, Alexander Ross family papers; Church of England registers, St John's Church (Winnipeg), baptisms, 1828–79, no.885. Begg's Red River journal (Morton). Canadian North-West (Oliver), I, 442, 505–8. Hargrave, Red River. Manitoban (Winnipeg), 23 Sept. 1871. Nor'Wester (Winnipeg), 1860–63. The Canada directory, for 1857–58 . . . (Montreal, 1857), 808. Begg and Nursey, Ten years in Winnipeg. Careless, Brown, II, 7–8.

ROSS, JOHN, lawyer, politician, and businessman; b. in County Antrim, Ireland, 10 March 1818; d. 31 Jan. 1871, at Toronto, Ont.

John Ross was brought to Canada as an infant and was educated in Johnstown District (Leeds and Grenville counties) and Brockville. At 16 he was articled to Andrew Norton Buell and later to George Sherwood*. He was called to the bar of Upper Canada in 1839 and set up practice at Belleville. The roots of both his business and his political career lay in Belleville and the surrounding Hastings County, but acquaintance with the families of Levius Peters Sherwood* and George Crawford* and with William* Jr and A. N. Buell in Brockville introduced Ross to a circle of political, legal, and financial connections that he constantly enlarged. Alexander Tilloch Galt*'s brother

Thomas* was for a time a partner of Ross. Godparents of his sons included Robert Baldwin*, David Lewis Macpherson*, Philip VanKoughnet, and A. T. Galt. In September 1855 he wrote of Francis Hincks*: "He and I have been like brothers for so many years that I find it hard to part from him." Because of his work for the Grand Trunk Railway Company his associations also extended to the financial interests of London, England.

Business affairs had prospered sufficiently by early 1847 to allow Ross to marry Margaret, the daughter of George Crawford. She died before the year was out, and on 4 Feb. 1851 he married Robert Baldwin's daughter, Augusta Elizabeth, at St James' Cathedral in Toronto; they had three sons. They resided in Belleville for several years; by 1857 they were established in Yorkville near Toronto. Here Ross practised law in partnership with Abram William Lauder* and Thomas Charles Patteson*, but he continued his practice in Belleville with John Bell and later Thomas Holden.

In a letter of 1867 to John A. Macdonald*, Ross wrote: "my politics can best be described according to the facts. Up to the year 1854 I was follower first of Mr. Baldwin and then of Mr. Hincks. I then joined the coalition government with you, and have supported you and your policy ever since." When just 23 Ross had campaigned vigorously for Baldwin's election to the Legislative Assembly in 1841 and had persuaded him to stand for Hastings. A special confidence grew up between the two men, based in part on an identity of political views but reinforced by mutual sympathy in widowerhood and later in the relationship of father and son-in-law. From 1841 to 1848 John Ross was Baldwin's loyal aid and adviser in the area from Hastings to Grenville counties. He was rewarded on 1 Dec. 1848 with a seat on the Legislative Council. Ross did not treat the appointment as a sinecure, but continued to lead an active political and official career from the "Upper House."

John Ross' service in public office extends from late 1851 to early 1862. He was appointed solicitor general for Canada West without a seat in the cabinet on 12 Nov. 1851. Hincks brought him into the cabinet as attorney general for Canada West on 22 June 1853. When Hincks was defeated and withdrew from politics in the late summer of 1854, his mantle fell upon Ross who entered the Allan Napier MacNab*–Augustin-Norbert Morin* government as leader of the moderate Reformers. His presence in the cabinet as speaker of the Legislative Council was viewed as a pledge that a number of measures advocated by the Hincks-Morin government would be carried into law by the new coalition government. In the next years the political tensions apparent in the Legislative Assembly were echoed within the cabinet. John Ross repressed the full measure of his frustration in the meetings of the executive, but wrote of them privately. He distrusted Lewis Thomas Drummond*, and lacked sympathy for Joseph-Édouard Cauchon* and François-Xavier Lemieux*. He felt that MacNab was not effective and seemed always to be dealing with a mob of hangers-on. By 18 April 1856 the moderate Reformers had lost confidence in MacNab and were drifting into opposition. Ross resigned his speakership in the Legislative Council and strove to rally the moderate Reformers to support John A. Macdonald who was emerging as the new leader of the government. Macdonald brought Ross back into the government on 2 Feb. 1858 as receiver-general and member of the Board of Railroad Commissioners. Following the brief interlude of the George Brown–Antoine-Aimé Dorion* administration of 2–4 August, George-Étienne Cartier appointed Ross president of the Executive Council and minister of agriculture on 7 Aug. 1858. He continued in these offices until his resignation from government 26 March 1862.

Ross was an effective administrator as well as an astute politician. His official correspondence reveals a clear concise mind, and the long continuity of his service in office confirms that he was reliable. Much of his correspondence to Baldwin and Macdonald is filled with well-founded speculation about contemporary political affairs. He was a trusted lieutenant of Hincks, serving at times as his special "trouble shooter" in Washington and London in the 1850s, and there making use of his political as well as administrative and financial talents. His role is one of the antecedents of the office of high commissioner in London. Cartier took Ross along as well as Galt when he went to London in October 1858 to press for British North American federation. On 5 November Ross had an audience with Queen Victoria and spoke of the possibility of a royal visit to Canada. A part of Ross' usefulness to the mission of 1858 was that he was well regarded in some influential British financial circles.

Hincks appointed Ross one of the six government directors of the newly projected Grand Trunk Railway on 11 Nov. 1852, and dispatched him immediately to London. There, in the next months, Ross was at the centre of the intricate negotiations that brought together financial resources and experienced contractors and resulted in the Grand Trunk Railway prospectus of 12 April 1853. At the request of the British financial interests Ross was then appointed president of the railway. His effectiveness as president was in maintaining the legal and administrative machinery of the company and in coordinating in one policy the disparate pressures of various financial interests, the contractors, and the Canadian government. At the same time he fended off threats from competing railroads and the opposition in the Canadian parliament. On 20 Feb. 1857 he was the first witness to give evidence before the select committee of the House of Commons enquiring into the future of the Hudson's Bay Company. He appeared as a former Canadian minister and an expert witness concerning the development of railroads to the west. He remained president of the Grand Trunk until 1862 when the company was reorganized and Sir Edward W. Watkin* succeeded to the office.

After 1862 John Ross receded from public attention into private business, but his attendance in the Legislative Council was regular. In 1867 he was appointed to the Senate. He was a director of the Northern Railway Company of Canada, a charter member of the Dominion Bank in 1869, and from 1862 to 1869 lieutenant colonel in the 2nd Battalion of Toronto militia. He died in Toronto in 1871 "after a long painful illness."

PAUL CORNELL

MTCL, Baldwin papers. PAC, MG 24, B11 (Baldwin papers), ser.2, 5; B40 (George Brown papers), ser.1, 2; D16 (Buchanan papers), 53; MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 260. St James' Cathedral (Toronto), baptismal and marriage registers. G.B., Parl., House of Commons paper, 1857 (Session II), XV, 224, 260 (whole volume), Report from the select committee on the Hudson's Bay Company . . ., "Minutes of evidence . . . ," 1–357. Robert Ross, friend of friends; letters to Robert Ross, art critic and writer, together with extracts from his published articles, ed. Margery Ross (London, [1952]). Canada, an encyclopædia, I. The Canada directory . . . 1851, ed. R. W. S. Mackay (Montreal, 1851). Can. directory of parliament (Johnson), 508–9. Encyclopedia of Canada, V. Mitchell & Co.'s Canada classified directory for 1865–66 (Toronto, n.d.). Mitchell's Toronto directory for 1864–5 (Toronto, 1864). Morgan, Sketches of celebrated Canadians, 612–14.

Careless, Brown, I; Union of the Canadas. Creighton, Macdonald, young politician. R. S. Longley, Sir Francis Hincks; a study of Canadian politics, railways, and finance in the nineteenth century (Toronto, 1943). Sissons, Ryerson, II. O. D. Skelton, The life and times of Sir Alexander Tilloch Galt (Toronto, 1920). G. R. Stevens, Canadian National Railways (2v., Toronto, 1960), I. D. W. Swainson, "Business and politics: the career of John Willoughby Crawford," Ont. Hist., LXI (1969), 225–36.

ROUSSY, LOUIS, Protestant missionary, b. at Vevey, Switzerland, in 1812; d., a bachelor, at Grande Ligne (Saint-Jean County), Quebec, in November 1880.

Louis Roussy, of Huguenot descent, was educated in the Swiss school system, and then served a mason's apprenticeship. At 19 he began religious work as a colporteur in France, and two years later, in Lausanne, entered a missionary seminary supported by the Independent Swiss Protestant churches. Here he became acquainted with Madame Henriette Odin* Feller, a prominent member of an independent Protestant group. In 1835 Madame Feller decided to join missionary friends in Montreal, Henri Olivier and his wife; Roussy volunteered to go with her. Proselytizing was next to impossible in Montreal because of the hostility shown to it, and Roussy went immediately to the country, where he was engaged to teach school in the parish of L'Acadie in a settlement called Grande Ligne [see Charles LA ROCQUE].

After two months Roussy had to quit teaching because of objections to his preaching on Sundays. He apparently had some private means in addition to support from the Swiss church and perhaps local donations. Roussy's evangelistic efforts were successful in winning a few converts, and Madame Feller joined him in 1836, to teach in a rented house. In this newly opened section of the province they taught both children and adults, using the Bible as their textbook. By midsummer of 1837, Roussy had organized his converts into the first independent French Protestant church in Canada. When the rebellion of 1837 broke out, the Patriotes identified the two missionaries with English Protestants and harassed them until they fled to Champlain, New York. Here Roussy met Dr Cyrille-Hector-Octave Côté*, a leader of the rebellion, whom he converted and who later became an able member of the mission.

When Roussy and Madame Feller returned to Grande Ligne after two months, they were welcomed by their flock and the people of the district. Their work became better known, and financial aid came from Switzerland and other parts of Canada and the United States. The first large mission building was opened for occupancy in August 1840.

Under the sponsorship, after 1845, of the Canadian Baptist Missionary Society, Louis Roussy remained until his death in 1880 the esteemed pastor of the Grande Ligne church and an occasional teacher in Feller College. As a colporteur he travelled on horseback distributing literature and Bibles; he held meetings and preached in houses or on street corners in many villages of southern Quebec and northern Vermont, meeting often with rebuffs. His main work was in his church, however, which grew to include 30 or more families. It is called today Roussy Memorial Church.

F. T. ROSSER

Canadian Baptist Archives (Hamilton, Ont.), [A. de L. Therrien,] "Pastors of the past in G.L.M." (handwritten MS). The Baptist encyclopædia . . ., ed. William Cathcart (Philadelphia, 1881). E. R. Fitch, Baptists of Canada; a history of their progress and achievement (Toronto, [1911]). Théodore Lafleur, A semi-centennial, historical sketch of the Grande Ligne Mission read at the jubilee gathering, Grande Ligne, Oct. 18th, 1885 (Montreal, [1886]). M. J. Milne, In the shadow of Mt. Royal: Madame Henrietta Feller (New York, [1958]). E. A. Therrien et al., Baptist work in French Canada (Toronto, n.d.). Théodore Lafleur, "Louis Roussy," McMaster University Monthly (Toronto), III (1893–94), 49–58.

ROWAN, Sir WILLIAM, field marshal and administrator of the Province of Canada; b. Isle of Man, 18 June 1789, eighth son of Robert Rowan of County Antrim, Ireland, and of Mary Wilson of County Down; m. Martha Sprong in 1811 (d. 1874), they had no children; d. at Bath, Eng., 26 Sept. 1879.

At the age of 14, William Rowan became an ensign in the 52nd Light Infantry, a regiment in which his uncle Charles Rowan and two older brothers, Charles (later Sir Charles, the first commissioner of the London Metropolitan Police) and Robert, also served. The renewal of the war with Napoleon brought the boy opportunities for active service and quick promotion. He became a lieutenant within a year and served in Sicily, 1806–7, and Sweden, 1808. Before he was 20 he commanded a company in the 2nd Battalion of the regiment and went with Robert Craufurd to Vigo (1808). He was also present at the capture of Flushing (1809). From 1811 to the end of the war Rowan took part in a number of engagements in the Peninsula and France; his conduct on the field at Orthez won him his brevet-majority. Rowan fought for the third time on a birthday (his 26th) at Waterloo, taking part in the 52nd's famous charge under Sir John Colborne* against the Imperial Guard, an attack which some have said brought Wellington the victory. Rowan then went with the occupying force to Paris and was put in charge of the 1st arrondissement. On 21 Jan. 1819 he became a lieutenant-colonel in the army (he was a captain in his regiment).

In 1823 Rowan was posted with his regiment to New Brunswick, and in 1826 he transferred to the 58th (which was not stationed in Canada) with the rank of major in the regiment. Leaving Canada in 1829, he went on half-pay on 22 July 1830.

Sir John Colborne, Rowan's war-time chief and life-long friend and patron, had come to Upper Canada in 1828 as lieutenant governor. Four years later Rowan joined him there as his military secretary (1832–39) to handle his correspondence on military matters. He also served him as civil secretary for Upper Canada from 1832 to 1836. The civil secretary, a personal appointee, conducted the whole internal management of the province, initiating or handling all public business and dealing with petitions for favours and appeals from decisions made by subordinate authorities. Colborne retired as lieutenant governor in 1836, but a year earlier he had been appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Canada. Rowan thus served as Colborne's military secretary when he dealt with the uprisings of 1837 and 1838. Rowan was made a colonel in 1837, and the next year was awarded the CB for his services during the rebellions. He served as civil secretary in Lower Canada in 1838, and returned to England in 1839.

Promoted major-general on 9 Nov. 1846, Rowan was granted the Distinguished Service Award on 1 April 1848 and returned to Canada a year later as commander of the British forces there. On 30 May 1849, when there was a possibility that the governor general, Lord Elgin [Bruce*], might be insulted if he appeared in public since the violent disturbances in Montreal provoked by the rebellion losses bill had only recently abated, Rowan was sent to prorogue parliament, which he did with a conciliatory speech. Lord Elgin was on leave from 23 Aug. 1853 to 10 June 1854, and Rowan became administrator of the province. Ten days after Elgin returned, Rowan was promoted lieutenant-general and in that same year was appointed colonel of the 19th Regiment.

Rowan left Canada in 1855 and took up residence at Bath. He was knighted a year later (Military Knight Grand Cross of the Bath), and in 1861 became a colonel of his old regiment, the 52nd. On 13 Aug. 1862 he was promoted general and on 2 June 1877 field marshal. His death was occasioned simply by "a decay of nature."

It was Rowan's delight in his old age to claim that he had never purchased a commission or a promotion, a rare boast for that era and one which testified not only to his courage in the field but also to his abilities. He was entitled to wear a war medal with six clasps, but he marked a memorandum recounting his war services "strictly private" and during his long retirement at Bath was loath to talk about them. By contrast with his war record, Rowan's years in Canada appear unexciting, but he brought with him the prestige of a distinguished military career and rendered good service in three different roles.

RICHARD A. PRESTON

Illustrated London News, LXXV (1879), 322, 335, 337. The annual register: a review of public events at home and abroad for the year 1879 (London, 1880), 221. Boase, Modern English biography, III, 322. DNB. J. T. Haydn, The book of dignities, containing lists of official personages of the British empire . . . (3rd ed., London, 1894), 770, 778, 856, 882. Morgan, Sketches of celebrated Canadians, 549–50. Edward Walford, The county families of the United Kingdom or royal manual of the titled and untitled aristocracy of England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland (London, 1875), 843. Dent, Last forty years, II, 171, 280; Upper Canadian rebellion, I, 152.

ROY, LOUIS-DAVID, lawyer, man of letters, and judge; b. 9 June 1807 at Quebec, son of Joseph Roy and Marie Brunet; d. 31 July 1880 at Quebec.

Louis-David Roy studied at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec from 1818 to 1827, and was called to the bar of Lower Canada in 1832. While carrying on his profession, he used his spare time to publish, with François-Xavier Garneau*, a literary and scientific journal, L'Institut ou Journal des étudiants; it had no more than a fleeting existence, since publication, which began on 7 March 1841, had to be suspended on 22 May of the same year. The purpose of this undertaking was to ensure a wider reading public for reports on the literary and scientific societies of Canada and abroad, and to publish bibliographical articles on education, industry, and the arts. It was an ambitious project, and as Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau*, one of Roy's friends, wrote, a "noble effort to provide the country with a useful and serious publication, and to direct the ambition of our youth along a new path."

After this excursion into the realm of letters, Louis-David Roy devoted his time and energies to his profession. In 1842 he was appointed assistant to the chief justice, with jurisdiction in the lower district of Kamouraska. On 24 Dec. 1849 he became judge of the Circuit Court at Chicoutimi; he took the oath of office on 2 Jan. 1850 and had his first hearing on 24 May. He took up residence in what was then called "the village of Chicoutimi," and lived there from 1850 to 1858. As the first law courts were not built until 1862, the hearings of the court were held first in private houses, then in the town hall. One of the first cases to come before Judge Roy was that of a Métis Peter McLeod*, the associate of William Price*, against a certain Thiboutot, over a "scuffle." On 25 Nov. 1857, Louis-David Roy was appointed judge of the Superior Court for the new districts of Saguenay and Chicoutimi, with residence at La Malbaie; his house was situated at Pointe-au-Pic, near the present church. The government decided to hold three sessions of the Superior Court and the Circuit Court at Chicoutimi, and Judge Roy was instructed to preside over them. He dispensed justice for 14 years to the satisfaction of all. Furthermore, he took an interest in the natural sciences, and wrote 13 letters to Abbé Léon Provancher* concerning them. The two correspondents exchanged several plants, and Abbé Provancher, in his preface to Flore canadienne . . ., made a point of stressing the collaboration of Judge Roy, who had provided him with a list of plants at Chicoutimi and La Malbaie and in the surrounding area.

On 7 Jan. 1871 Judge Roy retired; he returned to Quebec to live, and died there on 31 July 1880. He was buried in the chapel of the Hôtel-Dieu. On 11 Sept. 1832, at Quebec, he had married his first wife Adeline Masse, by whom he had at least one daughter, Adeline, who married Montreal lawyer Alexandre de Lusignan. Widowed, on 19 Aug. 1839 he married again, his second wife being Hélène Parent, who gave him six boys and one girl.

LOUIS-PHILIPPE AUDET

Archives du séminaire de Chicoutimi, Fonds Victor-Alphonse Huard, Scrap-book, I, f.234; Fonds Léon Provancher, Correspondance, lettres de Louis-David Roy, 1860–1873. ASQ, Fichier des anciens du séminaire. PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 26, pp.701–4. Le Canadien (Québec), 3 avril, 8 avril, 15 avril 1844; 1^er^ mars, 13 mai 1850. Dom ann. reg., 1880–81, 428. Frère Éloi-Gérard, Recueil de généalogies des comtés de Charlevoix et Saguenay depuis l'origine jusqu'à 1939 (Publ. de la SHS, 5, La Malbaie, Qué., 1941), 448. Inventaire des contrats de mariages au greffe de Charlevoix accompagné de documents précieux se rapportant à l'histoire de Charlevoix et du Saguenay, Frère Éloi-Gérard, édit. (Publ. de la SHS, 8, La Malbaie, Qué. 1943), 257–61; P.-G. Roy, Les juges de la province de Québec, 481.

Léon Provancher, Flore canadienne ou description de toutes les plantes des forêts, champs, jardins et eaux du Canada donnant le nom botanique de chacune, ses noms vulgaires français et anglais, indiquant son parcours géographique, les propriétés qui la distinguent, le mode de culture qui lui convient . . . (2v., Québec, 1862), I, iv. Percy Martin, "Le premier juge à Chicoutimi," Saguenayensia (Chicoutimi, Qué.), I (1959) 81–82.

RUBIDGE, CHARLES, naval officer, settler, and emigration agent; b. 30 April 1787, and baptized at London, Eng., second son of Robert Rubidge and Margaret Gilmour, and half-brother of Frederick Rubidge*; m. Margaret Clarke 20 Jan. 1810, by whom he had three sons and three daughters; d. 5 Feb. 1873.

Charles Rubidge's mother died when he was eight, and one year later he entered the Royal Navy as a volunteer first class on an uncle's ship. His far-flung naval service took him to the West Indies and, in 1812, to Annapolis, Maryland. He served with the Mediterranean and Atlantic fleets in the Napoleonic campaigns, was commissioned a lieutenant in 1812, and was twice wounded on active service.

Rubidge was placed on half pay in 1815. By 1819 he saw no hope of resuming active service and emigrated to Cobourg, Upper Canada. In the spring of 1820 he took his wife and three small children to the bush to become one of the first settlers in Otonabee Township. He settled on a 200-acre lot and acquired three other lots to make up the 800 acres allowed a naval officer of his rank. As a backwoods farmer Rubidge was one of the more successful of the half-pay officers who settled in the Peterborough district. He attributed his success in the early years to a cautious beginning, to "doing little, and that partly with my own hands," until he gained experience.

It is for his connection with emigration, which began in 1825 with the arrival of Peter Robinson*'s settlers from southern Ireland, that Rubidge is best known. He assisted Robinson on a voluntary basis by placing the emigrants destined for Otonabee Township on their lots and directed the cutting of ten miles of bush road, briefly named after him, to serve as a winter supply route to the depot on the townsite of Peterborough. In common with several others he received a town and a park lot in Peterborough for his exertions.

From 1831 until August 1832 Rubidge held a temporary appointment as a crown land agent at Peterborough with responsibility for seven townships in neighbouring parts of Newcastle District; he claimed that 4,000 new emigrants came to the district while he held this office. His duties as agent included supervision of the assistance given poor settlers at Lieutenant Governor Sir John Colborne*'s direction.

In 1838 Rubidge visited England and wrote A plain statement of the advantages attending emigration to Upper Canada, in which he stated that improvements over the past few years had demonstrated "that Canada is destined to become the comparatively rich as well as the poor man's country," and offered practical advice to those who decided to emigrate. The following spring Colonel G. F. Wyndham employed Rubidge to superintend the voyage of 181 emigrants from his Irish estates to Cobourg and to find work for them in Upper Canada.

Rubidge played an active role in the community that grew up around him: he was appointed a justice of the peace in 1820, with his neighbours he petitioned for local improvements and helped raise funds for the Church of England, and he was chosen as a returning officer in four elections. He gave up active farming in 1841 when he was appointed registrar for the county of Peterborough, a post he held for more than 30 years. He was also promoted retired commander in the Royal Navy on 12 Oct. 1841, and in 1853 he received a Greenwich Hospital out-pension.

Rubidge's experience enabled him to speak with authority to those interested in assisting the emigration of paupers. Sir Robert John Wilmot-Horton printed information and opinions supplied by Rubidge in his Ireland and Canada (1839). Eight years later Rubidge gave evidence on backwoods settlement and assisted emigration to the 1847 select committee of the House of Lords on colonization from Ireland.

Rubidge indirectly influenced the writing of the history of his district. Thomas Poole* set a pattern in 1867, followed by others, when he relied on Rubidge for material describing Robinson's emigrants and when he reflected Rubidge's opinion in assessing the manner in which they were settled.

WENDY CAMERON

Charles Rubidge was the author of An autobiographical sketch (Peterborough, Ont., 1870); A plain statement of the advantages attending emigration to Upper Canada (London, 1838); "Report of Lieutenant Rubidge," Canadian, British American and West Indian Magazine (London), I (1839), 375–78.

PAO, RG 1, A-I-6, 6, 8–9, 11–13; RG 21, sect.A, Census and assessment rolls, Newcastle District, Otonabee Township. PRO, CO 42/393, 42/394. G.B., Adm., Navy list (London), 1813, 1863. G.B., Parl., House of Lords paper, 1847, VI, 737, pp.547–62, Report of the select committee of the House of Lords on colonization from Ireland. . . . Basil Hall, Travels in North America, in the years 1827 and 1828 (3v., Edinburgh, 1829), I, 325–39. Valley of the Trent (Guillet). R. J. Wilmot-Horton, Ireland and Canada; supported by local evidence (London, 1839). Directory of the united counties of Peterborough & Victoria for 1858 . . . (Peterborough, C.W., [1858]). T. W. Poole, A sketch of the early settlement and subsequent progress of the town of Peterborough, and of each township in the county of Peterborough (Peterborough, Ont., 1867).

RUTTAN, HENRY, soldier, businessman, legislator, author, and inventor; b. 12 June 1792 at Adolphustown, U.C., son of William Ruttan, a United Empire Loyalist of French ancestry, and of Margaret Steele; d. 31 July 1871 at Cobourg, Ont.

Henry Ruttan's formal schooling, which was obtained at Adolphustown, ended at 14 when he left home to become a store assistant in Kingston. His boyhood on a farm being developed from the wilderness was, he later wrote, remarkably healthy and provided him with a robust constitution. During the War of 1812 Ruttan joined the militia, was commissioned, and served in Upper Canada. In 1814 he was severely wounded in the bitter fighting at Lundy's Lane, but he returned to active service before the war ended. He continued to serve in the militia, in the 1st Battalion of Northumberland and after 1825, when he became colonel, in the 3rd Battalion. He left the active militia in 1846 but was recalled in 1860 to command the 4th Military District until 1862.

In 1815 Ruttan went into business in Cobourg. He was elected to the House of Assembly in 1820 as the representative for Northumberland, and served until 1824. During his second term, 1836–40, he was influential in having the Trent Canal started, and he replaced Allan MacNab* as speaker of the house from 28 Dec. 1837 to 24 Jan. 1838. Appointed in 1827 sheriff of the Newcastle District (which became in 1849 the United Counties of Northumberland and Durham), he held that office for 30 years; he also served on the Board of Agriculture for Upper Canada.

His autobiography, written in 1861, deals with the history of his family and with his experiences in war and in politics. It unaccountably makes no mention of his studies, perhaps the most comprehensive hitherto undertaken, of problems in the heating and ventilation of buildings or of his related inventions.

The conservation of fuel and the proper ventilation of houses were impossible to achieve with the inefficient fireplaces and stoves then in use. Ruttan began to design air heaters and ventilating equipment, for which he was granted seven patents between 1846 and 1858. His method, extensively used, for the combined heating and ventilation of buildings involved drawing in outside air through a duct. The air then passed by natural flow through a heater and circulated by convection through the various rooms, finally to flow through a duct to a foul-air shaft which sent it outside.

Ruttan also devised a system for the heating and ventilation of railway coaches. Outside air, forced through ducts into the cars by means of the train's motion, passed through a wash tank which cleaned, humidified, and cooled it. In the winter the system was modified to heat the air entering the cars. Ruttan's system, probably the first to provide an air-conditioned vehicle, was used by several railways in Canada and the United States.

In 1816 Ruttan married Mary Jones. They had nine children of whom Henry Jones continued his father's interests in ventilation and was editor of the Cobourg Star from 1846 to 1855. In his 68th year Henry Ruttan was thrown from a carriage and suffered injuries from which he never fully recovered. Stricken six years later by a disease which gradually undermined his health, he died in his 80th year, thus ending the many-faceted and useful life of an intelligent man of good character.

T. Ritchie

PAC, MG 24, K2 (Coventry papers), 11, "Reminiscences of the Hon. Henry Ruttan of Cobourg," pp.361–82. Other versions, with some changes, of this autobiography are: "Autobiography of the Honorable Henry Ruttan of Cobourg, Upper Canada," copied by C. E. Thomson, United Empire Loyalists Assoc. of Ont., Trans., II (1899), 75–84; and Loyalist narratives from Upper Canada (Talman), 296–311. Henry Ruttan, Lectures on the ventilation of buildings, delivered at the Cobourg Mechanics' Institute (Cobourg, C.W., 1848); Lecture on ventilation, delivered before the Cobourg Mechanics' Institute . . . Feb'y 22, 1858 (Cobourg, C.W., 1858); Ventilation and warming of buildings . . . (New York, 1862). Cobourg Sentinel, 12 Aug. 1871.

Armstrong, Handbook of Upper Canadian chronology. Can. biog. dict., I, 729–30. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, 329. Patents of Canada, I, nos.210, 222, 225, 244; II, no.311. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 659. E. C. Guillet, Cobourg, 1798–1948 (Oshawa, Ont., 1948), 23–25, 56.

RYAN, JAMES, labour leader; fl. 1872.

James Ryan was corresponding secretary and moving spirit of the Nine Hour League in Hamilton when, on 20 Feb. 1872, 120 men struck a Hamilton sewing-machine factory, Wilson, Lockman and Company, over demands for a nine-hour day. Ryan had probably been named to this position at a mass meeting of delegates from various Hamilton shops on 1 February to appoint officers and adopt a constitution for the league, the first in Canada. On 24 February he spoke to another mass meeting of "sixteen or eighteen hundred men" in support of the strike. He said that the workingmen were willing to settle by arbitration, but that they would resort to other means if forced to do so. The strike ended on 27 February by a "mutual understanding," which Toronto Globe editor George Brown called a victory for the employers. Ryan's actions in Hamilton and his correspondence with the Toronto Trades Assembly encouraged that group to start its own nine-hour movement, which resulted in a printers' strike throughout Toronto in March 1872.

Ryan held a "Council of deliberation" in Hamilton on 3 May to gain support for a proposed demonstration on 15 May. There were 12 delegates from Hamilton, three from Toronto, and one each from Montreal, Brantford, and Dundas, as well as supporting letters from several other Ontario communities; a Toronto delegate called it the first labour convention in Canada. The council formed the Canadian Labor Protective and Mutual Improvement Association with the purpose of forming "similar local organizations throughout the Dominion for the purpose of uniting all classes of workmen for mutual benefit." Ryan was made recording secretary of the new association. Nothing further is known about his life.

BERNARD OSTRY

Canadian Labour Congress Library (Ottawa), Toronto Trades Assembly minutes, 18 April 1872–27 March 1873. Globe (Toronto), 1 Jan.–1 July 1872. The Hamilton and District Trades and Labor Council, T.L.C.–A.F. of L.; 60th anniversary, diamond jubilee, 1888–1948 (n.p., n.d.). Eugene Forsey, "The Toronto Trades Assembly, 1871–1878," Canadian Labour (Ottawa), X (July–August 1965), 21–22; X (September 1965), 32–33. Bernard Ostry, "Conservatives, Liberals, and labour in the 1870's," CHR, XLI (1960), 93–127.

RYERSON, JOHN, Methodist minister; b. at Charlotteville, Norfolk County, U.C., 12 June 1800, fourth son of Colonel Joseph Ryerson*, a loyalist of Dutch and Huguenot ancestry, and of Sophia Mehetabel Stickney; m. Mary Lewis in 1828 by whom he had a son and a daughter; d. 8 Oct. 1878, at Simcoe, Ont.

Five of Colonel Ryerson's six sons entered the Methodist ministry despite his strong disapproval. After serving with his father as a volunteer on special service during the War of 1812, John was converted to Methodism in the evangelical awakening which followed the war in Upper Canada as were his two older brothers George* and William RYERSON and, subsequently, his two younger brothers Egerton* and Edwy. In 1820 he began preaching as supply and in 1821 he was received on trial on the Ancaster circuit. Two years later, on the Yonge Street circuit, he was ordained deacon and in 1825, on the Perth circuit, elder. In the ensuing years he served as presiding elder, chairman, or superintendent of almost every circuit or district in the province, and in 1843 he was elected president of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada. Subsequently, for nine consecutive years from 1849 to 1857, he was elected co-delegate, or vice-president, of the church, which was then, under the terms of reunion with the British conference, the highest post to which his colleagues in the Canadian conference could elect him.

John took, with his brothers William and Egerton, an active part in resolving many of the issues which confronted the Methodists in Upper Canada, particularly during the period from the mid-1820s to the mid-1850s. He was a leader in the fight, which he described as "a desperate struggle," against the schismatic body of Methodists, led by Henry Ryan*. At the same time, he advocated the separation of the church in Upper Canada from the American Methodist Episcopal Church of which it was then a part; as one of five delegates from the Canada conference to the American general conference in Pittsburgh in 1828, he was instrumental in bringing about the amicable separation that year which resulted in the establishment of an independent Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada [see RICHARDSON]. In 1832 he proposed a union with the British conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church to avoid wasteful competition and duplication of effort, and to affirm the essential loyalty of the Canadian Methodists. The Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada was formed but the union collapsed in 1840. He again expressed concern at the harm done by having two rival Methodist bodies and urged another attempt at union. In 1846 he and Anson GREEN were chosen delegates to the British conference where they successfully advocated this cause.

John, William, and three others were asked in 1829 to study the advisability of establishing a Methodist seminary of higher learning and, in 1830, he and William were named to a new committee to further the project. It selected Cobourg as the site for the Upper Canada Academy, which later became Victoria College. In 1835 John was made one of the first five visitors to the college; they were given the responsibility of working with the trustees in appointing the principal and teachers, drafting regulations, managing the affairs of the institution, and reporting upon its academic and financial state each year to the conference. In 1841 he was, with William and Egerton, among those who petitioned the Legislative Assembly for a charter and an endowment for the college. Throughout these years, when the college was in financial difficulties and its survival sometimes in doubt, John signed notes on its behalf, borrowing money on his personal credit to meet its indebtedness even though these debts were incurred against his advice. He continued for more than three decades to work actively for the college, serving terms as treasurer and chairman of the board.

The modest extent of John's own formal education is reflected in his remarkably colourful and imaginative spelling. But his qualities of intellectual distinction and his feeling for language are unmistakable. At the 1837 conference John was named, as were William and Egerton, to the Book and Printing Committee, forerunner of the Ryerson Press, which supervised the publishing of the Christian Guardian, in that period the most widely read and influential newspaper in Canada, and of other productions, as well as overseeing the sale of books from Britain and the United States of interest to Upper Canadian Methodists. John served as book steward from 1837 to 1841.

The range of John's intellectual and literary interests is, however, more substantially indicated by his own writing which included an extensive correspondence, diaries and journals, and numerous notes and papers on Methodist history and policy. Although much of this material remains unpublished, or has been misplaced, a good deal of his writing was apparently published without attribution, perhaps because of an aversion which John had to seeing his own name in print. His name appears, however, at the head of five of the 18 chapters of Canadian Methodism; its epochs and characteristics, and it may well be that this book was really the work of John, annotated by Egerton and published in his name in compliance with his brother's wishes. John's book, Hudson's Bay; or, a missionary tour in the territory of the Hon. Hudson's Bay Company . . ., published in 1855, which records the perilous expedition he led the previous year from Sault Ste Marie to Hudson Bay, via Red River, and from there to England, furnishes the most accurate and reliable account available of this early trade route. The expedition was made with a view to the assumption by the Canadian Methodist Church of responsibility for missionary activity in the area. He described the promise of parts of this land and, in contrast to some other writers of the period, looked ahead to its settlement and development with confident enthusiasm.

It was characteristic of John to undertake so difficult a journey in his 55th year. Throughout his life he worked to excess and he was frequently exhausted by these exertions, with a consequent strain on his health. This strain and chronic ill-health led him to some dependence at times, in particular immediately following his journey, upon opium and brandy, which aroused acute concern amongst his Methodist brethren. At the conference of 1858, which had in any case an undercurrent of hostility towards the Ryerson brothers, a committee of ten was appointed to investigate his character and its report resulted in his being "left without a station" and his name being "dropped from the Minutes of Conference for One Year." In the following year he was restored to his accustomed place, however, and chosen a member of the special committee entrusted with conference business between the annual sessions. From 1860 until his death he was superannuated at Brantford and at Simcoe, continuing an active work in the ministry despite his precarious health.

John was in age and affection the brother nearest to Egerton who, in the years when his career was in the making, never took a step without consulting "this brother who commanded his entire respect and affection." Egerton, writing in 1843, records that he regarded John as "for many years the most cool and accurate judge of the state of the public mind" of any man he knew in Canada. Described by Egerton as "a life-long Conservative," John was the principal architect of the strategy advocated by Egerton and, in general, followed by the Methodists, of support for loyal reform, within the constitution, aimed at civil and religious liberty. In the difficult period before the 1837 rebellion he cautioned Egerton constantly to "take good care not to lean a hair's breadth toward Radicleism." He repeatedly expressed concern that the Methodists had become too much associated with extreme Reformers, "a banditti of compleat vagabonds," so that it was "absolutely necessary to disengage ourselves from them entirely. You can see that it is not Reform, but Revolution they are after." He rejoiced that in the critical 1836 elections not "a ninny of them was elected in the Bay of Quinte District" where "the preachers and I laboured to the utmost extent of our ability to keep every scamp of them out and we succeeded."

Nevertheless John was far from being a stern and unbending Tory. Once the rebellion had been coped with, he renewed his advocacy of constitutional reform and urged the Methodists to pursue "the enlightened, just and liberal course we have been wont to persue." He signed and presented to Lieutenant Governor Sir George Arthur* a petition, on behalf of some 4,000 signators, asking that the lives of the rebels Samuel Lount* and Peter Mathews* be spared and when the petition was rejected he followed the two men to their execution. Similarly, in the wake of the rebellion, he protested arbitrary measures including the indiscriminate keeping of scores of persons in prison awaiting trial. He felt it necessary for "the friends of Civil and Religious liberty" to remain vigilant, noting that "it is a great blessing that Mackenzey [William Lyon Mackenzie*] and Radicalism are down, but we are in immediate danger of being brought under the domination of a military and high-church oligarchy, which would be equally bad if not infinitely worse."

Often seemingly aloof, austere, and taciturn in public, John was in the privacy of his family and friendships warm, kindly, and forthcoming. In C. B. Sissons*' assessment, "Seldom has a Canadian home produced four such men as George, William, John and Egerton Ryerson. Differing in character and talent, they all had upon them the mark of greatness." Of the brothers, John was pre-eminently the statesman and the practical man of public and ecclesiastical affairs. He was for several decades probably the most influential man in the councils of the Methodist Church in Upper Canada.

THOMAS H. B. SYMONS

John Ryerson, Hudson's Bay; or, a missionary tour in the territory of the Hon. Hudson's Bay Company . . . (Toronto, 1855).

Methodist Missionary Society (London), Correspondence, continent of America. UCA, A. E. Ryerson papers. John Carroll, Case and his cotemporaries; [ ] Past and present, or a description of persons and events connected with Canadian Methodism for the last forty years (Toronto, 1860). Christian Guardian (Toronto), 1829–78. [Ryerson], Story of my life (Hodgins). Cornish, Cyclopædia of Methodism, I. Dom. ann. reg., 1878, 364–65.

G. S. French, Parsons & politics: the rôle of the Wesleyan Methodists in Upper Canada and the Maritimes from 1780 to 1855 (Toronto, 1962). G. F. Playter, The history of Methodism in Canada: with an account of the rise and progress of the work of God among the Canadian Indian tribes, and occasional notices of the civil affairs of the province (Toronto, 1862). A. E. Ryerson, Canadian Methodism; its epochs and characteristics (Toronto, 1882). A. W. Ryerson, The Ryerson genealogy; genealogy and history of the Knickerbocker families of Ryerson, Ryerse, Ryerss; also Adriance and Martense families; all descendants of Martin and Adriaen Ryerz (Reyerszen), of Amsterdam, Holland, ed. A. L. Holman (Chicago, 1916). Sissons, Ryerson. Clara Thomas, Ryerson of Upper Canada (Toronto, 1969).

RYERSON, WILLIAM, Methodist minister; b. at Maugerville, N.B., 31 March 1797, third son of Colonel Joseph Ryerson* and Sophia Mehetabel Stickney; m. Mary Griffen, and they had three sons and three daughters; d. 15 Sept. 1872 at Salt Springs near Brantford, Ont.

William Ryerson's formal education was confined to the log schoolhouse near the family farm in Norfolk County, Upper Canada. He served as a volunteer on special service with his father during the War of 1812, and was converted to Methodism by David Youmans in the religious awakening which followed the war. His conversion incurred the strong displeasure of his father and he left home, moving to Oxford County where he started bush farming. He was received on trial as a preacher at the Methodist Episcopal conference of 1823 and was ordained deacon on the Queenston circuit in 1825.

William rapidly assumed responsibility in his church, serving as a presiding elder, chairman, and superintendent in various districts throughout the province. The outline of powers given to quarterly meetings in all matters of general importance which he prepared with his brother Egerton* in 1828 was adopted by the church conference and remained in use with little change for decades. In the same year he was chosen a delegate to the conference of the American church at Pittsburgh, where he argued successfully for the separation of the Canadian church from its American parent. He collected funds for Egerton's trip to England in 1833 to arrange the union between the Canadian church and the British Wesleyan Methodist Church; when this union disintegrated he made, with Egerton, a trip to England in 1840 in a final attempt to salvage it, and presented to the British conference, to no avail, the address and resolutions of the Canada conference. While in London, William and Egerton also met with Lord John Russell to remonstrate unsuccessfully against his clergy reserves bill.

Collapse of the union with the British church opened the way for the Canada conference to choose its own head, and William was elected the first Canadian president of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada in 1840. He was chosen president a second time at the annual conference of 1847 which approved reunion with the British church, subsequently yielding the office to Robert ALDER, the first appointee by the British conference under the terms of the reunion. He was thus both the first and the last of the presidents elected by the Canadian church during its period of autonomy between 1840 and 1847.

Despite frequent ill-health, including periodic bouts with "bleeding of the lungs," William worked prodigiously throughout his life. During the early years of his ministry he was particularly interested in the Indian peoples, assisting with the planning and operation of special Indian schools and often joining with the Reverend Peter Jones* in missions to the Indians at which he preached and Jones acted as interpreter. He was instrumental in arranging for the Bible to be translated into Chippewa and for the preparation of spelling and hymn books in several Indian tongues. In 1829 he was named to the committee which oversaw the establishment of the Christian Guardian. In the same year, he and his brother JOHN were put on a committee to study the advisability of establishing a Methodist seminary of higher learning. The following year the two brothers were named to a committee given the task of establishing the Upper Canada Academy (later Victoria College).

William's relations with Egerton were not as close as those of John. Nonetheless, he was an influential mentor to Egerton in his eariler years.

His political views, as a constitutional liberal leaning somewhat towards radicalism, more nearly coincided with those of his fellow Methodist ministers than did those of either John or Egerton. Though William helped defend Toronto at John MONTGOMERY's tavern against William Lyon Mackenzie* and the rebels in December 1837, he asked that the punishment of Samuel Lount* and Peter Mathews* be mitigated, and he deplored the role of Sir Francis Bond HEAD, noting that "the most guilty author of these miseries is to escape without punishment, yes, with honour and praise . . . !" Weary of political and religious factionalism, he briefly contemplated emigration to the United States after the suppression of the rebellion.

William was, however, always interested in politics, and in 1861 he ran as an independent candidate for the West Riding of Brant in response to appeals by members of his church who were anxious that his views should be expressed in the legislature on the question of university reform. He won, defeating Herbert Biggar, despite the vigorous opposition of George BROWN and the Globe. He was, however, badly beaten in the next election, in 1863, by Edmund Burke Wood*, probably because of the support he gave to Richard William Scott*'s separate school bill, for which he was again bitterly denounced by Brown. He had retired to his farm at Salt Springs, superannuated, in 1858, and he continued to live there until his death.

William was the orator of the Ryerson brothers and indeed was one of Canadian Methodism's most renowned preachers. His forthright manner and strength of feeling, coupled with his wit and good humour, enabled him to establish a powerful sympathetic bond with his listeners. In many ways the prototype saddle-bag preacher of pioneer Upper Canadian Methodism, he excelled in the setting of the camp meeting, and was gifted in organizing these gatherings.

THOMAS H. B. SYMONS

Methodist Missionary Society (London), Correspondence, continent of America. UCA, A. E. Ryerson papers. John Carroll, Case and his cotemporaries; [ ], Past and present, or a description of persons and events connected with Canadian Methodism for the last forty years (Toronto, 1860). Christian Guardian (Toronto), 1829–72. [Ryerson], Story of my life (Hodgins). Cornish, Cyclopædia of Methodism, I. Dom. ann. reg., 1878, 364–65.

G. S. French, Parsons & politics: the rôle of the Wesleyan Methodists in Upper Canada and the Maritimes from 1780 to 1855 (Toronto, 1962). G. F. Playter, The history of Methodism in Canada: with an account of the rise and progress of the work of God among the Canadian Indian tribes, and occasional notices of the civil affairs of the province (Toronto, 1862). A. E. Ryerson, Canadian Methodism; its epochs and characteristics (Toronto, 1882). A. W. Ryerson, The Ryerson genealogy; a genealogy and history of the Knickerbocker families of Ryerson, Ryerse, Ryerss; also Adriance and Martense families; all descendants of Martin and Adriaen Ryerz (Reyerszen), of Amsterdam, Holland, ed. A. L. Holman (Chicago, 1916). Sissons, Ryerson. Clara Thomas, Ryerson of Upper Canada (Toronto, 1969).

S

SAINCENNES, JACQUES-FÉLIX. See SINCENNES

SANBORN, JOHN SEWELL, teacher, politician, and judge; b. 1 Jan. 1819 at Gilmanton, N.H., ninth and youngest child of David Edwin Sanborn, farmer and teacher, and Hannah Hook; d. 17 July 1877, at Asbury Park, N.J.

In 1842 John Sewell Sanborn graduated from Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, where his brother, Edwin David, was professor of Latin language and literature. He later received the degrees of AM (1845) and LLD (1874) from Dartmouth, and of MA (ad eundem, 1854) and DCL (1873) from the University of Bishop's College, Lennoxville. After 1842, Sanborn was for three years principal of the Sherbrooke Academy (now high school). He then read law in Sherbrooke with Edward SHORT and in Montreal with ANDREW and George Robertson; he was admitted to the bar in 1847, and, returning to Sherbrooke, married in July Eleanor Hall Brooks, daughter of Samuel Brooks, Conservative member of the Legislative Assembly for the old Sherbrooke County. Throughout his political career he continued to practise law.

Brooks died in March 1849, and the parliamentary vacancy was filled by Alexander Tilloch Galt*, commissioner of the British American Land Company in the Eastern Townships. In November Galt proclaimed himself an annexationist, and in January 1850 resigned his seat, implying that his attitude had been criticized by his company and that he disapproved of moving the seat of government from Montreal to Toronto. Sanborn was nominated to contest the by-election as an annexationist, both he and Galt believing that annexation would bring greater prosperity to the Eastern Townships. Their agitation undoubtedly influenced the ministry to give strong backing to the projected railroad, pushed by Galt and Sanborn, from Montreal through Richmond and Sherbrooke to Portland, Maine, thus promising the region the advantages of annexation without the political formality.

Sherbrooke County in 1850 included not the town but the present counties of Richmond, Wolfe, Compton, and Frontenac; only 15 per cent of the population was French Canadian. Sanborn was opposed by Chester B. Cleveland of Shipton, who was nominated by John Henry Pope*, at this time an anti-annexationist farmer in the southern part of the county and now beginning his long political career. Both candidates were born in the United States and had had personal connections with members of the Tory party, but whereas Sanborn was a liberal Congregationalist living amidst the business "aristocracy" of the town, Cleveland was a rural "Episcopalian" (Church of England), residing in the constituency. The Reform ministry of Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* publicly supported Cleveland the "Loyalist," and during the campaign stripped the county's annexationists of their public commissions. Privately, however, Sanborn, as a promoter with Galt of the St Lawrence and Atlantic Railroad, had business connections with the speaker of the assembly, Augustin-Norbert Morin*, and his friend, George-Étienne CARTIER. Sanborn appealed for Liberal support.

At the by-election, on 5 and 6 March 1850, Sanborn obtained 51 per cent of the vote. Lord Elgin [Bruce*] reported that "this is the first instance in which a person avowing these doctrines has been elected to the Canadian Parliament," and explained it by the number of American settlers in the area and the activities of Galt, chief agent "of a body of absentee English proprietors," the "selfish traitors" of the British American Land Company.

Sanborn was introduced to the house in Toronto on 14 May by two Eastern Townships oppositionists, who had also introduced Galt in 1849 – William Badgley*, the former Tory attorney general, and John McConnell of Stanstead, a Conservative turned annexationist. On 17 May, Sanborn, McConnell, and Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU were among seven members who voted against Robert Baldwin*'s motion not to receive a petition brought by John Prince*, member for Essex, calling upon Canada "to become an Independent Sovereignty." In the general election of 1851 Sanborn was opposed by John Henry Pope himself, but greatly increased his majority. A month before the election the new railroad had been opened to Richmond. At his nomination he stated that the annexation question was "nowhere mooted in the Province," and added "requiescat in pace." In an 1853 by-election he helped secure the election of Galt for Sherbrooke Town.

No longer opposed by the ministry, who were prepared to forget the annexationist agitation, Sanborn supported advanced liberal proposals, but not radical opposition for its own sake. In June 1854 he voted against the vague motions by which Conservative and Liberal opposition members combined to defeat the Francis Hincks*–Morin government. An immediate dissolution followed. In the election, Sherbrooke County having been divided, Sanborn contested Compton, bordering on the United States. But in Compton lived his relentless Tory opponent, John Henry Pope, who ran as a farmer, denouncing the Sherbrooke "family compact and the oppression of the British American Land Company." Sanborn won but only by eight votes.

In September 1854, Galt and Sanborn voted for Cartier, ministerial candidate for speaker. But upon his defeat they joined the section of the opposition led by William Lyon Mackenzie* and George BROWN. They participated in the final destruction of the Hincks-Morin administration but denounced the succeeding Allan Napier MacNab*–Morin (or Liberal-Conservative) combination as "an utter abandonment of principle."

Upon the creation of elective seats for the Legislative Council in 1856, Sanborn and Pope each nominated a candidate for Wellington, a new division including the town of Sherbrooke and a surrounding area even larger than the original county. Sanborn's man, Hollis Smith, won for the Liberal opposition in spite of a bitter personal attack on Sanborn by the provincial secretary, Timothy Lee TERRILL.

In the general election of 1857, Sanborn and Galt parted company politically. Galt suddenly dissociated himself from the Grit-Rouge party, promised not to endeavour to overthrow the administration, and was re-elected by acclamation in Sherbrooke. But Sanborn remained in opposition, and allowed Compton to go by acclamation to Pope. In contrast to 1854, George-Étienne Cartier's party would this time have helped Sanborn's Tory opponent in the closely balanced constituency.

The death of Hollis Smith enabled Sanborn to enter the Legislative Council for Wellington by acclamation on 8 May 1863. The John Sandfield MACDONALD–Antoine-Aimé Dorion* government, formed a few days later, offered Sanborn the post of solicitor general east, but he declined; he preferred to remain a private member and a practising advocate. On 15 Aug. 1863, he was created queen's counsel by the same ministry, and was re-elected by acclamation to the Legislative Council on 27 Sept. 1864 for a regular term.

In the confederation debate of 1865, Sanborn proposed an amendment calling for an elective senate, which was defeated 18–42. Although he viewed confederation favourably, he would not vote for the measure "unless after it had been submitted to the country." He abstained on the main motion, warning that "the power of the local governments" (that is, provincial governments), which might not respect their minorities in matters of property and civil rights, was "an apple of discord which our posterity might gather in fruits of the most bitter character." However in 1867 he was almost automatically appointed to the Senate for Wellington, and on 1 July was the official orator in Sherbrooke.

In July 1872 his law partner since 1858, Edward Towle Brooks, brother of his first wife, succeeded Galt as Conservative member for the federal constituency of Sherbrooke, and on 12 Oct. Sanborn's political career ended with his appointment by the Conservative government to the Superior Court for the district of Saint-François, at Sherbrooke; he was proud of the fact that this nomination had been made by his political opponent, Sir John A. Macdonald*. On 6 March 1874 his old friend, A.-A. Dorion, in the new Liberal government, promoted him to the Court of Queen's Bench in Montreal. He died while vacationing in the United States and his funeral service, appropriately for the only person ever elected to the Canadian parliament as an annexationist, was held at the American Presbyterian (now Erskine and American United) Church in Montreal.

Sanborn was a characteristic New England Calvinist – a deacon in the Congregational (now Plymouth United) Church in Sherbrooke, president of the Temperance and Prohibitory League of Quebec, full of good works and charity towards the poor, president of the Sherbrooke Library Association, thoroughly democratic in outlook, highly successful in business, a champion of the rights of private property and throughout his life a progressive continentalist. A Liberal living until 1874 in a town which after 1854 was overwhelmingly Conservative, he was fortunate in having close personal connections in both parties.

John Sewell Sanborn's first wife died in 1853, leaving three children; their only son died unmarried. His second wife, Nancy Judson Hasseltine, of Bradford, Mass., whom he married in 1856, died in 1874, leaving one daughter.

Gordon O. Rothney

PAC, RG 4, B37, 5, A.-N. Morin to B. C. A. Gugy, 19 Feb. 1852; RG 31, A1, 1851, no.423, ff.2, 13. PRO, CO 42/565, 42/662. University of Bishop's College, Registrar's Office, official records of degrees granted. [Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty), II, 604. Lower Canada, Statutes, 1829, c.73. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1848, 1850, 1854, 1854–55. Canada, Province of, Statutes, 1853, c.152. Montreal Courier, 9 Nov. 1849; 16, 30 Jan., 8, 13, 18, 22 Feb., 4 March 1850. Montreal Daily Witness, 28 Dec. 1874; 18, 19 July 1877. Montreal Gazette, 7, 18 Jan., 13 Feb., 1 March 1850; 17 Dec. 1851; 8 Aug., 18 Sept. 1854; 19 July 1877. Montreal Herald, 28 May 1863, 19 July 1877. Montreal Transcript, 21 May 1850; 23 Sept., 1 Oct. 1856; 8, 28 Dec. 1857. Pilot and Journal of Commerce (Montreal), 18 May 1850, 26 Dec. 1854. Le Pionnier de Sherbrooke, 6 juill. 1867. Quebec Gazette, 16 Sept. 1854. Sherbrooke Gazette, 8 Jan. 1853; 22, 29 July, 23 Sept. 1854; 26 Jan. 1861; 10 Sept., 1 Oct. 1864.

Appleton's cyclopædia of American biography, ed. J. G. Wilson et al. (10v., New York, 1887–1924), V. The Canadian men and women of the time: a handbook of Canadian biography, ed. H. J. Morgan (1st ed., Toronto, 1898). A catalogue of the officers and students of Dartmouth College, September 1838 (1st ed., Windsor, Vt., 1838). A catalogue of the officers and students of Dartmouth College, 1838–39 (2nd ed., Concord, N.H., 1838). DAB. Political appointments, 1841–1865 (J.-O. Coté). P.-G. Roy, Les juges de la province de Québec, 81, 493. Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 297.

C. D. Allin and G. M. Jones, Annexation, preferential trade and reciprocity; an outline of the Canadian annexation movement of 1849–1850, with special reference to the questions of preferential trade and reciprocity (Toronto and London, 1912), 193–95, 266–327. L. S. Channell, History of Compton County and sketches of the Eastern Townships, district of St Francis, and Sherbrooke County (Cookshire, Que., 1896). G. T. Chapman, Sketches of the alumni of Dartmouth College, from the first graduation in 1771 to the present time, with a brief history of the institution (Cambridge, Mass., 1867). Edward Cleveland, A sketch of the early settlement and history of Shipton, Canada East (Sherbrooke, C.E., 1858). Plymouth Church, past and present; a brief history of Plymouth United Church, Sherbrooke, Quebec (Sherbrooke, Que., 1956). L. B. Richardson, History of Dartmouth College (Hanover, N.H., 1932), 573. J. G. Robertson, Sketch of the formation of the Congregational Church at Sherbrooke and Lennoxville (Sherbrooke, Que., 1890), 4–6. V. C. Sanborn, Genealogy of the family of Samborne or Sanborn in England and America, 1194–1898 (Concord, N.H., 1899). O.D. Skelton, The life and times of Sir Alexander Tilloch Galt (Toronto, 1920).

SAUNDERS, JOHN SIMCOE, lawyer, legislator, and public servant; b. in 1795 at Fredericton, N.B., son of John Saunders*, a judge of the Supreme Court and later chief justice of New Brunswick, and Arianna Margaretta Jekyll Chalmers; d. 27 July 1878 at Fredericton, N.B.

John Simcoe Saunders' father had distinguished himself in the American Revolution as an officer of the Queen's American Rangers under the command of Colonel John Graves Simcoe*; he consequently enjoyed the benefit of high official connections in England. With this patrician background, young Saunders was a scion of the slender loyalist aristocracy of the new province of New Brunswick. In his youth he received many benefits from his family's position; in his later years his career can be explained by the declining importance of the colonial aristocracy.

Young Saunders was sent to school in England under the supervision of his maternal grandfather, James Chalmers, who had commanded the Maryland loyalists during the American Revolution. After a higher education at Oxford and Lincoln's Inn, Saunders returned to Fredericton where he was called to the bar in 1817. Finding his profession unrewarding, he returned to London and studied law with the eminent pleader, Joseph Chitty. In 1828 he published The law of pleadings and evidence in civil actions, a work that enjoyed rapid sale and was reprinted several times in the United States. In New Brunswick there was a rumour, probably caused by envy, that the work was really Chitty's, that for some unknown reason the teacher preferred to publish the book under the pupil's name. Sometime during this period Saunders married his first cousin, Elizabeth Sophia Storie of Camberwell, Surrey; they had a son and a daughter.

During this London residence Saunders conducted an interesting correspondence with friends and relatives in Fredericton. His exchanges with his boyhood friend, Henry BLISS, reveal a sophisticated amusement with, and a mild contempt for, the decaying rural aristocracy of his native province. His letters to his father, who was the greatest landowner in the colony, poke fun at the judge's conviction that real estate eventually would produce a fortune and that a great agricultural property, fashioned after the family's lost estate in Princess Anne County, Virginia, could be created. More abreast with current commercial development than his father, Saunders believed that agriculture in New Brunswick had no future. One of his prophecies was that by 1947 New Brunswick would be Acadian once again.

In 1830 he again returned to Fredericton and, favoured by family connection, enjoyed for many years a number of public offices. Because of his superior education, he was at once appointed master of the rolls, but the legislature would provide no salary for the post. In 1833, when the government was reorganized, he was made a member of both the Executive and the Legislative Council, and in 1834 became advocate general. None of these appointments gave much financial reward, but from 1840 to 1843, during the temporary disgrace of Thomas Baillie*, Saunders held the lucrative post of surveyor general. After the death of the provincial secretary, William Franklin Odell*, and during the controversy over Sir William Colebrooke*'s appointment of his son-in-law, Alfred Reade, to the vacant post, Saunders fell heir in 1845 to the office of provincial secretary. He was the last man to hold this position before it became subject to political tenure with the advent of responsible government in 1848.

Saunders' resignation in 1848 provides the key to his character. According to the testimony of the lieutenant governor, Sir Edmund Head*, Saunders was a scholarly man who could not bring himself to the disagreeable necessity of fighting a popular election. Since the fortunes of the new government would depend on its ability to keep the confidence of the House of Assembly, he could not be a source of strength. Until his death he continued to play a minor official and political role, serving as clerk of the circuits until 1867 and president of the Legislative Council until 1878.

Saunders was an astute man financially; his estate included stock in several banks and insurance companies as well as property in New Brunswick and England. He also left a collection of "minerals and geological specimens" to his son. Able, scholarly, and somewhat cynical, the product of an era of aristocratic domination, John Simcoe Saunders was not equipped temperamentally for the period of greater popular participation in government.

W. S. MACNUTT

University of New Brunswick Library, Archives and Special Collections Department, Saunders papers, correspondence and papers of John Simcoe Saunders; journal of John Simcoe Saunders, 1871–77. York County Court of Probate (Fredericton), V, 18–22. J. S. Saunders, The law of pleadings and evidence in civil actions, arranged alphabetically, with practical forms: and the pleadings and evidence to support them (2v., London, 1828). Lawrence, Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton), 274–75, 359, 423, 440. MacNutt, New Brunswick, 164, 178, 288–89, 318, 480.

SCATCHERD, THOMAS, lawyer and politician; b. at Wyton (Station), U.C., 10 Nov. 1823, eldest of 12 children of Anne Farley and John Scatcherd, who emigrated from Yorkshire in 1821 and became member for Middlesex West in the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada, 1854–58; d. at Ottawa, Ont., 15 April 1876.

Thomas Scatcherd attended the London District grammar school, then articled in London with William Horton and in Toronto. He was town clerk for London, 1845–46, and began the practice of law in London in 1848. In 1849 he became solicitor for the town, a post he held for the rest of his life. In partnership, first with Ephraim Jones Parke and from 1861 with William Ralph Meredith*, he established an extensive legal practice. In 1851 he married Isabella Sprague, and they had two sons.

In politics, Scatcherd's unbroken record of electoral success began when he ran in Middlesex West in 1861, returning to the Reform cause the seat which had been lost to the Conservative party after his father's death in 1858. Re-elected in 1863, he supported the Clear Grit positions developed in the 1850s. He broke party ranks on the coalition of 1864, opposing the Quebec resolutions on the grounds that they did not provide for the type of federation agreed to in the Reform convention in 1859. He regarded confederation as primarily "a scheme to construct the Intercolonial Railway" and "to benefit the Lower Provinces at the expense of Upper Canada," whose true interests were to be found in the development of the northwest territories. In his view, the new constitution should not become law until it had been "submitted to and pronounced upon by the people."

In 1866, Scatcherd played a leading role in opposing a private bill introduced by Robert Bell designed to extend to Roman Catholic schools in Canada West the privileges then being proposed for the Protestant minority of Canada East in a government bill sponsored by Alexander Tilloch Galt*. The vigour of the assault on the measure by George Brown and Scatcherd threatened the life of the government, and led to the withdrawal of the bills and the resignation of Galt.

With the adoption of confederation, Scatcherd, though he was elected as a Reformer in the federal election of 1867, did not take the strongly partisan position advocated by George Brown. In addition to supporting much of the government's legislation, he defended the choice of Sir Francis Hincks* as minister of finance in 1869, an appointment strongly attacked by the Toronto Globe. Asserting that "all this clamor about Reform and Conservatism in Ontario amounts to very little in the Dominion Parliament," he successfully defended his moderate position against opposition that developed in the Reform organization within his constituency in 1872. He received the support of many Conservatives and, in spite of some efforts by Sir John A. Macdonald* to have him opposed, he was returned by acclamation in the general elections of 1872 and 1874. A brother, Robert Colin (1832–79), at one time mayor of Strathroy, was also a member of parliament, and represented Middlesex North, 1876–78.

Thomas Scatcherd became an experienced and influential parliamentarian, serving on various select and standing committees including the committee of supply, of which he was chairman when he became fatally ill toward the end of the session of 1876. Though at no time a major figure, Scatcherd contributed significantly to the political life of his time.

Richard B. Splane

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), letter book 10, pp.706, 867; letter book 18, pp.179–80. Canada, Province of, Parliamentary debates, 1861–65. Globe (Toronto), 1867, 1876. London Advertiser, 1867. London Free Press, 1867. Ottawa Citizen, 1876. William Horton, Memoir of the late Thomas Scatcherd; a family record (London, Ont., 1878). Creighton, Road to confederation.

SCOTT, ALFRED HENRY, bartender, clerk, and political delegate; b.c.1840 of English parentage; d. 28 May 1872 in Saint-Boniface, Man.

Alfred Henry Scott was a resident of the Red River Settlement in Winnipeg from 1869 to 1872. He worked as a barkeeper in the saloon of Hugh F. O'Lone, an American, and later he served as a clerk in the store of Henry McKenney, also an American.

When resistance to union with Canada began in Red River in 1869, it found the settlement divided into three camps. Some favoured union with Canada, others would accept union if it came; some wished to negotiate terms with Canada; other settlers wanted to prolong the agitation in the hope of intervention by the United States. Alfred Scott's association with the Americans, O'Lone and McKenney, gave him some influence with the last group.

A mass meeting held on 19 and 20 Jan. 1870, at Upper Fort Garry (Winnipeg), decided that a convention of delegates should be elected to consider what terms might be asked of Canada. By deft political organization on the part of O'Lone and McKenney, Scott was nominated the Winnipeg delegate at a nominating meeting duly held but attended by the American party only. The moderates led by Alexander Begg* thought it was the only meeting to be held, that they had been excluded, and called none of their own. For want of another nomination, Scott was then declared elected, and, despite protest by the moderates, his election was confirmed in the convention. He was later elected by the convention one of three delegates to go to Ottawa to discuss terms, the other two being the Reverend Noël-Joseph Ritchot* and Judge John Black representing the French and English elements respectively. This election also was criticized, especially by Louis Riel*, who felt that one of the envoys should be a Métis. On 11 Feb. 1870, Scott, Ritchot, and Black were appointed delegates to Ottawa by the provisional government set up by the convention.

Ritchot and Scott travelled to Ottawa at the end of March, where they were arrested by agents of the Ontario government as parties to the murder of Thomas Scott*, an Ontario Orangeman executed by the provisional government. The Canadian government obtained their release and opened negotiations with the envoys. Scott played no recorded part in the discussions, but contented himself with supporting Ritchot's demands. He is known to have had a conversation with the American special agent in Ottawa, James Wickes Taylor*, but there is nothing to suggest that it was significant. After the main work was over, Scott left Ottawa towards mid-May. He visited New York to see relatives, and perhaps make American or Fenian connections. He then returned to Red River in the steps of Ritchot, who had already reported to the provisional government on the negotiations.

After a six-month illness in 1871–72, during which he was converted to Roman Catholicism, Scott became the first patient of the Hôpital Saint-Boniface. He presumably died in that institution.

W. L. Morton

Archives des sœurs grises (Saint-Boniface, Man.), Registre de l'hôpital Saint-Boniface, 1872. Archives paroissiales de Saint-Boniface (Man.), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures. Begg's Red River journal (Morton), 1–148, 212, 278, 284, 305, 370, 388, 535. "N.-J. Ritchot's journal," Manitoba: birth of a province (Morton), 134–35. New Nation (Winnipeg), 18 March 1870. Morice, Critical hist. of the Red River insurrection, 241–42.

SCOTT, JONATHAN, Methodist clergyman, b. 5 May 1803 at Nottingham, Eng.; d. 5 May 1880 at Brampton, Ont.

Jonathan Scott was converted at Chesterfield, England, in 1816 and joined the Wesleyan Church. He became a candidate for the ministry in 1834 and was immediately sent to the Canada Conference as a missionary by the British Wesleyan Conference. Received on trial by the Canada Conference in that year, he was sent to the Grape Island Indian mission (in the Bay of Quinte) where he remained until 1836. He was then ordained and stationed at the Lake Simcoe and Coldwater Indian mission. From 1834 to 1840 he was a frequent contributor to the Christian Guardian on Wesleyan missions to the Indians, criticizing the government's Indian policy under Sir Francis Bond Head, and defending the integrity of Indian converts.

Scott was stationed on the Goderich mission by the conference of 1839, but the appointment was immediately changed so that he might be acting editor of the Christian Guardian during the absence of its editor, the Reverend Egerton Ryerson*.

In 1840 the union of the Canada Conference with the British Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church was dissolved and Scott remained with the former. His appointment as editor was renewed each year by the conference but in 1844 it declined to reappoint him; according to John Carroll* the conference felt that Scott had worn the nib off his pen a little by long use. During Scott's editorship, the Guardian became a strictly religious paper avoiding political pronouncements and confining itself largely to a defence of evangelical Protestantism, more especially Methodist doctrine and polity. Much space was devoted to attacks on high church Anglicanism and on Roman Catholicism. The contrast between the paper under his editorship and that of Ryerson is quite marked.

In 1844 Scott returned to circuit work, in which he excelled. The conference of 1845 elected him secretary, in order, according to Carroll, to assuage wounded feelings over his dismissal from the editorship of the Guardian. He refused the appointment, however, and continued in the itinerant ministry until 1854, serving on the circuits of Stamford, Cobourg, Port Hope, Perth, and Cooksville.

He dropped from the itinerant ministry in 1854, because of his wife's ill health, and became an assistant to Dr Enoch Wood*, the superintendent of missions, at the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society office in Toronto. He was superannuated in 1868 and moved to Brampton, where he died.

C. Glenn Lucas

UCA, Minutes of the Canada Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada, 1834–74; Minutes of the Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada, 1874–80. Christian Guardian (Toronto), 1834–80. Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada, Missionary Society, Annual Reports (Toronto), 1834–41. Carroll, Case and his cotemporaries, IV, V.

SEXTON, JOHN PONSONBY, advocate, editor, and municipal official; b. 11 June 1808 in Quebec, son of John Sexton and Helen Halpen; d. in Montreal, Que., 18 March 1880.

John Ponsonby Sexton was the eldest son of John Sexton, native of Limerick, Ireland, former officer of the 49th regiment and employee of the Crown Lands Department, Quebec. His mother was related to the Ponsonby family. He was educated at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec and studied law in Montreal where he was admitted to the bar on 9 Feb. 1829.

Sexton joined the law firm of A. Jones and practised successfully in Montreal for 11 years. In 1835 he became editor of the Irish Advocate, a moderate reform journal temporarily created to draw Irish support from the Vindicator and Canadian Advertiser, a stalwart proponent of the Patriote cause. Although, in the invective which followed, the Vindicator branded Sexton a prominent Orangeman, there is no evidence to suggest that Sexton converted to the Protestant faith. He remained an active member of the St Patrick's Society and the Irish Roman Catholic Temperance Society, and, in 1844–45, served as first vice-president of both organizations.

On 12 Sept. 1840 Sexton became Montreal's first city clerk under the new charter of 1840, at a salary of £300, winning this appointment over the recorded opposition of five of the six French Canadian members of the city council. Since the corporation had no legal department Sexton drafted most of the municipal by-laws. In 1841 the city provided him with an assistant, Richard D. Bodley. Sexton, a prescient and exacting administrator, twice persuaded the lethargic city council to appoint land assessors if the corporation was not to lose the annual tax revenue. On one occasion, the city would otherwise have lost the whole revenue from the west ward amounting to about £5,000. In 1846 Sexton's foresight saved the entire assessment of the city, an estimated £30,000. In 1849 Sexton refused to follow his Montreal merchant friends into the annexation movement.

From 1852 until 1859 he served as clerk of the Recorder's Court, a local court established to try violations of municipal laws. Upon the recommendation of the city council, Sexton was on 2 April 1859 named recorder by the governor general, Sir Edmund Walker Head*, and he held this position until his death. He served as a major in the militia of Lower Canada. On 28 Feb. 1873 he was made queen's counsel.

In St Paul's Presbyterian Church, on 15 Feb. 1834, Sexton married Jane Elizabeth Carswell, the daughter of a Montreal merchant in wine and spirits. They had one son, James Ponsonby, an author and advocate, and two daughters. Jane Sexton died on 23 Jan. 1849, at the age of 49. Ten years later, on 7 June 1859, Sexton married Lolitia Keys, the widow of Francis McDonnell.

Sexton, a competent civic administrator, has been described as "a man of learning, ability and great literary attainment and an able writer."

Carman Miller

AJM, Registre d'état civil, Notre-Dame Parish, 1880; Registre d'état civil, St Paul's Presbyterian Church, 1834, 1835, 1849; Registre d'état civil, St Patrick's Church, 1859. AVM, Procès-verbaux du conseil municipal, 1–67. [Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty), II, 456–58. Le Courrier de Montréal, 17 mars–21 mars 1880. Le Nouveau Monde (Montréal), 16 mars–21 mars 1880. Pilot (Montreal), 1–17 April 1859. True Witness and Catholic Chronicle (Montreal), 24 March–18 April 1859. Vindicator and Canadian Advertiser (Montreal), 18 Aug. 1835–10 Jan. 1838.

P.-G. Roy, Les avocats de la région de Québec, 404. Hector Berthelot, Montréal; le bon vieux temps, É.-Z. Massicotte, édit. et compil. (2v., Montréal, 1916), II, 107–10. Histoire de la Corporation de la Cité de Montréal, depuis son origine jusqu'à nos jours . . ., J.-C. Lamothe et al., édit. (Montréal, 1903), 410–12. F.-J. Audet, "1842," Cahiers des Dix, VII (1942), 221, 253–54. Léon Trépanier, "Les attributs de la mairie de Montréal," Cahiers des Dix, XXXI (1966), 203–11.

SHAH-WUN-DAIS ("sultry heat"; better known as John Sunday), Methodist minister and Missisauga chieftain; b.c. 1795 near the Black River in central New York State; d. 14 Dec. 1875 at Alderville, Ont.

John Sunday was a member of the Missisauga tribe, which was scattered throughout central Upper Canada and particularly in the vicinity of Rice Lake and the mouth of the Credit River. Possibly Sunday's family was on an expedition in New York when he was born (the Black River district is opposite Kingston) or, as the border was still rather fluid in 1795, they may have lived there. Sunday said he fought in the War of 1812–14; presumably he was recruited by the British forces as an Indian auxiliary. He appears to have been recognized as a chief, and was one of the signatories of the lease for the Grape Island mission lands in 1826, but the office of chief was not very important among his people.

Urged on by the Reverend William Case*, the Canada Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church launched a vigorous campaign in 1824 to convert the Upper Canadian Indians to Christianity and to assimilate them to British North American society. John Sunday, who, like the majority of Indians, was living in miserable conditions near the white settlements, was one of the early converts, and was quickly singled out as a potential religious leader. He was married when, in 1826, he assisted in the establishment of a model mission settlement on Grape Island in the Bay of Quinte, at which the Indians were induced to pursue an ordered religious life, to raise crops, and to acquire elementary academic and technical skills. Sunday, however, did not remain long on the island; under the direction of Case and his fellow-chieftain, Peter Jones*, he became an itinerant missionary to the Missisaugas and Ojibwas in Upper Canada and northern Michigan.

Sunday had acquired sufficient education and experience at the Grape Island mission by 1832 to be accepted as a ministerial candidate. He travelled extensively for several years thereafter, particularly among the Ojibwas in the Lake Superior region. Following his ordination in 1836 he visited Great Britain to stimulate interest in the Indian missions, and was presented to Queen Victoria. His addresses and his conversations with English Methodists attracted much favourable attention and helped arouse greater concern in political circles for the welfare of the Indians. Subsequently he served on several mission stations, including Alderville, where he lived after being superannuated in 1867.

Among his Methodist brethren Sunday had an outstanding reputation as a person and as a preacher. In his own tongue, he was "always effective, often eloquent"; on occasion he "rose to the grandeur of sublimity in thought and speech." Although he was never fluent in English, "the quaint originality of his remarks" was said to have been "irresistibly attractive." As a pastor he laboured faithfully for his people; when blind and near death he was still speaking to them at length, showing them "how wonderfully he had been led into the way of the Kingdom."

John Sunday's career epitomized the initial impact of Methodist missions on the scattered Indian tribes of Upper Canada. For him, as for many of his fellows, Christianity gave a new meaning to life and a measure of dignity and of material comfort, but it did not bring them fully into the white community or enable them effectively to adapt their own culture to new and changing social conditions.

G. S. French

Christian Guardian (Toronto), 22 Dec. 1875. Peter Jones, Life and journals of Kah-ke-wa-quo-nā-by: (Rev. Peter Jones,) Wesleyan missionary (Toronto, 1860). Methodist Church of Canada, Toronto Conference, Minutes (Toronto), 1876, 12–17. The minutes of the annual conferences of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada from 1824 to 1857 (2v., Toronto, 1846–63), I. Cornish, Cyclopædia of Methodism, I. Carroll, Case and his cotemporaries. G. F. Playter, The history of Methodism in Canada: with an account of the rise and progress of the work of God among the Canadian Indian tribes, and occasional notices of the civil affairs of the province (Toronto, 1862).

SHANLY, CHARLES DAWSON, artist, poet, and creator of ballads; b. Dublin, Ireland, 9 March 1811, the eldest son of James Shanly, a member of the Irish bar, and Frances Elizabeth Mulvany; brother of Walter* and Francis*; d. 15 April 1875, Arlington, Fla.

When Charles Dawson Shanly was five, his family left Dublin to live at Stradbally, Queens County, and, in 1825, moved to Dunboyne, County Meath. He was educated at home under the family tutor, the Reverend Henry Carpenter, and at school in Waterford, Waterford County. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, but spent a year at Penzance, Cornwall, caring for his brother William, a promising young engineer who had developed tuberculosis. There the two men devoted much time to sketching. After William died in 1833, Charles returned to Trinity College and graduated with a BA in 1834. He later studied art at the Brocas Academy in Dublin.

The ready acceptance of his poetry by a literary agent in London led him to contemplate a career as a writer in England. Instead, he came with his family to Upper Canada in 1836 and settled near Fanshawe, where Hamilton Hartley Killaly, a Dublin friend of his father, lived. The Shanly family's 600-acre estate, "Thorndale," was only just established when the rebellion of 1837 broke out. Charles volunteered, received a commission, and served for one year.

He joined the Board of Public Works of Lower Canada as a clerk in 1840, serving under its chairman, Killaly, and remained with the board after the union of Upper and Lower Canada. However, Shanly continued writing and became editor, in 1849, of a comic magazine, Punch in Canada, to which he contributed poetry, satirical articles, and cartoons, all unsigned. This periodical followed the government when it was transferred from Montreal to Toronto and was published weekly until its end in 1850.

Shanly became assistant secretary to the board of works, but resigned and went to New York in 1857. He now made journalism a full-time occupation. He wrote for the Albion, New York Leader, and Atlantic Monthly, and assisted in founding Vanity Fair, a humorous weekly journal, admired for its wit and subtle cartoons. Shanly became its editor. His thoughtful poem, "Sword and plough," published in the early days of the Civil War, was followed by a series of clever articles, entitled "Hardee made easy," also published in Vanity Fair, which satirized General William J. Hardee's textbook on military tactics.

"The lilac tree" illustrates the music of his verse, but the poem most frequently quoted is "The walker of the snow." The monkey of Porto Bello was published in 1867, and two other witty monographs, A jolly bear and his friends and The truant chicken were apparently published in 1866. One of his close friends at this time was F. H. Bellew, the creator of "Uncle Sam."

Suffering from lung trouble, Shanly went to Arlington, Florida, in February 1875 and died there, unmarried, two months later. He was buried in Arva, Ontario, near the family homestead. He was an ardent painter, and some of his sketches, along with his portrait, are preserved in the McCord Museum in Montreal.

FRANK NORMAN WALKER

C. D. Shanly, The monkey of Porto Bello (New York, 1867). C. M. Whyte-Edgar, A wreath of Canadian song (Toronto, 1910), 25–29, contains "Blondine," "The walker of the snow," and "The lilac tree."

MTCL, Publisher's proofs of a number of C. D. Shanly's poems. PAO, Francis Shanly papers, box 95, Walter Shanly, "The Canadian Shanlys. Whence they came and how they got to Thorndale." Walter and Francis Shanly, Daylight through the mountain, letters and labours of civil engineers Walter and Francis Shanly, ed. F. N. Walker ([Toronto], 1957), 107, 140, 424. Appleton's cyclopædia of American biography, ed. J. G. Wilson et al. (10v., New York, 1887–1924), V, 481. A catalogue of graduates who have proceeded to degrees in the University of Dublin . . . with supplements to December 16, 1868, ed. J. H. Todd (Dublin and London, 1869). F. N. Walker, Sketches of old Toronto (Toronto, 1965), 243–95.

SHARPLES, JOHN, prosperous lumberman of Quebec, shipbuilder, official, mayor, and legislative councillor; b. 1814 in Lancashire, Eng.; d. 19 Dec. 1876 at Sillery, Que.

John Sharples came from a family whose forbears had remained faithful to Catholicism. While still young, he left Lancashire to come to America. He spent the year 1822 at St Andrews, New Brunswick, then returned to England the following year; he came back to Canada only in 1827, to take up residence there once and for all. He was welcomed at Quebec by several members of his family. Indeed, in 1816 his uncle William had started the Sharples timber company, the first to trade in square timber at Quebec. Around 1850 John went into partnership with Owen Jones and William's two sons, Charles and Henry. While Henry and Owen Jones carried on business at Liverpool, England, as Sharples, Jones and Company (which became Henry Sharples and Company when Jones withdrew from the firm in 1866), Charles and John formed the company at Quebec known as C. and J. Sharples and Company. A partnership contract for a five-year period, dated 6 April 1854, specified that the capital of the company was £25,000, the sum of £5,000 being supplied by John and the rest by the three other partners in proportion to their shares in the company.

Charles and John Sharples bought their lumber east of Quebec, and brought it to the coves at Sillery and Bridgewater. The company exported principally square timber, made up of white pine, red pine, oak, elm, ash, and birch; timber for construction, essentially planks, and staves were also sold to the timber merchants in England and Scotland. In 1852 John and his cousin were among the "Grand Manitous" of the Anglo-Saxon race who controlled the timber trade and shipbuilding at Quebec [see John GILMOUR]. From 1854 to 1871 Charles and John Sharples each built three ships. The firm became John's sole property in 1870, and took the name of John Sharples Sons and Company.

In addition, John held certain public offices: on 19 Dec. 1843 he became superintendent of cullers, a post he left in 1855. On 10 Nov. 1859 he was appointed commissioner of the port of Quebec, then president; when he resigned in May 1864, a special committee was immediately formed to inquire into the reasons for this resignation. Two years earlier his sense of civic responsibility had attracted the attention of his fellow-citizens, who had elected him mayor of Sillery. No doubt with the object of consolidating his social relationships, while seeing to his personal gain, John Sharples joined the Quebec Board of Trade (1862–76), and in May 1873 was chosen to represent the timber merchants on the council of this board. John also became director and vice-president of the Union Bank of Lower Canada, as well as of the Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company in 1873.

John Sharples' career reached its height on 27 Feb. 1874, when he was called upon to join the Legislative Council as representative for the division of Stadacona, in recognition of his services to society and his loyalty to the Conservative party. In the same year, while on a business trip in Europe, he learned of the death of his only daughter. The shock was so great that he does not seem to have recovered from it. He died on 19 Dec. 1876 at Sillery; the English-speaking Catholic community of Quebec mourned for one of its greatest benefactors. His sons John* (1848–1913) and William (1841–86) carried on his business under the trade name of W. and J. Sharples.

PIERRE LANDRY

ANQ, Port de Québec, 14; Quebec Board of Trade, Minute book, 6; Quebec Board of Trade, 37. PAC, MG 28, III, 11 (W. & J. Sharples Reg'd.). Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1864, 184, 343. L'Événement (Québec), 20 déc. 1876. La Minerve (Montréal), 21 déc. 1876. Morning Chronicle (Quebec), 20 Dec. 1876. The Canadian men and women of the time: a handbook of Canadian biography, ed. H. J. Morgan (2nd ed., Toronto, 1912), 1012. Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 285, 287. A. R. M. Lower, A history of Canada; colony to nation (4th ed., [Don Mills, Ont.], 1964), 209, 215. Ouellet, Histoire économique, 500. Narcisse Rosa, La construction des navires à Québec et ses environs; grèves et naufrages (Québec, 1897), 63–66, 70, 73, 97, 101, 105, 116–17, 142.

SHAW, JAMES, businessman and politician; b. 1798 at New Ross, Ireland, son of Richard (?) Shaw and Anne Dowsley; m. Helen Forgie of Glasgow, Scotland; d. 6 Feb. 1878 in Smiths Falls, Ont.

James Shaw was educated in Dublin, Ireland, and emigrated to Upper Canada in 1820. He was employed by the British authorities as clerk of the military settlement at Lanark-on-Clyde (Lanark) and Perth, assisting settlers to get established. After nine years he left to become an overseer, probably in the provisioning of the workers, on the section of the Rideau Canal from Smiths Falls to Bytown (Ottawa). He was a member of the Carleton and Lanark militias and had attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel when he retired in 1860. During the rebellion of 1837–38 he was stationed at Brockville with the 3rd Leeds militia.

Shaw's economic interests were varied: he opened a general merchandise store and a blacksmith shop in Smiths Falls, where he settled after working on the canal, and he assisted his sons in establishing a general merchandise store and a foundry, and also a newspaper, the British Standard, in Perth. He was involved briefly in banking and he invested in land and in the Brockville and Ottawa Railway.

A political career complemented his business ventures. He actively supported the Conservative party and included among his friends prominent Conservatives of the region such as William*, James*, and Alexander Morris*, George Sherwood*, Roderick MATHESON, Colonel Andrew William Playfair*, and James and Bennett Rosamond. The local political offices he held – county and town reeve and councillor of the district of Johnstown – perhaps influenced him to seek other political positions. In 1851 he successfully contested the Lanark riding and, when the constituency was divided, retained the seat of South Lanark in 1854. He lost in 1857, however, in large measure because of his moderate attitude towards Roman Catholic demands for separate schools. Shaw was a staunch Anglican and assisted in the founding of St Johns Church in Smiths Falls. He was sympathetic to the Orange Order, although not a member, and belonged to the freemasons.

Shaw was elected for the Bathurst division to the Legislative Council in 1860, and in 1867 he was appointed to the Senate, having been a supporter of confederation. Politically he was a moderate, a strong supporter of John A. Macdonald*'s conservatism, and he was influential in dispensing patronage for the area.

Shaw's business ventures proved disastrous; he lost heavily in the crash of 1857–58 because of overspeculation, and the financial difficulties of a son contributed to his business failures in the 1860s. His situation had not improved when the recession of the 1870s began, and he never recovered. The family, however, remained prominent in the area. Shaw was recalled as "Liberal in his opinions and broad in his views upon public questions," and as "a kind and sympathizing friend. . . . Full of anecdote & repartee he was a great favourite with all who knew him."

FOSTER J. K. GRIEZIC

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers); RG 8, I, A1, 130, 202; RG 9, I, B5, 1–8. Queen's University Archives, Alexander Morris papers. St Johns Church (Smiths Falls, Ont.), Burial records, entry 38, 9 Feb. 1878. British Whig (Kingston), 8 Feb. 1878. Perth Courier (Bathurst Courier, 1834–57), 1834–Feb. 1878. Can. parl. comp., 1862; 1867; 1871; 1878. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1888). Andrew Haydon, Pioneer sketches in the district of Bathurst (Toronto, 1925). A summary of the proceedings of the council of the district of Johnstown and the council of the United Counties of Leeds and Grenville, 1842–1942, comp. William Jelly (Brockville, Ont., 1943).

SHEDDEN, JOHN, cartage agent, contractor, and railway promoter; b. 4 Nov. 1825, at Kilbirnie, Ayrshire, Scotland, son of John Shedden and Jean Wyllie; d. unmarried 16 May 1873, at Cannington, Ont.

John Shedden studied at the Irvine Academy in Irvine, Ayrshire, and worked on the Glasgow and South Western Railway before emigrating to Virginia in the United States where he became a railway contractor. In 1855 he came to Canada and entered into a partnership with William Hendrie of Hamilton to form the cartage firm of Hendrie and Shedden. They were the cartage agents for the Great Western Railway and later became the agents for the Grand Trunk after its line from Montreal to Toronto was completed in late 1856. The firm introduced in Canada some of the features of cartage firms in England, such as making facilities available in several cities (in 1857 the firm had offices in Toronto, Hamilton, and London), and it improved on the service previously provided by cartage firms in Canada. It employed heavier wagons and standardized the more important forms used by the railways in moving freight. Nonetheless, the monopoly position of the firm inevitably led to complaints. A riot is said to have occurred in Montreal after meetings held to protest this monopoly, and the firm's barns were burned on two occasions.

Hendrie and Shedden dissolved their partnership in 1859 or 1860, and the latter retained the contract with the Grand Trunk. He continued to expand his company's facilities, and by 1870 he had offices in Montreal, Toronto, London, and Detroit, and owned about 400 horses. He was, however, developing other interests, particularly as a contractor and as a railway promoter.

Shedden became associated with a group of prominent Toronto businessmen, including George Laidlaw* and J. G. Worts*, who were actively promoting the construction to the areas north of Toronto of narrow-gauge railways which, it was believed, could be built more cheaply and quickly than railways with a wider gauge. Shedden had already been a contractor for several buildings in Toronto, including the Grand Trunk grain elevator, opened in 1863, and Union Station, completed in July 1873. He now became a railway contractor, in partnership with William James Mackenzie, on the narrow-gauge Toronto, Grey, and Bruce Railway, chartered in 1868 and completed from Toronto to Owen Sound in June 1873. He was also an important stockholder in the railway, and in 1870 became a director. Another narrow-gauge railway was the Toronto and Nipissing, completed as far as Coboconk in November 1872. Shedden was elected its president in 1870 and was an important stock and bondholder in the company.

Shedden did not participate actively in politics but he had close associations with the Conservative party and Sir John A. Macdonald*. He had been a director of the Toronto Daily Telegraph (and probably lost some money when it was discontinued in 1872), and he and C. J. Campbell signed in 1872 a note for $10,000 to Macdonald "to enable him to supply funds to the several constituencies which he hopes to carry." He had been included in 1872 in the Interoceanic Railway Company headed by David Lewis Macpherson*, which Macdonald failed to amalgamate with Sir Hugh Allan*'s Canada Pacific Railway Company. Macdonald then tried to persuade Shedden to enter a company that was being formed. Shedden was disappointed in not receiving the vice-presidency of the company and, although he "could have managed the financial part of it," he refused Macdonald's offer at the last moment because of an unspecified "difficulty."

Shedden was included in the provisional board of directors of the St Lawrence Bank in 1872, and he was a director in a number of other firms. He died as a result of an accident at Cannington on 16 May 1873 when he was crushed between moving cars on the Toronto and Nipissing Railway line and the station platform.

HENRI PILON

General Register Office (Edinburgh), Register of births and baptisms for the parish of Kilbirnie. PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 123, Shedden to Macdonald, 16 Dec. 1872; Alexander Campbell to Macdonald, 17 Dec. 1872; Shedden to Macdonald, 18 Dec. 1872; 125, Shedden to Macdonald, 29 Jan. 1873; letter book 17, Macdonald to C. J. Brydges, 16 Feb. 1872; letter book 19, Macdonald to Shedden, 9 Dec. 1872. PAO, Sir Alexander Campbell papers, C. J. Campbell to Alexander Campbell, 28, 30 Aug. 1872; RG 8, I-7-b-3, Toronto and Nipissing Railway, box 7; Toronto, Grey, and Bruce Railway, box 9; Toronto City Council papers, 1857, S. P. Bidder to John Hutchison, 26 Aug. 1857. York County Surrogate Court (Toronto), will of John Shedden. Globe (Toronto), 19 May 1873. Mail (Toronto), 17, 19 May 1873. Standard dict. of Can. biog. (Roberts and Tunnell), II, 398.

D. C. Masters, The rise of Toronto, 1850–1890 (Toronto, 1947), 74–75, 109–14. Myles Pennington, Railways and other ways, being reminiscences of canal and railway life during a period of sixty-seven years . . . (Toronto, 1896), 104–7. Ross and Trigge, History of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, III, 214, 217. F. W. Terrill, A chronology of Montreal and of Canada from A.D. 1752 to A.D. 1893, including commercial statistics, historical sketches of commercial corporations and firms and advertisements . . . (Montreal, 1893), 238–39.

SHERWOOD, ADIEL, United Empire Loyalist and sheriff; b. 16 May 1779 at Fort Edward, New York, son of Thomas Sherwood and Anna Brownson; m. on 11 Oct. 1801 Mary Baldwin by whom he had seven daughters and one son; d. 25 March 1874 in Brockville, Ont.

Adiel Sherwood's parents were United Empire Loyalists who came to Quebec in 1779 when Adiel was an infant. In 1784 they settled in the future Leeds County, and Adiel later recalled that "I saw the first tree cut and the first hill of Corn and Potatoes planted by an actual settler." He probably attended a private settlers' school but had little formal education. He expressed himself well, however, and, as a young man, taught school near Elizabethtown (Brockville). About 1804, he built and operated the first tavern in Brockville. When he became sheriff he "brought [his] mercantile affairs to an end," but it is not known what these affairs comprised.

Sherwood joined the 1st Regiment, Leeds militia, as ensign at 17. He was militia paymaster from June 1813 through 1814 for the Johnstown and Eastern districts (eastern Ontario between the St Lawrence and Ottawa rivers). Besides issuing pay, he purchased clothing and supplies for "all classes of Militia . . . Sedentary and Embodied, the Provincial Cavalry, and Incorporated Militia." He became colonel in 1830 and retired in 1846.

In his long public career Sherwood served the Johnstown District (present-day Leeds and Grenville, and parts of Lanark and Carleton counties) as deputy clerk of the crown, branch roads commissioner, land board member, commissioner of the peace (1818–28), treasurer (1814–41), and sheriff (1829–41). He continued as sheriff for the United Counties of Leeds and Grenville from 1842 to 1864.

Sherwood was an upright and conscientious sheriff. His duties were to seize land and goods and chattels for tax arrears and to sell them at public auction, to attend the assizes and quarter sessions of the district courts, to select and summon juries for court hearings, to supervise the district (later the counties) jail and its inmates, and to bring the prisoners to court and to see that their sentences, including executions, were carried out.

After the rebellion in 1837, Sherwood investigated for the provincial government the activities of "Patriots" and of Hunter's Lodges suspected of border raids across the St Lawrence (some led by the "pirate" William Johnston*) and of the invasion at Prescott in November 1838.

Sherwood, a devout man, helped found the First Presbyterian Church in Brockville in 1811 and was an elder in it for many years. He was the first superintendent of its Sunday school (the first in Upper Canada), president of the first Bible Society in Brockville, and a member of the first Religious Tract Society of Upper Canada. When the Brockville Temperance Society was formed in 1832, Adiel Sherwood was the first president.

He was a prominent freemason. After joining the order at 21, he rose rapidly to become a mark master mason, and helped organize the Sussex Royal Arch chapter which met in his house. He became provincial junior grand warden in 1825, and grand senior warden for the year 1827–28.

When Adiel Sherwood died at 95, he was mourned as the patriarch of the United Counties. He had contributed to their development in land settlement, municipal government, and the district courts. He had participated in the founding of Ontario, and had witnessed the confederation of Canada and its expansion from sea to sea.

RUTH MCKENZIE

Adiel Sherwood prepared a "Memorandum" in 1866, for William Canniff*, which the latter quoted in History of the settlement of Upper Canada (Ontario), with special reference to the bay Quinté (Toronto, 1869). An edited version entitled "Memoir" was printed in T. W. H. Leavitt, History of Leeds and Grenville, Ontario, from 1749 to 1879, with illustrations and biographical sketches of some of its prominent men and pioneers (Brockville, 1879), 18–20. The original "Memorandum" is in PAC, MG 24, I65 (Adiel Sherwood papers), which also contains a few letters. A "Memento" by Adiel Sherwood was published in the Brockville Recorder, 13 Feb. 1868, and reprinted 16 May 1873.

PAC, RG 5, A1, 16 Sept., 10 Nov. 1813; 21 Aug. 1821; 26 May, 26 June 1829; 19 Oct., 6, 11, 18 Dec. 1832; 18, 19, 20, 23, 30 Aug. 1833; 28 June, 17 Dec. 1838; 26 Feb. 1839; C1, 1839, no.1782; 1841, nos.1638, 2372, 2460; 1843, no.6277; 1864, no.128; RG 9, I, B4, 26, 7 Jan. 1836; RG 68, 1. Brockville Recorder, 15 March 1832, 31 Aug. 1854, 2 April 1874. Recorder and Times (Brockville), 20 Dec. 1927. Can. biog. dict., I, 315–17. J. R. Robertson, The history of freemasonry in Canada from its introduction in 1749 . . . (2v., Toronto, 1899). H. S. Seaman, "The Rev. William Smart, Presbyterian minister of Elizabethtown, 1811–1876," Ont. Hist., V (1904), 178–86.

SHIELS, ANDREW, blacksmith, poet, and magistrate; b. 12 March 1793 in the parish of Oxnam, Roxburghshire, Scotland; d. 5 Nov. 1879 at Dartmouth, N.S.

After emigrating to Nova Scotia in 1818, Andrew Shiels worked as a blacksmith at Halifax. A decade later he moved across the harbour to Dartmouth, where he owned a farm, and continued his trade at Ellenvale Tavern. By 1834 he had set up a carding mill at Ellenvale, named for his wife, Ellen, who died in 1846. Shiels later married Isabella Blair; he was the father of a large family, but most of his children died young.

A supporter of Joseph HOWE, Andrew Shiels was appointed a justice of the peace for Halifax County on 20 Nov. 1848 in the commission appointed by the Reformers after the winning of responsible government. In 1857 the Court of Quarter Sessions appointed Andrew Shiels a stipendiary magistrate, and in 1860 he became a member of the commission for the relief of insolvent debtors in Halifax County.

Shiels is remembered as a colourful local character who wrapped himself in a long plaid cloak in cold weather, as a man of strong opinions active in the affairs of the community, and as a respected magistrate. At the time of his death the Presbyterian Witness said, "He was a fast friend and an implacable enemy." During the greater part of his life he belonged to the Presbyterian Church, but after a misunderstanding with members of the local presbytery he joined the Methodists.

Largely self-educated, Shiels read widely and had an excellent memory. He was influenced by the history, tales, and imagery of his native border country and by the poetry of Robert Burns. His popular verse appeared frequently in the Halifax newspapers for 50 years over the pseudonyms "Albyn" and "the Bard of Ellenvale." The witch of the Westcot; a tale of Nova-Scotia, in three cantos was an ambitious work. An historical tale in verse, it was based on the Indian massacre at Dartmouth in 1751, and in the preface he remarked on his difficulty in adapting his border vernacular to the English spoken in Nova Scotia. He also commented on the colony's apathy towards poetry, which be believed to be due to pioneering conditions. His most significant poems were those devoted to nature and those where he attempted to draw upon the history and imagery of his adopted country. He was also strong in satire.

PHYLLIS R. BLAKELEY

Following is a list of some of the writings of Andrew Shiels [Albyn]: Dupes & demagogues: a souvenir (Halifax, 1879); Eye to the ermine: a dream (Halifax, 1871); John Walker's courtship: a legend of Lauderdale (Halifax, 1877); Letter to Eliza (Halifax, 1869); My mother: in memorium (Halifax, 1868); The preface, a poem of the period (Halifax, 1876); Retribution: a literary contribution to the Nova Scotia Department of the Philadelphia Exhibition (Halifax, 1875); Rusticating in reality: a Pierian paraphrase (Halifax, 1873); Sabbath in Dartmouth (Halifax, 1870); The witch of the Westcot; a tale of Nova-Scotia, in three cantos; and other waste leaves of literature (Halifax, 1831). "To the late Honourable Simon Bradstreet Robie," Sun (Halifax), 7 Jan. 1858.

Woodlawn Cemetery, Dartmouth, N.S., Shiels family tombstones. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 6 Nov. 1879, 8 April 1885. Presbyterian Witness (Halifax), 8 Nov. 1879. M. J. Katzmann (Mrs William Lawson), History of the townships of Dartmouth, Preston and Lawrencetown; Halifax County, N.S., ed. Harry Piers (Halifax, 1893), 101–2. J. P. Martin, The story of Dartmouth (Dartmouth, N.S., 1957).

SHIVES, ROBERT, printer, publisher, and public servant; b.c. 1815 in Aberdeen, Scotland, son of Robert Shives and Martha Wiggins; d. a bachelor on 7 Jan. 1879 in Saint John, N.B.

Robert Shives, whose father was a Saint John merchant, was born during a visit by his parents to Scotland. He was raised in Saint John, and in 1827 apprenticed as a printer to the New Brunswick Courier. Upon completion of his apprenticeship in 1834 he went to Scotland for two years before settling permanently at Saint John.

Shives was responsible for adding another dimension to the increasingly sophisticated urban settlement of Saint John in the 1840s. From 1840 to 1843 he ran the Amaranth, one of the first literary magazines in the Maritime provinces. The 36 monthly editions, of approximately 30 pages each, contain a bulk of original prose and verse contributed by New Brunswickers and Nova Scotians. As well Shives carried reprints from foreign sources. From the London Sporting Review, for example, were drawn articles written by the ubiquitous Saint John attorney, Moses H. Perley*. A short story, "Mark Meriden," may have been from another source: it had an American setting and was written by Mrs Harriet Beecher Stowe. Partly because of the disappointment of getting less public support than he had hoped for, but mainly because of "the slenderness of the pecuniary returns" Shives stopped publishing the Amaranth.

Robert Shives probably continued his trade as a printer on one of the Saint John newspapers until he succeeded Moses H. Perley as immigration agent in the late 1840s or early 1850s. Shives led an active life in the community. He was elected a director of the Mechanics' Institute in 1844, was a freemason, a member of the St Andrew's Society, and held the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the provincial militia.

RICHARD RICE

Amaranth (Saint John, N.B.), January 1841–December 1843. Daily Sun (Saint John, N.B.), 8 Jan. 1879. Daily Telegraph (Saint John, N.B.), 8 Jan. 1879. Morning News (Saint John, N.B.), 13 Dec. 1843. New Brunswick Courier (Saint John, N.B.), 9 Jan. 1841, 9 Dec. 1843. Royal Gazette (Fredericton), 14 Feb. 1844. Saint John Globe, 8 Jan. 1879. Saint John Weekly Freeman, 11 Jan. 1879. Harper, Hist. directory, 47. D. R. Jack, "Acadian magazines," RSCT, 2nd ser., IX (1903), sect.II, 173–203.

SHORT, EDWARD, lawyer and judge; b. 10 June 1806 at Bristol, Eng., son of John Quirk Short, inspector of military hospitals, and grandson of the Reverend Robert Quirk Short, Anglican minister of Trois-Rivières; d. 5 June 1871 at Sherbrooke, Que.

Edward Short emigrated to Canada while still young, and studied with the lawyer David Augustus Bostwick at Trois-Rivières, then with Dominique Mondelet* and A. Lebourdais at Montreal. He was called to the bar on 12 Oct. 1826. He practised his profession in turn at Montreal, Trois-Rivières, Quebec (as partner of Thomas Cushing AYLWIN), and, after 1830, at Sherbrooke; in this last place he was a partner first of Ebenezer Peck, then of his brother John Short*, who later became protonotary of the judicial district. He also presided over the Court of the Sessions of the Peace for the district of Saint-François.

During the 1850 by-election in Sherbrooke County (which did not then include the town), Short worked against John Sewell SANBORN. He opposed annexation to the United States, which Sanborn was promoting, and the annexationist movement, which he regarded as "seditious." Because of his relationships with the Anglican community, Short was the ideal candidate to save the town of Sherbrooke for the Liberals. It was therefore not surprising that the government of Francis Hincks* and Augustin-Norbert Morin* supported his candidature during the general election of 1851. Short represented the town of Sherbrooke in 1851 and 1852. On 12 Nov. 1852 he received his mandate as justice of the Superior Court (district of Saint-François) and held this post until his death. He also sat as judge on the Seigneurial Court, which was created in 1854. It was the task of this tribunal, composed of judges of the Court of Queen's Bench and of the Superior Court, to determine the real rights of the seigneurs and those the censitaires had to redeem as a result of the abolition of the seigneurial system. Short, a sociable man with an affable disposition, was remembered as a fair and understanding judge.

Edward Short died on 5 June 1871 at Sherbrooke. By a resolution passed on 8 June 1871, the bar of the judicial district of Saint-François agreed that they would attend his funeral as a corps and wear mourning for two months. Short Street perpetuates his name in Sherbrooke.

On 7 May 1839, at Sherbrooke, he had married Ann Brown; he had seven children, among them Robert, who also practised law at Sherbrooke, and Major Charles John, who perished through his devotion to duty in the fire that in 1889 destroyed the district of Saint-Sauveur in Quebec.

MAURICE O'BREADY

Archives judiciaires de Saint-François (Sherbrooke, Qué.), Registre d'état civil, St Peter's Church, 10 June 1806, 7 May 1839, 5 June 1871, 7 March 1881, 16 May 1889. Private archives of Mrs F. P. Cluderay (North Hatley, Que.), Short family papers. Le Pionnier de Sherbrooke, 9 juin 1871. P.-G. Roy, Les juges de la province de Québec, 501. L. S. Channell, History of Compton County and sketches of the Eastern Townships, district of St. Francis, and Sherbrooke County (Cookshire, Que., 1896), 40. Jean Mercier, Autour de Mena' Sen (Sherbrooke, Qué., 1964), 163.

SIMARD, GEORGES-HONORÉ, businessman and politician; b. 18 April 1817, in Quebec City, son of Pierre Simard and Louise Clouet; m. 3 Sept. 1844, Julie Measam (of their children three survived him); d. 27 June 1873 at Sainte-Foy, Que.

Georges-Honoré Simard received his education in Quebec City, where he began his career as a printer. He soon abandoned this trade to enter the hardware business, first with his uncle, Michel Clouet, and later with his own firm of Chinic, Simard et Méthot. He sold his interests in the firm in 1860 and later became sole proprietor of the Quebec Plaster Mills. At various times he held office in a number of companies, banks, societies, and on boards in Quebec, including president of the City Building Society, 1857–59, vice-president of the Caisse d'Économie de Notre-Dame de Québec from 1858, director of the De Lery Gold Mining Company from 1865 [see Alexandre-Réné CHAUSSEGROS], vice-president of the Shipbuilding Association [see CHAREST] in the same year, and director of the Union Bank of Lower Canada, 1867–71. In 1859, he was appointed a member, and in 1870 the chairman, of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners Board.

Simard attempted to enter politics in 1854, when he contested the Quebec City seat for the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada. He was defeated but ran again for the same riding in the by-election of 27 Oct. 1856 and in the general election of 1857 and was successful in both instances. Violence and political machinations surrounded the latter election, and he was unseated by petition on 16 April 1860, but in the subsequent by-election, held on 7 May, in Quebec Centre, was returned. Defeated in 1863, he served on a number of commissions for the next few years. One, appointed in 1865, was for an investigation of the failure of St Roch's Savings Bank. On several occasions he was a member of a permanent commission for the erection and maintenance of parish buildings in the Quebec diocese. In 1867 Simard was elected by acclamation to the Legislative Assembly of Quebec for Quebec Centre, and to the House of Commons for Quebec City. He retired from provincial politics in 1871 and from federal politics in 1872.

Throughout his life Simard was a successful businessman and he always maintained firm connections with the mercantile community. As a politician, he was active in Quebec interests. In the debates on a capital for the united province, he strongly supported Quebec City and when Ottawa was chosen in 1857 he bitterly attacked George-Étienne CARTIER for his compromising attitude. He was a Conservative and a loyal supporter of Cartier but, on this occasion, he voted against him.

CAROLE B. STELMACK

PAC, RG 68, 1. L'Événement (Québec), 1840–juill. 1873. Morning Chronicle (Quebec) 28 June 1873. Quebec Mercury, 1840–July 1873. [G.-É. Cartier], Discours de sir Georges Cartier . . ., Joseph Tassé, édit. (Montréal, 1893). Can. directory of parliament (Johnson), 530. Can. parl. comp., 1867; 1869; 1871;

1872. P.-G. Roy, Fils de Québec, IV, 16–18. Rumilly, Hist. de la prov. de Québec, I.

SIMPSON, JOHN, government official and politician; b. 1788 in England; d. 21 April 1873 in Kingston, Ont.

Having failed in England as a farmer and a merchant, John Simpson emigrated to Augusta, Upper Canada, in 1815 with his wife Zipporah Tickell and, very likely, his six step-sons. Following the arrival of Lord Dalhousie [Ramsay*] as governor-in-chief of Canada in 1819, Simpson joined his staff as a private secretary. In 1822 the governor appointed him inspector of merchandise, collector of customs, and overseer of his majesty's locks at Coteau-du-Lac, a post on the St Lawrence where the British had built a canal and a small fort, and where customs duties on goods passing between Upper and Lower Canada were levied.

Remarkably, two years after his arrival at Coteau-du-Lac, Simpson had "gained an influence over French Canadians" and was elected to the assembly of Lower Canada for the County of York. During his term he opposed the election of Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU as speaker and generally supported his benefactor, the governor, in his quarrels with the assembly. When he stood for re-election in 1827, he was strongly opposed and, fearing electoral violence, he withdrew from the contest. Simpson's first venture into colonial politics ended in a storm of controversy when he claimed that the Roman Catholic clergy had fomented "unholy excitement" on behalf of his opponents, whom he labelled a "Revolutionary Faction."

Simpson remained collector of customs at the increasingly busy port of Coteau-du-Lac throughout the 1830s and was indirectly associated with the growing reform movement of the period through the activities of his step-son, John Arthur ROEBUCK, the agent for the Lower Canadian assembly in the British House of Commons. However, when violence broke out in November 1837, Simpson organized a group of volunteers to occupy the undefended British fort at Coteau-du-Lac, preventing it from falling to the Patriotes, and earned the thanks of Sir John Colborne* for his "zeal and activity." Later Simpson received rare praise from the opposite quarter. Jean-Joseph Girouard*, a Patriote leader for whose capture a £500 reward had been offered, surrendered to him on Christmas Day 1837, and later commended Simpson for "the generous and prudent treatment of the persecuted Canadians which he ensured in his area."

This same generous attitude which Girouard praised led Simpson into prominence and problems in 1838. It was Simpson who suggested to Lord Durham [Lambton*] that a general amnesty be granted to all political prisoners captured during the troubles except the leaders. Once the governor had accepted this idea, it was Simpson who acted as his intermediary in obtaining a signed confession of guilt from eight of the principal Patriote prisoners, who were banished to Bermuda by Lord Durham. Towards these men Simpson later displayed a compassionate – almost paternalistic – regard. He accompanied them from Montreal to Quebec, dining with them on the way, and arranged with Lord Durham for them to be given freedom of the island once they reached Bermuda. Following the disallowance of Durham's ordinance and the subsequent pardoning of the Bermuda exiles, Simpson sent the prisoners £100 to enable them to return from exile. The revelation of these past kindnesses by the Montreal Herald after the uprising of 1838 marked Simpson as "a notoriously bad character" in the eyes of the Tory establishment.

In 1841 John Simpson again entered politics. He resigned as collector of customs at Coteau-du-Lac, arranged for his son, William B., to succeed him at the post, and stood as the chosen candidate of Lord Sydenham [Thomson*] in Vaudreuil County (part of the earlier York County). After a violent contest in which "pitchforks, axes and clubs were made use of," Simpson was elected to the Legislative Assembly. The controversial contest was highly criticized by the Reform party and in 1844 Simpson chose not to risk re-election. One year later he was appointed to the Rebellion Losses Commission, on which he served until it completed its work in 1851 [see Philip Henry MOORE]. Even as a commissioner, he was the target of journalistic abuse; in 1851 the Conservative Montreal Gazette severely criticized his work on the hated commission. In later life Simpson lived in quiet retirement with his son, collector of customs at Brockville and then at Kingston, where he died in his 85th year.

John Simpson was a conspicuous member of the privileged minority which dominated Lower Canada during the first half of the 19th century, but his quixotic enthusiasm prevented him from becoming a typical member of it. Possibly the best analysis of Simpson's chequered career was written by his step-son, John Arthur Roebuck: "He was a daring and sanguine man and indulged in schemes that would have terrified a more sober-minded one."

JOHN BESWARICK THOMPSON

ANQ, QBC, Procureur général, Événements de 1837–1838, no.4082. Canada, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, National Historic Sites

Service, Research Division, George Ingram, "A history of Coteau-du-Lac" (typewritten report, 1967). PAC, MG 24, A27 (Durham papers), 26, pp.631–34, 652–53; RG 1, E13, 14, p.174; RG 8, I, A1, 49, pp.62–69; A2, 1271, pp.54–55, 58–59.

Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1841–52. [Charles Grey], Crisis in the Canadas: 1838–1839; the Grey journals and letters, ed. W. G. Ormsby (Toronto, 1964), 176. Lower Canada, House of Assembly, Journals, 1824–37. "Les Patriotes aux Bermudes en 1838 – lettres d'exil," Yvon Thériault, édit., RHAF, XVII (1963–64), 107–12. "Les patriotes de 1837–1838 d'après les documents J.-J. Girouard," P.-A. Linteau, édit., RHAF, XXI (1967–68), 310. News (Kingston), 22–24 April 1873. Life and letters of John Arthur Roebuck . . ., ed. R. E. Leader (London and New York, 1897), 8–17. F.-J. Audet, "Les députés de la vallée de l'Ottawa: John Simpson (1788–1873)," CHA Report, 1936, 32–39.

SIMPSON, JOHN, businessman, politician, and public servant; b. 27 Dec. 1807, at Helmsley, Yorkshire, Eng.; d. 19 Sept. 1878, at Ottawa, Ont., and buried at Niagara.

John Simpson was a linen draper in London, England, before moving to Niagara, Upper Canada, in 1835, and setting up as a bookseller and stationer. In September 1837 he began publishing the Niagara Chronicle in partnership with George Menzies*, and became its sole owner in 1839. In January 1837 he had edited a volume of poems, tales, and essays by local authors, and from 1843 to 1849 he published, in some years associated with Hugh Scobie*, annual editions of The Canadian mercantile almanack. He continued to centre his interests in the paper, its press, and associated bookstore until he disposed of the whole undertaking in 1852. Simpson married a local lady, Miss Baker, on 12 May 1841 in St Mark's Church.

Simpson had shifted and enlarged his business interests in the late 1840s. The subscription list of the newly launched Niagara District Bank was located in the Chronicle office in 1845. In the following years he subscribed to the stock of the Erie and Ontario Insurance Company and a proposed Niagara Boot and Shoe Manufacturing Company. In addition, he was secretary of the Niagara and Ten Mile Creek Plank Road Company, the Niagara Permanent Building Society, the Niagara District Building Society, and the Erie and Ontario Railroad Company. Niagara's economy was declining under competition from neighbouring towns, however, and Simpson was content to be sustained by the collectorship of customs at Niagara in the years 1855–57. Early in 1857 he was projecting a large woollen mill.

Simpson's political apprenticeship began in 1846–47 when he was president of the Niagara board of police. In 1848 he was elected to the Lincoln district council and in 1851 to the town council of Niagara. He served as mayor of Niagara for four years beginning in 1852. He then entered provincial politics. In recent parliaments Niagara had been represented by the moderate Reformers Francis Hincks* and Joseph Curran Morrison*. Simpson was returned in 1857 as a Conservative, defeating Charles Curry. He was successful in the two following general elections, defeating T. McMicking in 1861 and Henry John Boulton* in 1863. A man of proven competence and party loyalty, Simpson was appointed provincial secretary in the Étienne-Paschal Taché*–John A. Macdonald* government on 30 March 1864, and continued in the cabinet until the formation of the "Great Coalition" in 1864. He then resigned on 29 June to make way for three Grit ministers, including George Brown, to enter the cabinet. In compensation he was appointed deputy auditor general, an office he continued to hold until his death at Ottawa in 1878.

In his years at Niagara Simpson was a close associate of William Kirby* who was his election agent. A requisition to him, requesting that he stand for nomination in 1857, held 206 signatures, a veritable directory of the business community and the social register of Niagara. Throughout his career he was a member of the Church of England, and he was active in Christ Church in Ottawa.

Paul Cornell

John Simpson was the editor of The Canadian forget me not for MDCCCXXXVII . . . (Niagara, Ont., [1837]), and publisher of The Canadian mercantile almanack . . . (Niagara, Ont., and Toronto), 1843–49.

Niagara Chronicle, 1838–52. Niagara Mail (Niagara; St Catharines), 1847–64. Ottawa Citizen, 20 Sept. 1878. Dom. ann. reg., 1878. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 693. L. A. Pierce, William Kirby, the portrait of a Tory loyalist (Toronto, 1929).

SINCENNES (Saincennes), JACQUES-FÉLIX, shipowner, businessman, and politician; b. in Deschambault, Hampshire County (Portneuf), L.C., 7 Jan. 1818, son of Jacques Saincennes, a farmer and pilot, and Marie-Josephte Marcotte; d. at Montreal, Que., 20 Feb. 1876.

The Saint-Seine family were Acadians, who had originally come from the village of Bourguignon, near the source of the Seine in France. At the time of the expulsion of the Acadians, they settled on the north shore of the St Lawrence, and the name became first Saincennes and then Sincennes, which is the form Jacques-Félix used. At the age of 13, after six years at school, he was apprenticed to his father as a pilot and for two years plied the St Lawrence between Quebec and Montreal. He then returned to school to finish his education and was thereafter employed as a clerk in a commercial house, before he obtained the post of purser in 1839 on a Montreal-Laprairie steamer.

Sincennes soon realized that one of the great needs of the region was a steamship service on the Richelieu River to carry produce from Chambly to William-Henry (Sorel) and on to Montreal: a 90-mile route in all. In 1845 he held a series of meetings of the Richelieu habitants, at such centres as Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu, at which subscriptions were raised to the value of £3,715; this amount was used to build the side-wheeler Richelieu (the first ship built at the Sorel shipyards) and the barge Sincennes. The new company was called "La Société de Navigation de la Rivière Richelieu." Sincennes became the captain, in which capacity he not only transported produce, but soon performed the apparently impossible task of moving square timber from William-Henry to Chambly.

Almost immediately a rival line was formed and the first of many amalgamations took place, resulting in the Richelieu Company (La Compagnie du Richelieu), which was incorporated by statute in 1848. The founders and stockholders were all French and French was the language in which the entire business of the company was conducted until 1875. By 1848 operations had so expanded that Sincennes gave up the captaincy to conduct the shore business; he was secretary-treasurer of the company for many years, president for a decade, and a director until his death. His policy was one of continued expansion and, when competition broke out, amalgamation with his rivals. In 1856 the company launched the Victoria and the Napoléon and entered the hotly contested Montreal-Quebec run in rivalry with the Molson, Torrance, and Tate interests [see TORRANCE]. At the same time it took over the fleet of the Montreal and Three Rivers Navigation Company. In 1857 the Richelieu Company was capitalized by statute at £75,000 and in that year it paid a 32 per cent dividend. The next year the Torrance interests were incorporated into the company and David Torrance became a director, thus ending the competition.

In 1860 the expanded organization made a profit-pooling agreement with the Toronto-Montreal Royal Mail Line to prevent competition. The St Lawrence North Shore Navigation Company was taken over in that same year and the Lake St Peter Navigation Company and the Terrebonne and L'Assomption Navigation Company in 1861. By this time "in many cases the season's operations resulted in gross earnings greater than the total capital of the company," which by 1861 was $161,733. In 1862 the charter of the Richelieu Company was extended to permit operations throughout the St Lawrence and the Great Lakes. The final amalgamation with which Sincennes was involved came in 1875, after a period of rivalry, when the Richelieu Company joined with the Canadian Navigation Company (formerly the Royal Mail Line) of Sir Hugh Allan* to found the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company (from 1913 Canada Steamship Lines), which operated a total of 18 ships on the Great Lakes and St Lawrence and had a paid up capital of $750,000. Sincennes remained a director of the new corporation.

While establishing the Richelieu Company, Sincennes was also involved with another important shipping operation. In 1849 he and William McNaughton, whose interests lay in Ottawa valley lumber and forwarding, formed a partnership, the Sincennes-McNaughton Line (today McAllister Towing Limited). With headquarters at Sorel and Montreal, this company specialized in towing and berthing ships, as well as towing timber rafts and lumber barges on the Ottawa, Richelieu, and St Lawrence rivers, as far east as Quebec. The tugs used were of the side-wheel type. Sincennes was the president in what must have been an amiable relationship, for he and McNaughton were also engaged in various other partnerships such as the Montreal and Ottawa Forwarding Company, formed in 1865.

Sincennes took part in many other commercial and financial enterprises: in 1873, with McNaughton and others, he founded the Royal Canadian Insurance Company of Montreal and at the end of its first year became president. By 1875 the company had 300 agencies in Canada and the United States. He was, in addition, vice-president of La Banque du Peuple and was involved with companies manufacturing cotton and india-rubber goods.

In 1853 he was appointed a magistrate of the Montreal district and in 1857 made a brief entry into politics, running as a Ministerialist (Conservative) for the County of Richelieu, in which he had his residence, at Sorel. On December 28–29 by 1,204 votes to 1,169 he defeated the sitting member, Jean-Baptiste Guévremont, who appealed unsuccessfully. Sincennes, however, did not run in the next election, in July 1861.

He married twice: first, Clotilde-Héloise Douaire Bondy, by whom he had a son and three daughters; the second time, in 1866, Delphine-Denise Perrault, widow of lawyer Victor-Henri Bourgeau. There were no children by the second marriage. A man of medium stature, and faultless dress, Sincennes was noted in Montreal for the regularity of his habits. When asked what he took as his motto he replied: Esse potius quam videri: to be rather than to seem. Although he lived in Sorel for much of his life, and was also a magistrate of this district, he spent his last years at Montreal, where his funeral service at Saint-Jacques-le-Majeur was conducted by Bishop Édouard-Charles Fabre*.

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

AJM, Registre d'état civil. AJQ, Registre d'état civil. PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 28, pp.107–8; RG 68, 240, p.49; Liber 21, p.171. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1858; Statutes, 1857, c.170; 1862, c.69. Canada, Statutes, 1873, c.99. Andrew Merrilees, "A history of the Sincennes-McNaughton Line" (typescript, property of McAllister Towing Ltd, Montreal). Montreal Gazette, 2 Jan. 1858, 12 July 1861, 15 Feb. 1862, 21 Feb. 1876. Le Nouveau Monde (Montréal), 21 févr. 1876. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 25 avril 1875, 2 mars 1876. Pilot and Journal of Commerce (Montreal), 5 Jan. 1858. The Mercantile Agency reference book (and key) for the dominion of Canada . . . Jan., 1876 (Montreal, 1876), 319, 511.

Atherton, Montreal, II 168, 531, 574, 577. Azarie Couillard-Després, Histoire de Sorel de ses origines à nos jours (Montréal, 1926), 281, 297–98, 308–12. James Croil, Steam navigation in Canada and its relation to the commerce of Canada and the United States (Toronto, 1898), 314–15. M. J. Patton, "Shipping and canals," Canada and its provinces (Shortt and Doughty), X, 539, 541–42, 551. L. C. Tombs, National problems of Canada; the port of Montreal (McGill University Economic Studies, 6, Toronto, 1926), 43. Turcotte, Canada sous l'Union, II, 384. Wood, All afloat, 148–50. R. W. Shepherd, "The Richelieu and Ontario fleet," Detroit Marine Historian, VIII (March–June 1955).

SITTING ON AN EAGLE TAIL. See SOTAI-NA

SMALLWOOD, CHARLES, physician, professor of meteorology, and founder of McGill Observatory at Montreal; b. 1812 in Birmingham, Eng.; d. 22 Dec. 1873 in Montreal, Que.

Charles Smallwood arrived in Canada in 1833, with an MD from University College, London, and for at least two years lived at Huntingdon, Lower Canada. There he kept a weather notebook. He was licensed to practise medicine in Lower Canada on 16 July 1834. Sometime between late 1835 and early 1841 he established a residence and presumably a medical practice at Saint-Martin (Isle-Jésus), nine miles west of Montreal.

For the years until 1856 information about Smallwood is meagre. However, a paper published by Smallwood in 1858 describes, as it was then, the weather observatory he had established at Saint-Martin in 1841, and had developed since that time. It was a small wooden building, within 20 yards of his house, with instruments inside, outside, and on an array of wooden masts. Regular instruments included barometers, thermometers, hygrometers, an anemometer, and rain and snow gauges. He took readings of these and recorded observations of the state of the sky three times daily, along with notes on natural events such as bird migrations. He built ingenious autographic recorders, some of them photographic. Dew and evaporation were measured. Ozone, measured by chemically prepared paper, was studied intensively. A copper lantern, hoisted to the top of an 80-foot mast, was connected to electroscopes and electrometers, to measure atmospheric electricity. Snow crystals were examined by microscope and by photography. With a 7-inch telescope he took astronomical observations on all favourable nights. For time-keeping, a transit telescope looked out through an opening along the ridge of the roof, and the observatory was connected by the Montreal telegraph with major cities in the United States.

After 1856 information about Smallwood's activities suddenly becomes plentiful. In that year a committee of the Montreal Natural History Society visited his observatory and subsequently forwarded a petition to parliament urging assistance for publication of his records for the preceding 15 years. When the American Association for the Advancement of Science met in Montreal in 1857, Smallwood gave the opening remarks and they are those of someone who is clearly an established member of the Montreal scientific community.

He had been elected an honorary member of the Montreal Natural History Society in 1856, and was president in 1865. His papers were usually presented to that society. Six papers and four annual weather reviews appeared in the Canadian Naturalist (conducted by a committee of the society) in 1857–60, nine papers and seven weather reviews in 1866–72. Perhaps his most important paper, "On some of the forms of snow crystals and the different electrical states of the atmosphere during their formation," appeared in the annual report of the society for 1855–56. The topic to which he gave most attention was ozone, especially its relation to relative humidity rather than to atmospheric electricity. Smallwood's scientific activities also brought him in 1856 an LLD from McGill University and he was appointed professor of meteorology, without salary. (A further degree of DCL was granted by the University of Bishop's College in 1864.)

In 1863 all the apparatus of Smallwood's observatory was moved from the frame building at Saint-Martin to a stone structure built for the purpose in the McGill University grounds. The Montreal Observatory, as the establishment was renamed (later McGill College Observatory, then the McGill Observatory), remained in this building until it was demolished in 1962, and continues now in the Macdonald Physics Building. (Dr Smallwood had moved his own residence and practice, probably in 1863 but surely by 1868, to Montreal.) Magnetic-field observations were added by the observatory. The astronomical time-keeping was made available to the community; it was only succeeded as a national time service by the Dominion Observatory at Ottawa in the 1920s, and like the weather recording its time-keeping has continued to this day.

For almost six years, commencing in January 1857 and terminating with Dr Smallwood's removal to Montreal, the Canadian Naturalist published monthly tabulations of the Saint-Martin observations. It published others for the McGill Observatory, but only for ten months of 1864. These "abstracts" are the only detailed record of Dr Smallwood's observations, apart from record books at the McGill Observatory for 1860–62 (Saint-Martin) and 1868–72 (McGill).

Dr Smallwood had had various grants for his meteorological work but had canvassed over some 15 years for comprehensive government support for the observatory. It was finally obtained in 1871, jointly from the Signal Office of the United States War Department and the Canadian Ministry of Marine and Fisheries. The observatory became the Montreal station in the network reporting observations directly by telegraph to Toronto for use in national weather forecasting by the Meteorological Service of Canada, established in 1871.

Also in the spring of 1871, Bishop's College created in Montreal a medical faculty, toward which Dr Smallwood had been a prime mover. On 19 March he became professor of midwifery and diseases of women and children; next day the new faculty met and elected him their dean. In late May, however, he finally received word of government support for the observatory and resigned his medical positions; on 12 June the medical faculty met, but failed to dissuade him.

Just two years later, in December 1873, Dr Smallwood died after a brief illness, and was buried on Christmas Eve. He was succeeded at the observatory by his assistant, Clement Henry McLeod*.

Smallwood was a member of four foreign scientific societies: La Société Météorologique de France, the Pulkova astronomical observatory, Académie Royale de Belgique, the National Institute of the United States, and the Academy of Natural Sciences (Philadelphia). He was a governor of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Lower Canada (founded 1847) from 1851 until at least 1865. His achievements as meteorologist become more striking when they are recognized as being an avocation, carried out while he was practising medicine, with sufficient competence to be offered a medical professorship

J. S. Marshall

Charles Smallwood's research and studies have been published by the Natural History Society of Montreal in: Canadian Naturalist and Geologist (Montreal), II (1857), 321–35; III (1858), 110–15, 352–61, 444–49; IV (1859), 81–84, 169–72, 276–80, 343–45, 383–87, 408–10; new ser., III (1868), 125–34; Canadian Naturalist and Quarterly Journal of Science (Montreal), new ser., IV (1869), 62–64, 112–18, 183–87, 249–56; new ser. V (1870), 10–13, 22–23; new ser., VI (1872), 334–39.

PAC, RG 1, E1, 82, p.497; RG 4, C1, 247, no.549; 393, no.149; 408, no.627; 494, no.478; 511, no.717; 512, no.805; 522, no.2231; 570, no.138; 588, no.272; 760, no.2989; 768, no.1351; 794, no.191; 796, no.58; 798, no.232; RG 19, D4a, 4, 16 March 1861. McGill Observatory (Montreal), Charles Smallwood's record book, Montreal Observatory, 1868–72; Charles Smallwood's record book, Saint-Martin, 1860–62. Natural History Society of Montreal, Annual Reports, 1854–81.

SMART, WILLIAM, Presbyterian minister; b. 14 Sept. 1788 at Haddington, East Lothian, Scotland, son of Alexander and Margaret Smart; m. first, Phylina Foote, 7 Nov. 1816, by whom he had a son, William (judge of Hastings County, Canada West, from 1850 to 1865), and secondly, Sarah Mallory, in 1862; d. 9 Sept. 1876 at Gananoque, Ont.

William Smart's parents moved to London, England, when he was an infant. They attended Wells Street secession church whose minister, the Reverend Alexander Waugh, became William's mentor. As a boy, William was delicate and precociously religious. He "gave himself to the Church" at 17, taught in Sabbath school, and preached at mission stations before enrolling in the London Missionary Society Seminary at Gosport, Hampshire, England. He was ordained in the Scots Church, Swallow Street, London, in April 1811.

Smart had "thought of Calcutta or some part of the East Indies" for his ministry but when a request for a missionary came from the Presbyterians of Elizabethtown, Yonge, and Augusta (three townships along the St Lawrence in Upper Canada), the interdenominational London Missionary Society recommended him.

William was welcomed in Montreal by the Reverend Robert Easton and proceeded to Elizabethtown (Brockville) in October 1811. Within a week he organized a Sunday school, the first in Upper Canada. Until the Reverend Robert Boyd came to Prescott in 1820, Smart preached for congregations scattered from Gananoque on the west to near Cornwall on the east, and north to the Rideau River and Lakes. He preached at military posts during the War of 1812, and afterwards at the new settlement of Perth until the Reverend William Bell* arrived in 1817. Because of Smart's efforts, the First Presbyterian Church in Brockville was built in 1817; when the church burned in 1847, Smart raised funds for rebuilding.

In 1818, William Smart helped to found the Presbytery of the Canadas, a union of secessionist churches free of Scottish control. This became the United Presbytery of Upper Canada in 1829, with Smart as first moderator, and the United Synod of Upper Canada in 1831. To strengthen its claim for financial support from the government, which endowed only the Church of England and the Church of Scotland in Canada, Smart promoted the union of 1840 between the United Synod and the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. However Smart (along with Boyd) withdrew in 1844 saying "the Union was one rather of form than of affection." His action displeased his congregation and he resigned from the Brockville church in 1849. For many years he did supply preaching for congregations in Leeds and Grenville counties and in Kingston.

Smart opposed the monopoly of the Church of England in clergy reserves and its control over the district schools. He believed that education should be equally available and he worked through his presbytery and synod toward these ends. Similarly, he promoted the establishment of a theological seminary to train Presbyterian ministers, but when this project failed he supported Queen's College at Kingston.

As a secessionist Presbyterian, Smart could not legally (until 1831) perform marriages. He persisted in doing so and in 1824 a charge was brought against him, but the jury returned "No bill." Smart joined the freemasons in 1820, a step which threatened to disrupt his congregation. He was grand chaplain, Provincial Grand Lodge, in 1822, 1823, and 1825. He was an early advocate of temperance and helped organize the Brockville Temperance Society in 1832.

William Smart expressed his views on the church, education, and other matters in contributions to the Brockville Recorder in the 1820s and 1830s, writing as "The Wanderer," "The Traveller, or Pickings by the Wayside," and "Presbuteros." He also wrote in the Canadian Watchman, a religious weekly, and he and the Reverend Robert McDowall* founded the Evangelical Herald, a short-lived periodical published in Kingston. Towards the end of his life, Smart wrote an autobiography in the third person but it was never published. He was a man of independent mind, courageous, compassionate, and visionary.

RUTH MCKENZIE

The most important source is William Smart's autobiography at UCA: "Biography of Rev. Wm. Smart, Presbyterian Church, Brockville, 1811–49." Knox College Archives, William Morris to Smart, 24 June 1840; William Rintoul to Smart, 4 Aug. 1831, 17 Nov. 1832. Methodist Missionary Society (London), correspondence, continent of America, letters written by Smart, 1811–20. UCA, William Smart, presbytery correspondence, 1819–56.

Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, Synod, Acts and Proceedings (Montreal, Toronto), 1831–44. United Presbytery of Upper Canada, Minutes, 1829–31. United Synod of Upper Canada, Minutes, 1832–38. William Bell, Hints to emigrants, in a series of letters from Upper Canada (Edinburgh, 1824), 90–93, 99–101, 117–18. Brockville Recorder, 1821–55, espcially 1821–32. Canadian Watchman (Kingston), 1831–32. Gregg, History of the Presbyterian Church. Ruth McKenzie, Leeds and Grenville, their first two hundred years (Toronto, Montreal, 1967), 72, 82–84, 89. J. R. Robertson, The history of freemasonry in Canada from its introduction in 1749 ... (2v., Toronto, 1899). Isabel Skelton, A man austere, William Bell, parson and pioneer (Toronto, 1947), 19–21, 104–10, 169, 178–228, 314–15. N. G. Smith et al., A short history of the Presbyterian Church in Canada (Toronto, [1967]). H. S. Seaman, "The Rev. William Smart, Presbyterian minister of Elizabethtown, 1811–1876," Ont. Hist., V (1904), 178–86.

SMITH, WILLIAM HENRY, surgeon, dentist, and author; fl. 1843–73.

William Henry Smith was probably born in England, most likely not before 1800, judging from the vigour of his activities in the 1840s. His parents have not been identified. Smith's writings show him as a man of education, remarkable energy and patience, and occasionally of humour. He studied surgery in London under Sir David Barry and was a pupil of G. J. Guthrie, president of the Royal College of Surgeons, who had earlier spent five years in Canada. There is, however, no evidence that Smith ever qualified as FRCS. He became surgeon to the emigrant ship Amazon and, perhaps in this capacity, emigrated to Canada. From the title-page and dedication date of his Gazetteer, we know that he had arrived in Canada West by 1843.

Smith travelled through all the settled parts of the upper province collecting data and walking more than 3,000 miles in all weathers. The result was his first known work, Smith's Canadian gazetteer, published in Toronto for the author in 1846; it was compiled expressly to dispel ignorance and misinformation regarding Canada, particularly in Britain and amongst immigrants, and to encourage settlement. It comprises articles on districts, counties, townships, and communities in alphabetical arrangement, and includes tables (original data recorded nowhere else), six plates, and a folded map. Three new issues or variant states of the book appeared before 1849, when it was reissued with a new title-page and the names of London booksellers added to the imprint.

Smith was referring to Canada as his adopted country by the end of the 1840s, and he is listed in a Toronto directory for 1850–51 as "surgeon dentist." He appears to have settled in Toronto with his family for in his next work, of 1851, he lists a Mrs and Miss Smith as conducting a ladies' seminary at his own address.

Encouraged by the success of his Gazetteer, and with the desire further to promote settlement, Smith compiled his Canada: past, present and future. It was copyrighted in 1851, but publication in ten subscription parts extended into 1852. The 1,200 pages and 11 maps to be bound into two volumes are a monument of industry, for Smith had distributed thousands of prospectuses requesting information, endured long journeys to gather data, and spent years of "exertion of body and mind" to complete the work. Detailed descriptions of each county in Canada West are given, going from west to east, with commercial tables and notes on townships and settlements. An invaluable business and professional directory is added, and each volume has a geographical index. The work was acclaimed in the press of both the Canadas. Another issue bound in two volumes appeared in 1852, and a third later with additional plates.

Smith drops from sight in 1852, when the final parts of his Canada were issued, until 1873 when he published in Montreal his last known work, Smith's family physician. Its long title-page records the details of his professional training and position as a ship's surgeon. After this time our knowledge of him ceases.

Smith's Gazetteer, though not the first in Canada West as he claimed, and his Canada, are indispensable references for the period, and are still widely quoted.

WILLIAM F. E. MORLEY

W. H. Smith, Canada: past, present and future, being a historical, geographical, geological and statistical account of Canada West (2v., Toronto, [1851–52]); Smith's Canadian gazetteer; comprising statistical and general information respecting all parts of the upper province, or Canada West . . . (Toronto, 1846); Smith's family physician: comprising the nature, causes, symptoms and treatment of diseases . . . (Montreal, 1873). Rowsell's city of Toronto and county of York directory, for 1850–1 . . . ed. J. Armstrong (Toronto, 1850).

SOTAI-NA (Sotenah; called Rainy Chief), a leading chieftain and warrior of the Blood tribe of the Blackfoot nation; b.c. 1809, a member of the Mamyowi (Fish Eaters) band, probably in what is now southern Alberta; d. 1878 in the same area.

As a young man Sotai-na was known as Makoyi-ksiksinum (White Wolf), a name he received after a battle in which he killed a Crow Indian of that name. In this fight, Rainy Chief deliberately exposed himself to danger and, with a fellow chief, Peenaquim (Seen from Afar), held off an enemy war party until his own followers could escape. Later Sotai-na became leader of a small family group of Bloods which eventually was recognized as a band in its own right. It was named Isiso-kaas (usually translated Hair Shirts but sometimes Robe Shirts or Robes with Hair on Outside) after a member of the band who wore a shirt made from the skin of a buffalo calf from which the hair had not been removed.

Sotai-na was also called Sowatsi-tapitowpi (Sitting on an Eagle Tail) and was identified under this name by James Doty who met him in 1855. Doty was searching for Blackfoot Indians, who normally hunted or traded on American territory, to sign a treaty with the American government. He described the chief as "a good friend to the Whites" but "himself and people were very poor." The chief usually traded at Hudson's Bay Company establishments and so did not become a party to the American treaty. At this time, Rainy Chief's following consisted of only 18 lodges; by 1870 this number had increased to 29 lodges and 348 people. Sotai-na's band was always poor, perhaps because he was on good terms with everyone and did not encourage the theft of horses, a source of wealth, from enemy tribes.

In spite of the fact that he was recognized as a medicine man, Rainy Chief was one of the few leaders of the Blackfoot nation to accept Christianity during the nomadic era. Most chiefs were hostile to missionary endeavours, but Rainy Chief became a friend of the Oblate father Albert Lacombe* (they first met around 1865) and believed he inherited supernatural powers from the priest. The chief permitted three of his grandchildren to be baptized by Oblate priests in 1873–74 and allowed Father Constantin Scollen* to labour in his camp during the winter of 1876–77. Scollen observed that the chief was an "old man who . . . did not leave me during a month of travels; his faith and simplicity were truly touching!" At a time when the Blackfoot tribes were feared and distrusted by traders and missionaries, Rainy Chief maintained his friendship with the white people.

When the bands gathered to sign Treaty No. 7 with the Canadian government in 1877, Rainy Chief, whose winter camp was now usually near the Red Deer River, was recognized by officials as the leader of all bands which camped in the northern part of the Bloods' hunting grounds. Only two head chiefs were selected from the Blood tribe, the young and dynamic Mekaisto (Red Crow) for the south, and the older patriarch Rainy Chief for the north. The latter was chosen not only for his friendly attitude towards the whites, but also because of the strength of his position within the tribe. By signing Treaty No. 7, these Indians conceded their right to hunt in most of present-day southern Alberta. Rainy Chief was among the first of the chiefs to sign but died before his people were settled upon the reserves it provided.

Sotai-na was probably buried on a high hill or in a scaffold on a tree, the usual Blackfoot custom. He had four children; his youngest son Apawakaasi (White Antelope) became a minor chief of the band but was never as important as his father.

HUGH A. DEMPSEY

H. A. Dempsey, "Blood Indian bands; their identification and history," 1955, and "Interviews with Charlie Pantherbone, 1954–1955" (unpublished MSS in author's possession).

National Archives (Washington), Census of the Blackfeet Indians, Alfred Sully to E. S. Parker, 16 July 1870; H. A. Dempsey, "A visit to the Blackfoot camps by James Doty," Alberta Hist. Rev., XIV, no.3 (1966), 24–25; Morris, Treaties of Canada with the Indians, 245–75, 368–75; "Rapport de Constantin Scollen à Mgr Vital Grandin, 15 Sept. 1874," Missions des O.M.I., XIV, 35; this report has been translated and edited by Hugh A. Dempsey in "Early Alberta teacher here before Mounties," Calgary Herald, 1 Sept. 1955.

SOULERIN, JEAN-MATHIEU, priest, Basilian, superior of St Michael's College in Toronto, and superior general of the Basilian fathers; b. 6 June 1807 at Ailhon (department of Ardèche, France), son of Mathieu Soulerin and Marie Pigeyre; d. 17 Oct. 1879 in Annonay, France.

Jean-Mathieu Soulerin studied at the college of Annonay and entered the Basilian order in 1830. After his ordination on 20 Dec. 1834, he taught at the college of Feyzin, near Lyons, until 1842, when he became director of studies at the college of Annonay. He also studied in Paris in 1836 and 1837, and later had the benefit of summer travel in Italy, Belgium, and England.

On 15 Sept. 1852, shortly after his arrival in Canada, Soulerin and four other Basilians, two priests and two not yet ordained, opened St Mary's Lesser Seminary in Toronto at the request of Bishop Armand de Charbonnel*. In the same year, the Christian Brothers had founded another school, St Michael's College, for students at the secondary level. The bishop merged the two schools in 1853 and named Soulerin the superior of the new college.

The opportunity to attend an educational institution presided over by members of their own faith was welcomed by Roman Catholics. Almost 50 students were attending the college in its second year but a lack of funds and the bishop's dislike of having the community engaged almost exclusively in teaching hampered efforts to expand beyond the bishop's palace where it was located. However, in 1856 Soulerin succeeded in establishing the new St Michael's College on property donated in part by John Elmsley* near the University of Toronto, the site it still occupies. That same year, Soulerin's foresight led him to open St Basil's Novitiate to prepare Canadians for membership in the Basilian community.

Father Soulerin was of less than average height, shy in disposition, and strong of will. His administrative abilities were soon recognized; he was a shrewd adviser, practical in business matters, sensitive to changing conditions, and gifted in appraising men and their actions. In Toronto, he served as vicar general under Charbonnel and his successor, John Joseph Lynch*, and twice, during the absence of the former, he was administrator of the diocese, once for a period of about two years. Soulerin also assisted in the work of the diocese by caring for a parish in Weston after 1852 and by building St Basil's Church in Toronto in 1856. His appreciation of needs outside Toronto led him to send a Basilian priest to Assumption College at Windsor in 1857, and in 1863 he took over St Mary's parish and its missions in Owen Sound. He was consulted by the bishop of Hamilton, John FARRELL, and the bishop of Ottawa, J.-B. GUIGUES, and in 1857 the bishop of London, Adolphe Pinsonnault*, appointed him a vicar general. After his return to France he held this same office in his native diocese of Viviers.

Father Soulerin was elected fourth superior general of the Basilian fathers for life on 19 Jan. 1865 and returned to France in June of that year. During his years as the head of the community the work of the Basilians reached a peak in France and their order grew rapidly in America.

ROBERT J. SCOLLARD

[Jean-Mathieu Soulerin described the prospects of the Roman Catholic Church in Ontario in "Missions du Canada," Annales de la propagation de la foi (Lyon), XXVIII (avril 1856), 308–19. He also published Constitutions de la congrégation de Saint-Basile (Lyon, 1878). Father Soulerin's letters are in the archives of the Congregation of Priests of St Basil in Toronto and in Annonay, France. In Toronto, the archives are located at the residence of the superior general and Soulerin's letters are placed in chronological order under the institutions he was concerned with. In Annonay, the archives are located at the Institution secondaire du Sacré-Cœur and there are letters of Soulerin in four collections: C, Documents de la période 1839–1859 (Tourvieille); D, Documents Actorie (1859–64); E, Documents de la période 1865–1879 (Soulerin); S, Rapports avec le Canada. R.J.S.]

R. J. Scollard, Dictionary of Basilian biography, lives of members of the Congregation of Priests of Saint Basil from its beginnings in 1822 to 1968 (Toronto, 1969), 148–50. Adrien Chomel, Le collège d'Annonay, 1800–1880, mémoires et souvenirs (Annonay, 1902), 184, 483–504, 511, 516–17. Charles Roume, Origines et formation de la communauté des prêtres de Saint-Basile, contribution à l'histoire religieuse du Vivarais (Privas, 1965), 239, 245, 273, 313, 329–40, 347, 387–88. Francis Boland, "Father Soulerin, C.S.B., founder and administrator," CCHA Report, 1956, 13–27. L. K. Shook, "The coming of the Basilians to Assumption College, early expansion of St Michael's College," CCHA Report, 1951, 59–73; "St Michael's College, the formative years, 1850–1853," CCHA Report, 1950, 37–52.

SOWATSI-TAPITOWPI. See SOTAI-NA

SPENCER, AUBREY GEORGE, Church of England clergyman, missionary, and bishop; b. 12 Feb. 1795 in London, Eng., a great-great-grandson of John Churchill, 1st Duke of Marlborough, and the eldest son of the Honourable William Spencer and Susan Jennison, Countess of the Holy Roman Empire; d. 24 Feb. 1872 at Torquay, Devon, Eng.

Aubrey George Spencer was educated at St Albans Abbey School, at Dr Charles Burney's private school in Greenwich, and at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. He was ordained deacon in Norwich Cathedral on 24 May 1818 by Bishop Henry Bathurst of Norwich, who also raised him to the priesthood on 24 Feb. 1819 at Welbeck Chapel, Middlesex. Spencer served as curate in Prittlewell, Essex, during 1818 and 1819; he then entered the service of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel and was appointed as their missionary at Ferryland, Newfoundland, in 1819. He was transferred to Trinity Bay in 1820. While visiting St John's in 1821, he informed the society that the intense cold was undermining his health and that he wished to return to England for the winter. He further advised the SPG that he had written William Howley, the bishop of London, requesting an appointment to one of five vacant missions in Bermuda.

Late in 1821 Spencer informed the society that he was in Bermuda and would not be returning to Newfoundland. The governor of Bermuda, Sir William Lumley, nominated him rector of Smiths and Hamilton in February 1822 and appointed him to his council. Shortly after, Spencer married Eliza Musson, daughter of a wealthy Bermuda merchant, by whom he had one son and three daughters. In 1825 Bishop John Inglis* of Nova Scotia appointed Spencer archdeacon of Bermuda and rector of Paget and Warwick. In 1827, the same year that he published Sermons on various subjects (London), he was granted a Lambeth DD by Archbishop Charles Manners-Sutton and a DCL by King's College, Windsor, N.S. Bishop Inglis offered him the archdeaconry of Newfoundland late in 1829, but he refused because he felt deeply committed to the spiritual welfare and education of the blacks of Bermuda.

By letters patent from Queen Victoria dated 27 July 1839 Aubrey George Spencer was appointed first bishop of the see of Newfoundland. In Lambeth Palace chapel on 4 August he was consecrated by William Howley, by this time archbishop of Canterbury, Bishops Charles James Blomfield of London, William Otter of Chichester, and John Inglis of Nova Scotia.

When Spencer took up his post in Newfoundland he found that the small number of clergy and the depressed condition of the people had cast a shadow on the growth of the Church of England. However, with the financial help of the SPG, the church progressed steadily under the new bishop's leadership. Missions expanded rapidly and the number of clergy in Newfoundland had risen to 27 by 1842. Spencer divided the diocese into deaneries and, in cooperation with the Newfoundland and British North American School Society – whose work had been opposed by John Inglis for its low church or evangelical leanings – increased the number of church schools. Spencer established a theological training school and in 1841 planned the building of his cathedral in St John's. However his health remained precarious and in 1843 he gladly accepted the bishopric of Jamaica. His successor Edward FEILD inherited a far more progressive see than had existed when Spencer assumed office.

Spencer remained in Jamaica until 1855 when his health broke completely. He thereupon retired to Torquay, Devon, where he lived until his death. During this period he worked on his last publication, A brief account of the Church of England, its faith and worship: as shown by the Book of Common Prayer (London, 1867).

C. E. Thomas

A. G. Spencer, A brief account of the Church of England, its faith and worship: as shown by the Book of Common Prayer (London, 1867); Sermons on various subjects (London, 1827).

USPG, C/CAN/NFL, 4 add., Spencer to the secretary of the SPG, 4 Jan., 22 May, 15 Sept., 5 Dec. 1821; 22 Feb., 2 April 1822; 6 Jan. 1830; Spencer to G. M. Markland, treasurer of the SPG, 3 Dec. 1822, 1 Nov. 1827; C/CAN/NFL, 6 (letters concerning the building of the cathedral in St John's, Nfld.). Times (London), 27 Feb. 1872. Pascoe, Two hundred years of the S.P.G. O. R. Rowley, The Anglican episcopate of Canada and Newfoundland (London and Milwaukee, Wis., 1928). "Aubrey George Spencer, D.D., D.C.L., first bishop of Newfoundland, 1839–1843, second bishop of Jamaica, 1843–1872," Can. Church Hist. Soc. J., X (1968), 186–93 [reprinted from the International Magazine of Literature, Art and Science (New York), II, no.11 (1 Jan. 1851), 157–59].

SPIKE, JAMES, printer and publisher; b. at Halifax, N.S., in 1807 (baptized 10 June), sixth child of Daniel Spike and Grace Cullimore; m. in 1831 to Elizabeth Kerr (widow of his cousin Francis Leston) by whom he had two children, and in 1842 to Mary Elizabeth Metzler by whom he had 12 children; d. 29 March 1879 in Halifax.

James Spike's mother was remotely related to the Howe family and her son seems to have learned the printing trade from them. In 1826 Spike and Joseph Howe, then 22, bought the Weekly Chronicle from William Minns, Howe's step-uncle. They changed the paper's name to the Acadian and General Advertiser and began publication on 5 Jan. 1827. This partnership was Howe's first business venture and is the main reason Spike is remembered. Their newspaper took a moderate, even faintly progressive, stand, and Howe's editorial touch is apparent. At the end of the year Spike bought out, but never paid, his partner, and changed the name of the paper to the Acadian. He was evidently more a printer than a journalist for he announced he had "committed the Editorial part to a gentleman fully competent to the task." The last number of the paper in the Nova Scotia archives is dated 9 May 1834. After Spike and Howe parted, their opinions diverged towards the right and the left. With his "unassuming manners and kindness of heart" Spike seems out of place in the fierce newspaper politics of that day.

On 6 June 1838 James Spike became the first printer and publisher of the Guardian, the unofficial voice of the Kirk of Scotland and also a good general newspaper. Ten years later he ended his newspaper career when the Guardian changed publishers on 30 June 1848.

Spike was appointed city health inspector of Halifax on 16 Oct. 1854 and continued in this office until his death from cancer. In his obituaries he was most remembered for his prominence in the temperance movement.

C. St.C. Stayner

Brunswick Street Church (Halifax), Records. St Luke's Church (Halifax), Records. St Paul's Church (Halifax), Records, 1769, 1787, 1807. Acadian (Halifax), 28 March, 9 May 1834. Acadian and General Advertiser (Halifax), 5, 12 Jan., 28 Dec. 1827. Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 8 July 1826, 9 July 1831, 29 March 1879, 10 March 1919. Guardian (Halifax), 6 June 1838, 30 June 1848. Halifax Daily Reporter and Times, 29 March 1879. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 31 March 1879. Novascotian (Halifax), 13 Sept. 1827. J. A. Roy, Joseph Howe, a study in achievement and frustration (Toronto, 1935). J. J. Stewart, "Early journalism in Nova Scotia," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., VI (1888), 91–122.

STAMP, EDWARD, master mariner and industrialist; b. Alnwick, Northumberland, Eng., 5 Nov. 1814; d. at Turnham Green, Middlesex, 20 Jan. 1872.

Edward Stamp obtained his master's certificate in 1851. In 1854, during the Crimean War, he was captain of the steam transport Emeu and succeeded in bringing her undamaged through the great storm off Balaklava in November of that year, in which 18 ships were lost and 12 others dismasted. He first visited the north Pacific coast in 1857, when the ship he commanded came to Puget Sound to load lumber for Australia. Later he returned to purchase spars, ship-timbers, and lumber for two London firms, Thomas Bilbe and Company and James Thomson and Company. Some of the spars were used to make masts and yards for the steamer Great Eastern. When the Fraser River gold rush began in 1858, Stamp established a commission and importing business in Victoria. He also made "considerable purchases of land in Vancouver Island, Victoria & Langley," not, he explained, as a speculator, but with a view to providing for his sons.

Stamp seems always to have been interested in a variety of enterprises, and in 1859, while in England, he tried to secure a contract for a steamer service between Victoria and San Francisco. When success seemed near he was thwarted by a change of government in Britain which so delayed negotiations that he had to return to Victoria without securing an agreement. While in London, Stamp had formed a syndicate to establish an export lumber mill either on Puget Sound or on Vancouver Island; James Thomson and Company was the major shareholder. This firm later became Anderson, Anderson and Company; in 1859 it was already controlled by the Anderson family, and the mill Stamp built was popularly known as the Anderson mill.

When Stamp returned to Victoria, he opened negotiations with Governor James DOUGLAS and agreed finally to place the mill on the Alberni Canal (now Alberni Inlet), on a site now within the city of Port Alberni. He was granted 2,000 acres for his mill and settlement, as well as timber limits that totalled 15,000 acres. Construction began in the summer of 1860 and the mill was completed in May 1861. The initial export shipment was to Peru. Stamp seems to have been a somewhat difficult character, and he resigned from the management of the mill in January 1863. Its future was then in doubt; in spite of the wealth of timber in the district, much of it was so large that with the equipment then available only trees close to the water could be brought to the mill, and it was running out of logs. It finally ceased operation about the end of 1864, having produced in all about 35,000,000 board feet of lumber.

Stamp now turned for a time to mining and prospecting for copper along Alberni Inlet and on Tzartus and other islands in Barkley Sound; but he soon returned to lumbering. He had a crew cutting spars at Port Neville in 1864, and in 1865, in England, he was instrumental in forming the British Columbia and Vancouver Island Spar, Lumber and Saw Mill Company, with a capital of £100,000, for the purpose of acquiring timber limits and building a sawmill on Burrard Inlet. The first site chosen was in what is now Stanley Park, but the strong currents at that point made it hazardous to dock sailing ships and the mill was actually built farther east, on the south side of the inlet. Its timber limits included many of the fine stands that then occupied the site of the city of Vancouver. When the machinery for the mill was shipped from Glasgow one box was left behind, and as a result operations could not begin until June 1867. In the interval Stamp exported spars. In the next year or two, lumber shipments were made to San Francisco, Mexico, Peru, China, and Australia. All seemed to be going well, but Stamp again had differences with his principals and he ceased to be manager on 2 Jan. 1869. Lawsuits followed and he received a judgement for $14,000. The company itself soon went into liquidation, and in February 1870 the mill was sold for a tithe of its value. Under new ownership it developed into the famous Hastings Mill, and became the nucleus around which the city of Vancouver grew up in the 1880s.

As usual, Stamp had other irons in the fire. In 1866 he had completed an office building in Victoria and he had a ship-chandlery there. He was once again interested in a steamer service to San Francisco and also in the building of a graving-dock; finances for both ventures were promised under the terms of union by which British Columbia entered confederation. In 1871 Stamp leased buildings at New Westminster that had been used formerly by the Royal Engineers and established a fish curing business. Convinced that fish packing had a promising future, he left for England in November to organize a company that would finance salmon packing on a large scale. It was while he was on this mission that he died suddenly of a heart attack.

Stamp served as a member of the Legislative Council of British Columbia in 1867 and 1868 as representative of the Lillooet District, but he does not seem to have taken a very active part in politics. His interests centred upon shipping and manufacturing, and he deserves to rank as British Columbia's first industrialist. The mill at Alberni was the first large export mill in British Columbia and his second mill on Burrard Inlet was for many years the leading industry there.

Stamp was survived by his wife, Maria, and by four sons and a daughter. Several geographical features in the vicinity of Alberni have been named after him, including Stamp Falls Provincial Park which surrounds the falls on the Stamp River.

W. KAYE LAMB

PABC, Edward Stamp correspondence. Somerset House (London), Principal Probate Registry, 1872, will of Edward Stamp. Colonist (Victoria), 1858–72. Times (London), November–December 1854. Walbran, B.C. coast names, 469. F. W. Howay, "Early shipping in Burrard Inlet, 1863–1870," BCHQ, I (1937), 4–20. "Journal of Arthur Thomas Bushby" (Blakey Smith), Biographical appendix, 194. W. K. Lamb, "Early lumbering on Vancouver Island. Part II: 1855–1866," BCHQ, II (1938), 95–121.

STEEVES, WILLIAM HENRY, merchant, lumberman, and politician; b. 20 May 1814 at Hillsborough, Westmorland County (Albert County), N.B., son of Joseph Steeves and Martha Cross, and great-grandson of Heinrich Stief (Henry Steeves) who came to New Brunswick from Germany in 1765; d. 9 Dec. 1873 at Saint John, N.B.

William Henry Steeves attended public school at Hillsborough. His teacher was Duncan Shaw, a native of Scotland, a graduate of the University of Edinburgh, and a prominent early educator in the colony. Steeves always gave the impression that he had much more education than was usually acquired in New Brunswick by persons attending only public school and he attributed this to the teaching of Mr Shaw. He married Mary Steeves, another great-grandchild of Heinrich Stief; they had six children, two sons and four daughters.

Steeves began his business career with a small store and then became a partner of James Abel Steeves and Gilbert Martin Steeves in the firm of Steeves Brothers, a mercantile and lumber export business with headquarters at Hillsborough. He later moved to Saint John where he continued in the lumber export business and became a leader in the financial and commercial activities of the city. His brother Gilbert moved to Liverpool, England, and established a branch office to handle the company's overseas interests.

When Albert County was created in 1846, Steeves was elected as one of its first two representatives in the House of Assembly. He was re-elected at the general election of 1850, but only sat for one session. Steeves favoured reform of the government and in 1851 voted for an unsuccessful bill which would have required that all members of the Legislative Council be elected; he also voted against paying council members.

Steeves was appointed to the Legislative Council in December 1851. In 1852 he was apparently offered the position of surveyor general by the lieutenant governor, Sir Edmund Head*, who wished to appoint to the government someone from Saint John since that city was the headquarters of opposition to his advisers led by Edward Barron Chandler. Steeves declined the office, which finally went to Robert Duncan Wilmot*, also a Saint John critic of the government. In 1854 the compact government was defeated and Charles Fisher headed a new liberal, reform, or "smasher" administration. The governor, John Henry Thomas Manners-Sutton, described this government as "formed on the principle that the direction of public affairs had been too long in the hands of men of property and liberal education." Steeves was again offered the position of surveyor general and this time he accepted. His appointment was opposed by many members of the assembly, who felt that the surveyor general should be selected from among the elected representatives. Accepting this criticism, Steeves resigned on 4 Dec. 1854.

In March 1855 he was appointed the first chairman of the newly created Department of Public Works – a position he held until 30 May 1856. He was then out of office for a short time when the government led by Fisher and Samuel Leonard Tilley* was defeated over the unpopular prohibition act. The "smasher" government was returned to power in 1857, Steeves regained his post as chief commissioner of the Department of Public Works, and kept it until 1861. He was the only member of the Legislative Council ever to hold this office. As minister without portfolio he continued in the Tilley government from 1861 until April 1865, when Tilley and his supporters were defeated over the issue of confederation.

Steeves was an advocate of railway communications and was eager to promote schemes which would benefit Saint John. For this reason he was interested in the Intercolonial Railway and the route it would follow through New Brunswick. He was a member of the delegation sent to Quebec in September 1862 to discuss the proposals of the Duke of Newcastle [Henry Pelham Clinton] for imperial aid in the construction of the Intercolonial.

A supporter of Maritime union and confederation, Steeves was a New Brunswick delegate at the Charlottetown conference in September 1864. He was also a delegate to the Quebec conference in October 1864 when the terms of confederation were discussed. In these meetings he supported Sir Leonard Tilley, but there is no record of his having made any speeches of importance. As a reward for his support of confederation, Steeves was called to the Canadian Senate in July 1867 as one of the original 12 senators for New Brunswick.

In his later years, Steeves became interested in the treatment of the insane. Probably encouraged by his brother, Dr James Thomas Steeves, a prominent Saint John physician who in 1876 succeeded John Waddell as superintendent of the provincial insane asylum at Saint John, he supported reform and improved facilities for this institution. One obituary credits him with part responsibility for legislation providing better treatment for the mentally ill.

Although Steeves' career was not spectacular he served capably in the government of New Brunswick for many years. He consistently advocated reform and his loyal support of Sir Leonard Tilley assisted in the struggle to bring New Brunswick into confederation.

W. A. Spray

N.B. Museum, Hazen papers, draft of a protest regarding the Board of Works under W. H. Steeves; Steeves family, miscellaneous genealogical notes; Tilley family papers, W. H. Steeves to S. L. Tilley, 13 Jan. 1863; Webster coll., W. H. Steeves to A. R. McClelan, 10 Dec. 1852, 2 May 1855. University of New Brunswick, Graves (New Brunswick), mss, Albert County, 32. Daily Telegraph (Saint John, N.B.), 10 Dec. 1873. Morning Freeman (Saint John, N.B.), 11 Dec. 1873. New Brunswick Reporter (Fredericton), 10 Dec. 1873. Fenety, Political notes and observations, 307–38, 405. Can. parl. comp., 1872. E. C. Wright, The Steeves descendants (Wolfville, N.S., [1965]), 667–68. Hannay, History of New Brunswick, II, 170–71, 185, 201, 221, 225. MacNutt, New Brunswick, 353–88. E. C. Wright, Samphire Greens: the story of the Steeves (Kingsport, N.S., [1961]).

STEWART, FRANCES. See BROWNE

STEWART, JOHN, clergyman; b. in Perthshire, Scotland, c. 1800; d. in New Glasgow, N.S., 4 May 1880.

John Stewart was educated at Perth Academy and at the University of Edinburgh where he studied medicine for a short time but finally chose to take a degree in theology. He was licensed by the presbytery of Dunkeld on 26 June 1832, and from 1832 until 1834 taught at St George's Academy, Edinburgh. Under the auspices of the Edinburgh Ladies Association and the Glasgow Colonial Society, he immigrated to Nova Scotia, landing at Plaster Cove, Cape Breton, on 23 Aug. 1834. After a year's missionary work in Cape Breton, he was ordained by the Pictou presbytery of the Church of Scotland on 6 Oct. 1835. Thirteen days later he was inducted into the West Bay charge of Cape Breton.

In the summer of 1836 Stewart returned to Edinburgh to marry Alica Murray Drysdale. The couple left Cape Breton in June 1838 and moved to Fraser's Mountain (New Glasgow) where John Stewart was pastor until his retirement in 1869. Fluent in both English and Gaelic, he continued his missionary travels in Cape Breton and elsewhere, and was often the first missionary to visit a pioneer settlement.

A disciple of Dr Thomas Chalmers, leader of the Free Church movement in Scotland, Stewart opposed state control and patronage in his parishes. In 1844 he worked to free his own congregation, the Pictou presbytery, and the synod of Nova Scotia from the Church of Scotland. In New Glasgow most of his congregation followed him when he left St Andrew's Church and formed John Knox Free Church. As early as 25 Dec. 1839, in a letter to the Halifax Guardian, he advocated the union of all Presbyterian bodies, and continued to support this policy until 1875 when practically every Presbyterian church in Canada was under one organization. Stewart also gave full support to the church's missionary work in the New Hebrides and Trinidad and was the leader of missionary activities in the synod for a number of years.

Perhaps the Reverend John Stewart's greatest contribution was in the field of ministerial training. By 1848, four years after the inception of the Free Church in Nova Scotia, he and several other clergymen had organized the Free Church College in Halifax. The college, giving classes in arts as well as divinity, opened with two professors and 15 students. In 1850 the synod sent Stewart to Britain to obtain funds for the endowment of the college. He travelled and canvassed widely, returning the following year with £1,000 and a valuable library. This divinity school was one of the ancestors of Pine Hill Divinity Hall, the present United Church seminary.

E. ARTHUR BETTS

Free Church of Nova Scotia, Synod, Minutes (Halifax), 1844–60; Minutes of the last session, 1860. Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia, Minutes of the last session (Halifax), 1860. Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces of British North America, Synod, Minutes of the first session (Halifax), 1860; Minutes, 1860–75. Presbyterian Church in Canada, Synod of the Maritime provinces, Minutes (Halifax), 1875–80. Presbyterian Church in Canada, General Assembly, Acts and Proceedings (Toronto), 1880, 61.

Guardian (Halifax), 25 Dec. 1839, 12 May 1841. Presbyterian Record (Halifax), June 1880. Presbyterian Witness (Halifax), 12 July, 4 Oct. 1851; 8, 15 May 1880. The missionary record and ecclesiastical intelligencer for 1851 and 1852 (Halifax, 1852). Gregg, History of the Presbyterian Church, 344–47. John Murray, The history of the Presbyterian Church in Cape Breton (Truro, N.S., 1921), 54–57.

STISTED, Sir HENRY WILLIAM, soldier and administrator; b. 1817 at Saint-Omer, Pas-de-Calais, France, son of Charles Stisted and Eliza Burn; m. in 1845 Maria, daughter of Colonel Joseph Netterville Burton and sister of Sir Richard Francis Burton; d. 10 Dec. 1875 at Upper Norwood, Eng.

Henry William Stisted was born into a military family and was educated at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst. He entered the British army in 1835 as an ensign and advanced rapidly, becoming a lieutenant-colonel in 1850 and a major-general in 1864. He commanded a brigade in the Persian War in 1856–57 (receiving the CB in 1858) and the advance guard at the relief of Lucknow, India, in 1857; he was later stationed on the northwest frontier of India.

Stisted was appointed to serve in Canada in November 1866 and in January 1867 he took over command of the 1st Military District at Toronto in Canada West. As the chief imperial officer in what was to become Ontario, he was appointed provisional lieutenant governor of the new province at confederation in 1867. Although his appointment was hailed with approval in Toronto military and social circles, where he had become popular, the politicians were not impressed and George BROWN considered him "an old fool."

His most important official act was the naming of John Sandfield MACDONALD as premier. Although not in itself necessarily illogical, the choice was dictated to Stisted by Sir John A. Macdonald* in Ottawa with strong support from Senator David Lewis Macpherson*, the Conservative party organizer in Ontario. Macpherson considered Sandfield best able to form a coalition administration friendly to the dominion government. As he had written to Sir John A., he wanted it "first understood with that gentleman [Stisted] who he is to get to join him, letting him understand that if he attempts any tricks he will find his commission withdrawn."

Stisted remained lieutenant governor only until the appointment of William Howland*, in July 1868. He remained in Toronto until June 1869 when he became the commanding officer at Quebec. Shortly thereafter, he returned to England. He was created a KCB in 1871 and promoted lieutenant-general in 1873.

BRUCE W. HODGINS

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), D. L. Macpherson to Macdonald, 3, 7 July 1867. DNB. D. B. Read, The lieutenant-governors of Upper Canada and Ontario, 1792–1899 (Toronto, 1900), 204–6. W. T. Barnard, The Queen's Own Rifles of Canada, 1860–1960: one hundred years of Canada (Don Mills, Ont., 1960), 33. B. W. Hodgins, John Sandfield Macdonald, 1812–1872 (Canadian Biographical Studies, Toronto, 1971).

STREET, THOMAS CLARK (Clarke), lawyer, businessman, and politician; b. probably in 1814, son of Samuel Street* and Abigail Ransome; d. unmarried, 6 Sept. 1872, at Chippawa, Ont.

Thomas Clark Street's father, Samuel, a United Empire Loyalist of English descent, owned, in partnership with Thomas Clark*, several grist and sawmills in the Niagara area. When Clark died in 1837, Street took these over and expanded into textile milling. His son, Thomas Clark, studied law in Toronto under Christopher Hagerman* and William Henry DRAPER, and was called to the bar in 1838. He returned to Chippawa to practise law but became more of a businessman than a lawyer. When his father died in 1844 he inherited "a liberal fortune" which he thereafter managed with considerable success. He later became a director of the Niagara Falls Suspension Bridge Company and when he died he was president of the firm. He also served as president of the Gore Bank from 1862 to 1868 and was a director of the British American Assurance Company, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and the Bank of Upper Canada. He invested in stock, owning shares in a number of financial and transportation companies.

Like many of his business colleagues, Street invested heavily in land and mortgages. Before the secret ballot this form of business involvement was of considerable political utility. As the Niagara Mail in St Catharines commented in 1851 when Street first ran for office, his principal assets were "his money and his mortgages." He was elected to the Legislative Assembly for Welland in 1851 but defeated in an unusually violent contest in 1854. Elected again in 1861, he sat for Welland in the union and later the federal parliaments until his death. Street was a lifelong Conservative. In 1851 he had campaigned as an independent, calling himself a "Constitutional Reformer," but was regarded by Reformers as a Family Compact Tory.

Although his political career was long and seemingly placid and took second place to his business interests, Street was an important politician. Men like Street did not sit in parliament as mindless supporters of a particular leader; he was not dependent on his party for campaign funds, and he needed neither his sessional indemnity nor a patronage post. His own economic interests were pushed, and he often acted with independence and courage. A strong supporter of representation by population, which he advocated not for love of the measure but because of what he feared would happen without it, he refused to enter the cabinet in 1862 when asked by John A. Macdonald* because it had not accepted that policy. He also supported the unpopular bill presented by Richard William Scott* in 1863 regarding separate schools. His weight was recognized by Macdonald, who assured him in 1867 that a place was reserved for him in the Senate: "[As] vacancies will be annually occurring you can, when you are wearied of well doing in the Commons, find your way to the dignified retirement of our House of Peers."

Street was very much an aristocrat, and in 1860 "entertained [the Prince of Wales] on a scale of magnificence seldom equalled in any colony of England." A member of the Church of England, he served as trustee of the University of Trinity College in Toronto. He was a lieutenant-colonel in the Welland militia and a justice of the peace. He died in 1872 in Chippawa shortly after being re-elected to the House of Commons by acclamation. He left an estate valued at between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000, often regarded as the largest in Ontario at that time.

DONALD SWAINSON

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 338, 513. PAO, W. H. Merritt papers; Samuel Street papers. Gazette (Montreal), 1872. Globe (Toronto), 1861–72. Leader (Toronto), 1872. Mail (Toronto), 1872. Niagara Mail, 1851–61. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson). Can. parl. comp., 1872. M. F. Campbell, Niagara: hinge of the golden arc (Toronto, 1958). Cornell, Alignment of political groups. Creighton, Macdonald, young politician. Ross and Trigge, History of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, II. Swainson, "Personnel of politics."

STUTSMAN, ENOS, lawyer, legislator, treasury and land agent; b. 14 Feb. 1826 in what is now Fayette County, Indiana, son of Nicholas Stutsman; d. 24 Jan. 1874 at Pembina, North Dakota.

Enos Stutsman was of German ancestry, his grandfather Jacob having settled in Pennsylvania in 1728. After being educated in what is now Coles County, Illinois, Enos taught school from the age of 17 to 21, then studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1851. In the 1850s he combined a law practice with a real estate business in Des Moines and Sioux City, and was active in politics as a Democrat. He moved to Yankton, Dakota Territory, in 1858 to supervise the laying out of a townsite for the Yankton Land and Town Company. From 1862 until 1873 he was a member of the territorial legislature of Dakota representing the Yankton and later the Pembina district. Stutsman was appointed a United States treasury agent in 1866 and thereafter divided his time between Yankton and Pembina, the latter being the site of the only customs house in Dakota Territory. Four years later he became a government land agent.

During the Red River disturbances of 1869 and 1870 he was one of a group of Americans at Pembina and Fort Garry (Winnipeg) who were actively promoting the annexation of the Red River Settlement to the United States. It has been suggested by Professor W. L. Morton that his intrigues were directed towards obtaining American intervention in the disturbances and the establishment of a military post at Pembina from which he would benefit as a result of his land speculations in the area. Alexander Begg*, the diarist, records his many visits to the Red River Settlement and to Louis Riel* at this time. Along with other Americans he had easy access to Riel during the early days of the disturbances and sought to influence the Métis leader in favour of union with the United States; it seems generally agreed today that, whatever his fears for the rights of his people with the entry of Red River into Canada, Riel never seriously considered annexation. Stutsman was, along with Joseph ROLETTE, one of a group of "correspondents" at Pembina forwarding distorted accounts of the events at Red River in 1869 and 1870 to the St Paul Daily Press, on which Canadian papers relied for their reports about the disturbances.

Stutsman was a curious if not pathetic figure on the Dakota frontier having been born with practically no legs. He used crutches throughout his life but was able apparently to move about the country independently by wagon or on horseback. He died a bachelor and was buried in Sioux City, Iowa.

HARTWELL BOWSFIELD

Begg's Red River journal (Morton). Stanley, Louis Riel. G. W. Kingsbury, "Enos Stutsman," North Dakota State Hist. Soc. Coll., I (1906), 350–54.

SUNDAY, JOHN. See SHAH-WUN-DAIS.

SWABEY, WILLIAM, soldier, civil servant, farmer, and politician; b. 13 June 1789 in England, son of Maurice Swabey and Catherine Bird; m. 4 Aug. 1820 to Mary Ann Hobson by whom he had seven sons and four daughters; d. 6 Feb. 1872 in England.

William Swabey, a native of Buckinghamshire, spent 18 years in the British army. He rose to the rank of captain in the Royal Horse Artillery, and fought at the battle of Copenhagen, in the Iberian peninsula, and at Waterloo. In 1840, several years after his retirement from the army, Swabey and his family immigrated to Prince Edward Island. He took up residence in Charlottetown Royalty, and leased two farms, comprising about 100 acres, which he cultivated with his family's help. He used the most modern farming methods and frequently advertised surpluses of hay, wheat, and turnips.

Immediately upon his arrival in the colony, Swabey began to play an active and visible role in organizations such as the Colonial Church Society and on various committees to promote improvements. In November 1841 he was appointed to the Legislative Council by the lieutenant governor, Sir Henry Vere Huntley*, who was a personal friend. He attended one session the following spring, and then, at the urging of Huntley, resigned to run for a seat in the assembly. He contested Prince County, Second District, as a Tory in the general election of 1842 and lost; two years later, he was reappointed to the Legislative Council, where he remained until his return to England.

Swabey, who had been described at the Colonial Office as "a great Tory," transferred his support to the Reform party in the mid 1840s and went on to establish himself as its leading spokesman in the Legislative Council. This change may have been related to an alteration in the political sympathies of the lieutenant governor. Huntley, who had been called a tyrant for his use of troops to suppress Escheat disorders in 1843 [see John MCDONALD], had broken with the Tories for reasons perhaps more personal than political. Huntley's feud with leading members of the family compact was widely known, and he left the Island as a Reform hero in 1847.

When responsible government was attained in 1851, Swabey joined the Executive Council of George Coles' Liberal government, was appointed registrar of deeds, and later became commissioner of public lands. He held these major positions, and about a dozen smaller ones, for most of the period until the Liberals were defeated in 1859. He was especially vocal on the land question and increasingly advocated a radical approach as gradualist measures failed to abolish leasehold tenure. Swabey's other major interest was education; he served 18 years on the Board of Education, actively promoted the Free Education Act of 1852, and vehemently defended its non-denominational aspect when the Bible question arose [see Coles].

William Swabey was a vigorous Liberal partisan; both his ability and his change in party affiliation made him a controversial figure – a fact amply demonstrated when he returned to England in 1861. The farewell dinner tendered to him as a Liberal, and the salute fired in his honour as a lieutenant-colonel in the militia, caused a series of bitter exchanges in the local press. The verbiage did not explain why Swabey left the Island; it is quite possible that, at the age of 72, he simply wished to retire, and to spend his last years in his native country.

Ian Ross Robertson

[PRO, CO 226/89, 201–16, is particularly important because it includes a letter from William Swabey to Dominick Daly*, 30 June 1858, which gives Swabey's account of the Bible question from 1845 to 1858. See also: CO 226/91, 173–75; 226/92, 11–21; 226/94, 144–51.

Prince Edward Island, Legislative Council, Journals, 1842, 1844–61; Debates, 1856–60. The debates of 1861 were not published in a bound volume; for the 1840s, the early 1850s, and 1861 consult the reports of the debates in the Island newspapers. For reports of the farewell dinner for Swabey see: Examiner (Charlottetown), 18, 25 Nov., 2, 16, 23 Dec. 1861, and Islander (Charlottetown), 22, 29 Nov., 13 Dec. 1861. Also see: Examiner (Charlottetown), 9 Feb. 1857. Island Argus (Charlottetown), 12 March 1872. Monitor (Charlottetown), 26 April 1859. Patriot (Charlottetown), 14 March 1872. Royal Gazette (Charlottetown), 19 April, 10 May, 21 June 1842. Robertson, "Religion, politics, and education in PEI." I. R. R.]

SWEET GRASS. See Wikaskokiseyin

SZALATNAY, MÁRK, trade unionist and revolutionary socialist; b. in Hungary; d. in Los Angeles, U.S.A., 1875.

The son of a Protestant school-teacher, Márk Szalatnay was expelled from the University of Budapest in 1836 for propagating doctrines of the American and French revolutions. Imprisoned for four years, after agitating over grievances of the 1838 Danube River flood victims, he wrote Traditiones communes Hungarorum et populorum Balcanicorum, subsequently published. Szalatnay then studied in the Netherlands at Leiden and Dordrecht but returned to Hungary to support Lajos Kossuth on the outbreak of the 1848 revolution, taking part as a combatant in the defence of Komárom, held by Magyar nationalists. Following the defeat of the revolution he went to England, became associated with the Chartists, and for six years worked as secretary of the South Wales Miners' Union. He took part in numerous strikes, suffered repeated arrests, and campaigned to have the trade union movement endorse the Manifesto of the Communist Party of Marx and Engels. Deported to the United States as an "undesirable alien" in 1855, he worked as a cigar-maker in Baltimore and was active in trade union organization.

An ardent abolitionist, Szalatnay was seriously wounded during a protest action against a pro-slavery demonstration. Disabled, he moved with a group of fellow Hungarian workers to Montreal, where he organized a local of the International Union of Cigar Makers of America in 1865. He organized another local in Toronto in 1869 and here, in 1872, the year of the historic printers' strike and the upsurge of the nine hour day movement, Szalatnay led a strike of the cigar-makers. Arrested, imprisoned for four months, then deported to the United States, he became an organizer for the National Labor Union. During a bitterly fought strike of bakery workers in Los Angeles, in 1875, he was shot and killed by police. The hardships and hazards of his 20 years' stormy sojourn in North America he had shared with Mary Fergusson, a leader of the early feminist movement in the United States.

One of the founders of the Canadian trade union movement, an early proponent of the ideas of revolutionary socialism and international labour solidarity, Márk Szalatnay embodied in his life's work a remarkable combination of militant traditions: those of the Hungarian revolutionary democrats of 1848, of British Chartism, of the American anti-slavery movement, trade unionism, and (through his association with Mary Fergusson) the movement for women's rights. He was the first Marxist of whom there is record in the history of Canadian labour; it has been surmised that Szalatnay may have been instrumental in the publication of an excerpt from Das Kapital (a passage from the chapter on "The working day") in the first issue of the Ontario Workman, 18 April 1872, 14 years before the full work appeared in English.

STANLEY B. RYERSON

Ontario Workman (Toronto), 18 April, 10, 31 Oct. 1872. Charles Lipton, The trade union movement of Canada, 1827–1959 (Montreal, 1966). H. A. Logan, Trade unions in Canada, their development and functioning (Toronto, 1948). S. B. Ryerson, Unequal union; confederation and the roots of conflict in the Canadas, 1815–1873 (Toronto, 1968). István Szöke, We are Canadians; the national group of the Hungarian-Canadians (Toronto, 1954).

T

TALBOT, JOHN, schoolmaster, journalist, and merchant; b. 21 Sept. 1797, probably at Cloughjordan, Tipperary County, Ireland, second son of Richard Talbot, a soldier and promoter of immigration, and Lydia Baird; d. 22 Sept. 1874, at Robinson, Illinois, U.S.A.

John Talbot came to Upper Canada in 1818 with the group of settlers brought out by his father on the Brunswick on the "£10 deposit plan," whereby Richard Talbot hoped to obtain a large grant of land. The family, including John's brothers, Edward Allen* and Freeman, settled in London Township. John Talbot, after several years of wandering through Ireland, eastern British North America, and New York State, working as a schoolmaster and labourer, became a schoolmaster in London Township in 1830, and two years later opened a school in London. Perhaps as a result of his failure to secure the land grant he considered rightfully his from 1818, he became a Reformer. Early in 1836 he took over the editorship of the St Thomas Liberal. His uncompromising support of reform ideas and his leadership in the Reform movement in the London District made him suspect. A few days after William Lyon Mackenzie*'s abortive uprising, the authorities sought Talbot; he escaped to Detroit and his press was seized.

He remained in Detroit until 1838, went to St Louis, and finally took a teaching position in Independence, Missouri. In 1839 he opened a general store in Somerset, Ohio; here he married Mary Jane Blake and had a family of four sons and three daughters. In 1863 he was forced to sell his store owing to an overextension of credit. After a brief stay in Terre Haute, Indiana, he moved to Robinson, Illinois, where in October he began publication of the Constitution, which supported the Democratic party. He turned the paper over to his two surviving sons in 1872 and died two years later.

DANIEL J. BROCK and JAMES J. TALMAN

PAC, RG 1, L3, T19/26; RG 5, A1, 159. PAO, RG 1, C-I-1, 49. University of Western Ontario Library, 248/3 (Talbot family papers). "Letters of John Talbot," ed. Leslie Gray, Ont. Hist., XLIV (1952), 139–64. F. W. Scott, Newspapers and periodicals of Illinois, 1814–1879 (Illinois State Hist. Lib. Coll., VI, Springfield, Ill., 1910), 297. History of the county of Middlesex, 512.

TAYLOR, JOHN, paper manufacturer; b. at Uttoxeter, Staffordshire, Eng., 1 May 1809, son of John Taylor and Margaret Hawthorne; d. at Toronto, Ont., 13 May 1871.

John Taylor Sr, a Methodist, left Uttoxeter in 1821 to settle in Cherry Valley near Albany, New York, and in 1825 or 1826 came to Vaughan Township in Upper Canada. With his family he pioneered there for about nine years before beginning with his brother James to clear several lots near the forks of the Don River. The pines in this neighbourhood, according to Henry Scadding*, who accounted the Taylors "substantial and enterprising immigrants," were of "a remarkably fine growth"; one white pine is said to have produced some 5,000 board feet and to have been hollow for 12 feet up from the ground. These splendid trees encouraged the Taylors to build a sawmill near their house, and the west branch of the Don was dammed just above the forks to produce the water power.

In 1844, as communications with Toronto began to be improved, it is said that George BROWN, inaugurating the Globe, persuaded John Jr to start a paper-mill at the same site as the sawmill. He and his brothers, Thomas (b. 4 March 1811) and George (b. 28 Dec. 1813), incorporated as John Taylor and Brothers in 1845 and opened an office in Toronto.

The sons were now all in their early 30s; John provided the organizing leadership and technical mill-working skills, Thomas managed the office, and George looked after the farming and lumbering. The family's landholding in the Don Valley and to the north of it increased to a conservative estimate of 2,000 acres. A village of Don Mills grew up in the valley near their mills. In 1847 fire destroyed a substantial part of the complex of mills near Todmorden (Doncaster) and the Taylors bought them in 1855, thus acquiring (or rebuilding) a second paper-mill and later rebuilding a grist mill. In 1858 they built a third paper-mill about half-way between the other two, on the site of the present mill.

Their three mills were known as the Upper, Middle, and Lower Mill respectively, and each was run, about 1867, by a shift of some ten men. The raw materials – rags, straw, and jute (flax was probably used around 1850, and an experiment with esparto grass failed) – were cooked with soda and lime, washed, drained on an "agitated stuff chest," pressed, and dried, emerging in various forms: newsprint (for the Globe and other newspapers), book paper, or manilla wrapping. Paper bags were also made, but by hand. By 1877 the mills were described as operating round the clock (except for Sunday) and as supplying goods "to all parts of the Dominion from Newfoundland to the Red River." "The proprietors have earned a name not always to be found among paper manufacturers, namely that of always putting the full count of sheets in every ream (viz., 480)." The next year, the firm's paper won an honourable mention at the Paris exposition.

John Taylor died in 1871, surviving by several years his wife Anne Eliza. He had experimented in making paper from straw and had applied for patents on making wood-pulp first with "a gang of saws mounted on a mandrel" and later with a "chisel-like machine . . . that . . . moved up and down." He had become a public figure in a minor way, as a leader of the Toronto branch of the Reform Association of Upper Canada, reconstituted in 1867, and as a member of the coterie surrounding Brown became a founding director of the Bank of Commerce in that same year. On his death, the Globe praised his "liberality and kindness" and his "probity"; as befitted a proper Torontonian, he was described as bearing his sufferings "with the firmness and patience which belonged to his character, and at the close he met death with Christian-like resignation."

Control of the business went to his two brothers, who renamed it Thomas Taylor and Brother, and George "inherited" John's directorship at the bank. In 1880 Thomas and George retired, Thomas dying soon afterwards on 21 April 1880 and George living until 17 May 1894. The business went to George's three sons. They called it Taylor Brothers, and advertised themselves as "Manufacturers of Printing, Colored Manilla, Roll, Hanging, and all kinds of Common Paper, Roofing and Carpet Felt, and Paper Bags."

In the 1880s and 1890s the company's business apparently began to decline, perhaps for technological reasons, perhaps because it employed no "travellers," or perhaps because of competition from Quebec firms which had opened offices in Toronto and which used wood-pulp. The Upper Mill was sold within the family in 1886 and then closed down in 1890; the Lower Mill was largely destroyed by fire in 1900; and in 1901 the defalcations of an employee forced the company into bankruptcy with liabilities of $750,000. The Middle Mill was taken over by Robert Davies, an enterprising son-in-law of George Taylor, and became the Howard Smith (Domtar) mill that stands in the valley today.

R. I. K. DAVIDSON

Globe (Toronto), 15 May 1871, 22 April 1880, 18 May 1894. Illustrated Toronto past and present; being an historical and descriptive guide-book . . ., comp. J. Timperlake (Toronto, 1877). Ontario, Department of Planning and Development, Don Valley conservation report (Toronto, 1950). George Carruthers, Paper-making (Toronto, 1947). Ross and Trigge, History of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, II. J. A. Blyth, "The development of the paper industry in old Ontario, 1824–1867," Ont. Hist., LXII (1970), 119–33.

TAYLOR, WILLIAM, Presbyterian minister; b. 18 March 1803 at Dennie (Denny), Scotland; d. in Portland, Maine, 5 Sept. 1876.

William Taylor was educated in Glasgow, but he was not a graduate of the university. He may have studied theology with one of the senior clergy, as was the custom in the Secession Church. He had been attracted by the fervour of that church, although his parents were members of the Church of Scotland. He was licensed to preach in 1827 and ordained in 1831. Between that date and his departure for Canada in 1833, he ministered in the Secession Chapel at Peebles.

In July 1833 he was inducted as pastor of the Montreal Secession Congregation, "the Wee Kirk in little Dublin [Lagauchetière Street]." This congregation, under the name Erskine (1864) and in a new location (1866), was still in his care at the time of his death. Taylor was a fine Hebrew and Greek scholar and zealous minister, active in social and charitable causes of Protestant Montreal. He was an earnest temperance worker and first editor of the Canada Temperance Advocate, printed by John C. BECKET. He was persuaded to become editor by James Court* and John Dougall*. With them, Taylor was also closely associated in the French Canadian Missionary Society. He held the editorship for only about one year, when he was succeeded by John Dougall.

Taylor's interest in aiding Negro refugees may have been the reason for the honorary DD bestowed upon him in 1851 by the now defunct Franklin College, Ohio, which was strongly abolitionist.

Taylor worked for the union of the Canadian churches adhering to the Westminster Standards, that is, the doctrines and discipline of Presbyterianism, and he hoped for the ultimate union of all Protestant denominations. He was an able speaker and skilful conciliator; hence his effectiveness before church assemblies or with smaller gatherings. Following the first major fusion, in 1861, Taylor became moderator of the new Canada Presbyterian Church, of which the Secession and Free churches were the chief constituents. It was only after confederation that he had success with the congregations in connection with the Church of Scotland. National sentiment and the practical example of Presbyterian union in the Maritime provinces softened opposition. In 1875, he had the satisfaction of seeing the dominion-wide Presbyterian Church in Canada formed.

Taylor was an advocate of cooperation among Protestant denominations – a founder of the Evangelical Alliance, of the Montreal Ministerial Association, and of the French Canadian Missionary Society (8 April 1839). On behalf of the last, in 1839 he visited Britain and Protestant communities in France in a successful search for money and men. He was a secretary of the society and its third president, 1870–74. The militancy of his Protestantism is shown by the title of one of his sermons, published in 1876 in pamphlet form under the authority of the Montreal-Ottawa Presbytery: "The Pope, the Man of Sin."

Taylor died while on holiday in Portland, Maine. He was predeceased by his wife, Mary Hamilton, and survived by three sons.

JOHN IRWIN COOPER

Erskine and American United Church (Montreal), Erskine Church records, 1833–76. McLennan Library, McGill University (Montreal), James Court, Journal of the Committee of the French Canadian Missionary Society, 1839–40. French Canadian Missionary Society, Annual Report (Montreal), 1842–78. Campbell, Hist. of Scotch Presbyterian Church. In memoriam, the Rev. William Taylor, D.D. (Montreal, 1876). E. A. McDougall, "History of the Presbyterian Church in western Lower Canada, 1815–1843," unpublished PHD thesis, McGill University, 1969, 13, 354. Guy Tombs, One hundred years of Erskine Church, Montreal, 1833–1933 (Montreal, 1934).

TAYLOR, WILLIAM HENRY, Anglican clergyman; b. 1820; d. at Clifton, Bristol, Eng., 19 Jan. 1873.

Prior to his arrival with his wife in Rupert's Land, 5 Sept. 1850, William Henry Taylor had served for eight years in Newfoundland, where he had been ordained as a deacon. In 1847 he was listed as schoolmaster at Spaniard's Bay.

Accepted by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel as its first missionary in Rupert's Land, Taylor was ordained priest by Bishop David Anderson* in St Andrews Church (near Lower Fort Garry), 22 Dec. 1850. By 1851 he had a "good congregation in a Licensed Schoolroom and a very regular Sunday School with fifty or fifty-two on an average." In that year he built a parsonage on a site given by the Hudson's Bay Company west of the Red along the Assiniboine River, on high ground used as a refuge from the floods. The cornerstone of a church was laid in 1853, but the flood of 1852 delayed construction so that it was not consecrated until 29 May 1855 under the name of St James. Taylor himself "laboured hard . . . both in the exterior and the interior; the painting he has done all himself." By 1854 he had established a parochial lending library of nearly 200 volumes, "one of the grand levers to elevate our people in the social and intellectual scale of society." By 1862 he also had two "nicely-conducted" schools and his congregation was increasing with increasing settlement. In 1854 he had been appointed first registrar of the diocese of Rupert's Land.

Taylor appears to have been a faithful, modest, and singularly considerate man. He secured the cooperation of the not very promising population of settlers and pensioners among whom he and his wife worked so devotedly until 1867, though his last years were marred by a quarrel over the location of a school. He and Bishop Anderson were on terms of close friendship. The Taylors lived at the bishop's house after their arrival in the settlement and the bishop and his family found shelter in their uncompleted parsonage during the flood of 1852. Bishop Robert Machray*, Anderson's successor, was less impressed by the effectiveness of the "good Mr. Taylor" as a parish priest.

Taylor wrote regularly and extensively to the SPG and his letters are of considerable interest for their descriptions of the affairs of the settlement. He played some part in the intellectual life of Red River and was in 1862 elected to the council of the short-lived Institute of Rupert's Land, established in an attempt to enrich the cultural life of the settlement.

In 1867 he and his wife were both in ill health; he retired from St James and returned to England. He had Worcestershire connections and owned a small freehold property at Clent. When he made his will in 1872 he was residing at Fearnall Heath in the parish of Claines and was curate of Martin Hussingtree in the diocese of Worcester. He died at Clifton, Bristol, where Bishop Anderson resided after he left Rupert's Land. Taylor's wife, the sole heir to an estate of under £300, survived him. They had no children.

L. G. THOMAS

Classified digest of the records of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, 1701–1892 (with much supplementary information) (London, 1895), 88–234. Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, Reports (London), 1862–63. [W. H. Taylor], "William H. Taylor's journal, Assiniboia, 1851," ed. F. A. Peake, Canadian Church Hist. Soc. J. (Toronto), XII (1970), 24–36. Boon, Anglican Church, 87. Pascoe, Two hundred years of the S.P.G. M. P. Wilkinson, "The episcopate and the Right Reverend David Anderson, D.D., first lord bishop of Rupert's Land, 1849–1864," unpublished MA thesis, University of Manitoba, 1950. T. C. B. Boon, "The Institute of Rupert's Land and Bishop David Anderson," HSSM, Papers, 3rd ser., no.18 (1961–62), 92–114.

TERRILL, TIMOTHY LEE, lawyer, merchant, farmer, and politician; b. 12 March 1815 in Ascot Township, Sherbrooke County, L.C.; d. 26 Aug. 1879 in Stanstead, Que.

Timothy Lee Terrill's father was Joseph Hazard Terrill, commissioner of small causes for the rugged pioneer settlement of Sherbrooke. Strong and ambitious, Timothy Lee was at 16 both a champion axeman and a keen student. During the rebellions of 1837–38, Timothy Lee interrupted his law studies to join his three brothers in a cavalry troop, where he earned a lieutenancy. These studies were in the offices of his brother Hazard Bailey, in Sherbrooke and then in Stanstead. On 25 July 1840 he was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada. His law practice and commercial ventures brought him almost instant wealth. He began his political career as an annexationist in 1849, entering politics in earnest when in 1852 cholera killed his brother Hazard Bailey, Liberal member of the assembly for Stanstead. Despite John A. Macdonald*'s efforts to free Stanstead for Alexander Tilloch Galt*, Terrill was elected by acclamation in his brother's place on 23 Nov. 1852.

In 1854, Terrill, now a queen's counsel, overwhelmed the Conservative John McConnell in the July general elections. In May 1856 he became provincial secretary in the Étienne-Paschal Taché*–Macdonald government. The choice of Terrill may be explained by the fact that though he was a Liberal, he was moderate rather than radical, that he was the brother of the brilliant Hazard Bailey, and above all that he was an available English Lower Canadian – the only one in the government. After his ritual resignation Terrill was re-elected on a platform emphasizing the honour of his appointment for the Eastern Townships, and advocating progressive government by moderate men. However, Terrill resigned his executive office in 1857 when his neglected business affairs fell "into confusion and disorder"; about the same time his family, including his wife Harriet, suffered ill health, and his baby son died. He continued in the assembly, however, and in the December 1857 general elections Stanstead returned him again, on the pledge that he would continue to protect the interests of the Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly Railroad. He had helped to raise funds for this enterprise and guided through the legislature all legislation affecting it.

After several serious paralytic attacks, Terrill retired from politics in 1861. He became one of the leading agriculturalists in the townships, an officer in the Stanstead Agricultural Society, and a breeder of prize livestock. Terrill also sat on the Council of Public Instruction from 1859 until its reorganization in 1869, "assisted in the direction" of at least one railway company, and was a leading director of the Eastern Townships Bank. He suffered a paralytic attack on 25 Aug. 1879 and died the next morning.

In person and spirit, Timothy Lee Terrill epitomized the pioneer. Attached to the land, he wrested an abundant living from it; loyal to his locality, he contributed much to its political, financial, and commercial growth. Wealthy, socially prominent, and personally affable, Terrill helped the Townships gain appropriate recognition in the broader context of the United Canadas.

ELIZABETH NISH

[J. A. Macdonald], Letters (Johnson), I. Sherbrooke Gazette, 22, 29 July 1854. Stanstead Journal (Rock Island), 22 Feb. 1855; 5 June 1856; 5 March, 27 Aug., 22 Oct., 19 Nov., 3, 17, 27, 31 Dec. 1857; 26 Sept. 1861; 28 Aug., 4 Sept. 1879. Political appointments, 1841–1865 (J.-O. Coté). F.-J. Audet, "Commissions d'avocats de la province de Québec, 1765 à 1849," BRH, XXXIX (1933), 590. Chapais, Histoire du Canada, VII. Cornell, Alignment of political groups. Dent, Last forty years.

TÉTREAU (also rendered Tétreault, Tetrault, and Tetrau), HUBERT-JOSEPH, Roman Catholic priest, Protestant evangelist; b. 25 Feb. 1803 at Verchères, Lower Canada, son of Jean-Baptiste Tétreau and Marie-Anne Guyon; d. 1 Dec. 1877 at Montreal.

Hubert-Joseph Tétreau studied at the college of Montreal, where he was encouraged to prepare for the priesthood. From 1822 to 1824 he taught at the seminary of Saint-Hyacinthe and at the seminary of Nicolet. He then studied theology at Quebec, and was ordained priest 8 Jan. 1826, by Bishop Bernard-Claude Panet*.

His first postings were as assistant priest to stations in the Montreal district, Varennes and Saint-Hyacinthe; next, 1826–30, as missionary in northern New Brunswick; the last 13 years of his life as a Roman Catholic were spent in the dioceses of Quebec and Montreal, his final posting as parish priest being to Les Éboulements. It was there that the break with the Roman Catholic Church occurred. For several years Tétreau had had differences with his superiors, and in October 1843 Bishop Joseph Signay* relieved him of his jurisdiction in the parish, although he did not forbid him to celebrate mass.

Tétreau settled at Sainte-Cécile-de-Milton (Shefford County), and devoted himself to the cause of French Canadian Protestantism. It cannot be established from documents that he was a regularly appointed minister in either the Baptist or the Wesleyan Church. He assisted Baptist clergy in their evangelical work and was active in door-to-door visiting and in public debate, the favourite weapons of the Protestant controversialists. He was associated with the Protestant missionaries Louis ROUSSY and Henriette Odin* Feller, not at their chief centre, Grande Ligne (Saint-Jean County) [see Charles LA ROCQUE], but in the newer missions, Saint-Pie (Bagot County), established in 1842, and Salem (Roxton Pond, Shefford County), begun about 1848. In both places he aided the Reverend Théodore Lafleur*, and, upon the opening of a school for girls in 1850 at Saint-Pie, Tétreau took charge of the primary department. When the girls' school moved in 1855 to Longueuil, and later to Grande Ligne, he did not go with it, but continued to live in the locale of his mission post.

An appreciation of Tétreau was provided by his former co-worker, Lafleur. He found Tétreau less energetic than he would have liked, but "with very decided protestant principles. . . . He often wrote short but sensible articles for our french protestant papers." When called to preach, Tétreau would give a good sermon, but might leave the impression after the service that "he had got rid of a duty which reminded him of the mass said in bygone days."

Tétreau's wife, Harriet, was buried in Montreal in July 1864. Whether the couple was then living there is not known. He spent the last years of his life in the city – from at least 1874 – and died there on 1 Dec. 1877. The funeral service was conducted (3 December) in the Baptist Church on St Catherine Street by his old mission associate, Lafleur. Burial was in the Mount Royal Cemetery.

JOHN IRWIN COOPER

[In the records of the Mount Royal Cemetery (Montreal) Tétreau's Christian name is given as "Herbert" along with the title "Reverend"; they also show his age, place of birth, and his Montreal address. The Montreal Daily Witness, which had a strong denominational bias, gave notice of Tétreau's death and a brief obituary; see issues of 3 and 4 Dec. 1877. Allaire's Dictionnaire provides a brief statement on the Roman Catholic phase of Tétreau's career, but has virtually nothing on the Protestant phase and is in error regarding his place of burial. The earliest and thus valuable biography of Henriette Odin Feller is by J. M. Cramp, A memoir of Madame Feller, with an account of the origin and progress of the Grande Ligne Mission, published in London probably in 1876. The standard history on French Protestantism is that of R.-P. Duclos, Histoire du protestantisme français au Canada et aux Etats-Unis (2v., Montréal, [1913]), see I, 291. Théodore Lafleur's A semi-centennial, historical sketch of the Grande Ligne Mission, read at the jubilee gathering, Grande Ligne, Oct. 18th, 1885 (Montreal, [1886]), 52–53 gives an appreciation of Tétreau's close associate at Saint-Pie and later his pastor in Montreal, and is valuable because of its objectivity. Amand Parent, The life of the Rev. Amand Parent, the first French-Canadian ordained by the Methodist Church (Toronto, 1887), which gives a good account of the French Canadian approach to proselytizing, is indispensable to an understanding of the evangelists' frame of mind and of their techniques in controversy; see p.64, for a valuable reference to Tétreau's work. W. N. Thomson, "Réflexions historiques sur le champ de Roxton Pond, Québec" (typescript in possession of the author, 1957), an able, though brief, study, refers to Tétreau's relationship to Lafleur. Léo Traversy, La paroisse de Saint-Damase, co. Saint-Hyacinthe (s.l., 1964) contains a full account of Tétreau's Roman Catholic life, but is much less satisfactory on the Protestant phase; it makes a statement, which I have been unable to substantiate, that Tétreau served in Granby as a Protestant minister. W. N. Wyeth, Henrietta Feller and the Grande Ligne Mission (Philadelphia, Penn., 1898), adds little not in Cramp, but contains some valuable references to the mission. J.I.C.]

AAQ, Diocèse de Montréal, 5, pp.87, 89; Diocèse de Montréal, 8, p.193; Registre des lettres des évêques de Québec, 6, pp.180, 320, 367, 398; Registre des lettres des évêques de Québec, 20, p.436; Vicaires généraux, 2, p.40. Archives judiciaires d'Iberville (Qué.), Registre d'état civil, 29 mars 1868. ASQ, Séminaire, LIV, 10; Polygraphie, L, 16–17.

THIBAUDEAU, JOSEPH-ÉLIE, merchant, politician; b. 2 Sept. 1822 at Cap-Santé, Portneuf, L.C., son of Pierre-Chrysologue Thibaudeau and Émilie Delisle; d. 5 Jan. 1878 at Cap-Santé, Que.

Joseph-Élie Thibaudeau was born to a Cap-Santé merchant-politician family which included an older brother Isidore* and a younger Joseph-Rosaire*. Thibaudeau's life centred around Cap-Santé. He married a local girl, Félicité Larue, and when he left his business it was to represent his county in the Legislative Assembly. From 10 Aug. 1854 until after the 1857 general elections Thibaudeau was a moderate Liberal who usually supported the Liberal-Conservative coalition government. Then in 1858, as a means of embarrassing the ministry, he moved that double majority be adopted as a principle of government although since 1856, when it had actually used double majority to oust Sir Allan Napier MacNab* from leadership, the ministry had lost its Upper Canadian, therefore double, majority. Thibaudeau's motion and various amendments were defeated, but the government cunningly resigned soon after making use of strong, if not majority, disapproval of the queen's choice of Ottawa as the seat of government. George Brown formed a new Executive Council and named Thibaudeau president and minister of agriculture. On 4 August, two days after its formation, this "Short Administration" fell. Thibaudeau was re-elected after having resigned to accept office, but never again reached the executive level. In the 1861 general elections he was defeated by Jean-Docile Brousseau*, a Bleu. This defeat ended Thibaudeau's political career. In 1863 the government of John Sandfield Macdonald and Antoine-Aimé Dorion* appointed him registrar for Portneuf County, a post he held until his death in 1878.

Thibaudeau was a typical middle-class French Canadian even though his family had a business rather than professional tradition. His political career was not outstanding, though he was a competent and articulate representative for his constituency, the District of Quebec, and Lower Canada.

Elizabeth Nish

Archives paroissiales de Sainte-Famille-du-Cap-Santé (Cap-Santé, Qué.), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures, 1822, 1878. Canada, Province of, Parliamentary debates, 1858–61. Political appointments, 1841–1865 (J.-O. Coté). Careless, Brown, I. Chapais, Histoire du Canada, VI, VII. Cornell, Alignment of political groups. Dent, Last forty years. David Gosselin, "L'honorable Élie Thibaudeau," BRH, VI (1900), 62. "Les Thibaudeau," BRH, XXXIX (1933), 58–59.

THIBAULT (Thibaud, Thebo), JEAN-BAPTISTE, secular Catholic priest, missionary, founder of the Lake St Anne mission (Alberta); b. 14 Dec. 1810 at Saint-Joseph-de-Lévis, L.C., son of Jean-Baptiste Thibault and Charlotte Carrier; d. 4 April 1879 at Saint-Denis-de-la-Bouteillerie (Kamouraska County), Que.

Jean-Baptiste Thibault, a farmer's son, received his classical and theological education at the seminary of Quebec, where on 31 March 1833 he was admitted into the subdiaconate. On 28 April he set out for the North-West. Contrary to several of his predecessors, he had no debt to pay before his departure. Yet the Thibault family was scarcely well-to-do, if the sums of money that the bishopric subsequently sent rather often to his father are an indication.

During the voyage, the missionary was frequently shocked by the behaviour of the crew. Unable to quiet them, or to ensure the use of more acceptable language, he complained to the captain. He was sturdy, but, hampered by his timidity, he was unable to enforce respect from those who provoked him. This timidity was to be construed as pride when Thibault, feeling ill at ease with the employees, later refused the hospitality offered at the Hudson's Bay Company's trading posts. He arrived at Saint-Boniface in June 1833, and began to study the Cree and Chippewa languages. On 8 September he was ordained priest by Bishop Joseph-Norbert Provencher*.

Two years later, in the bishop's absence, Thibault showed himself to be a wise and skilful administrator of the western missions. The building of the cathedral at Saint-Boniface progressed, and the yield from the farm belonging to the mission increased. Thibault proved to be a good preacher, without being too verbose. Above all, he was good at expounding; this quality was appreciated by Bishop Provencher, who considered that Christianity should be brought to the Indians by persuasion, and not "in the Protestant fashion" by gifts. In such a manner the ministers of the different faiths accused each other of trading in souls.

In 1842, therefore, at the request of the Indians and Métis, Bishop Provencher sent Thibault as a missionary across the prairies to the Rocky Mountains. The bishop made this decision unknown to the HBC, which had refused to approve his plan; Thibault, however, met the preference of the company for Canadian rather than French missionaries. His first journey lasted six months, during which, prudently, he travelled on horseback across the plains as far as Edmonton House – the first Catholic or Protestant missionary to adopt this form of transportation. Delighted with the politeness and cordial welcome extended to him by the commandants of the company's forts, he preached the gospel to all the Canadiens, Indians, and Métis who came to him. He welcomed the Blackfeet, whom he described thus: "These Indians . . . are very clean, and very well-disposed towards the whites; but their number, their war-like qualities, and particularly their rapacity make them the terror of their redskin enemies. They have only a very imperfect idea of the divinity." This journey, the prelude to the diffusion of Catholicism throughout the American north-west, bore fruit: Thibault conducted 353 baptisms and celebrated 20 marriages, in addition to acquiring a better knowledge of the religious needs of this vast region.

For 10 years the missionary worked discreetly, without displaying excessive zeal, and visited the meeting-places of the Indians and Métis. Thibault was probably the first Catholic missionary to make his way to several of the HBC posts and to several places where the Oblates were later to establish missions [see EYNARD; REYNARD]. However, only one foundation is acknowledged unanimously as his, the Lake St Anne mission. Crees were accustomed to stay in this spot, which they called Devil's Lake; Thibault substituted the name of St Anne. He stayed there in 1842 and 1843, but it was only in the summer of 1844 that a house was built for the missionary.

In 1852, acting on Thibault's request to return to Quebec, Bishop Provencher recalled him to Red River. When Thibault reached Saint-Boniface, however, Provencher asked him to stay there, as there was no one to minister to the region. Thibault did so, and did not return to the diocese of Quebec until 1868.

While at Quebec in the autumn of 1869, Thibault was visited by Hector-Louis Langevin*, who asked him to go to Red River as a representative of the Canadian government. Thibault was believed to have a great influence over the Métis. Some of them had just refused to allow William McDougall*, who had been appointed lieutenant governor of the North-West Territories by the Canadian government, to enter the settlement. By this action the Métis and their leader, Louis Riel*, meant to force the federal government to negotiate with them the terms of their union with Canada. Conjointly with Charles-René-Léonidas d'Irumberry* de Salaberry, Thibault was to reassure them that Ottawa intended to respect their rights and not to treat them as a conquered people, and to convince them to lay down their arms [see Sir John YOUNG]. A third delegate, Donald Alexander Smith*, was for his part to set at rest the minds of the company's directors, and to discuss with all "the people of Red River" the conditions of their entry into the dominion. The prime minister, John A. Macdonald*, judging Thibault to be "a sensible old French Canadian" and "a shrewd and at the same time a kindly old gentleman," was of the opinion that, if he accomplished nothing in particular, at least he would not commit any blunders since he knew the region and supported the Canadian government. A reserved and prudent man, Thibault was content to remain in the background, and this was where circumstances kept him during his governmental mission.

Salaberry having remained at Pembina, Thibault, on 25 December, arrived in the west alone. By order of the recently proclaimed provisional government, Thibault was escorted to the bishop's palace at Saint-Boniface, where he was kept under surveillance so that he would not meddle in political affairs. On 6 Jan. 1870 Louis Riel and his council received Thibault and also Salaberry, who had just arrived. "Immediately we communicated our instructions to the president [Riel] and his council," Thibault recounted, "and they took them under consideration." However, no comment was received, and four days later Thibault wrote to the provisional government to ask about the conditions required by the colony in the event of its union with Canada, "in order that we can submit them," he said, "to the examination of the government that sent us." The next day the council replied to him that the documents Thibault and Salaberry had submitted did not confer on them the necessary powers to conclude an agreement. On 13 January the council expressed this opinion to Thibault and Salaberry by word of mouth. According to the commissioner D. A. Smith, Thibault ceased to be useful from then on. In general, historians agree that he had no influence on the course of events. But Smith wrote that had it not been for the steps Thibault took during the night of 19–20 January, he himself would have succeeded in settling everything at this time. During that night, as Smith has it, Thibault contributed to a closing of the ranks of the demonstrators, who that day had held public meetings which Smith's money and promises had managed to break up. Subsequently Riel's position grew stronger, and he became formally president of the provisional government, whose bases were enlarged. Then delegates were sent to Ottawa to negotiate the entry of the Red River colony into confederation [see John BLACK]. Was Thibault partly responsible for this sudden change? In his report, he said that he had had "to reason with the leaders, and with the people; always, however, by conversations with single individuals, as that seemed to me the best . . . way of effecting any good result."

Thibault stayed two more years at Red River, ministering to the parish of Saint-François-Xavier; then in 1871 he accepted the post of vicar general of the diocese. The following autumn he returned to the east for good, and was successively in charge of the parishes of Sainte-Louise (L'Islet County) and Saint-Denis-de-la-Bouteillerie.

A man of little ambition, Thibault preferred to work in a parish where he could follow the instructions of a bishop, for he did not like to direct affairs himself. Although he spent the greater part of his life in the diocese of Saint-Boniface, he was of the opinion, as early as 1856, that secular priests should withdraw from that region. As a missionary, Thibault opened up the way to the west and north in America; as a government emissary, he defended the interests of those whom he was supposed to appease.

LIONEL DORGE

AAQ, Registre des lettres des évêques de Québec, 15, p.367; Rivière-Rouge et diocèse de Saint-Boniface (Man.), III, 161. ACAM, RLL, 5, p.383; RLL, 7, p.132; 255.109. ANQ, Collection Chapais, Fonds Langevin, Jean Langevin à Hector-Louis Langevin, 5 janv. 1870, Taché à Cartier, 15 mars 1870. Archives de l'archevêché de Saint-Boniface (Man.), Documents historiques, 1861–1872. ASQ, Séminaire, XXXVIII, 7, 9. PAC, MG 17, B2, C.1/M–C.1/M10; MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 101, pp.40831, 40833, 41082, 41083, 41086, 41198; 516, pp.614–17, 646–51, 666–69, 717–18, 939–41; RG 6, C1, 10A, p.1041. PAM, Louis Riel papers; Red River Settlement, Copies of miscellaneous letters and documents, 92.

Begg's Red River journal (Morton), 81, 82, 88–91, 239, 240–50, 268, 289, 299, 301, 454, 468, 482, 533, 535. Canadian North-West (Oliver), II, 907–8. [P.-J. De Smet], Life, letters and travels of Father Pierre-Jean De Smet, S.J., 1801–1873 . . ., ed. H. M. Chittenden and A. T. Richardson (4v., New York, 1905), IV 1560. Hargrave, Red River, 129, 135. HBRS, XXII (Rich), 917, 921–22, 932. James Wickes Taylor correspondence (Bowsfield), 97. Paul Kane, Wanderings of an artist among the Indians of North America . . ., intro. and notes by L. J. Burpee (Master-works of Canadian authors, ed. J. W. Garvin, VII, Toronto, 1925; repub. with intro. by J. G. MacGregor, Edmonton, 1968), 261, 276. "Lettres de Monseigneur Joseph-Norbert Provencher, premier évêque de Saint-Boniface, Manitoba," Bulletin de la Société historique de Saint-Boniface, III (1913), 137, 138, 147, 154, 167, 173, 179, 195, 196, 234–35, 246, 247–48, 249–50, 256–57. McLean's notes of twenty five years service (Wallace), 123, 318–19. [A.-A.] Taché, Vingt années de missions dans le Nord-Ouest de l'Amérique (Montréal, 1866; New York, 1970), 4, 20, 57–58, 64–66, 86, 88, 222, 238.

Allaire, Dictionnaire. Morice, Dict. hist. des Can. et Métis, 297. Julienne Barnard, Mémoires Chapais: documentation, correspondance, souvenirs (4v., Montréal et Paris, 1961–64), III, 18–19, 156. F. E. Bartlett, "William Mactavish, the last governor of Assiniboia," unpublished MA thesis, University of Manitoba, 1964. J.-É. Champagne, Les missions catholiques dans l'Ouest canadien (1818–1875) (Publ. de l'Institut de missiologie de l'université pontificale d'Ottawa, I, Ottawa, 1949), 64–65. Georges Dugas, Histoire de l'Ouest canadien de 1822 à 1869; époque des troubles (Montréal, [1906]), 154; Monseigneur Provencher et les missions de la Rivière-Rouge (Montréal, 1889). Donatien Frémont, Monseigneur Provencher et son temps (Winnipeg, 1935). Giraud, Le Métis canadien, 1074–81. Morice, Hist. de l'Église catholique, I, 234; II. Alexander Ross, The Red River Settlement; its rise, progress, and present state . . . (London, 1856; Minneapolis, 1957), 275–300. Stanley, Birth of western Canada, 88–91, 93–96, 121, 146, 148; Louis Riel, 85. Gaston Carrière, "L'honorable compagnie de la Baie d'Hudson et les missions de l'Ouest canadien," Revue de l'université d'Ottawa, XXXVI (1966), 15–39, 232–57. C. J. Jaenen, "Foundations of dual education at Red River, 1811–1834," HSSM, Papers, 3rd ser., no.21 (1965), 35–68. G. F. G. Stanley, "Louis Riel," Canada's past and present; a dialogue, ed. R. L. McDougall, (Toronto, 1965), 21–40.

THOMPSON, JOSHUA SPENCER, journalist, accountant, prospector, and politician; b. at Belfast, Ireland, in 1828; d. at Victoria, B.C., on 20 Dec. 1880.

Educated in Belfast, Joshua Spencer Thompson emigrated to British Columbia in 1858, settling first in Fort Hope but later, probably in 1862, moving to Barkerville. As foreman of the Fort Hope grand jury in 1860, Thompson complained to Chief Justice Matthew Baillie Begbie* of the poor roads in the Fraser Canyon, and as secretary to two citizens' political conventions in 1860 and 1861 he spoke for Fort Hope commercial interests, condemning the abuses of the absentee government of James DOUGLAS and demanding responsible government, lower taxes, and improved roads for the colony. In 1861 Thompson was a member of the committee that met with Governor Douglas to discuss the financing of the proposed Cariboo road.

Working in Barkerville first as a clerk, accountant, auctioneer, and mining commissioner, Thompson later acquired interests in various mining claims, and in 1866 was elected to the Mining Board of the Cariboo. In 1871 he was foreman of the grand jury of Richfield, and was elected chairman of the first school board in the Cariboo. As editor of the Cariboo Sentinel in 1870 and 1871, Thompson became the Cariboo's most influential advocate of confederation and "that grand bond of union," the transcontinental railroad. On 20 Dec. 1871 he was elected by acclamation the first MP for Cariboo. He was re-elected by acclamation in the general elections of 1872, 1874, and 1878. In the commons Thompson opposed Chinese immigration and urged that the house devise "some means by which that great evil which threatened to overwhelm their country, namely, the unlimited immigration, might be averted." He also called for improved postal and telegraphic communications between east and west. But above all he called for the completion of the Canadian Pacific railroad. Although a Conservative supporter, he criticized both parties for delays in railroad construction.

Apart from his commercial and political activity, Thompson was active in Cariboo social life, being president of the Cariboo Literary Institute in 1866, 1867, and 1870, an officer in the freemasons brotherhood in 1871, and an actor and manager in the Cariboo Amateur Dramatic Association after 1869. He helped establish the first library and the first freemasons Grand Lodge in the Cariboo.

After Thompson's death, a San Francisco woman claimed his estate as his widow, but his relatives denied her claim, maintaining that he had never married.

JOHN A. LYON and GEORGE A. TRIPP

PABC, Joshua Spencer Thompson correspondence, 1851–61. Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1871–81. I. M. L. Bescoby, "Some aspects of society in the Cariboo from its discovery until 1871," unpublished BA thesis, University of British Columbia, 1932, especially 14, 113, 123, 127, 130. F. W. Howay et al., British Columbia and the United States: the north Pacific slope from fur trade to aviation, ed. H. F. Angus (The Relations of Canada and the United States series, Toronto, New Haven, Conn., London, 1942), 212. R. L. Reid, Grand Lodge of British Columbia A.F. & A.M.: historical notes and biographical sketches 1848–1935 (Vancouver, B.C., n.d.), 30–33. G. M. Murray, "Cariboo M.Ps. – 1871–1951," Northwest Digest (Quesnel, B.C.), VII (July 1951), 3–5, 16–21.

THOMSON, SAMUEL ROBERT, lawyer; b.c. 1825 at St Stephen, N.B., the fourth son of Skeffington Thomson, Church of England rector at St Stephen; d. 19 Nov. 1880 in London, Eng.

Samuel Robert Thomson studied law with his eldest brother George, and was admitted an attorney on 5 Feb. 1846. Following his admission to the bar on 3 Feb. 1848, he practised briefly at Fredericton, then at Saint John, where he was in partnership for many years with Robertson Bayard until the latter's death. He was made a queen's counsel in 1871 or 1873. Thomson also ventured into politics: he was defeated in at least one contest for the New Brunswick assembly.

Thomson enjoyed an unusually high reputation as a barrister both in New Brunswick and abroad. His first major case was in 1860 when he served as counsel for the tenantry before the P.E.I. Land Commission which included John Hamilton Gray* for the crown, John William Ritchie* for the proprietors, and Joseph HOWE for the tenantry. Though the commission's recommendations were disallowed in London, the land question was finally resolved in favour of freehold tenure. In 1875 Thomson along with Louis H. Davies* was again retained by the tenantry to appear before the arbitration commission set up to settle the P.E.I. land claims. Perhaps the most significant tribute to his ability was that of William Henry POPE, who, though an ardent defender of the landlords' property rights, described a crucial speech by Thomson in 1860 as "the most eloquent ever delivered in the colonial building."

Before the 1875 arbitration closed, Thomson returned to New Brunswick to defend Acadians charged with murder and sedition following disturbances at Caraquet, Gloucester County, in January 1875. The incident was linked directly to the Common Schools Act of 1871 which withdrew public assistance from denominational schools. Catholic sentiment interpreted the bill as against the spirit of Article 93 of the British North America Act; the government and courts upheld that "de jure" denominational schools did not exist at confederation. Four years of unrest in the province culminated in the incident at Caraquet, in which two men were killed. Thomson, rather than an Acadian barrister, was retained, as much for his calmness in the face of the sectarian emotions roused by the case as for his ability. Though the charges were upheld at the Gloucester sessions before Chief Justice John C. Allen* in December 1875, Thomson, in a highly acclaimed manoeuvre, had the verdict quashed on technical grounds by an appeal in the New Brunswick Supreme Court the following June.

Thomson's most important case was heard before the Joint High Commission which met at Halifax in 1877 under the stipulations of the Treaty of Washington of 1871 to determine the amount of compensation the United States should pay Canada for the use of her inshore fisheries. Though Alexander Tilloch Galt*, the commissioner appointed by Great Britain, was pessimistic about the outcome of the case, he was obviously heartened by the prospect of Thomson's summing up the argument for the crown. Galt's hopes were well founded, for on 23 November the commission made an award of $5,500,000 in favour of Canada. When Thomson died, his colleagues recalled his speech as the highlight of his career.

In September 1880 Thomson contracted typhoid fever while on the Northumberland circuit. Despite growing ill health, he sailed for England on 30 October to argue a case before the Privy Council. His illness became progressively worse after his arrival in London on 9 November, and he died ten days later. His body was transferred to Saint John. His wife, Catherine McDonell, whom he had married less than five years before, was expecting their third child at the time of his death. Thomson died while still in the prime of his professional life. Of his career H. J. Morgan* wrote, "There was not a trial, criminal or civil, of any importance, during the past twenty years in New Brunswick in which Thomson did not take a leading part."

BERNARD POTHIER

N.B. Museum, Webster coll., Court record, Caraquet murder case, 1875. PAC, MG 27, 1, D8 (Galt papers). Queen's University Archives, Alexander Mackenzie papers (on microfilm in PAC, MG 26, B1 (Mackenzie papers, general correspondence)). Daily News (Saint John, N.B.), July 1876, December 1880. Daily Telegraph (Saint John, N.B.), July 1876. Examiner (Charlottetown), September–October 1860, August–September 1875. Islander (Charlottetown), August–October 1860, August 1861. Le Moniteur acadien (Shédiac, N.B.), septembre–décembre 1875. Morning Freeman (Saint John, N.B.), September–November 1875, June–July 1876.

Award of the Fishery Commission. Documents and proceedings of the Halifax Commission, 1877, under the Treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871 (3v., Washington, 1878). Judgement of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick in the case of Maher v. the town council of Portland (1873), reported sub nomine Ex parte Renaud, 14 New Brunswick Reports (I, Pugsley, 1876), 273, and in G. J. Wheeler, Confederation law of Canada; Privy Council cases on the British North-America Act, 1867 ... (London, 1896), 338–62. The case was appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1874, and the judgement is reported in Wheeler, Confederation law ..., 362–67. Can. biog. dict., II. The Canadian legal directory: a guide to the bench and bar of the dominion of Canada, ed. H. J. Morgan (Toronto, 1878). Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81. Lawrence, Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton), 401. G. H. Lee, An historical sketch of the first fifty years of the Church of England in the province of New Brunswick (1783–1833) (Saint John, N.B., 1880). C. C. Tansill, Canadian-American relations, 1875–1912 (Carnegie endowment for International Peace: Division of economics and history, pub., New Haven, Conn., London, and Toronto, 1943). Onésiphore Turgeon, Un tribut à la race acadienne: mémoires, 1871–1929 (Montréal, 1928).

THOMSON, WILLIAM ALEXANDER, railway promoter, author, and politician; b. November 1816 in Wigtownshire, Scotland; d. 1 Oct. 1878, near Queenston, Ont.

William Alexander Thomson attended school in Wigtownshire before emigrating to the United States. He went to Buffalo, New York, then came to Upper Canada in 1834, settling in Queenston. He was active in arranging for the incorporation, financing, and development of railways in western Ontario beginning with the Fort Erie Railway (later the Erie and Niagara Railway), and then the Erie and Ontario Railway, which was purchased by the Erie and Niagara in 1863. He became president of the Erie and Niagara Railway and a senior officer of the Canada Southern Railway; the Toronto Globe reported that the latter appointment was "largely the result of his determination, perseverance, and energy." He was an enthusiastic advocate of western expansion, and at his death was said to have been "engaged in the promotion of railway enterprises in Manitoba."

Thomson was an unsuccessful candidate at the federal general election of 1867, standing for Niagara, but was elected to the House of Commons as a Liberal in a by-election on 19 Nov. 1872 for Welland, and was re-elected in 1874. He was prevented by ill health from being a candidate for re-election in 1878. A man of advanced views, enterprising spirit, and "a bold speculative turn of mind," Thomson was also called "a large-hearted, liberal man, of kindly and social sympathies, a loyal member of his political party, and true to his convictions."

Thomson was an effective advocate of radical agrarian economic doctrine in the years just before and after confederation. He set forth most of his ideas for the first time in 1863 in a long pamphlet entitled An essay on production, money, and government; in which the principle of a natural law is advanced and explained. Thomson believed that Canadian laws and institutions had been formulated to advance mercantile rather than productive interests and were not conducive to national development. He told the House of Commons in 1876: "The cause of our troubles has been that our laws have been made to suit the merchants instead of the producing classes." He recommended more public works, lower tariffs, and above all an issue of irredeemable government notes to assist farmers and other producers of real goods. Like many other radical spokesmen before and since, he tended to overstate his case and to confuse his economic theory with religious and moral doctrine. He explained: "Nature laid the foundation, Adam Smith and his successors built the columns, and, I believe, it has been given to me to place the keystone in the arch of Political Economy."

Public management of the currency, Thomson argued, could eliminate depressions, stimulate growth, help to finance government expenditures, and bring about the reign of Christian principles on earth. "The present money," he said, "never moves production, it only exchanges products." Thomson's ideas are strikingly similar to those of Canadian Social Credit theorists in the 20th century, and he even used the term "social credit" in presenting his case. He described an economic crisis as follows: "When the collapse happens, apart from the increase of human wretchedness that will arise, there will be a depreciation of fixed properties just equal to the amount of social credit withdrawn." He expressed his views often to parliament, and he proposed a series of resolutions in 1878 asking that a system of "Agricultural Banks" be established on his model. Though there is little evidence that his ideas were influential beyond a few contemporary advocates of a "national currency," he is remembered as one of Canada's first agrarian radicals and as a pioneer advocate of government monetary policy.

CRAUFURD D. W. GOODWIN

W. A. Thomson, An essay on production, money, and government; in which the principle of a natural law is advanced and explained, whereby credit, debt, taxation, tariffs, and interest on money will be abolished; and national debt and the current expenses of government will be paid in gold (Buffalo, N.Y., 1863). PAO, Misc. 1946, "Historical sketch of Canada Southern Railway Company." Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1875–78. Globe (Toronto), 2 Oct. 1878. Can. parl. comp., 1878. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson), 570. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, 372. C. D. W. Goodwin, Canadian economic thought: the political economy of a developing nation, 1814–1914 (Duke University Commonwealth-Studies Center pub., 15, Durham, N.C., and London, 1961); "A forgotten forerunner of Social Credit: William Alexander Thomson," J. of Canadian Studies (Peterborough, Ont.), IV (May 1969), 41–45.

THURGAR, JOHN VENNER, merchant, banker, and militia officer; b. 1797 in Yorkshire, Eng.; m. Anna Paddock by whom he had two daughters and one son; d. in Saint John, N.B., 29 Feb. 1880.

John Venner Thurgar left England at the age of 20 to apprentice with his uncle, John Lawder (Lauder) Venner, a Saint John loyalist and owner of a wine and commission business. He succeeded his uncle as proprietor in 1823 and continued at the same location at Market Wharf for 57 years. He overcame many financial obstacles, including a large original debt, a near-ruinous swindle, a disastrous fire, and several severe economic depressions. Thurgar's business steadily expanded into the United Kingdom, the West Indies, New York, and Boston.

Banking emerged as a vital part of Thurgar's career when he became the founding president of the City Bank of Saint John in 1836. Three years later, when it merged with the Bank of New Brunswick, Thurgar became a director. He was a senior director of the Bank of British North America for 25 years, director of the Equitable and Marine Insurance companies, and Saint John agent for the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia Land Company.

Thurgar also had a life-long interest in the local militia, entering the artillery corps as a private and rising to the rank of colonel. His son, John Venner Thurgar, followed this tradition, becoming lieutenant-colonel of the 3rd batallion of the Saint John City Militia.

In November 1864, when Thurgar handed over his firm's operation to his son, the Saint John Globe wrote: "No man could retire from business with a cleaner record in every respect." His will, drawn up nine years later, indicated that he had amassed considerable wealth and achieved an important social position in the community. Despite the fact that he was not a Saint John "native," Thurgar had met the other requirements by which his contemporaries measured success: a thriving business and an influential marriage. For half a century, when Saint John was a vital part of the British empire, Thurgar was an important member of its commercial establishment.

RICHARD WILBUR

N.B. Museum, J. V. Thurgar papers, letter book, 1827–31; Scrapbook 13, Clarence Ward, "Old times in Saint John," clippings from Saint John Globe, 12 Aug. 1905. Census of Canada, 1870–71 (5v., Ottawa, 1873), for district 174. Royal Gazette (Fredericton), 1835–38. Saint John Daily Sun, 1 March 1880, 3 Nov. 1887. Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81, 432. R. M. Breckenridge, The Canadian banking system, 1817–1890 (American Economic Association pub., X, New York, 1895).

TODD, WILLIAM, merchant, lumberman, railway promoter, and politician; b. at North Yarmouth, Maine, on 10 June or 10 July 1803, one of ten children of William Todd and Hannah Worthley; m. in 1826 to Clarissa Hill by whom he had 12 children, and on 9 July 1862 to Mrs Mary Jane Haney; d. 5 Aug. 1873 at St Stephen, N.B.

William Todd Sr had built a lucrative business in the Atlantic coast–West Indies trade, but the business was destroyed by the blockade during the Napoleonic Wars, and in 1811 the Todd family, like many of their countrymen, sought a new life in the security of British North America. They settled in St Stephen, N.B., where by the age of 22 William Jr had established himself as a merchant in nearby Milltown. Within a short time he moved into the lumber business, then the principal industry of the St Croix River valley. He was an able businessman and became one of the wealthiest lumbermen on the St Croix. His business interests in both New Brunswick and Maine were extensive, making him one of the leading members of the "international community" on the St Croix. At the time of his death, Todd's estate was valued at $187,571.

Early in his career Todd became engaged in railway construction. He was president of the St Croix and Penobscot Railroad and of the St Stephen Branch Railroad (later known as the New Brunswick and Canada Railway). In addition he was a founder and director of the St Stephen's Bank and served as its president from 1849 until 1873.

Todd was a member of the Congregational Church of St Stephen and was active in the affairs of the church and the community. His interest in education is indicated by the fact that he was a founder, and for many years a director, of the Milltown Academy – one of the leading schools of the province.

In 1854, the year in which the Liberals under Charles FISHER gained control of the assembly, Todd was appointed to the Legislative Council. At the deliberations of the council he was a strong supporter of the business community in general and of the lumber industry and railways in particular. During the confederation controversy Todd did not, at least in the beginning, take a strong stand. The St Stephen area was regarded as an anti-confederation centre and several influential lumbermen, including Todd's brother, Freeman H. Todd*, opposed the union of the provinces. As late as 1866 William remained uncommitted, but during the council session of that year he was influenced by the forceful case in favour of confederation which was presented by Edward Barron CHANDLER. Finally, when the resolution supporting confederation was placed before the council, Todd voted for it.

In October 1867 he was called to the Senate, but he was unwilling to go to Ottawa and declined the appointment. He retained his seat in the Legislative Council of the province where he made his last appearance during the session of 1872.

MICHAEL SWIFT

PANB, Department of Justice, Probate Court Records, Milltown, 873/Wm. Todd. New Brunswick, Legislative Council, Debates, 1866; Journals, 1854–72. Morning Freeman (Saint John, N.B.), 7 Aug. 1873. Statutory history of the railways of Canada (Dorman). H. A. Davis, An international community on the St. Croix, 1604–1930 (University of Maine Studies, 2nd ser., 64, Orono, 1950). G. H. Mowat, The diverting history of a loyalist town (St Andrews, N.B., 1932). Guy Murchie, Saint Croix, the sentinel river; historical sketches of its discovery, early conflicts and final occupation by English and American settlers, with some comments on Indian life (New York, 1947). William Todd, Todds of the St. Croix Valley (Mount Carmel, Conn., 1943).

TOPP, ALEXANDER, Presbyterian clergyman; b. at Sheriffmill, near Elgin, Elgin (now Moray) County, Scotland, 1 April 1814, the second of three sons in a family of six; d. Toronto, Ont., 6 Oct. 1879.

Alexander Topp was educated at Elgin Academy, at King's College, Aberdeen, where he obtained an AM in 1831, and at the divinity faculty of the University of Aberdeen. He was appointed assistant to the minister of the Elgin parish church in 1836 and minister in 1837. He had early identified himself with the evangelical party in the Church of Scotland, and in 1843 he sided with the Free Church movement, leading most of his congregation into the new body. He was active in organizing Free Church congregations in the north of Scotland and, in 1852, he was inducted minister of Free Roxburgh Church in Edinburgh.

Topp received a call to Knox Church, Toronto, and on 16 Sept. 1858 he was inducted its minister. He remained at Knox Church until his death, and his congregation became, under his able leadership, one of the largest Presbyterian churches in Canada. An outstanding Presbyterian leader in Canada, Topp held many high offices in the church. He was elected moderator of the Canada Presbyterian Chutch in 1868 by unanimous vote. Convener of the committee on union of the Canada Presbyterian Church from 1871 to 1875, he was also secretary of the joint union committee of the four churches which united in 1875 to form the Presbyterian Church in Canada. In 1876 he was elected moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. He was also a member of the general assembly committees on French Canadian evangelization, the Home and Foreign Record of the Presbyterian Church (Toronto), and foreign missions.

Topp was closely identified with Knox College in Toronto, founded in 1844, and was a member of the board of management for 1859–65 and 1869–79, the chairman of the board 1860–62, 1871–73, and 1877–79, and a member of the senate on several occasions between 1860 and 1875. He took an active interest in the founding of the Presbyterian College in Montreal and of Manitoba College in Winnipeg in 1871.

Interested in benevolent work, Topp served as chairman of the board of management of the Toronto Home for Incurables from its inception in 1874 to 1879, and was a member of the board of management of the House of Industry in Toronto, 1866–70, and of the board of trustees, 1870–79.

Alexander Topp was awarded an honorary doctor of divinity by King's College, Aberdeen, in 1870. He died in Toronto on 6 Oct. 1879. He had married Jane Mortimer, the widow of John Clark, both natives of Aberdeen, and his only son died in 1853 at age four.

C. Glenn Lucas

UCA, Minutes of Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, 1844–61; Minutes of Synod of the Canada Presbyterian Church, 1861–69; Minutes of the General Assembly of the Canada Presbyterian Church, 1870–75; Minutes of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, 1875–79. Globe (Toronto), 7 Oct. 1879. Knox Presbyterian Church, Annual Report (Toronto), XIII (1880). Presbyterian Record for the Dominion of Canada (Montreal, Toronto), November 1879. Toronto Home for Incurables, Annual Reports (Toronto), 1875–80. Toronto House of Industry, Annual Reports (Toronto), 1869–80. Robert Cowan, Remember your leaders, a sermon occasioned by the death of the Rev. Alexander Topp, D.D. . . . (Elgin, Scotland, 1879). Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, III, 54–55. H. M. Parsons, Biographical sketches and review: First Presbyterian Church in Toronto and Knox Church, 1820–1890 (Toronto, 1890).

TORRANCE, DAVID, merchant, shipper, and president of the Bank of Montreal; b. 1805, New York, N.Y., son of James and Elizabeth Kissock Torrance; d. 29 Jan. 1876 at Montreal, Que.

The Torrances were a Scottish Lowland family who came from Larkhall in Lanark. Five brothers, sons of Thomas Torrance (1735–1805), emigrated to Canada via New York shortly after the turn of the 19th century. Of these, Thomas* (1776–1826) and John* (1786–1870) settled at Montreal, where they established wholesale and retail groceries, trading largely in wines and liquor; James went to Kingston, Upper Canada, where he acted as the agent for the forwarding business of the family and carried on commercial operations of his own. The first two, at least, became very prosperous as a result of the War of 1812.

David Torrance, the son of James, went to Montreal about 1821 to work in his uncle John's St Paul Street business, John Torrance and Company. Among the firm's clerks were Henry Wilkes*, the future Congregationalist minister, and John Young, with whom David was to operate a Quebec City partnership, known as Torrance and Young, for some five years after 1835. On 9 Jan. 1832, David married his cousin Jane Torrance (1812–75), the eldest daughter of his uncle John, and in 1833 he became a partner in the business. In the years following he assumed an important role in Montreal commerce and with his uncle's retirement in 1853 the firm became David Torrance and Company. His partners were Thomas Cramp* and later also his own son, John Torrance Jr (1835–1908). With Cramp and another son, George William Torrance (*c.*1849–1911), David also formed a second partnership in Toronto entitled Cramp, Torrances and Company. The John Torrance businesses dealt in all forms of general merchandizing, but specialized in teas; from the late 1820s the Torrances challenged the monopoly of Forsyth, Richardson and Company in tea importation. They were the first Canadian firm to deal directly with China and India, where their name was well known for over 30 years; in 1853 they began holding annual sales of teas imported directly from China. At the time of David's death Bradstreet estimated the value of David Torrance and Company in Montreal at $400,000–$500,000.

John Torrance and Company were also interested in shipping and their Montreal Tow Boat Company was to be the first to rival the Molsons in river shipping [see William Molson]. In 1825 the company gained control of the powerful steam tug Hercules, and over the next few years had steamers for both passengers and freight plying the Montreal-Quebec route, including the St George, British America, and the 240-foot Canada, the last being the largest and fastest boat in British North America. By 1831 they were also operating the Voyageur and the Edmund Henry between Montreal and Laprairie, and in 1833 they added the Britannia. Competition with the Molsons on the St Lawrence was at first fierce, but in 1833 both parties "agreed to unite in forming a daily line between Quebec and Montreal for the convenience of the public." At the same time passenger and barge traffic were separated. The Montreal and Quebec Steamboat Company, as the Torrance firm became known, soon had agents at Quebec, Trois-Rivières, Sorel, and Saint-François (Yamaska County) and new boats were added during the 1840s. In late 1853 the Montreal, which they owned with the Molsons and others, was lost off Cape Batiscan, in a snowstorm. The 1850s saw another period of competition, for by 1852 the Tate brothers had established a rival line and in 1856 the Richelieu Company (La Compagnie du Richelieu) [see Jacques-Félix Sincennes] extended its operations to the Montreal-Quebec route. This rivalry resulted in both reduced fares and competitive races until 1858, when an amalgamation was arranged under which the Torrance Company was merged in the Richelieu Line, of which David Torrance became a director.

In 1870 Torrance branched into a different type of shipping, when he became involved with the new Mississippi and Dominion Steamship Company Limited, which was chartered to develop trade from Liverpool to New Orleans and Montreal. The American connection was soon discontinued and the name changed to the Dominion

Line; the Torrance family retained its agency long after David's death.

David Torrance's other main financial interest was the Bank of Montreal. His uncle, Thomas Torrance, had been one of the original shareholders in 1817 and a year later had been elected to the Board of Directors, an office he held until his death in 1826. Thomas' brother John succeeded him and remained a director until 1857; meanwhile, in 1853, David had been elected to the board and by the time Edwin H. King* resigned from the presidency in 1873, he was second in seniority. When Senator Thomas Ryan, the senior director, refused the office of president, the board, of which David's brother-in-law, Sir Alexander Tilloch Galt*, had just become a member, elected Torrance president.

Torrance's presidency of the bank was a short one, for he died in early 1876 and was ill through most of 1875. It was also marked by the major depression which began in 1873, shortly after he was elected president. Nevertheless, profits remained steady, dividends were held at 14 per cent, a loan of $1,250,000 was made to the Grand Trunk Railway in 1873, and in 1874 the bank entered the field of investment banking by jointly underwriting an issue of Quebec provincial bonds with the London firm of Morton, Rose and Company, one of whose principals was its London agent, Sir John Rose*. Torrance's term, however, is easily overlooked, coming as it did between the brilliant presidencies of King and his own vice-president and successor, George Stephen*, later Baron Mount Stephen.

David Torrance was noted for the regularity of his attention to his work; the Montreal Daily Witness summed this up well in his obituary when it stated "he was a diligent merchant, and did not meddle much in public affairs, though he was a consistent Liberal in politics throughout." His only real political activity was in connection with the annexation movement in 1849, when he was treasurer of the Montreal Annexation Association and fifth of the 325 initial signatories of the Annexation Manifesto.

The Torrance family was originally Presbyterian, but became Methodist and was active in the affairs of the St James Street Methodist Church; David contributed £100 to the building fund for the second church in 1845. He became a charter member of the St James Club in 1857. Torrance was also a member of the Montreal Board of Trade, was on its council, and was a member of its committee which was active in obtaining the second act of incorporation for Montreal in 1840. In 1845 he was commissioned a captain in the 8th Battalion, Montreal militia, and in 1847 recommissioned in the 6th Battalion, but was dismissed in 1850 for his part in the annexation movement. In addition he was prominently associated in many benevolent and philanthropic undertakings. Examples are his directorship in the High School of Montreal, which he helped establish in 1843, and his many charitable donations to the Montreal General Hospital, of which he was a governor from 1869 to 1876.

He was survived by five children and one son and four daughters predeceased him. Besides the sons who succeeded him in the business, another son, Edward Fraser Torrance, became minister of St Paul's Presbyterian Church, Peterborough, 1876–1909. David Torrance was an able businessman and a conscientious worker, who "in the days of his prosperity was as regular in attendance at the counting house as when he first started in business." His activities in business, in religion, and with most of his interests, however, seem to be very much a continuation of those of his uncle cum father-in-law John Torrance, who, with his brother Thomas, was the real innovator and founder of the family fortunes.

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

AJM, will of David Torrance, 7 April 1875. PAC, RG 1, L3^{L}, 194, pp.92426–52; RG 9, I, A3, 12; A5, 16, pp.437–38; C4, 1, pp.145, 150; C4, 4, p.266. Bank of Montreal Archives (Montreal), Minute book of the board of directors, 1873–76. Molson Archives (Molson's Brewery, Montreal). "The annexation movement, 1849–50," ed. A. G. Penny, CHR, V (1924), 237. Bradstreet's reports of the dominion of Canada, February 1, 1876 (New York, 1876), 642. Montreal Daily Witness, 20 Jan. 1870, 31 Jan. 1876. Montreal Herald, 15 Oct. 1849, 21 Jan. 1870. The Canadian men and women of the time: a handbook of Canadian biography, ed. H. J. Morgan (1st ed., Toronto, 1898). Notman and Taylor, Portraits of British Americans, II, 228.

C. D. Allin and G. M. Jones, Annexation, preferential trade and reciprocity; an outline of the Canadian annexation movement of 1849–1850, with special reference to the questions of preferential trade and reciprocity (Toronto and London, 1912), 114. Atherton, Montreal, II, 168, 531, 574, 577. Campbell, Hist. of Scotch Presbyterian Church, 313–16. Canada, an encyclopædia, V, 443. The centenary of the Bank of Montreal, 1817–1917 (Montreal, 1917), 50–51, 80. E. A. Collard, The Saint James's Club; the story of the beginnings of the Saint James's Club (Montreal, 1957), 12–13. James Croil, Steam navigation in Canada and its relation to the commerce of Canada and the United States (Toronto, 1898), 221, 308–10, 313–15. Merrill Denison, The barley and the stream; the Molson story . . . (Toronto, 1955), 90, 92, 95, 148, 152, 159–60; Canada's first bank, I, 162, 299; II. G. E. Jacques, Chronicles of the St. James St. Methodist Church, Montreal, from the first rise of Methodism in Montreal to the laying of the corner-stone of the new church on St. Catherine Street (Toronto, 1888), 68, 84, 90. L. C.

Tombs, National problems of Canada; the port of Montreal (McGill University Economic Studies, 6, Toronto, 1926), 36, 38.

TOWNSEND, WILLIAM H., merchant, banker, shipowner, and politician; b. 1812 in New York City, son of William and Lucinda Townsend; m. Sarah Gardner and had two children; d. 14 Oct. 1873 in Yarmouth, N.S.

Round Hill, Annapolis County, would awaken no great expectation in the soul of an ambitious young man, and when his more confident parents abandoned New York for that drowsy hamlet, the young William H. Townsend responded in storybook style and ran away from home in 1828. He chose Yarmouth, the second port in the sometime bustling commerce of Nova Scotia, as his adopted home, learned the wheelwright's trade, and six years after his arrival opened his first ship-chandlery and hardware business there.

Between 1837 and 1870 he was a director or shareholder in the Yarmouth Marine Insurance Association, the Acadian Insurance Company, the Yarmouth Commercial Insurance Company, the Atlantic Insurance Company, and the Pacific Insurance Company. During the same period Townsend launched himself into shipping ventures on an increasingly large scale, until in 1855 he became a director of the Yarmouth Steam Navigation Company which launched Yarmouth's first home-owned steamship. He became the first president of the Bank of Yarmouth in 1865 and served as president of the Exchange Bank of Yarmouth in 1869. The base of his business ventures, however, remained the steady family trade in dry goods and hardware.

His first taste of politics as warden of the short-lived Yarmouth Township apparently whetted a latent appetite; after his defeat in 1858, following a year in office, he stood for the assembly as a Conservative, and sat in opposition to the Joseph Howe–William Young* ministry. Defeat in 1863 failed to eliminate him from the all-important confederation struggle. The sitting member resigned his seat in criticism of Charles Tupper*'s régime and, in 1866, Townsend was re-elected on the strength of a promise to bolt his party on the confederation issue.

His opposition speech was thus necessarily based on the injury dealt Yarmouth in the proposed union. He balked at rerouting trade to the west, at paying Canadian debts with high tariffs, and at the suggestion that the Intercolonial Railway would benefit any ports other than Saint John, N.B. Unlike most prominent "antis," he was opposed not only to the Quebec scheme but to any union. The temper of Yarmouth was so roused that annexation was more to its liking, and Townsend so informed the house. Despite his disagreement with his party, he was not a supporter of the Liberals under William Annand* but a dissenting Tory, caught in the realignments on the hottest issue of his day.

Townsend was re-elected as an anti-confederate in the 1867 election, but by December 1868 he was convinced of the futility of further resistance to the John A. Macdonald*–Tupper machine. He wrote Howe urging him to take a federal post, and explaining his own reluctance to continue in opposition. Both men were old and tired and destined to die within months of one another. In 1872 Townsend's health failed, and he resigned his seat. He was dead within a year.

He was a small historical figure, despite the fact that he walked and talked with the great men of Nova Scotia legend. He was an ordinary, laconic assemblyman of that peculiar Nova Scotia type, presenting his constituents' petitions, performing his committee duties, distributing the local patronage, and leaving the oratory to others. But for the confederation agitation, he might have been forgotten outside his family and his community. As a voice of the shipping and merchant interest, and as one of the 19 who opposed Tupper's union resolution in 1866, he became of more than usual significance.

MARY ELLEN DUBÉ CLANCEY

PANS, Joseph Howe papers; William H. Townsend papers; "Yarmouth genealogy, 1761–1913," compiled by G. S. Brown. Halifax Chronicle-Herald, 21 March 1959. Tribune (Yarmouth), 1863–64, 1866–67. Vanguard (Yarmouth), 2 Aug. 1967. Yarmouth Herald, 1859, 1863–67, 1872–73. Nova Scotia House of Assembly, Debates and proceedings, 1855–61, 1864–67. Directory of N.S. MLAs (Fergusson). G. S. Brown, Yarmouth, Nova Scotia: a sequel to Campbell's history (Boston, 1888). J. R. Campbell, A history of the county of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia (Saint John, N.B., 1876). J. M. Lawson, Yarmouth past and present: a book of reminiscences (Yarmouth, N.S., 1902). K. G. Pryke, "Nova Scotia and confederation, 1864–1870," unpublished PHD thesis, Duke University, 1962.

TREMBLAY, PIERRE-ALEXIS, surveyor, politician, and journalist, commonly known as "Pitre" and familiarly as "Pitre à Kiki" (Kiki being the name given to his father at Charlevoix); b. 27 Dec. 1827 at La Malbaie, L.C., son of Alexis Tremblay and Josephte Duguay; d. 4 Jan. 1879 at Quebec.

Pierre-Alexis Tremblay was educated at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec, where he formed friendships with students later important in the religious world, such as the prelates Dominique* and Antoine Racine*, and the abbés Benjamin Pâquet* and Pierre-Télesphore Sax. Tremblay remained closely attached to his religion, despite the trials and personal attacks to which he was to be subjected later by fervent Catholics, and even by several members of the clergy. His principles and beliefs took a concrete form both in his personal and in his public life. At the time of the disastrous fire of 1870 that ravaged the Saguenay area and ruined several thousand settlers, he travelled throughout the province and wrote many accounts of the calamity, in order to raise enough donations to cover the most urgent needs. In fact Pierre-Alexis Tremblay makes us think of a fighter, an armed knight ready to defend what he believed to be right and just. He was "tall, thin, slender. His drawn features and pale face reveal a high-strung temperament. His well-developed forehead is topped by black hair mingled with silvery streaks." A portrait of Tremblay, preserved in the archives of the Quebec provincial museum, confirms this description.

On 5 Oct. 1853 Pierre-Alexis Tremblay became a surveyor of the Saguenay region, particularly in the townships of Demeulles, Parent, Signay, Labarre, and Caron; he carried out the survey of the Rivière Péribonca and plotted the course of Lac Saint-Jean. His cherished dream, to see the fertile districts of the Saguenay opened to settlement, inevitably clashed with the ambitions of the timber merchants, who then formed "a kind of business aristocracy." Among the most important might be mentioned the Prices, who, in the county of Chicoutimi-Saguenay, "subscribed to the Conservative treasury, and enjoyed in exchange not only commercial privileges but electoral support." Tremblay was opposed to the existing system, despite the enticing offers that were made to him.

Not a man who was afraid of battle, he loved difficulties. Politics gave him ample opportunity to exercise his talents as a jouster; he concerned himself actively with politics from 1857 until his death, in the counties of Chicoutimi-Saguenay and Charlevoix. Pierre-Alexis Tremblay first stood as a candidate on the Conservative ticket, but soon left the party as a result of his opposition to confederation. As an independent, then as a Liberal, he was elected seven times to the Legislative Assembly and to the House of Commons; in 1874, when the end of the double mandate obliged him to make a choice, he decided for the federal arena. It was he who proposed secret balloting at elections, a measure which, before helping the cause of democracy, was first to work against him.

Each of the elections in which Tremblay took part would be worth describing as a good illustration of the electoral customs of the time or an accurate depiction of the political role of the clergy in the years 1870 to 1880. The Charlevoix election of 1876, in which Tremblay was defeated by Hector-Louis Langevin* after a memorable struggle, may be taken as typical. "Undue influence" was exhibited there with particular effectiveness; Tremblay and his collaborators noted several statements on this occasion and produced them before the courts and before Bishop Elzéar-Alexandre Taschereau*. The simple country-folk of Charlevoix County were unable to resist parish priests such as the one at Baie-Saint-Paul: "Document no. 3 proves that on 16 January last, the Reverend [Joseph] Sirois [–Duplessis] . . . depicted me [Tremblay] from the pulpit, me and those who supported me, as dangerous men, persecutors of religion, false prophets and false Christs, venomous serpents seeking to deceive the people. According to this reverend gentleman, if I were elected the people would be threatened with a revolution; the Pope, the bishops, the priests would be led to the scaffold and slaughtered; those who would have supported me would be guilty of all these crimes, and in death's hour they would be a prey to remorse and despair." This famous election of 1876 was an occasion for Tremblay to display his usual perseverance, which finally ensured his triumph in the Supreme Court. In September 1878, in the same county, he was elected by acclamation.

Pierre-Alexis Tremblay is perhaps less known as a journalist, even though he did contribute to several papers such as Le Canadien, La Nation, Le National, and L'Événement; it was particularly in L'Éclaireur that he gave his full measure as a polemicist and popular writer. The most remarkable document we have of him is probably the testament he drew up on his deathbed and addressed to the public. This text, published by the newspapers of the province, was inspired by a charity that led him to pardon all those who had offended him, and to ask forgiveness of all those whom he had hurt in the course of his eventful career. In both cases the individuals were numerous. Finally, he affirmed his fidelity and attachment to the church, despite earlier statements or attitudes which could have given rise to unfavourable interpretations.

Pierre-Alexis Tremblay died on 4 Jan. 1879, as a result of a leg infection of which the origin is unknown. His funeral took place in the cathedral at Quebec, and he was buried in St Patrick's cemetery, in the family vault of his wife, Mary Ellen Connolly. He left no children. In the spring of 1880 his body was transferred to the cemetery of La Malbaie.

NOËL BÉLANGER

The newspapers to which Pierre-Alexis Tremblay contributed are an important source for a study of him. ASHS, Dossier 86, pièces 34, 35, 36; Dossier 1638, pièces 1, 3, 10, 11; Mémoires 115 (Mlle Émilie Tremblay), par. 25, 59, 65, 70. Auguste Achintre, Portraits et dossiers parlementaires du premier parlement de Québec (Montréal, 1871). [Arthur Buies], Chroniques . . . (2v., Québec, 1873–75), I. Rumilly, Hist. de la prov. de Québec, I, II.

TROY, EDWARD, Roman Catholic priest; b. c. 1797, probably in Ireland; d. 2 April 1872 at Torbay, Nfld.

Nothing is known of Edward Troy's birthplace, family background, or education. He was ordained at Carrick-on-Suir, in the diocese of Waterford and Lismore, Ireland, by Bishop Michael Anthony Fleming* of Newfoundland; shortly afterward he sailed for Newfoundland where he landed in May 1831. He served as priest and assistant to Fleming at the chapel in St John's. His zeal and energy were soon evident. In October 1833 Troy presided at the dedication in Portugal Cove of a church whose completion the Newfoundlander credited to his efforts. Edward Troy became known, however, chiefly through his political activities in St John's.

The granting of an elected assembly in 1832 had only emphasized the many divisions in Newfoundland. The colony was increasingly split between the Irish Catholics, mainly fishermen and labourers, influenced by their priests, and the educated and prosperous, both Protestant and Catholic, who were primarily merchants and often English. The Patriot had become the newspaper of the former; the Public Ledger, the focus of Protestant and conservative opposition.

Troy clashed first with Governor Thomas John COCHRANE. Early in 1834 the Patriot published letters of "Junius," accusing the governor of bigotry and injustice. Cochrane was about to sue John V. NUGENT, co-proprietor of the Patriot, when Troy admitted authorship. The governor instituted a libel suit against Troy. It was dropped when Cochrane was replaced by Henry PRESCOTT. There is evidence that Cochrane thought he owed his hostile, mud-spattered send-off from St John's in November 1834 partly to an inflammatory sermon by Troy.

Troy's next antagonist was Henry D. Winton*, proprietor of the Ledger. In December 1833 Winton had praised Troy's moderating influence in helping to disperse a mob besieging Winton's premises because of his denunciation of Fleming's electoral intervention. But by early 1835 the Ledger was reporting that Troy was forbidding his congregation to subscribe to the paper, denying religious rites to Catholics who supported its political sentiments, and prohibiting trade with them under threat of excommunication. In a sermon quoted in the Ledger his bent appears: "I'll put the fear of God in them, and if that does not do I'll put the fear of man in them." The risk of financial ruin and starvation was real for those who failed to obey. The Ledger regarded such use of religious authority as an attempt at political dominance. By spring 1835 even the official newspaper, the Royal Gazette, was alarmed for the freedom of the press and for the whole colonial society. When Winton was assaulted on 19 May by ruffians who cut off his ears, the governor and others blamed the crime on the repeated tirades of Troy and other priests.

In July 1836 Bishop Fleming departed for Europe, leaving Troy as vicar-general for 14 months. He now increased his attacks on Catholics whose political opinions differed from his own. Stigmatizing them as "Orange Catholics" or "Mad Dogs," he denied them even burial rites, and created an uproar and several court cases when he expelled a few from the chapel during service. In the autumn elections of 1836 Troy campaigned for candidates to the assembly. After a boisterous rally on 23 October, he and candidates William Carson*, Patrick Morris*, and John KENT were indicted for illegal and riotous assembly. Although acquitted in January 1837, they were accused by the Protestant press of a deplorable attempt to intimidate the electorate. Troy's "popular" (radical) candidates were elected, but the election was declared invalid. In the new election of May 1837, Troy instructed his people to vote for the same candidates, and participated in their successful campaigns. He even took an active part in the new assembly. On 7 July 1837 the Ledger noted: "we have occasionally glanced up at the reporter's box and witnessed the gaunt, stalworth [sic] frame and figure of the Rev. Father TROY, leaning upon his elbows and grinning ineffable delight at the proceedings of his Parliament below. . . ."

The final phase of Father Troy's political career centred on Henry John Boulton*, chief justice since 1833. The Catholic reformers thought him harsh and unfair in the exercise of his office, and he had been subjected to constant attacks, especially by the Patriot. In 1835 he charged its editor, Robert John Parsons*, with contempt, heard the case, and convicted him. Troy joined the Constitutional Society which sought Boulton's removal, and subscribed on Fleming's behalf to its fund to pay Parsons' fine. By December 1837 an impasse between the assembly and the Legislative Council, of which Boulton was president, and his continued judicial severity impelled the assembly to send Carson, Morris, and Nugent to England to press for his removal. Boulton crossed the Atlantic to defend himself. Bishop Fleming joined the assemblymen and from London wrote to Troy with news and also instructions that indicate Troy's influence with the assemblymen in St John's. Troy campaigned against Boulton by sermons and petitions displayed in the chapel for signatures. When word reached St John's in August that the British government had dismissed Boulton, Troy ordered a Te Deum. His actions aroused further anger and anxiety in Newfoundland. The Colonial Office had already sought Troy's removal, in 1836 and in 1837, and through the Foreign Office had got the Congregation of Propaganda to request Fleming to control the political activity of his priests. The mounting disorder in Newfoundland and the threat to its prosperity led the Foreign Office to take final steps to make Rome fully aware of Troy's actions. A decision to remove Troy from St John's was apparently made; his name disappears from newspaper reports and it seems probable that early in 1839 Fleming ordered him to Merasheen Island in Placentia Bay.

After 1839 Troy appears to have been out of favour for a while. He was not mentioned as present at the laying of the foundation stone of the cathedral in St John's in May 1841. From 1848 on he once more took part in major annual religious celebrations in St John's, and was also noted as assisting at other important services in the 1850s and 1860s such as the consecration of the cathedral in September 1855.

Father Troy's energies were channelled into parish activities. In his seven or eight years at Merasheen he built a church and presbytery. Then he moved to Torbay as parish priest for his last 25 years. There he replaced the existing wooden church with a stone one, consecrated in October 1863. In 1865 a convent and school house, with four nuns of the Presentation Order, were established at Torbay. Michael Francis Howley*, in his Ecclesiastical history of Newfoundland, credited him with a spreading of the Catholic faith in the area, and told of often seeing him walking the nine miles back from St John's carrying a sack of nails.

A deed of property drawn up 28 May 1870 reveals that Troy focussed much of his energy upon acquiring land in Torbay and erecting a permanent presbytery to ensure the presence of a Roman Catholic priest. Single-minded energy, discipline, sacrifice, and pride are all manifest in his chronicle of privations and achievement attached to the deed. ". . . owing to the failure of the fisheries and consequent decrease in the revenues of the Parish, I was compelled to use the poorest description of food nor could I afford to procure sugar for my table and was obliged to use molasses. . . . I was often pained when visited by priests at not being able to give them a dinner nor even a glass of wine but so anxious was I to leave a dwelling House for a Priest that I joyfully submitted to these privations." Years of work enabled him to transfer ten acres of land (Father Troy's farm), a dwelling, coachhouse, and outhouses to a group which included his brother-in-law John Delaney*, postmaster general of St John's, and his nephew Father Patrick Delaney, to be held in trust. By this time his powers were declining, but he served until his death at the age of 75.

Bishop Fleming had lauded Troy as Newfoundland's most zealous missionary. His obituary in the Newfoundlander paid tribute to the warmth, simplicity, and kindliness which won him the veneration of the lowly. For more than forty years he had been an energetic, ambitious pioneer of Roman Catholicism in Newfoundland.

PHYLLIS CREIGHTON

Archives of the Archdiocese of St John's, Deed of land of Edward Troy (includes autobiographical material). PANL, material gathered on Edward Troy from various files. Newfoundlander (St John's), 1831–43, 1837–38, 1845–70, especially 31 March, 30 April 1869; 5 April 1872. Public Ledger (St John's), 1833–40, especially 24, 27 Feb., 6, 17 March 1835; 25 March, 7 Oct., 22 Nov. 1836; 7 Feb., 7 July 1837. Royal Gazette (St John's), 1833–35, 1837–38. G.B., Parl., House of Commons paper, 1839, XXXIV, 525, pp.565–94, Newfoundland: return to an address of the honourable the House of Commons dated 12 July 1839; – for, copy of any addresses received at the Colonial Office from the Legislative Council or Assembly of Newfoundland, or from public bodies of individuals in that colony, relative to the state of affairs there. Gunn, Political history of Nfld. M. F. Howley, Ecclesiastical history of Newfoundland (Boston, 1888). "The new church at Torbay," Newfoundland Quarterly, XXI (April 1922), 12.

TRUTEAU, ALEXIS-FRÉDÉRIC, secular priest, canon, vicar general, superior of a religious community, and administrator of the diocese of Montreal; b. 11 June 1808 at Montreal, L.C., son of Toussaint Truteau, a contractor, and Marie-Louise Papineau; d. 28 Dec. 1872 at Montreal, Que.

Alexis-Frédéric Truteau made his first communion on 25 May 1818, and was confirmed in June 1819 by Jean-Louis Lefebvre de Cheverus, first Catholic bishop of Boston. He received a classical education at the college of Montreal, and, after completing his studies, took the clerical habit and became a teacher in the same institution. During his years of teaching he studied theology and received the various orders, finally being ordained priest on 18 Sept. 1830 by Bishop Jean-Jacques Lartigue*.

On 25 September of the same year he was appointed curate at Boucherville (Chambly County). He was summoned by Bishop Lartigue to the bishop's palace at Montreal on 27 Sept. 1831 to direct the young ecclesiastics who, for want of a seminary, were studying theology there. Being in close communion of ideas and doctrine with his hierarchical superior, he imbued his disciples with ultramontane principles. Later Abbé Truteau held the office of procurator, then in 1836 that of secretary to the bishop in place of Abbé Ignace Bourget*.

When Bishop Bourget, who succeeded Bishop Lartigue in 1840, established the chapter of his bishopric, he chose Abbé Truteau as one of the first canons. The latter were installed on 21 Jan. 1841 by Bishop Charles-Auguste-Marie-Joseph de Forbin-Janson*, who had been invited, on completing the great retreat he had just preached at Montreal, to preside over the ceremony, which was entirely new for this city. On 21 Dec. 1847, with the death of the vicar general Hyacinthe Hudon, Canon Truteau was chosen to succeed him; he was to hold this office for a quarter of a century.

In 1867, on the occasion of the anniversary of St Peter's death, he was delegated by his bishop to travel to Rome with Bishop Joseph Desautels*, the parish priest of Varennes (Verchères County), and Canon Étienne-Hippolyte Hicks. The purpose of his voyage was to work, together with his colleagues, towards the settlement of the difficulties that existed at the time between the Sulpicians and the diocesan bishop, over the breaking up of Notre-Dame parish.

In addition to his duties at the bishop's palace at Montreal, Truteau was entrusted with the direction of several religious communities, among others the Institut de la Providence, which he guided as confessor or superior for 21 years. His subordinates liked to call him "the worthy Father Truteau."

But vicar general Truteau deserves to go down in history especially for the important part he played in the Guibord affair (Joseph Guibord*, dit Archambault) as administrator of the diocese of Montreal in the absence of Bishop Bourget, who on 19 Jan. 1869 had left for Rome to attend the Vatican council. On 18 Nov. 1869 Truteau wrote to the Sulpician Benjamin-Victor Rousselot, parish priest of Notre-Dame, to tell him that, having received the day before "a letter from the bishop of Montreal" instructing him to "refuse absolution, even at the point of death, to those who belong to the Institut Canadien and are not willing to cease to be members of it" [see Gonzalve DOUTRE], he could not "allow ecclesiastical burial to those of its members who died without having withdrawn from it"; he added: "You tell me that M. Guibord was a member of the Institut and that he died without having left it; therefore it is impossible for me to grant him ecclesiastical burial."

Guibord's widow, Henriette Brown, brought a legal action against the parish priest and the first churchwarden of Notre-Dame for having opposed the burial of her husband's remains in the part of the cemetery reserved for Catholics, and Truteau, as administrator, was called to give evidence before Judge Charles-Elzéar MONDELET. In his testimony on 10 and 11 Jan. 1870, he stated that "ecclesiastical burial," "being under the sole jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical authority," had had "to be refused" Guibord, "because the minor excommunication to which he had been subjected made him a public sinner," he having incurred this penalty "because he was a member of the Institut Canadien," "which was, as it still is, under the censure of the Church."

Three days later the administrator gave his hierarchical superior an account of his actions and his state of mind on that occasion: "At the court of inquiry before which I was summoned, I began by protesting that in such a matter, since it was a question of an ecclesiastical burial and not of a simple burial, I recognized as my superiors, entitled to require me to account for my conduct, only my Bishop and the Holy Father. Notwithstanding, Judge Mondelet forced me to speak, although my protest was recorded. In the end I was not sorry to answer, in order to make better known the institute's behaviour and its existence in a state of excommunication."

In the same letter vicar general Truteau made some forecasts about the outcome of this lawsuit: "If the affair is pleaded before Judge Mondelet, the Institute is likely to win the first time. But then the case will be appealed again, and all the odds will be against it." He did not live long enough to discover that if he had been accurate in the first part of his prediction, he had not anticipated the decision of the English Privy Council, which on 21 Nov. 1874 was to confirm Mondelet's judgement.

All testimonies agree that Alexis-Frédéric Truteau was an exemplary priest, zealous and sympathetic towards the suffering of others; but it must be admitted that, blindly submissive as he was to the instructions of a passionately ultramontane bishop, he lacked the suppleness and openness of mind that would have given a quite different turn to an "Affair" in which the initial refusal to bury a Catholic in a Catholic cemetery appeared to an impartial observer, Robert-Alexis Lefaivre, the French consul at Quebec, "of a severity unheard of in our century."

Philippe Sylvain

ACAM, 420.005. Archives du ministère des Affaires étrangères (Paris), Correspondance politique des consuls, Angleterre, 50, f.33. La Minerve (Montréal), 12 janv., 13 janv. 1870. L'Institut de la Providence; histoire des Filles de la Charité Servantes des Pauvres dites sœurs de la Providence (2v., Montréal, 1925–28). [Ignace Bourget], Mémoire pour servir à l'histoire du chapitre de la cathédrale S. Jacques de Montréal (Montréal, 1882), 141–57.

TURCOTTE, LOUIS-PHILIPPE, historian; b. 11 July 1842 at Saint-Jean, Île d'Orléans, C.E., of the marriage of Jean-Baptiste Turcotte, farmer, and Marie-Josephte Fortier; d. a bachelor on 3 April 1878 at Quebec.

After his first years of study at the parish school, Louis-Philippe Turcotte entered the first form at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec in 1855, and left it three years later without finishing his classical education. He then worked as a clerk for one of his brothers, a Quebec businessman. On 23 Dec. 1859, while crossing the frozen river to get to Île d'Orléans, he fell into the icy water, and this accident left him infirm for the rest of his life. He retired to his parents' house at Saint-Jean and was encouraged by the parish priest, M. Antoine Gosselin, to explore the archives of the Île d'Orléans. This research enabled him to publish in 1867 his Histoire de l'île d'Orléans, dealing with the French period; in it he outlined the history of each parish and recounted shipwrecks in which islanders had been the victims. He then undertook the preparation of his principal work, Le Canada sous l'Union the first part of which was published in 1871 and the second in 1872. He followed a chronological order from 1841 to 1867 and gave a faithful but colourless account of political events. He showed no ability to draw the threads together or to express views of his own.

In December 1872 Louis-Philippe Turcotte became assistant librarian of the library of the Quebec legislature, which was directed by Léon-Pamphile Le May*. In November 1873 he was admitted to membership in the Institut Canadien of Quebec, where he held the offices of librarian (1874–77) and vice-president (1877). He had been president for two months when, on 3 April 1878, he died at Quebec.

Besides the two works already mentioned, Turcotte published in 1873, at Quebec, two short biographies, one of the Honourable René-Édouard Caron, lieutenant governor of the province of Quebec, and the other of Sir George-Étienne Cartier. In 1875, at the Institut Canadien, he organized a celebration of the centenary of the Americans' siege of Quebec in 1775. The following year he published an account of these celebrations, as well as a study called Invasion du Canada et siège de Québec en 1775–1776.

Louis-Philippe Turcotte was a conscientious worker, but, lacking a certain kind of intellectual development, a proper perspective on events, and elementary qualities of style, he was able to produce only one useful work.

J.-C. Bonenfant

L.-P. Turcotte, Le Canada sous l'Union, 1841–1867 (2v., 1re éd., Québec, 1871–72; 2e éd., Québec, 1882); Histoire de l'île d'Orléans (Québec, 1867); L'honorable R.-É. Caron, lieutenant-gouverneur de la province de Québec (Québec, 1873); L'honorable sir G.-É. Cartier, ministre de la milice (Québec, 1873); Invasion du Canada et siège de Québec en 1775–1776 (Québec, 1876). Dom. ann. reg., 1878, 368–69. Annuaire de l'Institut canadien de Québec, 1878 (Québec, 1879), 75–86. Henri d'Arles, Nos historiens (Montréal, 1921), 125–55. N.-H.-É. Faucher de Saint-Maurice, "Louis Turcotte," RSCT, 1st ser., I (1883), sect.I, 111–18.

V

VALOIS, NARCISSE, tanner and city councillor; b. 12 Aug. 1811 at Vaudreuil, L.C., eldest son of Captain Narcisse Valois*, a Patriote of 1837, and Agathe Lalonde; d. 28 Aug. 1880 at Montreal, Que.

When he was still an adolescent, Narcisse Valois found employment at Montreal. At the time of his marriage with Ursule Ritchot, in November 1837 at Montreal, he was described as a tanner. After 1850 his establishment was situated in the west of the town, in the Saint-Antoine district, where in 1874 the parish of Saint-Joseph was set up, and where later the Canadian Pacific Railway station was built.

He was a city councillor of Montreal by 1846, and from 1853 on represented Saint-Antoine ward as councillor or alderman. He sat on the city council for more than 20 years, and during the last two (1867–69) he became once more alderman for East ward, which he had first represented in 1846. He was vice-president of the temperance society of the diocese of Montreal in 1863, and was also a member of the Roman Catholic School Commission during the year 1869–70.

Narcisse Valois was 69 when on 28 Aug. 1880 he passed away at Montreal, intestate according to the inventory of his possessions drawn up on 28 December by the notary Évariste-Odilon Labadie. He was buried in the crypt of the chapel of the sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, which had been built through the good offices of his uncle, Simon Valois*, likewise a tanner. Narcisse Valois left few assets, apart from a two-storey stone building in Rue Saint-Vincent, adjoining that of his uncle Simon.

His wife, Ursule Ritchot, survived him by five years. He is known to have had one son, Jude, a commercial agent, and four daughters.

Jean-Jacques Lefebvre

AJM, Registre d'état civil. AVM, Biographies de conseillers. Le Courrier de Montréal, 1^{er} sept. 1880. Fauteux, Patriotes, 390–91.

VAN CORTLANDT, EDWARD, physician, surgeon, and author; b. 1805 in Newfoundland, son of Major Philip Van Cortlandt, an officer in the War of the American Revolution, and United Empire Loyalist; d. 25 March 1875 in Ottawa, Ont.

Edward Van Cortlandt was educated in Quebec at the school run by the Reverend Daniel Wilkie*, and from 1819 to 1825 he studied medicine in Quebec under Dr William Hackett. He then went to England and, in 1827, passed the examinations at the Royal College of Surgeons in London, receiving praise from the celebrated John Abernethy and from Sir Anthony Carlisle for "the creditable manner in which he passed through the vigorous ordeal." In 1829 he was chosen over 12 competitors to be librarian to the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society, an early indication of a bookish tendency.

Van Cortlandt returned to Canada in 1832, and on 26 December was authorized by the provincial secretary to practise medicine in Lower Canada. The succeeding year, he went to the new frontier community of Bytown (later named Ottawa), Upper Canada, on the recommendation of Dr James Skey. There he quickly established a large and lucrative practice and in 1834 served through the cholera epidemic. He contributed his services gratuitously for a time in the lower Bytown hospital of the Grey Nuns of the Cross under Élisabeth Bruyère who had arrived from Montreal in 1845, and he was appointed physician and later consulting physician to their General Hospital which was established in 1851. He was coroner of the city of Ottawa, physician to the county gaol, and surgeon for some 20 years to the Ottawa Field Battery.

Edward Van Cortlandt also had a deep interest in other aspects of science, particularly geology and archeology. In 1843, when workmen building the Union Bridge came upon an Indian burial site on the Ottawa River, he carried out searches, collected artifacts, and recorded his work in a report which appeared in 1853 in the Canadian Journal. He published, in 1854, a little study entitled The productions of the Ottawa district of Canada, and, in 1860, a significant brochure entitled Observations on the building stone of the Ottawa country. In the latter, Van Cortlandt claims to have earlier called to the attention of Lord Elgin [James Bruce*] the location of the stone from which the parliament building was constructed. Van Cortlandt also contributed many articles to Ottawa newspapers and took part in civic movements, including a celebration of the tercentenary of Shakespeare's birth.

Van Cortlandt was a founding member of the Ottawa Silurian Society, president of the Horticultural Society, the Mechanics' Institute, the Athenaeum, and one-time secretary to the Board of Arts and Manufactures of Montreal. Almost from his arrival in Bytown he was an ardent promoter of the Ottawa region, and occasionally established exhibits of its products. He constructed a private museum of archeology and geology in the capital and opened it to the public.

Edward Van Cortlandt was a "bold surgeon and a good operator," if mannered in style. It is said that he imitated "the great Abernethy" but, "as always happens, a second edition was a failure." He was "eccentric in his manner," and was no doubt quarrelsome; about 1839 he was involved in an assault against one Lieutenant Hadden over pet animals. In the same year he pursued the impecunious Wright family for non-payment of an account in respect of Philemon Wright*'s last illness, and threatened to treat Wright's son Ruggles* the way he had Hadden. When he died in 1875, however, his obituaries stated that his "genial and warm-hearted qualities won the esteem of a large circle of acquaintances."

He married Harriet Amelia Harrington of St Andrews East (county of Argenteuil), Quebec, and they had four daughters and two sons. One daughter, Gertrude, was a writer and published Records of the rise and progress of the City of Ottawa, from the foundation of the Rideau Canal to the present time (Ottawa, 1858).

Edward Van Cortlandt died in 1875 and received full military honours from the Ottawa Field Battery.

Courtney C. J. Bond

Edward Van Cortlandt, "Notes on an Indian burying ground," Canadian Journal, I (1852–53), 160–61; Observations on the building stone of the Ottawa country; being the abridgment of a lecture delivered before the Ottawa Silurian Society, the 15th November, 1859 ([Ottawa], 1860); The productions of the Ottawa district of Canada . . . (Montreal, 1854).

PAC, MG 12, D, T28, 14, p.12; MG 23, D1 (Chipman papers), ser.1, 26, p.207; MG 24, D8 (Wright papers), 27, ff.10674, 10727–28; 35, ff.16013–14, 16241–42; I9 (Hill collection), 3, ff.754–55; 19, ff.4697–99, 4712–15, 4723–24; 20, ff.5046–59, 5105–6; 21, ff.5456–57, 5459; 30, ff.7523; RG 8, I, D2, 1203½P, pp.128, 140, 162, 196. PRO, CO 5/1067, pp.172–73. Ottawa Citizen, 9 Feb., 26 April 1864, 3 Jan. 1953. Ottawa Free Press, 27 March 1875. The Quebec directory, or strangers' guide to the city, for 1826 . . ., ed. John Smith (Quebec, 1826), 44. Quebec Mercury, 29 Dec. 1832.

Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, 381. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 766. C. C. J. Bond, City on the Ottawa (Ottawa, 1967), 37. Canniff, Medical profession in Upper Canada, 652–53. J. W. Hughson and C. C. J. Bond, Hurling down the pine; the story of the Wright, Gilmour and Hughson families, timber and lumber manufacturers in the Hull and Ottawa region and on the Gatineau River, 1800–1920 (2nd ed., Old Chelsea, Que., 1965), 31. C. C. J. Bond, "Alexander James Christie, Bytown pioneer; his life and times, 1787–1843," Ont. Hist., LVI (1964), 16–36.

VANDUSEN (Van Dusen), CONRAD, Methodist minister; b. 14 Dec. 1801 in Adolphustown, U.C., son of Conrad Vandusen, a loyalist veteran who had been sentenced to death by the American forces for his activities during the Revolution; d. 18 Aug. 1878 in Whitby, Ont.

Conrad Vandusen grew up in comfortable circumstances at Adolphustown, where his father owned a tavern and a store, and in Marysburgh Township (now North and South Marysburgh). He acquired a good education for that period. In his youth he was "vivacious, droll," and "distinguished for the use of cant or slang phrases," according to John Carroll* who served on a neighbouring circuit in 1830. Although his father was one of the founders of the Hay Bay chapel near Adolphustown, the first Methodist church in Upper Canada, the young Vandusen was evidently a lively fellow who, according to a later clerical observer, badly needed the restraints imposed by a marriage at 18 and his work as teacher and farmer. In 1827, however, he was converted at a camp meeting near Demorestville, Ameliasburgh Township. "He could hardly tell the hour or the place where the light of God's countenance broke in upon him. By the time, however, that he had got back to his home, he was happy and his soul overflowing with love." Immediately he began to spread the word to his neighbours.

Vandusen was soon pressed into service as a Methodist itinerant, at first as the assistant on the Whitby circuit, to which he would retire decades later. Received on trial in 1830, he was ordained into the Wesleyan Methodist Church at the conference of 1833. In subsequent years he laboured inconspicuously if not quietly on several circuits across Upper Canada, and gained an enviable reputation as an heroic but kindly minister.

In 1849, when Victoria College at Cobourg had few students and was low in funds, Vandusen was appointed governor and treasurer. Confronted with the necessity of retaining students "by the argument a posteriori, that is by holding onto their coat-tails," he devised an ingenious plan to build up an endowment through the sale of scholarships that would entitle the purchasers to free tuition for members of their families. It was "a natural product of a decade of speculation," but unfortunately it yielded little permanent return to the college.

Vandusen returned to his regular work as a preacher in 1852 as chairman of the mission of Newash, an Indian village near Owen Sound, and was superannuated in 1859. He continued to preach in the 1860s, mainly in the Toronto area and on the Wardsville circuit, but his attention centred increasingly on writing. In 1867, under the pseudonym of "Enemikeese," he published The Indian chief, in which he used the life of David Sawyer, an Indian Methodist minister, to illustrate the mistreatment of Indian tribes. The same year saw his Practical theology, an illuminating example of the literal way in which he and his contemporaries used biblical texts to construct a complete theology. Three years later he issued The prodigy, a memoir of the brilliant physician, G. E. A. Winans, and The successful young evangelist, a brief biography of Winans' brother, William Henry Winans. Appropriately, in 1878 he produced The doctrine of the human soul in which he argued, on biblical grounds, that man consists of body, soul, and spirit, and that death constitutes the birth of man's spiritual body in which his personality is preserved without physical defects and limitations.

In many ways, Conrad Vandusen exemplified the qualities of the first generation of native Canadian Methodist ministers. A tall, powerful man, famous for his endurance, he was equally notorious for his strongly conservative political attitudes and for his human touch. He had "a strong, inquiring, almost metaphysical mind" which he sought to develop by hard study, but he never attained intellectual or cultural sophistication. His preaching was vigorous and earthy: for him an indolent Christian was "like a lazy hired man, who would leave his corn-hoeing and spend his time chasing squirrels"; the Christian was not to forget that "the devil paid his servants as the cat paid the owl, over the face and eyes." His writings display some originality, but little literary skill. They are today chiefly significant for the light they throw on the climate of opinion within the Methodist community in his generation. His devoted work as minister and writer imparted a measure of comfort and a sense of purpose to the lives of many Upper Canadians.

G. S. French

Conrad Vandusen was the author of The doctrine of the human soul; philosophy of a trinity in man, and the phenomena of death, philosophically considered, showing that death will produce no additional pang in the hour of dissolution (Toronto, 1878); Practical theology: a plain exposition of various subjects based upon divine revelation (London, 1867); The prodigy, a brief account of the bright career of a youthful genius, Dr. G. E. A. Winans, together with some interesting extracts from his correspondence and manuscripts (Toronto, 1870); The successful young evangelist; an account of the brief but brilliant career of Wm. Henry Winans, Wesleyan preacher . . . (Toronto, 1870); and, under the pseudonym of Enemikeese, The Indian chief: an account of the labours, losses, sufferings, and oppression of Ke-zig-ko-e-ne-ne (David Sawyer) a chief of the Ojibbeway Indians in Canada West (London, 1867).

Christian Guardian (Toronto), 18 April 1860, 5 March 1879. Methodist Church of Canada, Minutes of the Toronto conference (Toronto, Montreal), 1879. The minutes of the annual conferences of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada, from 1824 to 1857 (2v., Toronto, 1846–63), I. William Canniff, History of the province of Ontario (Upper Canada) . . . (Toronto, 1872), 125. C. B. Sissons, A history of Victoria University (Toronto, 1952).

VanKOUGHNET, PHILIP (the name is often spelled Vankoughnet but he consistently used VanKoughnet), merchant and politician; b. probably 2 April 1790, at New Johnstown (Cornwall) in the district of Luneburg (later part of Upper Canada), son of Michael VanKoughnet, whose father was Alsatian, and Eve Empey, both loyalists; d. 7 May 1873.

Michael VanKoughnet was a large landowner and his son was educated at John Strachan*'s grammar school. With this background it is not surprising that Philip became an avid defender of the British connection. He served as a subaltern during the War of 1812 and was present at the battle of Crysler's Farm where the advance of an American force on Cornwall was stopped. A quarter of a century later, in 1838, VanKoughnet, now a lieutenant-colonel, commanded a battalion of militia at the battle of the Windmill against the American invaders who sympathized with the Canadian rebels.

VanKoughnet began his political career at an early age. He was elected to the assembly of Upper Canada for the riding of Stormont and Russell in 1816 as a staunch defender of the colonial administration. He held one of the two seats of the county of Stormont from 1820 when they were created until 1828, and again from 1830 to 1834, and his friend Archibald McLean* held the second seat during the same period.

In 1836, two years after leaving the assembly, VanKoughnet, clearly a secondary member of the Family Compact, was appointed to the Legislative Council by Sir Francis Bond Head, no doubt on the recommendation of Sir John Colborne* whom Bond Head had just succeeded. One week after his commission as councillor, VanKoughnet preceded Colborne in a Cornwall procession and carried a standard inscribed "Sir John Colborne and the Constitution" to assert the town's loyalty. He was not reappointed to the upper chamber after the union of 1841 and appears to have virtually retired from politics until 1857 when he re-emerged briefly. He contested the Cornwall seat unsuccessfully for the Conservatives when John Sandfield Macdonald switched his candidacy from Glengarry to the town. The Conservative efforts succeeded in keeping Macdonald tied to the local contest but VanKoughnet lost 428 to 246.

As a merchant and landowner, VanKoughnet was involved in several projects to improve transportation in the Cornwall area. In 1831 he was a member of a commission on roads and bridges in the township of Cornwall. Two years later he was one of the commissioners appointed to put into effect an act authorizing the financing and construction of the Cornwall Canal, begun in 1834 to improve navigation on the St Lawrence from Dickinson's Landing to Cornwall, a distance of 11½ miles.

In 1833 VanKoughnet was appointed to the newly formed 5th division of the Cornwall and Roxborough Court of Requests as one of the 11 commissioners. He held this office until the court was abolished in 1841. In 1870, after a prolonged absence from public life, he was appointed chairman of the Canadian Board of Government Arbitrators, a position he still held at his death.

In 1819 he had married Harriet Sophia Scott of Carrick-on-Suir, Tipperary County, Ireland, who predeceased him. The most distinguished of their several children was Philip M. M. S. Vankoughnet*, who died in 1869.

Bruce W. Hodgins

Queen's University Archives, Edmund Morris papers, "Colonel, the Hon. Philip Vankoughnet, M.L.C."

Armstrong, Handbook of Upper Canadian chronology, 27, 35, 64, 69, 70, 73, 75. B. W. Hodgins, "The political career of John Sandfield Macdonald to the fall of his administration in March 1864: a study in Canadian politics," unpublished PHD thesis, Duke University, 1964. J. F. Pringle, Lunenburgh or the old Eastern District, its settlement and early progress; with personal recollections of the town of Cornwall, from 1824 . . . (Cornwall, Ont., 1890), 34, 46, 66, 77–78, 155–62, 242, 260, 266–67.

VIGER, BONAVENTURE, Patriote; b. 14 May 1804 at Boucherville, son of Bonaventure Viger and Louise Carmel-Levasseur, and cousin of Denis-Benjamin Viger*; d. 15 Dec. 1877 at Beloeil, Que.

Bonaventure Viger is known above all for his share in the disturbances of 1837. Before that date, we have no knowledge of him. Viger, one of Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU's most loyal supporters, was "of a fiery and generous disposition." Consequently, on 16 Nov. 1837, when he learned that Dr Joseph-François Davignon and the notary Pierre-Paul Desmaray were being taken to prison in Montreal as a result of their active participation in the Patriotes' meetings, he had no hesitation in taking up arms to free the prisoners. Viger and a handful of men set up an ambush near Longueuil, awaiting a detachment, commanded by Lieutenant Ermatinger; they succeeded in setting Davignon and Desmaray free. This first act of hostility on the part of the Patriotes against the English soldiers marked the beginning of skirmishes. Subsequently, Viger took part in the battles at Saint-Denis and Saint-Charles. He was taken prisoner at Bedford, in the Eastern Townships, together with Louis-Isaac Larocque, a comrade in arms: the two of them, in an attempt to reach the American border after the defeat at Saint-Charles, had lost their way in the neighbouring woods.

Viger was incarcerated in Montreal prison on 7 Dec. 1837; he proved to be the most unruly of all the political prisoners, and numerous legends have circulated concerning him. In June 1838 he was one of eight prisoners sentenced to exile in the Bermudas. Set free in October of the same year, Viger settled in the United States, near the border, and had further brushes with the law. He rashly entered Canada, where he was again arrested. He was taken to Montreal prison on 8 June 1839, and he and two companions were charged with the murder of the loyalist Vosburgh. The affair came to an abrupt end in December 1840, when the jurors were unable to reach agreement.

After 1840 Viger lived a quiet life. On 11 Oct. 1841, at Boucherville, he married Eudoxie Trudel, by whom he had five children. In a short while his cheeses made him as famous as his other exploits. In 1867 he was a militia captain and the coroner at Saint-Bruno de Chambly. Viger was undoubtedly a popular and legendary hero, "one of the figures whose memory playwrights and novelists were to take pleasure in preserving."

JEAN-MARC PARADIS

ANQ, Ludger Duvernay, nos.308, 317; QBC, Procureur général, Événements de 1837–1838, nos.50, 52, 54, 55, 59, 61, 62, 65, 68, 301, 355, 1485, 2871, 3082, 3100, 3180, 4103, 4145. PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), XXX. "J.-J. Girouard à sa femme," RHAF, XIX (1965–66), 463–64. "Les Patriotes aux Bermudes en 1838, lettres d'exil," Yvon Thériault, édit., RHAF, XVI (1962–63), 117–26, 439–40; XVII (1963–64), 428–30. C.-M. Boissonnault, Histoire politico-militaire des Canadiens français 1763–1945 (Trois-Rivières, Qué., 1967). J. D. Borthwick, History of the Montreal prison from A.D. 1784 to A.D. 1886 . . . (Montreal, 1886); Jubilé de diamant, rébellion de 1837–1838; précis complet de cette période, rôle d'honneur ou liste complète des Patriotes détenus dans les prisons de Montréal en 1837–1838–1839; date et lieux des arrestations et autres détails intéressants et inédits sur ce sujet (Montréal, 1898). David, Patriotes, 130–37. L.-P. Desrosiers, L'accalmie; lord Durham au Canada (Montréal, 1937). Duclos de Celles, Patriotes of 1837. Fauteux, Patriotes. Lionel Groulx, Histoire du Canada français depuis la découverte (4ᵉ éd., 2v., Montréal et Paris, 1960), II. S. B. Ryerson, Unequal union; confederation and the roots of conflict in the Canadas, 1815–1873 (Toronto, 1968). L.-O. David, "Les hommes de 1837–1838," L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 15 févr. 1877. Léon Ledieu, "Entre nous," Le Monde illustré (Montréal), 5 nov. 1887. R.-L. Séguin, "Biographie d'un patriote de '37, le Dr Luc-Hyacinthe Masson (1811–1880)," RHAF, III (1949–50), 349–67.

VOYER, LUDGER-NAPOLÉON, soldier and writer; b. 20 April 1842 at Quebec, son of Louis Voyer, a wheelwright; d. accidentally 22 Feb. 1876 at Quebec.

Information about Louis-Napoléon Voyer's childhood is almost non-existent. We know, however, that he entered the college at Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière in 1854, at the age of 12. There, under the influence of Abbé Pierre-Stanislas Vallée, a teacher at the college and an enthusiast of military history, he decided to take up a military career.

In 1858, England obtained authorization from the Canadian authorities to raise an infantry regiment in Canada, the 100th Royal Canadian Regiment of Foot. It was the first time a regiment of regular soldiers was recruited in Canada to serve imperial interests abroad. Rapidly, 1,027 men were enlisted. Voyer was one of them. On 25 July 1859 he was sworn in, thanks to the support given by "protectors in high places." He embarked at Quebec on 9 November of the same year, bound for England.

We know little concerning the motives that prompted the youth of 17 to enlist in the British army. There are only hints. In the diary he kept from 1859 to 1870 is the following passage: "My engagement, honour, and duty take me still further away from my country. My great, my sole hope is to earn distinction, to have my name attached to some meritorious act, some glorious deed, so that it will be repeated at home, and so that my friends will speak of me with interest. . . ." If this text sheds some small light on the motives, it tells nothing about the social, family, and other reasons behind his decision. André-Napoléon Montpetit*, one of Voyer's friends, merely reports that he enlisted "despite his parents, protectors, and friends."

From 1859 to 1863 his military career abroad was uneventful. He seems to have accepted life in barracks at Parkhurst, on the Isle of Wight, and at Gibraltar calmly and patiently. He took advantage of it to improve his education by studying languages, history, and commerce, and to observe the behaviour of the British, Spaniards, and others. His personal diary of this period reveals certain traits of his personality, in particular perseverance, tolerance, a sense for observation, and a spirit of discipline. On 15 April 1863 he obtained a three months' leave to come to Canada. He was never to leave it again.

On 15 June 1863 Sir Étienne-Paschal Taché*, the minister of militia, appointed him special instructor to the Canadian militia; this appointment was confirmed on 20 July by the Duke of Cambridge, commander-in-chief of the British army. He worked as an instructor at various places: Rivière-du-Loup, Trois-Pistoles, the college at Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière, Quebec, and Lévis. On 31 July 1865 he purchased his discharge from the 100th Regiment. On 9 January of the following year he was appointed captain in the 9th battalion, Voltigeurs de Québec, which had been formed earlier by drawing upon Quebec independent volunteer companies. He served as captain for four years and six months. His career as an officer at Quebec was in fact no more thrilling than his career as a soldier in the 100th Regiment. Throughout the whole of the Fenian crisis, which alarmed the Canadian authorities unduly, he saw only garrison duty at Quebec and in the Eastern Townships.

It is not improbable that Voyer was grieved by the drab quality of his military career, for he was a man who extolled warlike virtues and idealized the life of the soldier. "Each of them," he wrote in 1865 in Les qualités morales du bon militaire, "when he takes up his arms receives as in trust the safety of our countryside, the tranquillity of our towns, the life, the liberty of his brothers; he becomes the sword and shield of him who has none, or who, having limbs too weak to bear them, cannot make use of them."

For Voyer, to be a soldier was not merely to serve one's country, it was also and perhaps more a means of social advancement. Thus he wrote Les qualités morales du bon militaire in order to "show Canadians that it is a great honour to wear military uniform." His friend Montpetit wrote that after his return in 1863 he lived all the time "with one foot in civilian society," winning people's sympathies and acquiring new protectors. The son of a wheelwright, on 2 Jan. 1869 he married Arline Laroche, "who had received her education from the Ursulines."

In 1870 his social ascent continued, thanks to his appointment as chief superintendent of the Quebec Provincial Police, an office he held until 1876. In January 1871 he was promoted major. Practically nothing is known about his duties as superintendent except that he was appreciated by his subordinates, in whom he endeavoured to instil the spirit of military discipline.

On 22 Feb. 1876 he died from a wound which he had inflicted upon himself accidentally the day before while handling a fire-arm. He left his wife and three young children aged from one month to six years.

YVES ROBY

L.-N. Voyer, Les qualités morales du bon militaire (Québec, 1865). A.-N. Montpetit, Major L. N. Voyer, surintendant de la Police provinciale (Québec, 1876).

C. P. Stacey, Canada and the British Army, 1846–1871 (2nd ed., Toronto, 1963). G. F. G. Stanley, Canada's soldiers; the military history of an unmilitary people (Toronto, 1960).

W

WADDELL, JOHN, physician, superintendent of the New Brunswick Lunatic Asylum; b. 10 March 1810 at Truro, N.S., son of the Reverend John Waddell, Presbyterian minister, and Nancy Blanchard; d. 29 Aug. 1878 at Truro.

John Waddell was educated at the grammar school in Truro and at the Pictou Academy. In 1833 he began to study medicine under Dr David B. Lynds of Truro. He continued his studies in Glasgow and London and on 18 Oct. 1839 received a diploma from the Royal College of Surgeons. In 1840, having spent some time in Paris where he attended lectures given by the leading French scientists, he began a medical practice in Truro. In the same year he married the daughter of his former teacher, Susan Lynds, who died in 1841. He was married again in 1846 to Jane Walker Blanchard of Truro; they had two daughters and a son who died as a child.

In 1849 Dr Waddell was appointed superintendent of the New Brunswick Lunatic Asylum. His appointment was opposed by many who felt that he had no special qualifications for the job and that a native of New Brunswick should have been given the position. Waddell carried out his duties capably and held the position until he retired for reasons of health in 1876. He continually urged that the government spend more on improving the hospital. He visited asylums in Canada and the United States and attempted to introduce the latest methods of treatment. The common practice in many mental hospitals was to confine violent patients in small cells. They were bound with ropes or chains and beaten frequently by keepers who were untrained and had no sympathy for the mentally ill. Facilities in many hospitals were inadequate and the patients were crowded into wards where there was no segregation of the sexes. They were placed in solitary confinement at the least sign of violent behaviour. Waddell tried as much as possible to do away with mechanical restraints and to improve the conditions under which the insane were forced to live by urging the New Brunswick government to provide more spacious accommodation. He was aware of the value of occupational therapy and attempted to provide opportunities for some of the patients to work with their hands, particularly in the gardens of the asylum. He urged that all patients be treated equally regardless of their social status and wanted to build an institution "to which those most loved" could "with confidence" be committed if required.

Waddell was greatly respected throughout the province and his resignation was accepted with regret in 1876. "Probably no man in the province of New Brunswick was better or more generally known than Dr. Waddell, and there are few whose name and works will be held in more grateful remembrance."

W. A. Spray

N.B. Museum, James Brown, Journal, 1844–70, sect.C, 26. PANS, Community Records, Truro Township book, 107. Daily Sun (Saint John, N.B.), 30 Aug. 1878. Daily Telegraph (Saint John, N.B.), 30 Aug. 1878. Morning Freeman (Saint John, N.B.), 31 Aug. 1878. Morning News (Saint John, N.B.), 7–31 Dec. 1849, 4 Jan. 1850. New Brunswick Reporter (Fredericton), 14 Dec. 1849. New Brunswick, House of Assembly, Journals, 1850–76; 1881, 172–73. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1888), 29–30. Dom. ann. reg., 1878, 370. Thomas Miller, Historical and genealogical record of the first settlers of Colchester County (Halifax, 1873), 160–62. C. T. Phillips, "Care of the insane," Saint John Daily Sun, 27 Feb. 1904.

WADDINGTON, ALFRED PENDERELL, writer and railway promoter; b. at Crescent House, Brompton, London, Eng., 2 Oct. 1801, sixth son of William Waddington, a merchant and banker of London and Paris, and Grace Valentine Sykes, a descendant of the Penderells who concealed Charles II in an oak tree after the battle of Worcester; d. a bachelor, at Ottawa, Ont., on 26 Feb. 1872.

Alfred Penderell Waddington received his early education in England, but after the death of his father in 1818 he joined an elder brother Thomas, who had become head of the French branch of the family, and whose sons were later prominent in public life in France. Alfred attended the École Spéciale du Commerce in Paris and then spent two years in Germany, at the University of Göttingen and in Leipzig. In 1823 he and his brother Thomas formed a company to operate a foundry, but the partnership ended in 1825. This was the first of a series of unsuccessful business ventures; "the whole of my existence for the past 20 years," Alfred wrote in 1841, "has been one continued series of disappointments, and struggles with adversity, and it would appear I am not yet at the end." At that time he was director of an ironworks at Lanvaux, near Auray, in Brittany, a position he held from 1829 until about 1845, when he moved to Épinac, in Burgundy. His favourite brother, Frederick, had helped him repeatedly, and it was he who provided funds when, attracted by the gold rush, Alfred sailed for California in May 1850. By 1854 he was a partner in the wholesale grocery firm of Dulip and Waddington, in San Francisco. The firm prospered and when the gold rush to the Fraser River began in 1858 Waddington came north to Victoria and opened a branch of the business there. At this time he was 57 years of age, and he must have been one of the oldest as well as best educated of the men who joined in the rush.

Waddington quickly adopted his new country and was soon championing its resources and involving himself in its future. The first gold discoveries had been shallow placer deposits along the banks of the Fraser in the vicinity of Hope and Yale. These were soon worked out and thousands of disgruntled men began to leave the country. In an effort to check the exodus and re-establish the good name of Vancouver Island and British Columbia, Waddington in November 1858 published The Fraser mines vindicated, or the history of four months (Victoria), the first book, other than official publications, printed on Vancouver Island. He soon became involved in politics, by joining Amor De Cosmos* and others in opposing the authoritarian ways and powers of Governor James DOUGLAS and the Hudson's Bay Company. In 1859 he published anonymously a pamphlet entitled The necessity of reform: a tract for the times: addressed to the colonists of Vancouver Island (Victoria). Early in 1860 he was elected to the House of Assembly as a representative of Victoria District, but he resigned in October 1861 to devote his time to furthering the road-building projects for which he is best remembered. In 1862 he helped draft the charter of the city of Victoria, but he declined to accept nomination as its first mayor.

In 1861 miners who had worked their way up the Fraser discovered the first of the rich gold deposits in the Cariboo country; excitement and activity mounted quickly. The new fields were far inland and the canyons of the Fraser made transportation costly and difficult. Waddington quickly became convinced that they could be reached more easily overland from the head of one of the many inlets along the coast. He had become an ardent partisan of Victoria in its rivalry with New Westminster, and undoubtedly part of the attraction of the plan was that it promised to give Victoria a virtual monopoly of the trade with the new mines.

Little was known about the hinterland of any of the coastal inlets, but Waddington decided that Bute Inlet was probably the best suited for his purpose. In September he visited the inlet and left an exploring party that returned in October with promising reports, based in large part on data gathered from the Indians. Waddington planned to establish a port at the head of Bute Inlet and to build a road from it up the valley of the Homathko River and thence eastward to the Fraser River in the vicinity of Alexandria; the distance would be about 160 miles. After negotiating with Governor Douglas during the winter, he was granted a charter in March 1862 that authorized him to build a bridle path or trail over the route proposed; this was supplemented almost at once by a further agreement authorizing the building of a road instead of the trail. Tolls were to be charged, and Waddington's concession was to be for ten years.

Work crews left for the inlet immediately, and in spite of the formidable obstacles met with in the Homathko canyon, 33 miles of road had been practically completed by the time operations ceased for the season in November. By contrast, the progress made in 1863 was discouraging. Freshets had washed out bridges and done other damage, and no way of getting the road through the rest of the canyon had been found. To make matters worse, time was beginning to run out on Waddington. Douglas had been pushing forward construction on two other roads to the Cariboo, one beginning at the head of Harrison Lake and the other going up the Fraser River from Yale. The former route was open for traffic in the summer of 1863, and it was clear that the other would be ready within a year. Yet Waddington refused to be discouraged, and in the winter of 1863–64 sold his property in Victoria to finance the next season's operations. These came to a tragic halt in April 1864 when his work parties were attacked by the Chilcotin Indians led by their chief Klattsasine*, and 19 men were killed. Frederick Seymour*, who had just succeeded Douglas as governor of British Columbia, took prompt action and the so-called "Chilcotin War" led to the apprehension of the murderers, five of whom were executed. Waddington, who had spent about $50,000 on the road project, asked for compensation, but was refused, and after vainly trying to raise funds he was obliged to abandon his scheme. In June 1865, when badly in need of a livelihood, he was appointed the first superintendent of schools of Vancouver Island, a post he filled competently until the colony was annexed to British Columbia in November 1866.

External events now prompted Waddington to revive and greatly enlarge his project. It seemed certain that a confederation of the eastern provinces of British North America was impending and that ultimately Rupert's Land and British Columbia would be included. Transportation between east and west would be essential. In addition, Waddington was much disturbed by the progress being made in the construction of a railway to California. He feared that it would divert to the United States much of the trade of the Orient, and felt that the British government should counter this by encouraging the development of a transcontinental travel route through British territory. He thought at first in terms of a traction line or tramway along the Bute Inlet–Fraser River route that his wagon road had been intended to follow, but the proposal soon grew into a plan for a railway that would continue on through the Yellowhead Pass to Edmonton and Red River. This he outlined in a pamphlet published in Victoria in June 1867 entitled Overland communication by land and water through British North America.

To promote this scheme Waddington left Victoria in September 1867 for London, where, he claimed, he had already been in touch with people who were "financially of the first class and men of means." On 9 March 1868 he described his plan in a lecture to the Royal Geographical Society. It aroused some interest and prompted Sir Harry Verney to move in the House of Commons for a commission to inquire into the settling of the Red River and Saskatchewan country. A debate followed on 9 June, but the motion was withdrawn in view of the negotiations with regard to the future of Rupert's Land that were then in progress. In September Waddington published a second pamphlet, Overland route through British North America; or, the shortest and speediest road to the east (London), which outlined his proposals and stressed their importance in relation to trade with the Orient. At this time he was still thinking in terms of a combined land and water route, which would reduce costs by taking advantage of navigable rivers and lakes whenever these were available, but his map also showed an all-rail route. In 1869, in a new version of his plea entitled Sketch of the proposed line of overland railroad through British North America (London) only the all-rail route was mentioned.

In 1870 Waddington was in Ottawa, seeking support and inquiring about the possibility of securing a charter for his railway. In December he had an interview with Sir John A. Macdonald*, who mentioned liberal land grants and possible subsidies, but pointed out that nothing could be done until British Columbia entered confederation. Waddington's English backers have not been identified; by the time he saw Macdonald again, in July 1871, his chief financial support was clearly from Americans, notably George W. McMullen and Charles M. Smith, of Chicago. Macdonald took shelter in the fact that he could make no commitment, as parliament had given him no authority to do so. Waddington evidently came away from the interview convinced that all was going well, and that all he had to do was wait for parliamentary approval. He seems still to have been in this optimistic mood when he was stricken with smallpox and died in Ottawa in February 1872. But in reality there was virtually no possibility that his bid for a charter to build the Pacific railway would have been accepted. Macdonald was determined at all costs to prevent the project from falling under American control, and he may already have sensed that McMullen was in this respect a power to be reckoned with.

When describing the interview with Waddington and his associates in July 1871 Macdonald remarked that "their movement was altogether premature, and was improperly hurried by that respectable old fool Waddington." The comment was cruel, but Waddington was undoubtedly an optimistic old man in a hurry. A friend who saw him in Ottawa in June 1870 wrote: "Alfred Waddington is here working up his railroad scheme. He is quite as sanguine of success as he ever was." Chartres Brew*, the shrewd head of the British Columbia police, described him as "one of the most sanguine imaginative men I have ever met; prompt to delude himself on any matter of which he makes a hobby." He has been called the original promoter of a transcontinental Canadian railway; this he was not. The idea was being discussed long before he became attracted to it. But his pamphlets and projects did much to popularize the project, and to create the atmosphere in which its construction came to be taken for granted.

Waddington was buried in St James Cemetery, on the outskirts of Hull, Quebec. Several geographical features bear his name, the most notable being Mount Waddington (13,260 feet), the highest peak in the British Columbia Coast Range, and Waddington Canyon on the Homathko River.

W. KAYE LAMB

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 519. PRO, CO 60/22, 225. Colonist (Victoria), 1858–73. Creighton, Macdonald, old politician, 106–7. Ormsby, British Columbia, 205–6. J. P. Waddington, Who's who in the family of Waddington (London, 1934), 152–53, 217–29, 474. R. L. Reid, "Alfred Waddington," RSCT, 3rd ser., XXVI (1932), sect.II, 13–27.

WATSON, JAMES CRAIG, astronomer; b. 28 Jan. 1838 near Fingal, U.C., the eldest son of William Watson and Rebecca Bacon; d. at Madison, Wisc., U.S.A., 23 Nov. 1879.

William Watson left his farm near Fingal in 1850 and the family settled at Ann Arbor, Michigan, where James Craig entered high school and, later, the University of Michigan. His lifelong interest was in celestial mechanics, the branch of astronomy that deals with the determination and nature of the orbits of heavenly bodies. He was well suited for such work, being an exceptionally keen mathematician and a rapid, skilful computer. He had also considerable mechanical ability: he supported himself in high school and university by working as an engineer in a factory. At Michigan, his ability developed rapidly under the guidance of his teacher, the eminent astronomer Franz Friedrich Ernst Brünnow. After graduation in 1857, he was appointed assistant in the observatory (1858), professor of astronomy, and, in Brünnow's absence in 1859, acting director of the observatory. He was made professor of physics in 1860. When Brünnow left Michigan in 1863, Watson was appointed his successor as director.

Three weeks after his appointment, Watson discovered the first of the 22 asteroids that were to be associated with his name. As an aid to such discoveries, he spent many years preparing a series of ecliptic star maps, but the project was never completed. A result of his interest in asteroids was his publication Theoretical astronomy (1868), an authoritative treatise on orbit determination which remained a standard text for many decades. Watson also wrote A popular treatise on comets (1861) and numerous scientific papers. He received many awards, including three honorary doctorates.

Watson, like many astronomers of his day, participated actively in eclipse expeditions (Iowa, 1869; Sicily, 1870; Wyoming, 1878), and he also led an expedition to observe the transit of Venus (Peking, 1874). At the 1878 eclipse, he became interested in the possible existence of an intra-Mercurial planet. He believed he had observed one, and devoted considerable effort to calculations which would aid in the verification of his observation. Unfortunately, his calculations were never published, and his observation never verified.

In 1879 Watson became first director of the new Washburn Observatory at the University of Wisconsin in Madison. In this position he carried out his duties with vigour, efficiency, and care, and he showed the utmost concern for the welfare of his colleagues and students. While engaged in the supervision of the construction of the observatory, he became ill, apparently of exposure, and died suddenly on 23 Nov. 1880. He was survived by his wife, Annette Waite, whom he had married in 1860. There were no children.

In a sense, Watson's interest in asteroids transcended his death, for he left a sum of money, deposited with the National Academy of Sciences, to finance the computation of tables that would assure his asteroids would never become lost to the scientific world. To the author's knowledge, Watson's asteroids are the only celestial bodies so endowed.

JOHN R. PERCY

James Craig Watson was the author of A popular treatise on comets (Philadelphia and Detroit, 1861); Tables for the calculation of simple or compound interest . . . (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1878); and Theoretical astronomy . . . (Philadelphia, 1868). DAB. G. C. Comstock, "Biographical memoir of James Craig Watson," National Academy of Sciences, Biographical Memoirs (Washington), III (1895), 45–57. W. J. Hussey, "A general account of the observatory," Astronomical Observatory of the University of Michigan, Pubs. (Ann Arbor, Mich.), I (1912), 3–6. B. L. Newkirk, "The Watson asteroids," Popular Astronomy (Northfield, Minn.), XII (1904), 645.

WEE-KAS-KOO-KEE-SEY-YIN. See WIKASKOKISEYIN

WENTWORTH-FITZWILLIAM, WILLIAM, Viscount Milton (an hereditary courtesy title), traveller, author, and politician; b. 27 July 1839 in London, Eng., son and heir-apparent of William Thomas Spencer Wentworth-Fitzwilliam, 6th Earl Fitzwilliam, and Frances Harriet Douglas; m. on 10 Aug. 1867 to Laura Maria Theresa Beauclerk by whom he had one son and three daughters; d. 20 Jan. 1877 at Rouen, France.

William Wentworth-Fitzwilliam was educated at Eton and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He appears to have been an intelligent, sensitive, romantic, and sociable man who was also slightly irritable and not too robust. In 1860 he visited the Red River Settlement and the trip whetted his appetite for more travel in British North America. According to a lecture he gave to a number of British scientific and literary societies in 1864, he was the initiator of a second and more important journey: "In the spring of 1862 I resolved to investigate for myself the nature of the country between the Red River Settlement and the Rocky Mountains; and to penetrate, if possible, by the shortest route to the gold regions of Cariboo. . . ." He rightly considered himself "fortunate to obtain the assistance" of a friend, Dr Walter Butler Cheadle*, who proved to be the real leader of the expedition.

Lord Milton and Dr Cheadle arrived in Quebec on 2 July 1862 and travelled to Upper Fort Garry by way of Toronto, Chicago, and St Paul, Minnesota. They wintered about 80 miles northwest of Fort Carlton, hunting and trapping. Resuming their journey in the spring, they obtained at Fort Pitt the services of a new guide, Louis Battenotte, a Métis, whom they called "the Assiniboine." They crossed the Rockies via Edmonton, Jasper, and the Yellowhead Pass. Because their party was small, ill assorted, without adequate food, and lacked a guide with local knowledge, they turned aside from one of the purposes of their expedition – to find a direct route to the Cariboo – and instead followed the North Thompson River to Kamloops. Generally travelling by horse, they met with great difficulties and privations, probably managing to survive only because of the resourcefulness and strength of Cheadle and Battenotte. On the expedition Dr Cheadle aided Milton during a number of attacks, which may have been epileptic; he also gave medical assistance at many of the posts they visited.

After reaching Kamloops on 29 Aug. 1863, Milton and Cheadle went on to Victoria, and then visited the Cariboo, going inland by the Lake Harrison–Lillooet route, and returning by the Fraser Canyon. They sailed from Victoria on 20 Dec. 1863. On their way back to England, which they reached on 5 March 1864, they visited San Francisco, Panama, and New York.

In 1865 the two travellers jointly published in London an account of their journey called The north-west passage by land. It was deservedly popular and went through eight editions by 1875 and another in 1901. Although Milton's name appears before Cheadle's on the title page of the book, comparison of its text with that of Cheadle's Journal (published in Ottawa in 1931) leaves little doubt that the latter was the main author. The Journal also has much detail left out in The north-west passage by land. The latter gives a lively, sometimes humorous, and rather roundabout account of their adventures and provides a great deal of information about the Canadian west. One well-known and gruesome incident was their finding a beheaded Indian corpse in a sitting position. By contrast, Mr O'B [Eugene Francis O'Beirne*], who fastened himself to the party, provided comic relief. With its analysis of the prospects of the prairies and British Columbia, the book helped prepare opinion in both Britain and Canada for the ending of Hudson's Bay Company rule, confederation, and the inclusion of the west in the union. Its intelligent estimate of the value of the Yellowhead Pass was vindicated by the route's being chosen for the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Lord Milton was elected an MP for Yorkshire in 1865. He was a Liberal and a supporter of such causes as abolition of church-rates, extension of the franchise, admission of dissenters to the universities, and extension of education to every child in the kingdom. He was also an active supporter of the development of British Columbia and of the Canadian west, and urged improved mail service between the United Kingdom and Victoria, B.C. In 1869, while still an MP, he published, in London, A history of the San Juan water boundary dispute question . . ., which remains a valuable source.

Milton resigned his seat in the commons in 1872 and travelled with his wife to New York and then to Canada. They lived for a short time in a camp on the north shore of Lake Superior called Pointe de Meuron. Here their only son was born in July 1872. A dubious story maintains that Milton lived for a time under an assumed name as a landowner in Virginia. For most of the last years of his life he was away from England for his health.

V. G. Hopwood

William Wentworth-Fitzwilliam, Viscount Milton, collaborated with Walter Butler Cheadle in several works describing their journey across British North America. These include: "An expedition across the Rocky Mountains into British Columbia, by the Yellow Head or Leather Pass," Royal Geographical Society, Proceedings (London), IX (1864–65), 17–21; An expedition across the Rocky Mountains into British Columbia, by the Yellow Head or Leather Pass (London, 1865); How we crossed the Rocky Mountains into British Columbia (n.p., 1864); and The north-west passage by land: being the narrative of an expedition from the Atlantic to the Pacific . . . to British Columbia . . . by one of the northern passes in the Rocky Mountains (1st ed., London, 1865; 9th ed., London, 1901). Wentworth-Fitzwilliam also wrote A history of the San Juan water boundary dispute question as affecting the division of territory between Great Britain and the United States (London, New York, 1869).

PABC, Milton, William Fitzwilliam, Correspondence outward, 1863, 1864. W. B. Cheadle, Cheadle's journal of trip across Canada, 1862–1863, intro. and notes by A. G. Doughty and Gustave Lanctot (The Canada series, ed. F. P. Grove, I, Ottawa, 1931; repr., Edmonton, 1970). "British Columbia," Daily British Colonist (Victoria), 21 Sept. 1863. "From British Columbia," Daily British Colonist (Victoria), 23 Nov. 1863. G. E. Cokayne, The complete peerage . . . of England Scotland Ireland Great Britain and the United Kingdom extant extinct or dormant, ed. Vicary Gibbs et al. (13v., London, 1910–40), V, 525–26. Debrett's illustrated peerage and titles of courtesy, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland (London, 1883), 276. Dod's parliamentary companion (London), 1865–73.

WESTPHAL, Sir GEORGE AUGUSTUS ALEXANDER, admiral in the Royal Navy; b. probably in Preston, N.S. (he was christened in St George's Church, Halifax) on 27 March 1785, youngest son of George Frederick and Anna Westphal; m. in 1817 to Alicia Chambers, a widow; d. 12 Jan. 1875 at Hove, Brighton, Eng.

George Augustus Alexander Westphal entered the Royal Navy in 1798 on board the frigate Porcupine, then serving on the North American Station. In 1803 he was a midshipman in Amphion which took Horatio Nelson to the Mediterranean as commander-in-chief. Westphal was transferred to Victory and served in her at the battle of Trafalgar where he was severely wounded. When he was taken below to the cockpit, his head was laid on Nelson's rolled coat; some of the bullions of an epaulette became tangled in his hair and were so fixed with dried blood that they had to be cut out. For the rest of his life Westphal treasured these bullions as a memento of Nelson.

Promoted lieutenant on 15 Aug. 1806, Westphal served for a short time in the West Indies but was captured by a French privateer when returning to England in a merchant ship. Although again severely wounded, he escaped from prison in Guadaloupe, made his way back to England after being picked up at sea by an American schooner, and returned to the West Indies as lieutenant first in the Neptune and then in the Belleisle, under the command of Commodore Sir George Cockburn. He served ashore at the reduction of Martinique, and, after further naval employment in European waters, returned with Cockburn to the Chesapeake where his many gallant services brought him promotion to commander on 8 July 1813. He was advanced to post-rank on 12 Aug. 1819 and in May 1822 commanded Jupiter which took Lord Amherst to India as governor general. Knighted on his return, Westphal served in 1832 as flag-captain to Sir George Cockburn on the North American station but was invalided early in 1834 and saw no further active service.

On the retired list, he was promoted rear-admiral on 17 Aug. 1851, vice-admiral on 10 Sept. 1857, and admiral on 23 March 1863. For the last 40 years of his life he lived at Hove, Brighton. Westphal was the longest surviving officer of those who had served at Trafalgar on the Victory. His brother, Philip (1782–1880), was also a Royal Navy admiral. They served together, though not on the same ship, in the operations in the Chesapeake in 1813.

PETER KEMP

St George's Church (Halifax), Register of births and children baptized by the Reverend B. M. Houseal (microfilm in PANS). Times (London), 14 Jan. 1875. DNB. John Marshall, Royal naval biography . . . (2v. and supps., London, 1823–30). O'Byrne, Naval biog. dict.

WHITE, EDWARD, Methodist minister and missionary; b. 11 Nov. 1822 in Philadelphia, Penn., son of William and Hannah White; m. in Canada West, on 22 or 23 July 1852, Sarah Jane Woodman by whom he had several children; d. 15 June 1872 at Montreal, Que.

Edward White grew up in the township of Raleigh, near St Thomas, Upper Canada. He attended the local school while working on his father's farm, and after studying at home was licensed as a local preacher at the age of 21. He earned a teacher's certificate and taught for a short time, then in 1845 began circuit work under the guidance of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Canada, Canada conference. By 1852 he was sufficiently advanced to be passed at the annual conference meetings in Kingston, where he was ordained the same year. White worked on the Smithville circuit until 1858 when he and three other Wesleyan Methodists were chosen for missionary work in the newly formed colony of British Columbia. Dr Ephraim Evans*, superintendent of the group, Ebenezer Robson, Arthur Browning, and White arrived in Victoria in February 1859 and received a warm welcome from local Methodists. Governor James DOUGLAS and other influential citizens, though not themselves Methodists, eagerly greeted the newcomers and offered assistance in setting up the mission.

White was assigned to Queensborough (New Westminster) in the mainland colony where conditions were rough and primitive. On 1 April in the open air outside his tent he held his first services, preaching to a congregation of "fifty men, one woman and two children." Confronted with virgin forest, overwhelmed by "the unspeakable mosquito," and suffering the usual privations of pioneer life, the undaunted missionary with his wife and two children took up his task with a will. White possessed an athletic frame and was an expert axe-man – qualities which enabled him to build a parsonage and later a church while the Royal Engineers under Colonel Richard Clement Moody* carved the proposed capital city out of the wilderness. White's small wooden building – the first Methodist church west of the Great Lakes – was dedicated on 8 April 1860 on land donated by Colonel Moody. Before long, ably assisted by his wife's sister, Emily Woodman, the missionary had established a day school, a night school for the Chinese, a Sunday school, a temperance society, and prayer groups.

After four years White and his family were named to replace Robson at Nanaimo, where the congregation included numerous Indians. Thomas Crosby*, a layman, was already there and had mastered enough of the Salish tongue to interpret for White on the circuit, which embraced Comox, Cowichan, and Saltspring Island.

By 1866 White was again in New Westminster, and he assumed the added responsibility of chairman of the British Columbia District since Dr Evans had retired. The New Westminster circuit had been enlarged to include Burrard Inlet, Chilliwack, Hope, and Yale, and as chairman White was expected to visit all stations including far-off Barkerville and the Methodist churches on Vancouver Island. Fortunately the Cariboo Road had been completed and Barnard's stage coaches were operating. Toward the end of 1869 White was again in charge at Nanaimo but by then the effects of exposure to the elements and over-exertion were beginning to show. The need for a protracted rest was evident by 1871 and White returned to Ontario.

In less than a year's time White was travelling in Britain "for health and observation" and lecturing as immigration agent for the Ontario government. Returning home from an enjoyable and successful tour, during which he had sent interesting dispatches to the Victoria Colonist, he paused in Montreal where he was stricken with smallpox and died.

Edward White's character as a minister of the Gospel, unselfish and zealous, is revealed in his soul-searching diaries. They show him as a "man of virility and faith." The foundations of Methodism in British Columbia were well laid by the "incredible zeal of men of this calibre."

MADGE WOLFENDEN

PABC, Edward White diaries, 1 Jan. 1859–31 Dec. 1866, 1867 (typescripts; typescript copies also held by the United Church British Columbia Archives, Vancouver); Letter of appointment, Enoch Wood to Edward White, 16 Nov. 1858 (photostat). Colonist (Victoria), 1859–72. Victoria Gazette, 12 Feb. 1859. Edgar Fawcett, Some reminiscences of old Victoria (Toronto, 1912). [John Sheepshanks], Bishop in the rough, ed. D. W. Duthie (London, 1919). E. O. S. Scholefield and F. W. Howay, British Columbia from the earliest times to the present (4v., Vancouver, B.C., 1914). W. D. Young, "Pioneer Methodist missionaries in British Columbia, 1859–71," unpublished BA essay, University of British Columbia, n.d.

WHITE WOLF. See SOTAI-NA

WIKASKOKISEYIN (also written Wee-kas-koo-kee-sey-yin, called Sweet Grass), ABRAHAM, chief of the Plains Cree Indians of the Saskatchewan country; place and date of birth unrecorded; d.c. 11 Jan. 1877 in a shooting accident on the plains, presumably at Saint-Paul-des-Cris (Alberta).

Wikaskokiseyin's mother, a member of the Crow tribe of the Missouri area, had been kidnapped during a war with the Crees, and Wikaskokiseyin was born in the Cree camp. As a young man, he was called Apistchi-koimas (Le Petit Chef). It was in his youth that he undertook the daring exploit which accounted for his later name and recognition as a brave. Alone he penetrated into Blackfoot territory where he killed one of his enemies and captured over 40 horses. Upon his return, amidst shouts of triumph, he held up a tuft of grass dipped in the blood of his victim; the whole camp took up the cry, "Sweet Grass!" By 1870 he was the principal chief in a large area of the central part of the Prairies (Alberta and Saskatchewan), and in that year he was converted to Roman Catholicism and baptized with the Christian name, Abraham, by Father Albert Lacombe*, who had founded the mission of Saint-Paul-des-Cris in 1865.

After the acquisition of the Hudson's Bay Company territory by Canada in 1870, Wikaskokiseyin communicated his concern for the condition of his people to Governor Adams George Archibald* at Upper Fort Garry (Winnipeg). "Our country is getting ruined of fur-bearing animals, hitherto our sole support," he said in 1871. "We have had great starvation the past winter, and the small-pox took away many of our people, the old, young, and children. We want you to stop the Americans from coming to trade on our lands, and giving fire water, ammunition and arms to our enemies, the Blackfeet." He requested that representatives be sent to treat with the Crees and that they receive assistance from the government.

Wikaskokiseyin was the leading spokesman for the Indians in the negotiation of Treaty No. 6 at Fort Pitt (near present-day Lloydminster), and was the treaty's first signatory at that place, 9 Sept. 1876. Although he died a few months later, his name is perpetuated in the Sweet Grass reserve established for his band near present-day Battleford, Saskatchewan.

ALLAN R. TURNER

Annales de la propagation de la foi pour la province de Québec, no.2 (juin 1877), 115–19. Canada, Sessional papers, V (1872), PT.7, no.22; X (1877), PT.7, no.11. Morris, Treaties of Canada with Indians, 168–245. Le Métis (Saint-Boniface), 11 janv. 1877. P. E. Breton, The big chief of the Prairies; the life of Father Lacombe ([Montreal, 1956]). Katherine Hughes, Father Lacombe; the black-robe voyageur (3rd ed., Toronto, 1920).

WILD PERSON. See ONISTAH-SOKAKSIN

WILKES, ROBERT, politician and businessman; b. at Tullaghan, County Leitrim, Ireland, 24 June 1832; m. Martha Cooke in 1863; d. at Sturgeon Point, Ont., 16 Aug. 1880.

Robert Wilkes' father died before 1832 and his family, in which there were six other children, was probably poor. His education in Ireland was limited and he emigrated in 1848 at 16. He came to Toronto where opportunities existed since his uncle, R. H. Brett, was "one of the leading merchants." Wilkes clerked with Brett for a time, then for Rossin Brothers, jewellers in Toronto. In 1857 or 1858 he bought Rossin Brothers, thus establishing his own wholesale jewellery firm in Toronto; he subsequently expanded to Montreal, Hamilton, and western Canada. He was sending travellers to Manitoba and British Columbia by 1872. He diversified his business interests as he grew wealthier and in 1869 he was a charter member of the Toronto, Simcoe, and Muskoka Junction Railway (later part of the Northern Railway). He became a director of the Canadian Bank of Commerce in 1871 and was one of its vice-presidents from 1874 to 1876. He served as a director of the Confederation Life Assurance Association and of the Isolated Risk Fire Insurance Company.

Wilkes was a Liberal, but an unusually unpersistent politician. He does not appear to have taken part in municipal politics, and it was not until 1872 that he contested a parliamentary riding, that of Toronto Centre. He was elected then and again in 1874, but when the latter return was voided in the same year he retired from politics.

Although Robert Wilkes himself is not memorable politically, the 1872 election in Toronto Centre in which he ran against Francis Shanly*, a railway engineer, was most revealing. George Brown thus described the election to his wife: "The struggle . . . in Centre Toronto was the keenest & bitterest I ever knew. The amount of bribery & perjury done by our opponents was never approached in any previous contest." A Conservative observer agreed: "We had great excitement yesterday over the Central Division Election. It is said none of the old famous struggles were anything like it. The halt the lame the blind, & even the absent & the dead were brought out to vote . . . & there can be no doubt a large sum of money was spent, & probably on both sides." One of the Conservative managers has left an interesting insight into the politics of open voting: "We suffered a most mortifying defeat yesterday when victory was within our grasp, at 11 o'clock we were 201 behind, at 12 178 at 1 157 & at 2 70, we then began to work & spend money but it was too late, we were beaten by 28, half an hour more would have cleaned off the 28 & given us a good majority." The Conservative party accounts survive, and reveal a minimum expenditure of $8,807.25. The Liberals probably spent as much. When the small size of the electorate is considered (Toronto Centre had 4,148 eligible voters of whom 2,404 voted), along with the real value of an 1872 dollar, the expense and financial pressure of a 19th-century election become clear.

Wilkes was an active churchman and a member of the general conference of the Methodist Church. He retired from the wholesale business shortly before his premature death by drowning, along with two of his children, at Sturgeon Point, Ont., on 16 Aug. 1880. Wilkes had become a "wholesale merchant of great energy, who from a position of a clerk . . . raised himself to wealth. . . ."

Donald Swainson

PAC, MG 24, B40 (Brown papers), 8. PAO, Sir Alexander Campbell papers, 1872; Francis Shanly papers. Globe (Toronto), 1880. Sarnia Observer, 1872. [Walter and Francis Shanly], Daylight through the mountain; letters and labours of civil engineers Walter and Francis Shanly, ed. F. N. Walker ([Toronto], 1957), 390. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson), 602. Can. parl. comp., 1873. Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81.

Davin, Irishman in Canada. Hist. of Toronto and county of York, II, 173–74. Hunter, Hist. of Simcoe County, I, 207. Ross and Trigge, History of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, II. Swainson, "Personnel of politics."

WILKINSON, JOHN, surveyor, draughtsman, and engineer; b. 2 April 1804 at Cowgill, Yorkshire, Eng.; d. 10 April 1871 at Fredericton, N.B.

John Wilkinson received his education in England where he graduated from the Institution of Engineers in London. He emigrated to New Brunswick in 1830 as manager of the Owen family property on Campobello Island. At St Andrews, N.B., on 6 June 1837, he married Mary Rebecca Curry; they had one daughter.

In 1836 Wilkinson joined Thomas Baillie*, chief commissioner of crown lands and the surveyor general, in his department at Fredericton as a surveyor and draughtsman. He served from 1840 to 1843 on the staff of the British commissioners for fixing the boundary between New Brunswick and Maine. He carried out an exploratory survey for the proposed European and North American Railway in 1847. The following year he surveyed a line for the railway between the city of Saint John and Shediac harbour, and in 1850 one for the proposed railway between Saint John and Calais, Maine. He also prepared reports for the government on surveys for railways, county boundary lines, and telegraph lines. From 1856 to 1858 he worked on an official map of the province of New Brunswick, which was published in 1859. This was the first general map of the province to include the results of admiralty surveys, boundary surveys, and the accumulated land surveys in the crown land office. He became involved in a dispute with the government over the copyright of this map and other matters, and in 1864 published a pamphlet in which he set out his side of the dispute. The government, of course, won. He later joined the provincial Board of Works as an engineer and was employed examining sites for bridges and lighthouses.

Wilkinson was an extremely careful and accurate surveyor, and his plans in the crown land office are by far the best in their extensive collection. His map of New Brunswick, according to W. F. Ganong*, was "scientifically constructed, minutely correct," and "beautifully engraved," and "must ever remain a classic of New Brunswick Cartography."

W. A. SPRAY

N.B. Museum, Ganong MS coll., "The province of New Brunswick," chap. 1, sect.3, 6 (unpublished MS by W. F. Ganong); Ganong MS coll., box 37; New Brunswick Historical Society papers, W. H. Steeves correspondence, items 7, 46. New Brunswick, House of Assembly, Journals, 1847, 1849, 1850, 1852, 1854, 1859. W. G. MacFarlane, New Brunswick bibliography: the books and writers of the province (Saint John, N.B., 1895), 84. MacNutt, New Brunswick, 325–26. A. W. Bailey, "Railways in New Brunswick, 1827–1867," unpublished MA thesis, University of New Brunswick, 1955. W. F. Ganong, "A monograph of the cartography of the province of New Brunswick," RSCT, 2nd ser., III (1897), sect.II, 403–4.

WILLIS, JOHN ROBERT, naturalist, teacher, and first Nova Scotian conchologist; b. 14 Feb. 1825 in Philadelphia, Pa., son of John Willis; m. in 1847 to Mary Ann Artz by whom he had six children, and in 1865 to Eliza Jane Mosely by whom he had four children; d. 31 March 1876 in Halifax, N.S.

John Robert Willis came to Halifax as a child; he was educated at the national school where he later became a successful teacher and principal. He was appointed superintendent of the new industrial school in Halifax in 1864, and a year later became secretary to the new board of school commissioners for the city. He retired from the latter post only in 1875.

Willis is remembered primarily, however, as a naturalist. A painstaking and discriminating collector and classifier, mainly of shells but also of insects and birds, he first won acclaim in 1854 when he exhibited his shells at the Nova Scotia Industrial Exhibition and won first prize. Later he sent exhibits of mollusca and pearls to an international exhibition, and to the Dublin Exhibition in 1864. His work brought him into correspondence with distinguished British, American, and Canadian scientists, among whom Sir John William Dawson* became a particular friend. With their assistance, he identified and publicized the existence of many species of shells, including European and southern types hitherto not recognized as existing as far north as Nova Scotia. He gave shell collections to local colleges, the British Museum, the Boston Society of Natural History, the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, and the Smithsonian Institution.

In recognition of his work he was elected corresponding member of the Liverpool Natural History and Microscopical Society in 1862, of the Boston Society of Natural History in 1863, and of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia in about 1866. He was one of the founders of the Nova Scotian Institute of Natural Science in 1862, and worked for the establishment of a provincial museum.

His shell catalogues showing localities, range, and relative importance helped American naturalists to wider, more accurate generalizations and are of historical interest since the distribution of shell forms changes with time.

PHYLLIS CREIGHTON

[John Robert Willis' own publications include the first known list of Nova Scotia shells, published in 1857 in a periodical which has not survived; a list of birds of Nova Scotia in the Annual report of the board of regents of the Smithsonian Institution . . . for . . . 1858; a catalogue of marine shells of Nova Scotia in the Boston Society of Natural History, Proceedings, VIII (1862); a catalogue of edible mollusca, from a paper read before the Nova Scotia Literary and Scientific Society, published in Colonial Review (Halifax), 29 Nov. 1862; and a privately printed extensive list of 193 Nova Scotia shells (November 1863). P.C.]

Dominion Illustrated Weekly, a Canadian pictoral weekly (Montreal, Toronto), 11 Oct. 1890, 247. Unionist and Halifax Journal, 27 Dec. 1865. "John Robert Willis, the first Nova Scotian conchologist, a memorial; his life, his list of shells of Nova Scotia, and his other published works," ed. W. F. Ganong, Nova Scotian Institute of Natural Science, Proceedings and transactions (Halifax), VII (1886–90), PT. IV, 404–28. Harry Piers, "A brief historical account of the Nova Scotian Institute of Science . . . with biographical sketches of its deceased presidents and other prominent members," Nova Scotian Institute of Science, Proceedings and transactions, XIII (1910–14), xciii–xciv.

WILLIS, JOHN WALPOLE, judge; b. in England, 4 Jan. 1793, son of William Willis and Mary Smith; d. 10 Sept. 1877 at Wick House, Wick-Episcopi, Worcestershire, Eng.

William Willis died in 1809 leaving little estate and John Walpole rose by a combination of ambition, legal talents, and charm. He published his first legal work in 1816 and was called to the bar the following year. Willis' interest in equity led to the publication in 1820 of a book that long remained an authority, and of a third work in 1827. His increasingly successful practice of the law was matched by a profitable advance into established society. These interests converged in 1823–24 when Willis was retained by the 11th Earl of Strathmore. In August 1824 their association led to his marriage to the earl's elder daughter, Mary Isabella Bowes-Lyon, aged 22.

As a successful barrister and an authority on equity, Willis might have thrived indefinitely amid the efforts of Sir Robert Peel, as home secretary, to encourage the codification and moderation of English civil law and commercial law. But marriage to Lady Mary did not guarantee solvency or harmony. She brought no great dowry. Her life with Willis in Hendon, a quiet London suburb, offered little excitement; his limited means meant that his mother and sister were forced to share their home. Lady Mary's consciousness of her rank appears to have grown, rather than diminished, following her marriage; her ambitions and the other financial and professional demands of Willis' career were propelling him forward at a forced pace.

In 1827 the Colonial Office played briefly with the idea of pressing upon Upper Canada some of the current British legal reforms and of establishing a court of chancery through which remedies could be sought in equity. The Earl of Strathmore suggested that his son-in-law could grace that new bench with authority during the period of necessary adjustment. The reform was not yet finally settled, but on some loose understanding Willis accepted an interim appointment as junior puisne judge on the province's Court of King's Bench. Willis, with the entire Hendon ménage, arrived in York (Toronto) on 18 Sept. 1827. He was to be in Canada only nine months – less than half of Robert F. Gourlay*'s stay – but he would cause nearly as much alarm in official circles and stir the reform-minded at a decisive moment in their organization.

Willis discovered immediately that the governor, Sir Peregrine Maitland*, and his Executive Council questioned the Colonial Office's flirtation with chancery. The attorney general, John Beverley Robinson*, and other Family Compact lawyers, including the solicitor general, Henry John Boulton*, differed over important details of the plan; Maitland's strong will, thus reinforced, gave way only slowly to Whitehall's proposals for a provincial enabling act. Robinson was prepared to accede to the proposal and even entrusted the drafting to an opposition lawyer, Dr John Rolph*, but Willis over-reached himself in attempting to force the pace of negotiations. The Reformers were anxious to bargain with the government by log-rolling – an equity court in return for a more independent judiciary. Willis abandoned his natural alliance with Robinson to consort with four lawyers who were then chief opposition spokesmen – Rolph, William Warren Baldwin*, Robert Baldwin*, and Marshall Spring BIDWELL. Despite such advocates, Willis' bill was emasculated and finally abandoned in the Tory assembly. Meantime, the imperial law officers had advised Whitehall not to press the matter further. Thus, the junior puisne judge was forced to reassess his prospects in the less familiar field of common law and in a provincial society.

At the outset Willis and his wife had been warmly accepted into York's small circle. If Lady Mary thought her charms wasted, Willis quickly joined the round of parties and fashionable charities with the confidence that had served him at home. This goodwill, however, was soon squandered. Willis' appointment had been deeply resented by aspirants such as Robinson, Boulton, and Christopher Hagerman*, who had prepared themselves through years of service in the common law and in Upper Canada's legal system. Willis' contempt for their abilities was expressed plainly, as was his poor opinion of his two superiors on the King's Bench, Chief Justice William Campbell* and Levius Peters Sherwood*. In part Willis' cause was sound: he argued, for example, that punishment in criminal cases was inhumane by contemporary English standards. But, by flaunting his own lack of factional spirit, he made the case for equity seem like a call for purity. Neither a demagogue like the earlier Judge Robert Thorpe*, nor a firebrand like Gourlay, he, with his charm and plausibility, seemed a more formidable opponent. Moreover, Governor Maitland's wife, daughter of a duke, saw a threat to her social position from an earl's daughter. These social and professional conflicts had developed so quickly that an open conflict must arise when Willis, after being resident only a few weeks, applied, in rivalry with Robinson, for succession to the chief justice's seat.

On 11 April 1828, taking advantage of the absence of his two colleagues, Willis behaved extraordinarily while presiding over the libel trial of Francis Collins*, editor of the Canadian Freeman. Collins had sought the latitude customarily accorded those appearing without counsel, but Willis permitted and even encouraged him in a prolonged, irrelevant attack upon the law officers, Robinson and Boulton. On Robinson's interjection, Willis presumed to question from the bench Robinson's entire record of public office, threatening to make "a representation . . . to His Majesty's Government." As John Charles Dent* concludes, "Judge Willis seems to have been wrong in his law, wrong in his etiquette, wrong in his temper, and wrong in his construction of judicial amenities."

By now, however, an impending general election invited hyperbole and postures of convenience. Maitland hastily assured Whitehall that because no one had before protested against "the laws, or the manner in which they have been administered, I must conclude that the people are content with both." On the other hand, "the people" – including the most notable Reform lawyers – had already decided for Willis. Memory of the application of the sedition act to Robert Gourlay and Barnabas Bidwell* was fresh. Willis' legitimate concern for the laws, however, threatened to give way to demagogy – an easy trap for a man of his vanity.

On 16 June Willis displayed a sensitivity for legal technicalities that would not have served him on 11 April by declaring that the act establishing King's Bench required the presence of the "Chief Justice, together with two puisne justices." Campbell was still absent on leave, as legal and administrative officers had frequently been of necessity in the past. Willis now presumed to cast doubt upon the entire legal foundation and record of the court for the past generation. The technicality needed to be met: the Baldwins refused to pursue justice further in King's Bench. But Willis had really sought to indict a society, not a court. Public alarm and confusion might gain him much.

On 26 June, advised by the threatened law officers, Maitland and his council agreed to the "amoval" of Judge Willis; a week later, Hagerman was named to fill the post. Public meetings and messages of condolence encouraged Willis to press his case in London. Trustees, including the Baldwins, John Galt*, and their wives, offered to care for Lady Mary and the family, and Robert Baldwin undertook to act as her solicitor. But committees can only do so much, and when Lady Mary was to rejoin her husband in England, she quietly chose instead to take up residence in Montreal with an officer in the 38th Light Infantry, Lieutenant Bernard, and subsequently to elope to England, leaving her son in a maid's care.

John Willis' career and Upper Canada's fortunes might have improved from that moment. Willis, as a cause, had helped to knit together the Reformers, who in the election of 1828 won their first assembly majority and elected Bidwell as speaker. Willis appealed his removal, lost an initial round, but was rehabilitated by the Privy Council, which overruled his amoval without chance of defence; he was given a new judicial appointment in Demerara (now part of Guyana). His marriage was dissolved, and in 1836 he married Ann Susanna Kent of Wick-Episcopi, Worcestershire, by whom he had three children. In 1841 he received another judicial appointment, in New South Wales, but again he clashed with a strong-minded governor, Sir George Gipps, and was amoved without notice; again, the Privy Council sustained his appeal on the same technicality. This time he received no new appointment. He retired to Wick House and lived privately for another 30 years.

In retirement Willis composed a summary of his colonial experiences, On the government of the British colonies. In it he displayed all that lack of faith in the colonies that had been implicit in his public career. Colonies, he argued like John Graves Simcoe*, only deserved recognition equivalent to English counties; as their highest political ambition they might be represented in the British parliament, but they should be administered by lords lieutenant. Whatever the convenience of the Willis incident to the Reformers of 1828, those future advocates of responsible government could not have lived with Willis for long – nor could most people.

ALAN WILSON

J. W. Willis was the author of the following works: A digest of the rules and practice as to interrogatories for the examination of witnesses, in courts of equity and common law, with precedents (London, 1816); Pleadings in equity, illustrative of Lord Redesdale's treatise on the pleadings in suits, in the Court of Chancery, by English bill (London, 1820–21); A practical treatise on the duties and responsibilities of trustees (London, 1827).

PRO, CO 42/381–42/387; 42/408. G.B., Parl., House of Commons, Hansard, XXIV (1830), 551–55; Parl., House of Commons paper, 1831–32, XXXII, 740, pp.49–58, Upper Canada. Return to several addresses to his majesty, dated 31 July 1832 . . .; Parl., House of Lords, The mirror of parliament . . . for the session . . . commencing 29th January 1828 . . ., ed. J. H. Barrow (36v., London, 1827–37), III, 1610–11, 14 May 1829. Papers relating to the removal of the Honourable John Walpole Willis from the office of one of his majesty's judges of the Court of King's Bench of Upper Canada ([London?], 1829). Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Journals, 1829, app., "Report of the select committee on the case of Mr. Justice Willis and the administration of justice." "Willis v. Gipps [1846]," Reports of cases heard and determined by the Judicial Committee and the lords of the Privy Council, 1845–47, ed. E. F. Moore, V (The English Reports, XIII, Edinburgh and London, 1901, 379–91). DNB. "Willis-Bund of Wick Episcopi," in Bernard Burke, A genealogical and heraldic history of the landed gentry of Great Britain (12th ed., London, 1914), 270–71.

Craig, Upper Canada. Dent, Upper Canadian rebellion, I, 162–94. Aileen Dunham, Political unrest in Upper Canada, 1815–1836 (London, 1927),110–15, 157. William Kingsford, History of Canada (10v., Toronto, 1887–98), IX, 258–79. Roger Therry, Reminiscences of thirty years' residence in New South Wales and Victoria . . . (2nd ed., London, 1863), 341–45. G. E. Wilson, The life of Robert Baldwin; a study in the struggle for responsible government (Toronto, 1933).

WILLIS, MICHAEL, Presbyterian minister, educator, and abolitionist; b. 1798 at Greenock, Renfrew, Scotland, son of William Willis, a prominent minister and theologian of the Original Associate Synod (Old Light Burghers), one of the groups deriving from the first secession of 1733 which protested the abuses of patronage in the Church of Scotland; d. at Aberlour, Banff, Scotland, 19 Aug. 1879. The name of his wife is not known.

Michael Willis obtained his MA at the University of Glasgow in 1817 and received theological training in the Divinity Hall of the Old Light Burghers. After his ordination on 23 Jan. 1821 he served the Albion Street Church, Glasgow, until in 1839 he was called to Renfield Street Church in that city. In 1835 he had been given added responsibility when he succeeded his father as professor of theology at the Divinity Hall.

Willis played a leading role in the negotiations which led to the reunion of the Old Light Burghers with the Church of Scotland in 1839. The same year he received the DD from Glasgow University. His stay in the Church of Scotland was short-lived, however, as he joined with those who separated from it in 1843 to form the Free Church of Scotland. He was sent to Canada in 1845 to represent the Free Church cause and to cement relations with those in Canada who had separated from the Church of Scotland synod in sympathy with the Free Church. While in Canada he taught on a temporary basis at the newly founded Knox College in Toronto. Two years later, upon the unanimous recommendation of the colonial committee of the Free Church of Scotland, he was appointed professor of theology in Knox College. His scholarly and administrative gifts were recognized when he was appointed its first principal in 1857. He assisted in drawing up the constitution under which the college was incorporated the following year. During his principalship Willis kept Knox College in the paths of Calvinist orthodoxy. A popular preacher and churchman, Willis visited extensively throughout the church.

Named to the senate of the University of Toronto in 1851 by the governor general, Lord Elgin [Bruce*], Willis also served as a university examiner. However, he resigned from both posts in 1863 when objections were raised against him as an examiner. The objections appear to have stemmed from his sympathy for the point of view reflected in the findings of the university commission, which had published its report early in 1863. Willis openly supported the claims of the denominational colleges to a share of the university endowments and thereby incurred the displeasure of his synod and college, both of which were bitterly opposed to the granting of financial aid to denominational colleges. Such grants, they believed, would be destructive of the "unsectarian System of Education in Canada West." Queen's University in Kingston conferred the LLD on him in 1863.

Willis was the first and only president of the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, founded in 1851 to find ways and means to provide relief for, and to rehabilitate, fugitive slaves from the United States. Included on the executive with Willis were George BROWN and Oliver Mowat*. Prior to his coming to Canada Willis had published a lengthy pamphlet against slavery, describing it as degrading and contrary to the will of God. He took a personal interest in the Reverend William King*'s Elgin settlement in which King attempted to prepare the Negro fugitives for productive participation in the Canadian community. Willis preached at the first communion service held for the little congregation of fugitives at Buxton.

Willis retired as principal and professor of Knox College in 1870. He was elected moderator of the first general assembly of the Canada Presbyterian Church in that year. He retired to London, England, but frequently travelled to the Continent or to Scotland as a guest preacher, and in 1877 he represented the Presbyterian Church in Canada at the first general Presbyterian council held in Edinburgh. He died in 1879 while preaching for a friend at Aberlour, Banff, Scotland.

ALLAN L. FARRIS

Michael Willis edited Collectanea graeca et latina: selections from the Greek and Latin fathers; with notes, biographical and illustrative (Toronto, 1865), and was the author of A discourse on national establishments of Christianity (Glasgow, 1833); Pulpit discourses, expository and practical and college addresses (London, 1873); Remarks on the late union between the Church of Scotland and the Associate Synod in opposition to certain statements of the dean of faculty, with the documents pertaining to the union (Glasgow, 1840); Slavery indefensible: an essay (Glasgow, 1847).

Presbyterian Church of Canada, Synod, Minutes (Toronto), session 28, 1857, 26, 54. Canada Presbyterian Church, Synod, Minutes (Toronto), session 2, 1862, 54–55; session 3, 1863, 26–27. Canada Presbyterian Church, General Assembly, Acts and proceedings (Toronto), 1870, 61. Presbyterian Church in Canada, General Assembly, Acts and proceedings (Toronto), 1880, 59.

Constitution and bye-laws of the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada (Toronto, 1851). Documentary history of education in Upper Canada (Hodgins), XVII, 171–72; XVIII, 15. Ecclesiastical and Missionary Record for the Presbyterian Church of Canada (Toronto), IV (1847–48), 35; VII (1851–52), 180. First annual report, presented to the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, by its executive committee, March 24th 1852 (Toronto, 1852). Presbyterian Record (Montreal), IV (1879), 263.

Hew Scott, Fasti ecclesiae, the succession of ministers in the Church of Scotland from the Reformation (new ed., 9v., Edinburgh, 1915–61), III, 431–32. Our Scottish clergy; fifty-two sketches, biographical, theological, & critical, including clergymen of all denominations, ed. John Smith (Edinburgh, 1840), 120–25. G. S. Pryde, Scotland from 1603 to the present day (London, 1962), 182. W. J. Rattray, The Scot in British North America (4v., Toronto, 1880–84), III, 823–24. William Caven, "The Rev. Michael Willis, D.D., LL.D," Knox College Monthly (Toronto), IV (1885–86), 97–101.

WILLSON, HUGH BOWLBY (Bowlsby, Boultby), barrister, author, journalist, and businessman; b. in Saltfleet Township, U.C., 15 Sept. 1813, third son of John Willson* and Elizabeth Bowlby, and uncle of Thomas Leopold "Carbide" Willson*; d. in New York City, 29 April 1880.

Hugh Bowlby Willson was educated at the Gore District grammar school in Hamilton and became a close friend of John RAE, headmaster of the school. From Rae and from his own father Willson received his interest in the economic ideas of Adam Smith. Politically, Willson became first a Peelite Conservative and signed with Rae a petition in January 1836 calling for a public display of loyalty to the king in opposition to the Upper Canadian Reformers. He served in the rebellion in 1837 as a lieutenant in the 3rd Regiment of Gore militia. In the 1840s, though acquainted with such Reformers as Hamilton Hartley KILLALY, William Hamilton Merritt*, and Francis Hincks*, he distrusted the Reform leadership of Robert Baldwin*. Instead, he considered himself independent of party and favoured policies for the promoting of economic development of the united province.

For a short time in 1834 Willson had been a purser on a steamer on Lake Ontario. In 1836 he began to study law and was admitted to the bar in 1841, but before practising he travelled to the West Indies for his health. He spent some time in Trinidad and wrote articles about its "natural curiosities" in the New York Albion.

Willson apparently had limited success as a barrister. He turned to land speculation in the late 1840s and to development of real estate in the Hamilton region, laying out a residential area in east Hamilton and villa lots in the village of Ontario (later named Winona). In 1847 he was secretary of the Upper Canada Mining Company. His attention also turned to journalism. He was always keenly interested in topical affairs and contributed articles to the Hamilton Spectator for many years after its establishment in 1846.

When the British parliament abandoned mercantilism in the late 1840s, Canada lost its preferred trading position and suffered a serious recession; many disgruntled merchants and politicians began to consider an alternative economic alignment to benefit the colony, annexation to the United States. To discuss the new problems facing Canada, the British American League was formed in 1849, largely by Tories. When it met at Kingston in July under the presidency of George Moffatt*, Willson was a delegate for Saltfleet Township. He spoke in favour of annexation, and withdrew from the league in September because it rejected the idea. In succeeding months he followed Luther Hamilton HOLTON and Alexander Tilloch Galt* in advocating Canadian separation from the British Empire and annexation to the United States, and in October 1849 he founded and edited the annexationist Independent, a Toronto weekly; Willson lost a considerable amount of money when it failed in April 1850 from lack of interest and financial support. That year he was a secretary of the Toronto branch of the annexation committee.

Willson abandoned his law practice about 1852 and became a dealer in securities in London, England, with William Shaw and Malcolm Cowan. While in England he may also have written for the London Times. He was appointed a commissioner to the Paris Exposition of 1855 by the Canadian government; he was again in Hamilton in that same year, and by 1857 appears to have settled there. He became the first editor of the Hamilton Times in 1858, resigning in 1860. It was an independent liberal paper, which succeeded the Hamilton Banner and strongly promoted the commercial development of Canada. Willson also wrote widely on currency and banking, and on the advantages of a written constitution for Canada, An early advocate of building the Great Western Railway, he canvassed for municipal subscriptions to the company's stock. He was also active in planning the construction of the Hamilton and Port Dover Railway (later called the Hamilton and Lake Erie).

In the early 1860s Willson resided in Quebec City as parliamentary correspondent for the Quebec Morning Chronicle and other newspapers; for the Chronicle he wrote a series of articles on Canada's defence problems which were subsequently published as a pamphlet in 1862. As a resident of Quebec City, in 1864 he described himself: "Barrister and Attorney at Law, parliamentary agent, solicitor of patents of invention, &c. &c."

Willson moved to Washington, D.C., around the close of the Civil War and married Harriot Conway Ladde of that city. He later settled in New York City but continued to follow Canadian affairs and to write for the Hamilton Spectator. He had sophisticated and advanced ideas on monetary theory, and was a persistent advocate of reform of the money and banking system in both the United States and Great Britain. He became deeply involved in the postwar "Greenback" controversy in the United States. In a number of pamphlets and in testimony before a congressional committee in 1879, he argued strongly that notes issued by the state should be the permanent and exclusive circulating medium. He suggested the creation of a currency board to control the issue of paper money and proposed that the amount of paper money should be related to the volume of business transactions in the country. He believed that monetary mismanagement was a principal cause of periodic depressions in Great Britain and the United States. He was also a vigorous opponent of the Bank of England and wanted the introduction of one pound notes for general circulation "of a convenient size for pocket use."

The quality of Willson's writings on money and banking was excellent and he foreshadowed a number of welcome changes which were to be introduced after his death. He kept in touch with his friend and mentor John Rae until Rae's death in 1871, and, although he does not specifically refer to Rae in his writings, he was clearly influenced by his penetrating ideas on economics. He died in New York in 1880, survived by his wife and two adopted children.

R. Warren James and John S. Moir

H. B. Willson is the author of: Canada and the United States: [a letter] to the editor of the National Intelligencer (Washington, 1849); Currency; or, the fundamental principles of monetary science postulated, explained and applied (New York, 1882); Great Western Railway of Canada (Hamilton, Ont., 1860); The Great Western Railway of Canada: its proposed branches and extensions (London, 1854); High speed steamers; or, how to build a river boat to run thirty miles an hour (Albany, N.Y., 1866); Industrial crises, their causes and remedies . . . from the report of the congressional committee on depression in labour and business (Washington, 1879); The military defences of Canada, considered in respect to our colonial relations with Great Britain, in a series of letters published in the Quebec "Morning Chronicle" (Quebec, 1862); The money question considered scientifically and practically . . . (London, 1874); A plea for Uncle Sam's money: or greenbacks versus bank notes (New York, 1870); The proposed Hamilton and South-western Railway (Hamilton, Ont., 1854); Reports and correspondence on the "Patent Compound Rail" (London, 1851); The science of money considered . . . (Washington, 1869); The science of ship-building, considered in its relations to the laws of nature (London, 1863).

Hamilton Public Library (Hamilton), Land papers, 1838, p.34; 1849, p.6; 1850, p.3. New York County, Surrogate's Court (New York), will of Harriot C. Willson. PAO, William Hamilton Merritt papers, H. B. Willson to W. H. Merritt, 17 Dec. 1842, 2 April 1859. "The annexation movement, 1849–50," ed. A. G. Penny, CHR, V (1924), 236–61. [Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty), I, 446. Hamilton Spectator, 1, 4, 5 May 1880. Montreal Gazette, 19 Jan. 1836. Canada directory . . . 1851, ed. R. W. S. Mackay (Montreal, 1851), 108. A supplement to the Canada directory . . . 1853, ed. R. W. S. Mackay (Montreal, 1853). Arthur papers (Sanderson). C. D. W. Goodwin, Canadian economic thought: the political economy of a developing nation, 1814–1914 (Durham, N.C., and London, 1961). Middleton, Municipality of Toronto, I, 241. C. D. Allin, "The British North American League, 1849," Ont. Hist., XIII (1915), 74–115. Annals of the Forty (Grimsby), IX (1958), 66. Canadian Library Association, Microfilm committee, News Notes (Ottawa), September 1959.

WILMOT, LEMUEL ALLAN, lawyer, politician, and judge; b. 31 Jan. 1809 in Sunbury County, N.B., son of William Wilmot and Hannah Bliss; d. 20 May 1878 at Fredericton, N.B.

Lemuel Allan Wilmot's father was a lumberman of loyalist ancestry, and his mother, who died before he was two years old, was a daughter of Daniel Bliss*, a loyalist and member of the first New Brunswick Executive Council in 1784. William Wilmot, not particularly successful in business, moved to Fredericton in 1813 to found a Baptist church and to educate his children. There he acquired an interest in politics and was elected to the assembly in 1816; he was defeated in 1819 and 1820 but re-elected in 1823. Twice, however, he was denied permission to take his seat, for an act had been passed in 1818 to prevent clergymen from sitting in the legislature. As he was ejected from the house for the second time, he is reported to have said, "Sir, the time will come when that lad (pointing to him [Lemuel Allan]) will see that justice is done to my memory." This story and another, that Wilmot overcame a speech impediment to become a great orator, form part of a mythology that enveloped Lemuel Allan Wilmot after his death and elevated him to heroic stature.

Wilmot was educated at the Fredericton grammar school and took a partial course at King's College. In June 1825 he entered the law office of Charles Simonds Putnam; he became an attorney in 1830, was admitted to the bar in 1832, and created a queen's counsel in 1838. As a lawyer and later as a judge, Wilmot impressed more by his style and oratory than by his logic and wisdom. His striking appearance, sharp gestures, and flowing language full of historical and biblical illustrations were combined with high emotion in most effective presentations. "When he drew his tall form up before a jury, fixed his black piercing eyes upon them, moved those rapid hands and pointed that pistol finger, and poured out his arguments and made his appeal with glowing, burning eloquence, few jurors could resist him."

Wilmot's admission to the bar in 1832 coincided with his marriage to Jane Ballock of Saint John. Her death the following year, "after a severe and protracted illness," may have affected Wilmot's religious attitudes. In 1833 he came under the influence of the Reverend Enoch Wood* of the Fredericton Methodist Church, and soon dedicated himself to the church. His marriage to Elizabeth Black in the fall of 1834 was closely related to this religious commitment. She was the granddaughter of the Reverend William Black*, "the father of Methodism" in the Maritimes. Wilmot never swayed from his new faith.

Almost as soon as he opened his law practice in Fredericton Wilmot turned his skills to politics. Successful in both a by-election and a general election in 1834, he took his seat in the assembly on 25 Jan. 1835. Neither his youth nor his surroundings inhibited Wilmot; in his first session he introduced resolutions and bills on subjects such as the Maine–New Brunswick boundary and the expenses of judges on circuit. By 1836 he was reputed to be able "to thrill and enchain legislatures" in four- to five-hour speeches. The subject of many was the crown lands office and its management by the commissioner, Thomas Baillie*. Apparently as a result of these speeches Wilmot was chosen to accompany William Crane* of Sackville to London in 1836 with specific demands for the surrender to the assembly of the remaining crown lands and of the revenue that Baillie had accumulated from earlier sales. Lord Glenelg [Charles Grant], the colonial secretary, agreed to all the requests and the crown lands were handed over in return for a permanent civil list. Of greater significance was Glenelg's decision that the Executive Council was to be reconstructed "to ensure the presence in the Council of Gentlemen representing all the various interests which exist in the Province, and possessing at the same time the confidence of the people at large." Glenelg was concerned not only with New Brunswick but also with the whole of British North America, and planned to use New Brunswick as the model for change. Lieutenant Governor Sir Archibald Campbell*, horrified at Glenelg's decisions, frustrated them at every turn, so much so that Crane and Wilmot were again dispatched to London in 1837 to reaffirm their gains. The trip was unnecessary, for Campbell, whose resignation they sought, had been replaced by Sir John Harvey*, the governor of Prince Edward Island.

Wilmot returned to New Brunswick to see a civil list bill passed in the legislature and Harvey liberalize the council by the addition of assemblymen including Crane. Wilmot as yet had no claim. In the meantime he supported the governor's struggle against the old Odell-Baillie clique, which was not easily uprooted. Wilmot's objectives were limited to those outlined in the Glenelg dispatch and it is unlikely that he either accepted or even understood the full meaning of responsible government. Never a good party man even when he was the leader of the reform movement, Wilmot did not hesitate to desert his colleagues when government appointments were offered. His pursuit of office, first on the Executive Council, then on the bench, and finally as lieutenant governor, might well be classed as rapacious. One authority has suggested recently that even before he was in office Wilmot was part of a "new family compact" that controlled New Brunswick after 1837 to a far greater extent than had the old compact. As an example, when George Pigeon Bliss*, the receiver general, died leaving his accounts short by £7,000, Wilmot and other Bliss relatives prevented the crown from seizing his assets. On another occasion, Wilmot, attacked in the press for his "usual effrontery and disregard for the truth," had the journalist, John A. Pierce, committed to common jail for his "gross and scandalous libel." Pierce had been criticizing Wilmot for some time and the latter proved remarkably sensitive to attack. In 1840 the Saint John Chronicle, which referred to Wilmot as "That inflated bladder of wind," attacked the lieutenant governor, and it too was taken to court. Harvey had not wished to pursue the matter, but Wilmot and others insisted. This case was lost as was a final one in 1844, when Wilmot was again criticized. In a negative way he thus contributed to the freedom of the press for the courts settled the issue by ruling against assembly decisions.

From 1837 until 1843 Wilmot participated actively in the assembly. The smart phrases of the Durham Report and the popularization of the ideas of responsible government provided him with the necessary slogans, yet Charles FISHER of York County, the leading constitutional expert in the province, was the only New Brunswick politician who treated the subject at an elevated level. Wilmot's devotion to the principle of responsible government was questioned by his contemporaries and remains hypothetical.

Under Sir William Colebrooke*, the new governor, an election was held early in 1843. Wilmot paraded the country with statements on responsible government, yet in New Brunswick, as in the rest of British North America, these were not the sort of issues that captivated the public imagination. Colebrooke, a moderate reformer himself, and aware of the diversity in the assembly, set about to form an all-factions Executive Council that undoubtedly had the support of the majority in the assembly. It included, among others, Edward Barron CHANDLER, Robert Leonard HAZEN, Hugh Johnston* and Wilmot. Wilmot's presence required little if any soul searching. To him taking office was a logical outcome of the Glenelg approach and probably satisfied his interpretation of responsible government. There was not much consternation at the time, although a liberal historian has written: "Mr. Wilmot certainly lost prestige by his action on this occasion, as he did subsequently from the display of similar weakness."

Colebrooke's limited acceptance of the new system soon forced Wilmot out of the council. On Christmas Day 1844 William Franklin Odell*, the provincial secretary, died. Before the sun had set Wilmot was at Colebrooke's door to inform him that Odell's position must be filled by a member of the assembly holding a seat on the Executive Council. Colebrooke, unwilling to make such a concession, appointed his son-in-law, Alfred Reade. The British government later declared the appointment invalid; in the meantime Chandler, Hazen, Johnston, and Wilmot resigned from the council. The first three stated that they had resigned because of Reade's unsuitability for the position; Wilmot had two reasons. The first was "that all the offices of honour and emolument in the gift of the administration of the government should be bestowed upon the inhabitants of the province." The second was that he supported British practices "which require the administration to be conducted by heads of departments responsible to the legislature. . . ." Colebrooke formed a new council and retained it even after the assembly passed by 23 to 10 a resolution that it did not possess "the confidence of the House nor the Country at large."

Out of office, Wilmot took on the appearance of the leader of the opposition and, although his position changed from issue to issue, he regularly pressed for the initiation of money grants by the executive.

Another of his interests was King's College. Between 1839 and 1846 he introduced a series of bills for some liberalization of the college. Only in 1846 was a minor revision accepted. Later he worked closely with Charles Fisher on a total revision which resulted in the creation of the University of New Brunswick in 1860. A related issue was a non-sectarian public school system and to this he gave untiring support. "It is unpardonable that any child should grow up in our country without the benefit of, at least, a common-school education," he stated in 1852. "It is the right of the child. It is the duty not only of the parent but of the people; the property of the country should educate the country. . . ." As lieutenant governor of New Brunswick in the 1870s he assisted in the passage of a school act fulfilling many of his own aims.

The nature of the political system was, however, the overriding issue of the 1840s. An election of 1846 returned many new members, and Wilmot confidently expected an invitation into the government. It came; in fact, he was the first offered a seat in council. After "much deliberation" he accepted, if "four professing his own opinion, whom he would be prepared to nominate, were appointed in a cabinet of nine." From this distance it is difficult to determine which was the greater – Colebrooke's relief at being able to refuse or Wilmot's dismay at the rejection. Chandler, Hazen, and Johnston returned to the government, and the "new compact," without Wilmot, governed with the support of the majority.

Over the next few months Wilmot's action as provocateur reached its height, especially during the debate on a motion of want of confidence in 1847. On 25 March 1847 he appeared at his best and his worst in a long, colourful, but rambling speech full of high sentiment and scorching personal references. George Edward Fenety* reported the speech: "A good deal had been said about politics and political principles; but his political principles were not of yesterday – he had gleaned them from the history of his country which they were all proud to own. Would any hon. member dare to tell him that because we were three thousand miles from the heart of the British Empire, that the blood of freemen should not flow through the veins of the sons of New Brunswick?" Almost in the next breath he could turn to a slashing personal attack on Hazen. Much of the speech was responses to interjections and chatter in the house. Fisher's constitutionally sound speeches lulled to sleep those who stayed; Wilmot's appeal to the converted and unconverted filled the house and few came through the experience unaffected. The motion of 1847 was lost 23 to 12.

This exercise of 1847 was really the last of its type for Wilmot. Sir Edmund Walker Head* became governor in 1848, with instructions to follow the dispatch of Earl Grey to Sir John Harvey of Nova Scotia requiring that the council be "men holding seats in one or other House, taking a leading part in political life, and above all, exercising influence over the Assembly." Head immediately set about to form a coalition "of the ablest Liberals with the preponderantly powerful Conservatives." Wilmot and Fisher thus joined Chandler, Hazen, John Simcoe SAUNDERS, William B. Kinnear*, and John R. Partelow*. Head had wanted Wilmot to become provincial secretary, but he refused and insisted on being appointed attorney general, the logical stepping stone to the Supreme Court. Wilmot did hasten to assure Chandler that the latter's "claims for the Bench are undoubted."

Wilmot and Fisher were accused of deserting their principles in 1848. "All hope of radical change, with the loss of two of the ablest standard bearers of the party, now vanished," lamented Fenety. "It was almost worse than useless to contend longer for equal political justice, when the leading champions of the party had joined the standard of the enemy. . . . This was the great political mistake of their lives." From this point of view, responsible government was not introduced into New Brunswick in 1848 and the major reason was the Wilmot–Fisher betrayal. Both men, however, believed they were entirely consistent with their principles. The Glenelg settlement had created a spirit of moderation which bridged the gap between 1837 and 1848. Chandler Hazen, Wilmot, and Fisher were products of a system that achieved most of the features of responsible government without the necessity of political parties. In addition, all preferred coalitions. Wilmot, moreover, was merely rejoining his colleagues of 1843 and 1844. The government formed in 1848 unquestionably had the support of the majority in the assembly and retained it until 1854.

Wilmot as attorney general (1848–1851) was a disappointment to even the most faithful. His principal achievement was an act for the consolidation of the criminal law, "a useful but not a brilliant work." Some practical changes were made to assist municipalities, and as chairman of the committee on agriculture he rendered good service. On the whole, however, Wilmot's primary function was to present and defend the position of the government in the assembly. There he frequently found himself on the receiving end of sharp barbs from former colleagues, especially William Johnstone Ritchie* of Saint John. On other occasions he took action not approved by the government but which he seemed called upon to pursue to retain political support. Goaded by Ritchie, for instance, he pressed legislation to lower the salaries of public officials, especially those of judges. In general, it is difficult to find consistency in his stand on issues. He voted against Fisher's bill requiring members to vacate seats on accepting appointments. He supported railway construction, but saw no conflict of interest between the Intercolonial and the European and North American line to the United States. In 1850 he made the major speech at the Portland convention in support of the latter [see John Alfred POOR]; that same year he accompanied Head to Toronto to discuss the Intercolonial. Wilmot had attended the first British North American intercolonial conference at Halifax in 1849 and seems then to have become a supporter of a union. At that same conference he offered to throw the whole inshore fisheries open to the Americans in return for reciprocity, and in 1850 he and Head were in Washington to explore possibilities.

Wilmot was never defeated at the polls, but in the election of 1850 he barely scraped into the assembly. Fisher was defeated. Wilmot may well have come to view his position as precarious and have realized that he had lost touch with New Brunswick politics. Governor Head was not enamoured with him, especially after his action concerning the salaries of judges. "If the Attorney General choose to resign, because he is offended by the expression of my opinion," wrote Head to Grey, "he must do so." A defrocked Wilmot might be a menace in the house, but Head did not believe he would resign. An escape for both was provided with the resignation of the chief justice, Ward Chipman*, on 17 Oct. 1850.

"I expect My Government here to break up in a scramble for the Chief Justiceship," Head wrote a friend the same day. The scramble, with one exception, failed to take place; the exception was Wilmot. The Executive Council decided not to add to the bench, considering the three remaining judges adequate for the work. Only Fisher, Kinnear, and Alexander Rankin* dissented. The day the council made its decision, most of the members left Fredericton for their homes. That evening Wilmot composed a letter to Head: "I certainly think we have not acted wisely in the advice given by our minute today, and I am now disposed to retract the opinion therein expressed." The next day he read his letter to Head. The encounter made it clear that Head would decide "on his own responsibility and not necessarily on that of his Council," and that Wilmot would accept appointment to the bench regardless of any problems over responsibility or principle. Secretly, Head had James CARTER appointed the chief justice and Wilmot a puisne judge. In January 1851 this news was sprung on the province in a special edition of the Royal Gazette.

After all possible rationalizations have been considered, it remains that Head and Wilmot between them sacrificed the essence of responsible government. Yet only Fisher resigned from the council for the principle, and he had lost his seat in the assembly and had no choice. It may be that New Brunswick was not ready for responsible government; it is more likely that the system was not well served by the two men, Head and Wilmot, who had the power to make it succeed. The other members of the council served the principle no better, but they had not committed themselves to it as had Wilmot.

From 1851 until 1868 Wilmot was a judge; apparently he served well but gained little distinction. No great decisions are on the record nor are there any blotches. He remained before the public to a far greater degree than most judges, however, and his other interests brought him into prominence: the Methodist church, the militia, educational changes, and confederation.

Wilmot was the first non-conformist to hold the office of attorney general and to be appointed to the bench. For these reasons if for no others he would have been important among the dissenters, but he took his church work more seriously than any of his other endeavours. He was the main pillar of the Fredericton Methodist (now Wilmot United) Church. Following a fire in 1850 he headed a movement to construct a much larger church of modern design. He had in addition been choir director from 1845 and was superintendent of the Sabbath school for most of his adult life.

During these same years Wilmot gave frequent and popular public lectures. In Saint John in 1858 over 2,000 came to hear "The most eloquent lecture I have ever listened to." His range of subjects was quite wide. It might be "Havelock's March to Lucknow," the public school system, the evil of Darwin, or the dangers of alcohol, though he does not appear to have been a prohibitionist.

Wilmot's missionary zeal was kept for common schools. Undoubtedly he supported an education for everyone, but he wished to eliminate Roman Catholic influences from the schools. His strong anti-Catholic and anti-French positions were public knowledge. As a judge he was severely reprimanded for a speech on a priest who flogged a boy for reading the Bible. When he was lieutenant governor in the 1870s a public school act was passed – the product, according to the Catholic press, of Pope L. A. Wilmot and his half-dozen Methodist cardinals. Wilmot's view of the French had been stated firmly in 1837: "Lower Canada would [not] be tranquillised and restored to a proper state, till all the French distinguishing marks were utterly abolished, and the English laws, language and institutions, universally established throughout the Province."

As a young man Wilmot had joined the York County militia and quickly rose to the rank of major. When the Aroostook War threatened in 1838–39 Wilmot at the head of his troop was patrolling the banks of the Saint John River. That was as close as he got to battle; he remained ready, however, and was a battalion commander at the first militia camp in the province in 1862. Lieutenant Governor Arthur Hamilton Gordon* was favourably impressed and promoted him to lieutenant-colonel on 1 Jan. 1863.

Wilmot's public activity was most strikingly displayed when confederation, which he fully supported, was mooted. "Keep your eye on the Pacific," was his theme. Wilmot and Samuel Leonard Tilley*, the government leader in 1864, had come to know each other in the 1850s and had participated in a lecture series in 1860. Shortly after the Quebec conference, Tilley consulted Wilmot over an approach to the public. "You must not lay too much scope on the financial adjustments," he told Tilley. Stress the "great future," and "national greatness." When Tilley was defeated by Albert James Smith* a few months later, Wilmot's position became uncomfortable. Smith reprimanded Wilmot for his strong pro-confederation statement before a grand jury. The office of chief justice twice became open and Wilmot was twice passed over, the second time for a junior judge and former antagonist, W. J. Ritchie. Even his cousin, Robert Duncan Wilmot*, who was on the Executive Council, could not assist him.

The eventual success of the confederation movement led to Wilmot's appointment as the first native-born lieutenant governor of New Brunswick. Tilley had written John A. Macdonald* on 3 Oct. 1867 requesting it, but it was not granted until nine months later, on 23 July 1868, and only after Tilley's continual pleadings. During his five years as lieutenant governor, Wilmot conducted himself well, pleasing even those who had been opposed to him. The University of New Brunswick, which owed much to him and on whose senate he served from 1860, awarded him an honorary DCL during this period.

Wilmot retired to his gardens at "Evelyn Grove," Fredericton, when Tilley succeeded him as lieutenant governor on 15 Nov. 1873. He served on the commission to settle the Prince Edward Island land claims, and he was appointed arbitrator in the western Ontario boundary dispute. Before the commission got underway, he died of a heart attack on 20 May 1878.

Few New Brunswick figures are better known than Lemuel Allan Wilmot. He is bracketed with Joseph HOWE, Robert Baldwin*, and Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* as a central personality in the struggle for responsible government. The city of Fredericton commemorates him with a church, a park, and several buildings. An examination of his career, curiously, does not reveal the reasons for this high reputation. As a politician and a judge he was not particularly notable. His legislative record was not impressive. His devotion to principles was tenuous at best, and he betrayed responsible government. How then can his eminence be explained? It seems to rest on three components.

As a public speaker Wilmot ranked with the best of his time. He thrilled audiences long after he had left the political scene and long after they had forgotten what his contribution had been. By the time he had become lieutenant governor, he was almost an institution.

Of more importance was his religion. He became prominent in his province as a non-conformist, proudly parading his religion all the way. In 1880 the Reverend John Lathern*, a Methodist clergyman and editor, wrote a eulogistic biography in which the whole of Wilmot's career was treated as a service to God, church, and country. Few New Brunswick politicians had biographies; no other was interpreted in providential terms. For over 25 years Lathern's remained the standard work on Wilmot. In 1907 James Hannay*, writing for the Makers of Canada series, started with Lathern's book as a solid foundation and erected on it the Whig-Liberal interpretation demanded by the series. Its preoccupation with responsible government as the great Canadian achievement assumed a Howe or a Baldwin in New Brunswick and Hannay obligingly produced Wilmot. Even with this sanguine approach, however, Hannay had difficulty forcing Wilmot into the mould. His humble youth and distinguished later years served admirably, but the main body of the career lacked the essential ingredients. In preparing the 1927 edition of the text, George Wilson felt it necessary to stress some of the problems in the preface and to add a 16-page appendix. The Hannay biography, nevertheless, remained unchanged. Sixty years after its publication it was still the authority.

Wilmot's reputation, in the final analysis, is decidedly inflated. He was a first-rate stump politician who failed to live up to the promise of his early career. His greatest success was in using his political influence to acquire prestigious appointments for himself – a practice that was normal in his era. His biographers, by attempting to create a man he never pretended to be, have spawned the view that he was a lesser man than he might have been.

C. M. WALLACE

[Lemuel Allan Wilmot's papers are scattered throughout other collections, and are incomplete. The following contain material on Wilmot: N.B. Museum, Edward Barron Chandler papers; Webster coll.; R. D. Wilmot, Record-books, 1868–85. PAC, MG 24, B29 (Howe papers); MG 26, A (Macdonald papers); MG 27, I, D15 (Tilley papers). PRO, CO 188 University of New Brunswick Library, Archives and Special Collections Department, Arthur Hamilton Gordon papers, 1861–66.

For printed primary sources see: New Brunswick, House of Assembly, Journals, 1835–50; Synoptic report of the proceedings, 1835–50. Globe (Saint John, N.B.), 1858–73. Morning Freeman (Saint John, N.B.), 1861–73. Morning News (Saint John, N.B.), 1839–65. New Brunswick Courier (Saint John, N.B.), 1842–62. New Brunswick Reporter (Fredericton), 1844–78.

Among printed sources G. E. Fenety's Political notes and observations is essential and his "Political notes," Progress (Saint John, N.B.), 1894, collected in a scrapbook at the N.B. Museum and PAC, are of some use. J. W. Lawrence's Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton) is also a valuable source.

Biographical notices of Wilmot appear in the following: Appleton's cyclopædia of American biography, ed. J. G. Wilson et al. (10v., New York, 1887–1924), VI; Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, III; DNB. The only two biographies of Wilmot were written by people who knew him: John Lathern, The Hon. Judge Wilmot: a biographical sketch, intro. D. D. Currie (rev. ed., Toronto, 1881), and James Hannay, Lemuel Allan Wilmot (Makers of Canada series, Anniversary ed., [VIII], London and Toronto, 1926). Hannay presents his view of Wilmot in a shorter form in his History of New Brunswick, II. Though useful, Lathern and Hannay must be approached with caution. W. S. MacNutt provides a major revision on Wilmot in New Brunswick: a history as does D. G. G. Kerr in Sir Edmund Head, a scholarly governor, with the assistance of J. A. Gibson (Toronto, 1954).

Of some use is G. E. Rogers, "The career of Edward Barron Chandler – a study in New Brunswick politics, 1827–1854," unpublished MA thesis, University of New Brunswick, 1953.

The following articles should be consulted: D. G. G. Kerr, "Head and responsible government in New Brunswick," CHA Report, 1938, 62–70; and W. S. MacNutt, "The coming of responsible government to New Brunswick," CHR, XXXIII (1952), 111–28; "New Brunswick's age of harmony, the administration of Sir John Harvey," CHR, XXXII (1951), 105–25; "The politics of the timber trade in colonial New Brunswick, 1825–40," CHR, XXX (1949), 47–65. C.M.W.]

WILSON, CHARLES, businessman, mayor of Montreal, politician; b. in April 1808 at Coteau-du-Lac (Soulanges County), L.C., son of Alexander Wilson and Catherine-Angélique d'Ailleboust de Manthet; d. 4 May 1877 at Montreal, Que.

Charles Wilson was a sort of microcosm of the Canadian population. Through his father, Alexander Wilson, a custom-house officer, he was linked with Scottish immigrants; through his mother, a d'Ailleboust, he had roots that were very "New France." And when on 19 May 1835 he married Ann Tracey, a sister of Dr Daniel Tracey*, the founder of the Vindicator and Canadian Advertiser (Montreal), he joined the Irish group.

He quickly made a start in business. Thanks to his intelligence and perseverance, a hardware store he set up in 1834 prospered. He subsequently became one of the directors of the Scottish Provincial Assurance Company.

Wilson was a sturdy little man, quick of gesture, and with a face framed in sidewhiskers, who established himself firmly in the life and society of Montreal; he was a Catholic who secured a prominent place, along with the Unitarian Francis Hincks*, in the St Patrick Society, which had been founded in 1834. Both of them, with Lewis Thomas Drummond*, instilled in the Montreal Irish a sense of pride and an awareness of their strength. Wilson was elected mayor of Montreal by acclamation in 1851, then again in the two following years, and on 23 Oct. 1852 was appointed member of the Legislative Council. He was thus in a position to exert on his two friends – Hincks, who had become prime minister, and Drummond, the attorney general east – a political influence not underestimated by the government's opponents.

On 24 Jan. 1852, in the debating hall of the municipal council at Bonsecours market, which had been inaugurated for the occasion as a town hall, Peter McGill*, one of Wilson's predecessors as mayor, presented him with a full-length portrait of himself by the Quebec artist Théophile Hamel*. Wilson could then measure the extent to which public opinion had evolved in his favour since 26 April 1849, when the mob had surged towards his house to shatter doors and windows: the assent given to the rebellion losses bill had provoked violent demonstrations at Montreal, and Wilson, no doubt because he was a friend of Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*, had not been spared.

But Wilson was fated to experience again the tribulation of unpopularity, at the time of the Gavazzi affair. Did he, on the evening of 9 June 1853, order the detachment of the 26th Scottish regiment, which had been dispatched to Zion Church to assist the hard-pressed municipal police, to open fire on the crowd as it streamed out of the temple after listening to the speech of the ex-Barnabite Alessandro Gavazzi*? The subsequent inquiry did not establish clearly who was the author of the fatal order, but Protestant journalists such as John Dougall* of the Montreal Witness persisted in accusing the mayor. On the morning of 2 August his full-length portrait, which hung in the hall of the municipal council, was found decapitated: in the canvas, in the place of Wilson's head, was a gaping hole, probably made with the help of a razor fastened to the end of a stick or cane! And when, in September 1855, at Bishop Ignace Bourget*'s request, Wilson received the cross of commander of the Order of St Gregory the Great from Pius IX, the Protestant press resumed its accusations against the man responsible for the "St Bartholomew of Montreal."

But Wilson had already left the mayoralty, having been replaced in this office in 1854 by Wolfred Nelson*. In May 1867 he was granted the title of senator and represented in the federal parliament the constituency of Rigaud. He died at Montreal on 4 May 1877.

Philippe Sylvain

[Robert [Philippe] Sylvain, Clerc, garibaldien, prédicant des deux mondes: Alessandro Gavazzi (1809–1889) (2v., Québec 1962), II, 392–423; this work, based on an exhaustive study of the primary sources, places Wilson's actions as mayor in the context of a troubled and significant time in Montreal's history. P.S.]

Thérèse Archambault-Lessard, "Alexandre et Thomas Wilson," BRH, XLII (1936), 347–55.

WILSON, WILLIAM MERCER, judge and freemason; b. 12 or 24 Aug. 1813 at "Mavisbank," the family estate in Perthshire, Scotland, son of Graeme Mercer; d. 16 Jan. 1875, at Simcoe, Ont.

William Mercer was adopted by his mother's brother, and William took his name, Wilson. He emigrated to Canada in 1832 and settled at Nanticoke in what is now Haldimand County. In 1834 he moved to Simcoe and was appointed commissioner to the Court of Requests in the Talbot District. In the same year he married Jane Brown, by whom he had 10 children. She died about 1849. During the rebellion in Upper Canada in 1837–38 he commanded the Norfolk Cavalry troop, which he had organized, and joined Allan MacNab* at Scotland, following him to Chippawa where he participated in the capture of the Caroline. He was gazetted lieutenant-colonel of the 3rd Battalion Norfolk militia in 1848 and retired from it with that rank in 1869.

In 1838 Wilson became clerk of the peace and clerk of the court for the Talbot District and accumulated other minor posts. He began the study of law, and in 1853 was called to the bar. His law practice flourished and he became active in local political affairs. During the 1860s he was elected reeve of Simcoe for five years and warden of Norfolk County for two years. He continued as clerk of the peace until 1858 when he was appointed crown attorney for the county. On 5 May 1868 he became judge of the county court.

Wilson's career indicates a wide variety of interests. In 1840 he had imported the first printing press into the Talbot District and founded at Simcoe the Norfolk Observer, which he conducted for about two years, He helped form the St Andrew's Society in 1842 and was president of it and of the Mechanics' Institute. In 1851 he was a delegate of the Provincial Agricultural Association to a meeting in London, England. Wilson's association with freemasonry began in 1840. He was initiated into Lodge no.14 (the Norfolk Lodge) at Simcoe and eight years later he was named grand senior warden of the Provincial Grand Lodge. When the Grand Lodge of Canada West was formed, independent of the Grand Lodge of England, in October 1855, Wilson became the first grand master. It was largely through his encouragement that the rival Ancient Grand Lodge under Sir Allan MacNab, which was formed from the Provincial Grand Lodge when it too broke away from the English lodge, joined the Grand Lodge of Canada in 1858. Wilson was grand master until 1860 and was again elected to this position for 1866–68 and from 1872 until his death in 1875. He had married in London, England, Susan Grace Codner by whom he had three children. She died in 1855 and he married Mary Elizabeth Dixon; they had one daughter.

ANNE E. F. SNIDERMAN

J. of Education for Ont., XXVIII (1875), 42. Militia list for Canada West . . . , comp. Joshua Thompson (Toronto, 1851). G. D. Maxwell, The first one hundred years: a history of Wilson Lodge A.F. & A.M., no.86, Grand Lodge of Canada in the Province of Ontario, 1857–1957 (n.p., n.d.). B. M. Pearce, First grand master: a biography of William Mercer Wilson, first grand master of the Grand Lodge of Canada A.F. & A.M. (Simcoe, Ont., 1932). Simcoe and Norfolk County; in commemoration of the Simcoe reunion of Norfolk County old boys, August 2nd to 7th, 1924 (Simcoe, Ont., 1924).

WOODS, JOSEPH, newspaper editor and proprietor, printer, and politician; b. at St John's, Nfld., in 1813, son of Joseph and Mary Woods; d. at St John's in March 1871.

Of Joseph Woods' early life we know only that he was born into an Anglican family and that his parents were converted to Methodism while he was still a child. In 1843, in St John's, Joseph Woods and William James Ward became proprietors of the Morning Post. The partnership was dissolved on 14 May 1846; Ward became sole proprietor of the Morning Post and Woods purchased the Morning Courier (Courier after 1855) from Ebenezer Winton. In addition to editing the Courier, Woods was compiler, printer, and publisher of the Newfoundland Almanac.

The Morning Courier, a semi-weekly established in 1844 by William Beck, carried local and foreign news but became much more political in tone with Woods as editor. As early as 1847 he declared himself in favour of the principles of responsible government. In supporting this Liberal demand Woods was an exception among Wesleyans, most of whom supported the Conservatives. He admitted that his primary goal was to gain a share of government patronage for the Wesleyans, who "generally are poor," from the Episcopalians, who "generally are rich." The Liberal press, including the Morning Courier, suggested to the Wesleyans that their interests would be promoted by joining the Roman Catholics in the struggle for responsible government. In the crucial 1855 general election, just before the introduction of responsible government, Woods was defeated as a Liberal candidate in the district of Burin. However, as the Liberals won a majority in the House of Assembly, the Courier duly received a share of much-needed printing jobs and Woods continued to give his paper a Liberal bias. Accordingly in 1861 it opposed the dismissal of John KENT's government, violently criticized the Conservative and Protestant government of Hugh William Hoyles*, but supported the coalition of Frederic Bowker Terrington Carter* and Ambrose Shea* which followed. When confederation became the issue, Woods advocated union with "increasing warmth" until July 1869 when he suddenly switched allegiance to the anti-confederate party led by Charles Fox Bennett*. This change created the suspicion that the Courier was being subsidized by Bennett. Woods said he was convinced that confederation had brought no real benefits to the mainland provinces and that Newfoundland would not suffer by remaining outside the union.

A prominent Wesleyan, Joseph Woods was a member of the Wesleyan Methodist School Society and the St John's Day School Committee. He was married and had two daughters. After his death the Courier and the Newfoundland Almanac continued to be published by his brother John on behalf of Joseph's widow and children.

ELIZABETH A. WELLS

Newfoundland, Department of Provincial Affairs, "List of affidavits of proprietorship of newspapers," 1836–1900. Courier (St John's), 1847–72. Morning Chronicle (St John's), 4 March 1871. Telegraph (St John's), 8 March 1871. The Newfoundland almanac, for . . . 1858 . . ., comp. Joseph Woods (St John's, 1857). The Newfoundland almanac for . . . 1877 . . . (St John's, 1876). E. C. Moulton, "The political history of Newfoundland, 1861–1869," unpublished MA thesis, Memorial University of Newfoundland, 1960. E. A. Wells, "The struggle for responsible government in Newfoundland, 1846–1855," unpublished MA thesis, Memorial University of Newfoundland, 1966.

WORKMAN, WILLIAM, merchant, businessman, and mayor of Montreal; b. May 1807, at Ballymacash near Lisburn, County Antrim, Ireland; fifth of nine children of Joseph Workman and Catherine Goudie; d. 23 Feb. 1878 in Montreal, Que.

William Workman was born to a family whose fortunes, once considerable, had apparently declined. There is no evidence concerning William's schooling; however, he had mastered the skills for employment with the Ordnance Survey of Ireland from 1827 to 1829.

His older brothers, Benjamin, Alexander, Samuel, Thomas*, and Matthew, had left Ireland before the rest of the family set sail for Canada in 1829. Soon after his arrival in Montreal, William was employed by a newspaper, the Canadian Courant and Montreal Advertiser, owned by his brother Benjamin and Nahum Mower. In 1830 William joined brother Thomas in the wholesale hardware house of John Frothingham. The Workmans rose quickly in the firm; by 1836 William and Thomas had become full partners, an indication perhaps that they had brought some capital into the firm. Until his retirement from the concern in 1859, it provided Workman's business base. As well as handling imported items, Frothingham and Workman manufactured some hardware in their Montreal factories which employed hundreds of men.

Workman did not confine his business interests to hardware, however. He was typical of the Montreal business community of that period in his involvement in ventures stimulated by growth and technological change. The scale of Workman's speculation in railways, land, and banking is evidence of his wealth by the early 1840s. Among his interests was the City Bank, a Montreal institution of which he was president from 1849 to 1874. His investments in railways included Canada's first railway, the Champlain and St Lawrence, completed in 1836 to connect Laprairie, on the St Lawrence River opposite Montreal, to Saint-Jean on the Richelieu. This 14-mile railway was designed to facilitate trade between the St Lawrence and the neighbouring states; Workman was one of its directors. Attracted also to the St Lawrence and Atlantic Railroad [see John YOUNG], he was one of the largest shareholders when the line was taken over by the Grand Trunk in 1854. A less successful railway venture was the abortive Montreal and Bytown [see Alexandre-Maurice DELISLE].

Workman also invested heavily in Montreal real estate. In the early 1840s he bought a large number of lots in a fashionable west-end residential suburb, where he built his own impressive mansion, Mount Prospect, in 1842. He had considerable property elsewhere in Montreal, and with Delisle bought a sizeable tract on its western outskirts. Workman ventured also into shipping, when in 1854, with Montreal businessmen David TORRANCE, Andrew Shaw, Ira Gould, and John Kershaw, he established the Canadian Ocean Steam Navigation Company. A year later, Workman purchased two large steamboats for the St Lawrence trade.

Although business was clearly Workman's major concern for many years, after his retirement from Frothingham and Workman in 1859 he took an active interest in public affairs. As a banker, he combatted the government's proposed measures to widen its fiscal powers during the late 1860s. In 1866, he attacked Alexander Tilloch Galt*'s recommendations for tariff reductions, "these wild Balaklava dashes at fiscal legislation" which would entail "beggary or emigration" for many Canadians. As a manufacturer, Workman had favoured high protective tariffs since the late 1840s when he led the Association for the Promotion of Canadian Industry. He made no known attempts to enter provincial politics but took an interest in federal affairs after confederation. During the 1870s, perhaps goaded by his brother Thomas' attachment to the Liberals who, in William's view, were scented with "a spice of Communism," Workman wrote occasionally to John A. Macdonald* reminding him of his loyalty and contributions of "the ready" to the party. The letters were little more than importunate pleas for a Senate seat.

Workman was best known in Montreal for his municipal political activity and his local philanthropy. He was nominated for mayor in February 1868 and ran against Jean-Louis Beaudry*, a former incumbent. Workman won the contest easily after overcoming disqualification and serious allegations of corruption levelled against him by his opponent. So popular was he as Montreal's mayor, that he was returned to the post by acclamation in 1869 and 1870.

Workman was a well-known local figure even before he became mayor. Many years earlier, he had been president of the St Patrick's Society before it became an exclusively Roman Catholic organization in 1856. Transferring his deep concern for the welfare of the less fortunate to the Irish Protestant Benevolent Society, Workman served it for years, giving money and time to its causes. He helped to establish the Montreal Protestant House of Industry and Refuge in 1864; he served as its president from 1874 to 1877 and left the institution a legacy of $20,000. To encourage thrift and saving among the city's workingmen, Workman helped to found the Montreal City and District Savings Bank in 1846 [see Marc-Damase MASSON]. He was the bank's first president, 1846–52, and a director, 1861–72.

Workman's private life was touched with much sorrow. Five children predeceased him and the loss of his only son, at age 24, was especially painful. Throughout most of his adult life, Workman was an adherent of the Unitarian church; he once confided to a friend that, as a Unitarian, he was "accustomed to vituperation from opposing Protestant sects (never from Roman Catholics)." According to one source, he later found solace in Roman Catholicism. He turned increasingly to private worship and had a family chapel added to his large mansion.

G. TULCHINSKY

PAC, MG 24 B40 (Brown papers), 4, p.778; D16 (Buchanan papers), 63, Workman; MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 345, pp.158327–30; 346, pp.158526–30; RG 12, AI, 176, pp.137–38. [Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty), IV, 1492. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1851, app.UU, "Proceedings of the standing committee on rail-roads and telegraph lines; together with the minutes of evidence ordered by the committee to be printed"; 1857, app.6, "Report of the special committee appointed to inquire and report as to the condition, management, and prospects of the Grand Trunk Railway Company." Canada, Province of, Statutes, 1854, c.45. Report of the committee appointed to enquire into the transactions of the Montreal and Bytown Railway Company, prepared by Mr. Loranger, by order of the committee, and unanimously adopted (Toronto, 1856), 51. Gazette (Montreal), 25 Feb. 1878. Montreal Herald, 2 Dec. 1867; 10, 18, 21–23, 25 Jan., 18, 21, 25, 26, 28 Feb., 2 March 1868; 13 Feb. 1869; 13, 14 Feb. 1870.

Montreal directory (Mackay), 1845–46, 286; 1852, 353. Borthwick, Montreal, 123. Campbell, Hist. of Scotch Presbyterian Church, 436, 439. T. T. Smyth, The first hundred years; history of the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, 1846–1946 (n.p., n.d.), 22. F. J. Workman, "The Workman family history" (manuscript in the possession of its author). Brian Cahill, "90-year-old papers found in cornerstone," Gazette (Montreal), 5 July 1955. Allan Cook, "Ancient chapel built here for spite still stands as reminder of bygone feuds," Montreal Daily Star, 12 Aug. 1937.

WRIGHT, WILLIAM, shipbuilder and shipowner; b. post 1800, probably in Scotland; d. a bachelor 17 Feb. 1878, probably in Liverpool, Eng.

William Wright and his younger brother Richard (b. before 1816, probably in Scotland; m. 4 May 1837 to Jane Nevins by whom he had two daughters; d. 12 Aug. 1872 in London, Eng.) made a modest beginning in the shipping industry. They apprenticed to the Saint John, New Brunswick, shipbuilder, George Thomson, for whom they may have worked after putting in their time. By the summer of 1839 they had set up their own shipbuilding yard at Courtenay Bay, Saint John. That autumn they launched three vessels, a whaling ship, a paddle steamer, and a timber ship. This was an ambitious start which placed them in the company of the best Saint John builders. During their initial eight years of operation the Wrights built 15 vessels averaging 567 tons. The first eight were either constructed for, or sold before registration to, local merchants, but five of the subsequent ships were registered, owned, and managed by the Wrights for very short periods, no doubt to take timber cargoes to Liverpool. There was considerable inducement for a shipbuilder to extend his operations to include shipowning because in delivering his vessel to be sold at Liverpool the revenue from the timber cargo could amount to a third of the cost of building the ship. In 1844 Richard started sailing as master or captain on the maiden voyages to Liverpool – at least 16 uneventful crossings of the Atlantic were a tribute to his seamanship. Not only were the masters' wages saved, but agency fees for selling the vessels or arranging freights could be eliminated.

In 1847 the Wrights moved permanently into shipowning with two of the three ships they built that year, the two ships being their first to exceed 1,000 tons. That year marked the beginning of the period in which William and Richard Wright were unrivalled in British North America as builders of the biggest class of wooden ships. Their second 15 ships averaged 1,352 tons each with not less than 3,000 tons of shipping launched yearly from their yard from 1849 until 1855. The climax in the Wrights' shipbuilding career came with their last two ships – the 2,339 ton White Star in 1854 and her slightly larger twin in 1855, the 2,379 ton Morning Light. Easily the largest British North American sailing ships, they were built to excel on the highly competitive emigrant run to Australia. The Wrights retained 21 of the 64 shares of the White Star for two and a half years and full ownership of the Morning Light. Perhaps the principal evidence of the quality of these ships was that they far exceeded the normal life-span of North American vessels, lasting 30 and 35 years respectively.

By the end of 1857 the Wrights had increased their fleet to ten ships. William remained at Saint John for a decade, but Richard, despite toying with an invitation he apparently received from Samuel Leonard Tilley* to enter New Brunswick politics, was mainly in Liverpool after 1857. Like the majority of the large New Brunswick and Nova Scotian vessels, the Wright ships were operated not from their port of registration but from Liverpool. Their smaller ships of about 1,000 tons were generally kept on the North Atlantic. Outbound cargoes, particularly for ports in the Maritime provinces, were often difficult to obtain, but there were ready supplies of timber, oil, and cotton for the return voyages. Their larger ships were in the Far East bulk trades.

In 1857 and 1858 the Wrights ran into a cash shortage which apparently stopped their expansion temporarily. They mortgaged six ships for £51,930. This sum represented 51 per cent of the Wright tonnage and therefore the Wright fleet can be reasonably estimated to have been valued at that time at £100,000 or $400,000. During the 1860s they slowly expanded their fleet and continued the shipbroking of Saint John ships.

Perhaps in recognition that the market for wooden ships was drying up, William joined his brother at Liverpool in the spring of 1867, and their ships registered at Saint John were re-registered at Liverpool. In the two previous years they had participated in the trend into iron ships, buying three, and in 1869 they purchased their only large screw steamer.

When Richard died in 1872, the Wright fleet was at its largest, 17 ships totalling more than 23,000 tons. William thereafter reduced the number of ships to 11. At his death in 1878 the firm was inherited by his nephew George Wright Gass who had been working in the Liverpool office. Under Gass the dilution of ownership and reduction in the number of ships were accelerated to such a point that W. and R. Wright and Company ceased at his death in 1887.

RICHARD RICE

N.B. Museum, Marriage register B (1828–39), 420; Tilley family papers, Richard Wright to S. L. Tilley, 1 Jan. 1858; Wright family deeds, 1859–1912, numerous documents including typescript of the will of Richard Wright, 5 Oct. 1871, typescript of probate of will of William Wright, 24 March 1885. Registry of British Ships, HM Customs and Excise, Custom House (Liverpool, Eng.), Liverpool Registers, 1835–90. Commercial News and General Advertiser (Saint John, N.B.), 16 Sept. 1839. Liberal Review (Liverpool), 2 Feb., 16 Aug., 4 Oct. 1879. Liverpool Mercury, 14 Aug. 1872. Liverpool Telegraph and Shipping Gazette, 28 Aug. 1863. New Brunswick Courier (Saint John, N.B.), 16 Jan. 1841. Saint John Daily News, 13 Aug. 1872. Sea Breezes; the Ship Lovers' Digest (Liverpool), XXIII (April 1938), 34; (May 1938), 75; (November 1938), 300–2; (December 1938), 340–41, 354; XXIV (March 1939), 466. Times (London), 14 Aug. 1872. F. W. Wallace, Record of Canadian shipping: a list of square-rigged vessels, mainly 500 tons and over, built in the eastern provinces of British North America from the year 1786 to 1920 (Toronto, 1929). E. A. Woods, "Liverpool fleet lists," I, 35–38 (typescript compiled c. 1939, copy in Liverpool City Libraries, Liverpool, Eng.). R. S. Craig, "British shipping and British North American shipbuilding in the early nineteenth century with special reference to Prince Edward Island," in The south-west and the sea, ed. H. E. S. Fisher (Exeter Papers in Economic History, 1, Exeter, Eng., 1968), 21–43. Wallace, Wooden ships and iron men. D. M. Williams, "The function of the merchant in specific Liverpool import trades, 1820–50," unpublished MA thesis, University of Liverpool, 1963. P. R. Lindo, "The whale fishing industry of Saint John," N.B. Museum, Hist. Bull., XIV, no.3 (1967). Donald Ross, "History of the shipbuilding industry in New Brunswick," essay awarded the James Simonds prize in history by University of New Brunswick, 1933 (copy in N.B. Museum). A. C. Wardle, "The ship 'Thomas' of Liverpool," Liverpool Nautical Research Society, Trans., I (1944), 14–22. D. M. Williams, "Merchanting in the first half of the nineteenth century: the Liverpool timber trade," Business History (Liverpool), VIII (1966), 103–21.

Y

YALE, JAMES MURRAY, HBC chief trader; b.c. 1798 at Lachine, L.C.; d. at Saanich, near Victoria, B.C., on 7 May 1871.

James Murray Yale entered the service of the Hudson's Bay Company in 1815 and was first stationed at Fort Wedderburn on Lake Athabasca. This post had just been built by John Clarke* in an effort to secure a foothold for the HBC in Athabasca, the great stronghold of the North West Company. It was subjected to constant harassment by the NWC's large staff at nearby Fort Chipewyan. Violence reached a climax when Archibald Norman McLeod* was in charge there; Clarke was twice arrested and Yale himself was seized in April 1817, taken to Great Slave Lake, and detained there until the autumn. In 1818 he was with Joshua Halcro* when he built Colvile House on the Peace River for the HBC.

In 1821 Yale was put in charge of Fort George on the Fraser River, and he spent the rest of his long career west of the Rocky Mountains. He was at Fort George until 1824, and later served at Fort Alexandria and at Fort St James. Unwell in 1827, he was sent to Fort Vancouver where medical attention was available. A year later he was back at Fort St James and there met Governor George Simpson*, who was on an inspection trip and was anxious to explore the Fraser River as a possible transport route to the coast. Yale accompanied him, and while Simpson travelled overland to Kamloops and returned to the Fraser down the Thompson River, Yale explored the Fraser itself from Alexandria to the mouth of the Thompson. From there he went through the main canyon of the Fraser with Simpson on a trip that was rivalled only by that of Simon Fraser* in 1808.

Yale left the party at Fort Langley, where he was to spend more than 30 years. After serving under James McMillan*, who had founded the post, and Archibald McDonald*, Yale was placed in charge of Fort Langley in 1833. In 1839 he supervised the construction of new buildings about two and a half miles upstream from the original site. These were burned in April 1840, and Yale had to rebuild the post a second time. He was appointed chief trader in 1844. Although never a chief factor he was well regarded by the company, and Fort Yale, built upstream from Fort Langley in 1848, was named after him.

By this time very few furs were being traded at Fort Langley, but Yale fought successfully against any proposal that it should be abandoned and he developed other resources that justified its continued existence. He was a pioneer in the packing of salt fish on the Fraser; his first efforts were made soon after 1830, and in 1850 some 2,000 barrels of salmon were packed at the fort. Yale also developed much the largest farms then existing on the mainland of what is now British Columbia. The crops included grain, potatoes, and vegetables; much of the produce was sent to the posts of the Russian American Company in Alaska, under the terms of its trading agreement with the HBC. Yale's chief assistant at Fort Langley for many years was Ovid ALLARD who later was in charge for a decade.

When the Fraser River gold rush erupted suddenly in the spring of 1858, Fort Langley was the only settlement on the lower river and it became a scene of great activity. It was intended at first to locate the capital of the new colony of British Columbia on the original site of Fort Langley, and the colony was proclaimed there on 19 Nov. 1858. The plan was abandoned in February in favour of New Westminster, but it had occasioned much turmoil and excitement with which Yale dealt competently. He retired in May 1859, and after a brief visit to Montreal settled on Stromness Farm, in Saanich, on Vancouver Island.

The name of Yale's wife seems not to have been recorded. They had three daughters, one of whom married a son of Sir George Simpson. A much liked character, Yale was known as "Little Yale" because of his short stature about which he was sensitive. Chief Factor James DOUGLAS, his superior in the HBC, a big man, took a quiet delight in standing near Yale and observing his discomfiture. In his famous "Character Book" Governor Simpson devoted an entry to Yale: "A sharp active well conducted very little man but full of fire with the courage of a Lion. Deficient in Education, but has a good deal of address & Management with Indians and notwithstanding his diminutive size is more feared and respected than some of our 6 feet men."

W. KAYE LAMB

HBC Arch. A.34/2. HBRS, I (Rich), 473–74; X (Rich). "Fort Langley correspondence," ed. R. L. Reid, BCHQ, I (1937), 187–94. R. L. Reid, "Early days at old Fort Langley: economic beginnings in British Columbia," BCHQ, I (1937), 71–85.

YOUNG, JOHN, merchant, business promoter, and manufacturer; b. 30 Jan. 1808, Galston, Ayrshire, Scotland, youngest son of James Young, merchant in Galston, and Margaret Mason; d. 20 March 1873, Hamilton, Ont.

In 1825, after finishing his education in Galston, John Young opened a small hardware business in nearby Kilmarnock with his brother James. Seemingly it did not prosper, and Young soon sought other employment. In 1828 he secured a post with Pollok, Gilmour and Company, Glasgow shipowners and timber merchants [see John GILMOUR], who sent him to clerk in their new Montreal branch, William Ritchie and Company. William Ritchie* decided in 1832 to open a branch in Hamilton, which, though a small community, seemed best located to capture the trade of Upper Canada's rapidly developing west. To run the new store, he chose John Young, whose ambition, ability, and, perhaps, modest capital made him an ideal manager. The business, known briefly as Young and Weir, then as John Young and Company, retailed dry goods, groceries, and hardware, sought wholesaling business in the west, and bought or solicited consignments of wheat, flour, staves, and ashes for William Ritchie and Company.

The west grew rapidly; Hamilton's population, reflecting this growth, doubled twice in five years, and Young, with his strong financial support, took full advantage of his opportunities. But then his senior partners quarrelled, and the future became uncertain. In 1840, Peter* and Isaac Buchanan*, Toronto's leading wholesalers, were establishing a Hamilton branch; to strengthen its management and remove a competitor, they asked Young to join them. He quickly accepted, for Isaac Buchanan had full financial support in Glasgow and offered the opportunity of certain expansion. In June 1840 Isaac Buchanan and Young opened Buchanan, Harris and Company, whose store Peter Buchanan described as "the largest establishment in British North America."

Young's capital in 1840 totalled $22,000. During his association with the Buchanans the business continued to grow with the west and his capital increased to well over $120,000. In the 1850s, Young and the Buchanans' Montreal partner, James Law, sought greater recognition in the firm. Increasingly heated conflict with the Buchanans ensued, and late in 1853 Young and Law withdrew from the Buchanan firms to establish Young, Law and Company in Hamilton and Glasgow, and Law, Young and Company in Montreal. Glasgow, where both men were well known in mercantile circles, was their centre for finance and buying; their Hamilton outlet, under Young, sold wholesale groceries and dry goods; and the Montreal firm, under Law, sold wholesale groceries and hardware, dealt in Upper Canadian produce, and forwarded goods to Hamilton. Prosperity during the next three years, the peak of the 1850s boom, enabled Young and Law to establish their business solidly.

Like other successful merchants in Canada, Young was anxious to develop new financial institutions. A large shareholder in the Gore Bank, he was elected to its first board in 1836. He resigned his directorship in 1837 to protest lending policy, gained re-election after the crisis of 1837–38, but resigned in the early 1840s to save his own business reputation after again failing to force the Gore to alter its policy of lending heavily to its own directors. In 1847 he took the leading part in founding the Canada Life Assurance Company; for the next 20 years he was its vice-president and then, for five years, its president.

Although Young subscribed to the abortive London and Gore Railroad Company in 1834 and, through his connection with the Buchanans, played some part in the promotion of its successor, the Great Western, railways were not one of his central interests until 1856. Then, discontented British stockholders, seeking to consolidate the Great Western, began a revolution in the Great Western Railway Company. They asked Young, a minor shareholder untainted by previous involvement, to become vice-president of the railway and chairman of its Canadian board. He held both posts for ten years and was also a director of the Hamilton and Lake Erie Railway. In 1850, Young organized the Hamilton Gas Light Company, and for the next 23 years he was its president. He was a member of the executive of the Hamilton Board of Trade from its founding in 1845 until his death, and served as president from 1846 to 1852 and again in 1857–58.

In 1835, Young married Anne Coleman, daughter of an English gentleman farming at Paris, Upper Canada, and had several children by her. He captained a militia company in 1837. As his family, wealth, and social standing grew during the 1840s, he built Undermount, a large home on the newly fashionable mountainside of Hamilton. Outside business, his leading interest was the Church of Scotland. In 1833 he helped found St Andrew's Church in Hamilton and, in the 1850s, he contributed heavily to its building fund; for many years he was its trustee and senior elder. He helped to found in Hamilton the Mechanics' Institute, the Mercantile Library Association, and the Protestant Orphan Asylum. Young never took an active role in politics; although he was friendly with Allan MacNab*, he rejected compact Toryism and was always a moderate Conservative.

Like all businesses in Upper Canada, Young's was hard hit by the commercial crisis in 1857–58. After the crisis, Hamilton's trade failed to revive and the city's challenge to Toronto and Montreal as a wholesaling centre was over. Young, Law and Company wrote off much capital, but the firm survived, and, by 1866, Young was ready to retire from trade. Three employees, Alexander Thomson, William Birkett, and John Bell, took over the dry goods business, and the grocery business was wound up completely. Young now turned to manufacturing, taking over Joseph Wright's Dundas Cotton Mills. This transition was most unusual for someone of Young's mercantile eminence, and it must be assumed that he acted to rescue tied-up capital, probably invested originally by Young, Law and Company as short-term commercial credit which Wright could not repay. Young, Law and Company continued in being, as manufacturers instead of traders.

By 1873, Young was said to have succeeded as a manufacturer, and he remained president of Canada Life and the Gas Light Company. At the time of his death he was at the head of Hamilton's business community, a community whose growth he had done much to foster.

DOUGLAS MCCALLA

Hamilton Public Library, A. W. Roy, "Newspaper clippings scrapbook," 13. PAC, MG 24, D16 (Buchanan papers). City of Hamilton, Directories, 1853, 1856, 1858, 1862, 1865–66, 1870, 1871–72, 1872–73. City of Hamilton and county of Wentworth, Directories, 1867–68, 1868–69. Great Western Railway of Canada, Report of the directors, 1852, 1856–66. Scobie & Balfour's Canadian almanac, and repository of useful knowledge . . . (Toronto), 1850–52. M. F. Campbell, A mountain and a city, the story of Hamilton (Toronto, 1966). A. W. Currie, The Grand Trunk Railway of Canada (Toronto, 1957). C. M. Johnston, The head of the lake, a history of Wentworth County (Hamilton, Ont., 1958). John Rankin, A history of our firm, being some account of the firm of Pollok, Gilmour and Co. and its offshoots and connections, 1804–1920 (2nd ed., Liverpool, 1921). Ross and Trigge, History of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, I. [W. J. Shaw], A century of service; St. Paul's Church (Presbyterian), Hamilton, Ontario (Hamilton, Ont., 1933). G. R. Stevens, Canadian National Railways (2v., Toronto, 1960), I. J. R. Holden, "Historical data re state and church in the county of Wentworth," Wentworth Hist. Soc. Papers and Records (Hamilton, Ont.), III (1902), 44–71.

YOUNG, JOHN, businessman, entrepreneur, and politician; b. 11 March 1811 at Ayr, Scotland, son of William Young, a cooper, and Janet Gibson; d. 12 April 1878 at Montreal, Que.

John Young completed studies at Ayr Academy in 1824. At 14, he became a teacher in the parish school at Coylton, a small village near Ayr. After a year, Young left Scotland for Upper Canada, arriving in 1826 and going directly to Kingston to work with a local merchant named MacLeod. In the early 1830s he moved to Montreal to the Torrances' wholesale merchanding firm. At this time the firm, established by John* and Thomas Torrance*, was also active in the steamboat business along the St Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec, and it offered Young ample opportunity to learn the Canadian import and export business and to formulate views of how St Lawrence trade could be improved.

After several years as a clerk, Young was elevated to partnership with David TORRANCE, a nephew of John. The two young men managed the family's Quebec business between 1835 and 1840. The partnership ended in 1840 and Young formed a new firm, Stephens, Young and Company, with Harrison Stephens*, a Vermonter who had been importing rice, tobacco, and other American goods to Montreal since 1832. The partners probably continued the specialized importing trade begun by Stephens, but in any case handled large quantities of western staples as commission merchants. The firm also had a general merchandising trade, and Young's prime job was to travel west to Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan buying produce and arranging for its storage, shipment, insurance, and, often, the milling of wheat into flour. The scale of the firm's operations is not known, but they were apparently remunerative. On 31 Aug. 1846 the partnership was terminated by mutual consent and Stephens left the company, but the firm continued importing American goods. Young also formed a partnership with Benjamin Holmes* of Montreal, formerly cashier of the Bank of Montreal; their firm seems to have had extensive trade with Chicago, acting as a receiver of products and as a supplier of imported manufactured goods.

Although Young came to be known as an untiring – and tiresome – crusader for the Caughnawaga canal, and a proponent of improvements to Montreal's waterways, he was cognizant of the potential importance of railways in improving Montreal's competitive strength for the trade of the interior. He was informed about economic developments elsewhere and, as an early member of the Mercantile Library Association of Montreal, encouraged the city's business community to read business periodicals and books from Britain and the United States. With other Montrealers, Young was an early participant in the St Lawrence and Atlantic Railroad Company, authorized to build a line from Montreal to Portland, Maine, in 1845. A director from 1847 until 1851, he supported Alexander Tilloch Galt* in raising capital by placing the company's bonds with London bankers.

Young was an active supporter of Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* in the 1847 elections and may have helped the railway gain favourable legislation in 1849 from the new Reform ministry. To Young, the St Lawrence and Atlantic promised communication to a winter port and a probable lessening of transportation costs to the ocean. Young also favoured the Intercolonial Railway scheme of the early 1850s, by the Saint John River route.

Another railway venture supported by Young was the St Lawrence and Ottawa Grand Junction, chartered in 1850 to build a line from Lachine west to Prescott. This project was unsuccessful but Young, undismayed, dabbled in other railway ventures. In 1854, supported by Augustin-Norbert Morin*, Galt, and John Alfred POOR, associates from the St Lawrence and Atlantic, he unsuccessfully petitioned the Canadian government for a charter to build a railway to the Pacific by the Ottawa valley and the south shore of Lake Superior. Never a strong nationalist, Young preferred a transcontinental rail line south of Lake Superior, which would link with the Northern Pacific at Duluth. He rejected military or political considerations and argued that the Pacific route should be determined solely on the basis of commercial benefits. To build north of Lake Superior "for no better reason, than it must be on British territory, and on a line as far as possible from our American neighbours, seems to us to be not a little absurd."

Young also assisted Father François-Xavier-Antoine Labelle*'s efforts in the 1860s and early 1870s to build the Montreal Northern Colonization Railway to Saint-Jérôme and Ottawa. As early as 1856 he had been interested in Joseph-Édouard Cauchon*'s plans for the North Shore Railway from Quebec to Montreal. Young had been among the first to see the need for a bridge at Montreal to bring a railway from the south shore to the city's harbour and from 1845 he urged the construction of Victoria Bridge, completed ultimately in 1860 [see James HODGES]. He used his position as harbour commissioner to promote on the North Shore's behalf a new bridge over the St Lawrence. Despite objections from his fellow commissioners, the Montreal Board of Trade, and the Corn Exchange that the proposed Royal Albert Bridge was a "serious danger and obstruction to the navigation of the river and Harbour," Young in 1876, unsuccessfully, carried his minority opinion to Ottawa. Not insignificant in his long support for this railway were lots in Montreal's east end which he held for speculation.

Throughout his life, Young's favourite transportation scheme was the Caughnawaga canal. He had been delighted with the St Lawrence canals when they were opened in 1848, and he believed that to ensure their success another canal should be built from the St Lawrence to Lake Champlain. This canal, he claimed, would greatly improve Montreal's attractiveness as an entrepôt. After some discussion of the canal in the legislature, an engineer was appointed to recommend the best route. Then a campaign was undertaken to promote public interest and government assistance. The Montreal Board of Trade favoured such a canal but did not wish it to be built from Caughnawaga several miles upstream from Montreal for fear it would injure the city's entrepôt trade. The board refrained, therefore, from requesting government aid. The government, labouring under its responsibilities for canals and railways, was probably reluctant to build a controversial canal whose estimated cost was £500,000.

Young believed that it could be financed privately and in 1849, with Montreal businessmen Harrison Stephens, Luther Hamilton HOLTON, William Bristow*, and William Dow*, he framed a charter, which was passed by the legislature after violent opposition. Young's company was empowered to raise £1 million and to decide on the route. Apparently his company never became operative. Further efforts to sway the Montreal Board of Trade, whose endorsement was indispensable for government aid or private investment, proved fruitless. The canal was reported by John C. Jarvis to be viable in 1855; but Young's insistence that it commence at Caughnawaga was damaging. For nearly 30 years he advocated the scheme in pamphlets, letters to newspapers, and speeches in the assembly, but he was unable to quell Montrealers' fear that the canal, which would allow vessels to sail from the Great Lakes to New York without breaking bulk, would seriously harm Montreal's trade. It is difficult to understand why Young was apparently unwilling to meet their objections, and also how he could justify another channel of trade from Montreal to the Atlantic which would compete with the lower St Lawrence and with three railways, in two of which he was himself associated.

In business, Young remained a partner in the commission house established in 1846 with Holmes. In February 1848, Joseph Knapp was brought into the firm, now Holmes, Young, and Knapp. Young continued to travel west during the winter to buy produce. This partnership ended in December 1849 and Young established a new one with James Benning, a comparative newcomer to Montreal business. Little is known of this firm. However, by 1852 Young had the means to build Rosemount, his impressive country villa, on Côte-Saint-Antoine.

Young was involved in other entrepreneurial ventures in the 1850s. One of the more remunerative was the St Gabriel Hydraulic Company. With Montreal miller, Ira Gould, Young in 1850 acquired a lease from the government for water power at the St Gabriel lock on the Lachine Canal. For an annual fee of £420, his company made immense profits by converting what had been intended as a right to use restricted amounts of canal water into a licence to use virtually unlimited quantities. In 1853 a question of abuse of the lease arose but the attorney general east, Lewis Thomas Drummond*, advised that the contract should nevertheless be observed. It is likely that Young maintained his connection with this lucrative company for many years.

Young was also interested in telegraphic communications. In 1847 he became a promoter of the profitable Montreal Telegraph Company. In 1856 he sought a charter to connect Canada to Britain by telegraph. He headed a group, including Luther Holton, Theodore Hart, and Thomas Cramp*, that formed the Canadian and British Telegraph Company, chartered in 1859 to build a telegraph line via the St Lawrence River and Labrador to Britain. Young was also a leading figure in the company, composed essentially of Montrealers, including Sir George Simpson*, L. T. Drummond, Holton, and Antoine-Aimé Dorion*, that received a charter for the Transmundane Telegraph Company, to build a line west by way of Alaska to the Orient. These projects failed but in 1869 he and Galt sought to recharter the Canadian-European Telegraph Company. Despite cooperative arrangements with the Great Western Telegraph Company and Hugh Allan*'s Montreal Telegraph Company, Young's company could not raise sufficient capital. In 1872 he asked the federal government to guarantee a net dividend of 5 per cent on the $4,000,000 needed to finance the building of the line from Gaspé to Scotland.

Like many businessmen in Montreal Young was interested in politics. He viewed government essentially as an instrument for economic development, an agent for "progress" and for ensuring a favourable atmosphere for commerce. He appears to have had no strong political interests during the early 1840s when he was building up his own business. However, by the late 1840s he was favouring moderate liberalism and in 1847 he nominated La Fontaine in Montreal.

Young's interest in free trade was probably a reason for his adherence to the Liberals. From them he would have expected effective measures of tariff reform and an attempt to seek the elimination of imperial restrictions on American shipping. Soon after the end of the corn laws, Young established, in 1846, the Free Trade Association in Montreal, and with a group of local merchants, including Thomas Kay, Henry Chapman, and John Glass, he advocated removal of all restrictions on Canadian trade. In their weekly newspaper, the Canadian Economist, for which Young wrote many articles, the Montreal free traders set forth the benefits to Canada of free trade. Young also advanced his views before the reluctant Montreal Board of Trade, dominated by the more conservative and protection-minded merchants. He continued to uphold free trade throughout his career.

Young strenuously opposed annexation to the United States in 1849, and was one of the few Montreal merchants who refrained from signing the Annexation Manifesto. Lord Elgin [Bruce*] believed that Young wrote two letters in 1849 in the Pilot and Journal of Commerce, which argued against annexation on the grounds that Canada would thrive "if our commercial legislation is conducted with ordinary judgement." Young had faith in the viability of the northern economy and St Lawrence river transportation system and in the continuation of traditional Canadian trade with Britain.

Young may have expected the Liberals to be more favourable to his ideas for canal and railway development. There is no indication of the relationship between Young and La Fontaine although Young's vigorous support of him in 1847 suggests their relations were amicable. In late 1849, Lord Elgin, who regarded Young as "the most enlightened merchant and the best political economist I have met with in Canada," persuaded him to assist the British ambassador at Washington, Sir William Henry Lytton Earle Bulwer, who was attempting to secure a reciprocity treaty. After La Fontaine's resignation in 1851, Young reluctantly entered the new Francis Hincks*–Morin ministry as commissioner of public works on 28 Oct. 1851. His appointment, which was probably due to La Fontaine and Lord Elgin, was applauded even by the opposition Montreal Gazette, which hailed Young as a man of "intelligence, integrity, and energy" and a "credit" to the administration. A provincial election was called in December 1851 and, with a strong campaign organization, he headed the polls by a narrow majority over Conservative lawyer William Badgley*. Young was vigorously opposed by the business community because of "his determination to build a canal from Caughnawaga, to take away our trade, and to build a railway to Halifax, to overwhelm us with debt."

Young resigned from the Executive Council in September 1852 but he retained his seat for two parliaments. As minister he took special interest in measures to improve navigation on the St Lawrence River. He believed that a bi-weekly service between Montreal and Britain during the navigation season and a monthly service in winter from Britain to Portland, Montreal's Atlantic outlet, would greatly enhance the competitive position of the St Lawrence. The service began in 1853 and won widespread approval in Montreal. In his report to parliament as chief commissioner, Young displayed his familiar preoccupation with waterways and a canal from the St Lawrence to Lake Champlain.

Young left the ministry over its proposal to impose higher tolls on American than on Canadian vessels using the Welland Canal and its decision to set higher rates of duty on semi-processed and manufactured goods imported into Canada through the United States. As a free trader, Young expressed dismay at a policy which was solely an act of retaliation against the United States for its failure to adopt reciprocity.

Young's resignation also reflected his increasing chagrin over the ministry's coldness to the Caughnawaga canal. A third reason was probably his sharp disagreement with Hincks. By the summer of 1852, Hincks favoured the Grand Trunk scheme of Thomas Brassey and William Jackson. As a cabinet member, Young was unwilling to accept the Grand Trunk scheme, especially since he himself was associated in an alternate company with Galt, Holton, and David Lewis Macpherson*.

As a member of the assembly Young supported many government measures. He endorsed the bill presented in April 1853 by George BROWN and Adam Johnston Fergusson Blair* to abolish rectories, and the June 1854 motion of Joseph Hartman* and Louis-Victor Sicotte* calling for measures to abolish seigneurial tenure and secularize the clergy reserves. But although an "advanced-Liberal" on some questions, Young did not identify himself with the anti-clericalism of the Rouges or the opposition of the Brownites to "Catholic power." In August 1852 he introduced and piloted through the assembly a bill to establish Collège Sainte-Marie in Montreal.

Young ran for election again in Montreal in 1854 and was careful to present himself as an opponent of the Hincks–Morin ministry, whose reputation had been damaged by revelations of trafficking in securities. He claimed to be running not as a "political man" but as a "mercantile man" interested solely in Montreal's trade. Again the Conservative Montreal Gazette recommended him as an "honest and straight-forward man." Young even temporarily muted his views on free trade and the Caughnawaga canal. Along with Luther Holton and Dorion, he was returned for Montreal (now a three-seat constituency) in the Rouge sweep of the city. Although nominally a Rouge, he said little in the assembly except for a few brisk contributions on his favourite subjects of transportation and tariffs.

Not a candidate in 1857, Young strongly supported Holton. It is not clear why he did not contest a seat. Perhaps his own claim that he was less a politician than a businessman can be accepted. He tried to re-enter politics in 1863 but was defeated by Thomas D'Arcy McGee* in Montreal West. After the election Charles John Brydges* and James Ferrier* of the Grand Trunk charged in the Montreal Gazette that Holton, Dorion, and John Sandfield MACDONALD had pressured them to support Young. Holton had no doubt that Brydges and Ferrier were the reason for Young's defeat because "they had powerful connections in contractors and persons doing occasional jobs for them, all of whom again had their circles of influence."

After 1863 Young continued his independent Liberal ways. In 1869 in a speech at Waterloo, Ontario, he attacked confederation and called for greater independence from Britain. Both Hugh Allan and Brydges wrote to John A. Macdonald* in 1869 that Young was in New York promoting the annexation of Canada and obstructing hopes of a commercial treaty with the United States. Again in 1871, Young proclaimed that confederation was only "a transition State," and although he opposed "political annexation" he called for "commercial annexation." His proposed Zollverein would include complete freedom in trade between Canada and the United States and in the use of waterways.

This heresy against Montreal Conservative interests was compounded in 1872 when Young supported the Parti National, a Liberal organization attempting to win clerical support for the Liberal party in Quebec. Montreal Conservatives spared no attempt to destroy it. Young acted as a moderate in the Parti National and influenced it to support free trade and a Pacific railway. With its help Young formed part of the Montreal Liberal team that unseated George-Étienne CARTIER in Montreal East, and Young himself defeated George Alexander Drummond* in Montreal West in the federal election of 1872. Despite this auspicious beginning Young's new parliamentary career was lack-lustre and in 1873 he declined to run again.

Probably Young's most notable achievements were with the Montreal Harbour Commission. Appointed to it in 1850, he became chairman in 1853. The commission was established to supervise wharves and improve the ship channel; its functions overlapped with that of Trinity House, Montreal, which under the Navigation Acts oversaw navigation in the St Lawrence. In 1868 Trinity House was abolished and with strong pressure from Young its functions were assumed by the Montreal Harbour Commission. Young was also largely responsible for the transformation of the commission into the National Harbours Board.

Young's attitude to the harbour seems to have mixed public good and personal gain. He owned land in the east end of Montreal and consistently urged expansion of the harbour into the Hochelaga Bay region. His support for a bridge in east Montreal, via Île Sainte-Hélène, coincided with his land speculations. At the very least, Young did not let his position as commissioner interfere with his private business. He sold both land and buildings to the commission for their offices; the Montreal Sailors' Institute took office space in two different buildings which Young owned.

Yet Young's 25-year contribution to the development of the harbour far transcended any personal interest. He understood the significance of Montreal's harbour facilities in the struggle between the St Lawrence and American canal routes. Attacking what he called "the farthing-candle policy" of the Grand Trunk and the government in not developing the harbour, Young consistently called for improved facilities throughout the St Lawrence channel. The Welland and Lachine canals, buoys below Quebec, the training of river pilots, wharving, and the duty structure were all given close attention by Young. This concern with detail and his predilection for facing problems head-on seem to have been his primary assets on the commission. However, personal struggles, often at a petty level, offset his effectiveness. His attacks on Hugh Allan were typical. Whether criticizing the fresh fruit on the Allan steamships or the depth of the ship channel between Montreal and Quebec, or disputing whether he or Allan had originated the idea of steamer service between Quebec and Britain, Young's battles regularly ended in public name-calling and personalities. (In 1847 a series of articles he wrote in the Pilot led to a Sunday morning duel with W. S. Turner: despite two shots each, no one was injured.) Yet Young maintained business contacts with Hugh Allan and continued to curl with him and Andrew Allan*.

In this period Montreal's harbour grew to over eight miles and Young envisaged a harbour of 16 miles. By 1878, wharves extended from the Lachine Canal basin in the west to the Hochelaga Wharf. In 1851, 258 overseas ships with a tonnage of 70,910 visited Montreal; in 1874, 731 ships with a tonnage of 423,423. Young never gave up his efforts to incorporate much of the American west as well as the St Lawrence and Ottawa trade into the harbour's vortex. To facilitate trade with the north shore of the St Lawrence he envisaged a tunnel through Montreal mountain and a new railway complex at the east end of the harbour. He constantly criticized what he interpreted as selfish policies by the Grand Trunk, attacking the location of their yards in Pointe-Saint-Charles, the blight their tracks had brought to the centre of Montreal, and the inadequacy of their loading facilities. He was probably responsible for the Harbour Commission's insistence that the Grand Trunk pay its fair share of the harbour's costs.

Young was particularly interested in deepening the ship channel through the shallows of Lac Saint-Pierre. He realized that in the age of the steamships and improved oceanic communication the depth of the channel was critical. In November 1851 it was only 12′6″ but by 1854, owing to his efforts, was 16′. The Harbour Commission records for 25 years abound with evidence of Young's efforts to acquire capital to deepen the channel. He considered himself an engineer and was fond of visiting controversial points on the river to take soundings and to challenge engineers' reports. The deepening in Lac Saint-Pierre in 1866 brought charges from Young of unnecessary expense and delay. He apparently forced the Montreal Board of Trade to choose between him and his fellow commissioners. Ultimately dismissed from the Harbour Commission by Cartier for his obstreperousness in 1866, Young continued to air his case in the public press, and throughout 1867 and 1868 a correspondence was carried on in the Gazette between Allan and Young. However, Young would again be commissioner in 1870–72 and 1873–78.

In 1860 Young's fortunes had been at their peak and he reported that he had shipped 100,000 barrels of flour to Portland since the rail link opened. Although president of the Royal Canadian Insurance Company, Young's interests centred on his forwarding business as well as the harbour and land speculation. In 1860 he proposed a new storage complex on the Lachine Canal with facilities for 200,000 barrels of flour and 500,000 bushels of wheat. He assured a business associate that he had assembled land worth $18,000 and buildings worth $7,000. His plans included a swing bridge to link railway lines into the complex. Young had also received rights from the government to use water power from the canal to operate the elevating machinery and permission from the city of Montreal to buy streets in the area.

With investments such as these Young was able to retire from active business in 1860. During his last years he dabbled in politics, maintained his strong interest in the Harbour Commission, and spent more time with his family and his curling. In 1860 he served as Montreal chairman for the visit of the Prince of Wales, the future Edward VII. The following year he moved with his wife, Amelia Jane Tilley, and his 13 children to Scotland for two years to ensure their proper education; the old country only reinforced his Scottish scrappiness. On the return voyage Young and his family were shipwrecked off Newfoundland on the Anglo-Saxon. Young was the most prominent witness in the investigation and attacked both the captain's competence and the Allan Line Steamship Company, owners of the vessel. He served in 1864 as a commissioner to Washington on the reciprocity treaty; he remained active on the Montreal Board of Trade of which he was president in 1855, 1860, 1870, and 1871; he was the first president of the Dominion Board of Trade in 1871.

Perhaps as a result of financing difficulties in his transatlantic telegraph and land speculations, Young's circumstances soured in the 1860s and by 1872 he was impecunious. Rosemount, the family estate, was sold and thereafter the family moved regularly. In 1873 the Harbour Commission petitioned the federal government for permission to grant Young a pension out of its funds. Young himself wrote plaintive letters to Cartier, Hincks, and Macdonald begging assistance for his "position of urgent necessity." A year later, although still on the commission, he continued to request a pension of $20,000 from Macdonald. However, Young's Montreal enemies had no intention of permitting him to enjoy a government pension. William WORKMAN, in particular, reminded Macdonald of Young's Liberal associations, his free trade proclivities, and his failure to protect Montreal interests. He accused Young of profiting from a $400,000 Harbour Commission contract let through Young's nephew in Scotland. Instead of a pension, Young had to accept from the Liberal administration of Alexander Mackenzie* a number of patronage positions. After his short term in parliament in 1872–73 he became flour inspector for the port of Montreal and also served as chairman of the Baie Verte Canal Commission. He continued writing pamphlets in favour of free trade, canals, and railways. His last public service was in 1877 as Canadian commissioner to the international exhibition in Sydney, Australia. Afflicted by sunstroke while returning, Young died in Montreal of heart trouble 12 April 1878.

John Young was one of the best-known public figures in Montreal in the mid-19th century. He shared the assumption of his fellow merchants that the St Lawrence was potentially the most advantageous commercial outlet from the west, and their aspiration that Montreal thrive on this trade, but he had different views as to how the goal could best be achieved. He championed free trade and the Caughnawaga canal with the persistence and fervour of an evangelist. In his later years he supported the commercial annexation he had so strongly opposed in 1849.

Despite the attacks and ridicule lavished upon him by his fellow businessmen, who feared his projects and his pen, Young was in many ways representative of his class, place, and time. He was a businessman in the export-import trade, an entrepreneur in a number of railway and telegraph ventures, a land speculator, and a dabbler in other ventures. Businessmen of this type assumed that the prime role of the state was to improve the climate of enterprise by building the necessary facilities, providing assistance for others, and following the "right" policies. Young could hardly have been president of the Montreal Board of Trade several times and harbour commissioner for so many years without the support of many Montreal businessmen who recognized him as a maverick but nevertheless one of their own. The merchants of Montreal buried him with respect and since he left a meagre estate provided a lavish headstone for his grave.

G. TULCHINSKY and BRIAN J. YOUNG

[Young wrote a great deal throughout his life, for he avidly threw himself into public debate on questions of policy that vitally affected Canadian trade. He expressed his views in reports to the Montreal Board of Trade and in speeches on local public occasions. He was indeed the most prolific Montreal polemicist of his era. Young's best-known and most representative writings are: Views of the commercial policy of Canada (Montreal, 1853); "Montreal," Encyclopædia Britannica (8th ed., 21v., Edinburgh, 1853–60), XV, 521–24; Letters to the Hon. Francis Lemieux, chief commissioner public works, on Canadian trade and navigation, and to the citizens of Montreal, on the commerce of the city and the means of its further development (Montreal, 1855); Reply to J. C. Trautwine, C.E., on the subject of the construction of docks at Montreal (Montreal, 1859); Rival routes from the west to the ocean, and docks at Montreal: a series of letters . . . in reply to letters of "A merchant," written by W. Workman (Montreal, 1859); On the changed opinions of the Montreal Board of Trade on the canal to connect the St Lawrence with Lake Champlain (Montreal, 1866); Three letters on Canadian independence (Montreal, 1869); [ ], Independence of Canada; Waterloo meeting; speeches of Hon. John Young, Hon. L. S. Huntington and Rudolph Laflamme, esq., Q.C., delivered at Waterloo, Oct. 2, 1869 (Montreal, 1869); [ ], Letters, &c., first published in the "Northern Journal," during 1871, by the Hon. John Young, on various questions of public interest (Montreal, 1872); North Shore Railway: a brief sketch of its commercial relations and financial prospects (Montreal, 1872); Memorandum for contractors, prepared by the directors of the Caughnawaga Ship Canal Company (Ottawa, 1873); Remarks on the Montreal harbour and the Lachine Canal (Montreal, 1875); The origin of the Victoria Bridge (Montreal, 1876).

Young wrote numerous letters to Montreal newspapers under his own name and also under the pseudonym "A Merchant." Evening Telegraph and Daily Commercial Advertiser (Montreal), 9 Aug. 1866. Gazette (Montreal), 12 June, 9 July 1868; 13 April 1878. Globe (Toronto), 28 Aug. 1863; 26 Oct. 1867; 7 May, 12 June, 9 July 1868. La Minerve (Montréal), 29 août 1863. Montreal Gazette, 16, 23–25, 30 Oct. 1844; 6 Oct. 1847; 26 May, 4 Aug. 1849; 3, 5 Nov.

1851; 9 Jan., 30 Aug., 23 Sept. 1852; 13 April, 21, 31 May, 1, 3, 4, 12 June, 4 July 1853; 15, 17, 26 July 1854; 26 Oct. 1867. Morning Courier (Montreal), 17, 24 May, 19, 29 June, 26, 28 July, 4 Aug. 1849. See also: Montreal Herald, 13, 15 April 1878.

McCord Museum (McGill University, Montreal), Bagg papers, Letter books of Stanley Bagg; Jedediah Hubbell Dorwin, Antiquarian autographs. National Harbours Board (Cité du Havre, Montreal), Letter books, 24 June 1876; Minute books, 19 Sept. 1862, 10 March 1876. PAC, MG 24, E1 (Merritt papers), ser.2, 21, pp.3496–99; 22, pp.3586–89; MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 344, pp.157516–17; 346, pp. 158526–30; Young to Macdonald, 2 March 1873; MG 27, I, D8 (Galt papers), Young to Galt, 9 Jan. 1862; RG 4, C1, 111, no.3010; 266, no.2615; RG 30, A1g, 146–58. Queen's University Archives, John Young papers, Young to T. E. Blackwell, 30 May 1860 (copy); Hugh Allan to Young, 11 Nov. 1869; Young to the secretary of state, 9 May 1872; Young to the governor general, 20 March 1873; extract from Montreal Herald, 1856; "The route of the Canada Pacific Railway" (speech by Young); "Cheap transportation: speech of John Young to the Chicago Cheap Transportation Convention."

[Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty), I, 420; II, 565. Canada Gazette (Montreal, Toronto), 1846, p.3308; 1848, p.5109; 1850, p.7686. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1852–53, app.Q, "Report of the commissioners of public works, for 1851"; 1857, app.6, "Report of the special committee appointed to inquire and report as to the condition, management, and prospects of the Grand Trunk Railway Company"; Parliamentary debates, 24, 28, 29 Nov. 1854; 20 Feb., 8, 11, 20 April 1856; Statutes, 1847, c.83; 1849, c.180; 1850, c.113; 1854, c.131; 1859, c.100, 101. [J. A. Macdonald], Correspondence of Sir John Macdonald; selections from the correspondence of the Right Honourable Sir John Alexander Macdonald, G.C.B., first prime minister of the Dominion of Canada, ed. Joseph Pope (Toronto, [1921]), 105, 108. The origin of the ocean mail steamers between Liverpool and the St Lawrence, and the advantages of the northern routes (Montreal, 1877). Proceedings of the convention held at Saratoga Springs, August 21, 1849, relative to the St Lawrence and Lake Champlain ship canal; with separate reports of the Canadian and American committees (Saratoga Springs, N.Y., 1849). Report of the commission appointed to inquire into the affairs of the Grand Trunk Railway (Quebec, 1861), 101. Report of royal commission on the leasing of water-power, Lachine Canal (Ottawa, 1887), 18, 35–36. Report of the committee on the Montreal and Kingston section of the Canada Grand Trunk Railway (Montreal, 1851). Return to an address from the Legislative Assembly of the 28th ultimo [February] for copy of Mr. Jarvis' report relative to the survey of the proposed Caughnawaga canal, and the amount of the cost of such survey as submitted by the said engineer (Toronto, 1855). Thoughts on the last election, and matters connected therewith (Montreal, [1854]), 7.

Can. biog. dict., II, 347–48. Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, III, 194–99. Montreal directory (Mackay), 1845–46, 197, 246; 1847–48, 269; 1852, 256–57. Morgan, Sketches of celebrated Canadians, 528–33. Notman and Taylor, Portraits of British Americans, II, 227–36. Political appointments, 1841–1865 (J.-O. Coté), 9, 21–22, 29, 55, 83, 92, 95.

Atherton, Montreal, II, 675. Cornell, Alignment of political groups, 33, 70. R. C. Dalton, The Jesuits' estates question, 1760–1888: a study of the background for the agitation of 1889 (Canadian Studies in History and Government series, 11, Toronto, 1968), 120. Facts of interest in relation to the harbour of Montreal (Montreal, 1929). J. E. Graham, "The Riel amnesty and the Liberal party in central Canada, 1869–1875," unpublished MA thesis, Queen's University, 1967, 107. P. G. MacLeod, "Montreal and free trade, 1846–1849," unpublished MA thesis, University of Rochester, 1967. Gustavus Myers, History of Canadian wealth (Chicago, 1914). W. J. Rattray, The Scot in British North America (4v., Toronto, 1880–84), II, 600–1. "Protection and free trade," Spectator (Montreal), 12 Jan. 1878. "Royal Albert Bridge Extra," Canadian Illustrated News (Montreal), 22 March 1876. G.T. and B.J.Y.]

YOUNG, Sir JOHN, Baron Lisgar, second governor general of Canada; b. 31 Aug. 1807 in Bombay, India, eldest son of Sir William Young, a director and large shareholder in the East India Company, and Lucy Frederick; d. 6 Oct. 1876 in Bailieborough, Ireland.

John Young was educated at Eton and Corpus Christi College, Oxford (BA 1829). In 1834 he was called to the bar of Lincoln's Inn but never practised law. Elected to the House of Commons first in 1831 from County Cavan (his ancestral home), he served as a Conservative MP until 1855 and held two senior Treasury offices between 1841 and 1846, during Sir Robert Peel's administration. He succeeded to the baronetcy in 1848 and was chief secretary for Ireland, 1852–55. Created GCMG in 1855, he became in that year lord high commissioner of the Ionian Islands. The theft and publication of a dispatch in which he recommended an unpopular policy about their government led to his recall, though his administration was commended. As governor general of New South Wales, 1861–67, Young, urged by the premier, nominated 15 new members to the upper house to secure passage of a regulation and was rebuked by the colonial secretary; he nevertheless completed his term. He became a KCB in 1859 and GCB in 1868.

Young was appointed governor general of Canada and governor of Prince Edward Island on 29 Dec. 1868 and assumed office on 2 Feb. 1869. Shortly after arriving in Canada, he commented publicly on Canada's independence within the empire and her freedom "to continue the present connection or in due time . . . to exchange it for some other form of alliance.” There was nevertheless, he felt, greater loyalty to and respect for Britain in Canada than in Australia. He himself, however, found he now had less influence since his Canadian ministers decided measures in cabinet before they came to him whereas in New South Wales he had been consulted by ministers before council meetings.

In Young’s first year in Canada the disturbance led by Louis Riel* broke out. As an appeasement he proclaimed an amnesty on 6 Dec. 1869. During the unrest the United States government barred the Canadian ship Chicora from the Sault Ste Marie Canal on its way west; Young made a formal protest that it carried no military supplies and that American vessels, some armed, were freely using the Welland Canal. The ban on passage was lifted.

During his term of office the Hudson’s Bay Company territory of Rupert’s Land was transferred to Canada, and Manitoba became a province in confederation. Originally scheduled for early 1869, the transfer was delayed by the rebellion until August 1870, and from April 1869 to that date Young had a key role as nominal lieutenant governor of Rupert’s Land. During the Fenian raid into Canada in 1870, Young, according to Lord Dufferin [Blackwood*] later, by a peremptory but judicious telegram to the adjutant-general, Colonel P. Robertson-Ross*, prevented the summary hanging of captured American invaders.

When a delegation from British Columbia came to discuss confederation in June 1870, it was informed by Young personally of the desire of Canadians to have the colony join them. In 1871, the agreements for construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway to British Columbia were concluded. In that year also the Treaty of Washington was drawn up and signed. Prime Minister John A. Macdonald* represented Canada on the commission in Washington and fought diligently to protect Canadian interests. His independence annoyed the British commissioners and Lisgar (he had become Baron Lisgar on 2 Nov. 1870) added to their annoyance by communicating to them indiscreet remarks from Macdonald’s correspondence with cabinet colleagues in Ottawa. Lisgar also complained to the colonial secretary of Macdonald’s independence. Macdonald eventually agreed to secure Canadian approval of the unpopular Treaty of Washington if the British government would grant Canada a guaranteed loan of £4,000,000. Lisgar advised the British cabinet that a much smaller sum would suffice. Nevertheless, Macdonald considered Lisgar the ablest of all the governors general under whom he had served.

Shortly before his retirement Lisgar inadvertently failed to reserve a bill imposing discriminatory duties in Canada against tea and coffee from the United States. The Australian colonies then asked for similar rights, which the colonial secretary granted rather than risk displeasing Canada by disallowing its act. These protective tariffs meant an end to the British ideal of a free-trade empire.

Lisgar did not enjoy good health in Canada and resigned prematurely in June 1872. A man of ability, experience, and generally sound judgement, he died at his family home, leaving his wife, Adelaide Annabella Dalton, daughter of an Irish landowner, whom he had married 8 April 1835. There were no children.

CHARLES A. THOMPSON

Manitoba; birth of a province (Morton), 85. The annual register; a review of public events at home and abroad for the year 1876 (London, 1877), 157. Appleton’s cyclopædia of American biography, ed. J. G. Wilson et al. (10v., New York, 1887–1924), VI, 648. Boase, Modern English biography, II, 444. Burke’s peerage (1953), 641. The complete peerage or a history of the House of Lords and all its members from the earliest times, ed. G. E. C. Kayne et al. (13v., London, 1932), VIII, 38–39. DNB. Edward Walford, The county families of the United Kingdom or royal manual of the titled and untitled aristocracy of England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland (London, 1875), 604.

British Columbia & confederation, ed. W. G. Shelton (Victoria, 1967), 202. Creighton, Macdonald, old chieftain. Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, IV, 40; Last forty years, II, 487–88. Morton, Critical years, 266; Manitoba: a history, 131–32, 139, 142. Joseph Pope, Memoirs of the Right Honourable John Alexander Macdonald G.C.B., first prime minister of the Dominion of Canada (2v., Ottawa, [1894]). R. A. Preston, Canada and “imperial defense”; a study of the origins of the British Commonwealth’s defense organization, 1867–1919 (Durham, N.C., and Toronto, 1967), 74. Stanley, Birth of western Canada, 134, 146.

GENERAL BIBLIOGRAPHY AND LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

List of Abbreviations

AAQ	Archives de l'archidiocèse de Québec
ACAM	Archives de la chancellerie de l'archevêché de Montréal
ADB	Australian Dictionary of Biography
AHO	Archives historiques oblates
AHSJ	Archives générales des Religieuses hospitalières de Saint-Joseph
AJM	Archives judiciaires de Montréal
AJQ	Archives judiciaires de Québec
AJTR	Archives judiciaires de Trois-Rivières
ANQ	Archives nationales du Québec
APQ	Archives de la province de Québec. Now ANQ
AQ	Archives du Québec. Now ANQ
ASGM	Archives des sœurs grises de Montréal
ASHS	Archives de la Société historique du Saguenay
ASJ	Archives de la Société de Jésus
ASJCF	Archives de la Société de Jésus, province du Canada français
ASN	Archives du séminaire de Nicolet
ASQ	Archives du séminaire de Québec
ASSM	Archives du séminaire de Saint-Sulpice de Montréal
ASTR	Archives du séminaire de Trois-Rivières
AVM	Archives de la ville de Montréal
AVQ	Archives de la ville de Québec
BCHQ	British Columbia Historical Quarterly
BNQ	Bibliothèque nationale du Québec
BRH	Bulletin des recherches historiques
CCHA	Canadian Catholic Historical Association
CHA	Canadian Historical Association
CHR	Canadian Historical Review
DAB	Dictionary of American Biography
DCB	Dictionary of Canadian Biography
DNB	Dictionary of National Biography
HBC	Hudson's Bay Company
HBRS	Hudson's Bay Record Society
HSSM	Historical and Scientific Society of Manitoba
JALPC	Journal de l'Assemblée législative de la province du Canada
JIP	Journal de l'Instruction publique
MTCL	Metropolitan Toronto Central Library
PABC	Provincial Archives of British Columbia
PAC	Public Archives of Canada
PAM	Public Archives of Manitoba
PANB	Provincial Archives of New Brunswick
PANL	Provincial Archives of Newfoundland and Labrador
PANS	Public Archives of Nova Scotia
PAO	Ontario Department of Public Records and Archives
PAPEI	Public Archives of Prince Edward Island
PRO	Public Record Office
RHAF	Revue d'histoire de l'Amérique française
RSCT	Royal Society of Canada Transactions
RUL	Revue de l'université Laval
SAB	Saskatchewan Archives Board
SCHÉC	Société canadienne d'histoire de l'Église catholique
SGCF	Société généalogique canadienne-française
SH	Social History
SHQ	Société historique de Québec
SHS	Société historique du Saguenay
SPRI	Scott Polar Research Institute
USPG	United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel
UCA	United Church Archives

General Bibliography

The General Bibliography is based on the sources most frequently cited in the individual bibliographies of volume X. It is not, therefore, a complete list of background materials for the history of Canada during the period covered by this volume.

Section I provides a description of the principal archival sources used for this volume and is divided by country. Section II has two parts, A and B: A contains printed primary sources including documents published by the various colonial, provincial, and federal governments, and the works printed in the 19th and 20th centuries that may be regarded as contemporary sources; B provides a listing of the contemporary newspapers most frequently cited by the contributors to the volume and includes an introduction listing some sources for background information on the newspapers. Section III includes various dictionaries, nominal lists, and guides to printed matter. Section IV contains secondary works, mainly written in the 20th century, including a few general histories, relevant series, and theses. Section V describes the principal journals containing material relevant to the 19th century as well as individual articles frequently cited in the text.

I. ARCHIVES AND MANUSCRIPT SOURCES

CANADA

ARCHIVES DE LA CHANCELLERIE DE L'ARCHEVÊCHÉ DE MONTRÉAL. These archives, where documents up to 1896 can be consulted, contain photographs, maps, 634 registers divided into 17 series (mainly the correspondence of the bishops of Montreal), and some 500,000 separate items describing the dioceses, clergy, laity, institutions, missions, religious orders, etc. For a more complete description of this archives, see, RHAF, XIX (1965–66), 652–55; SCHÉC, Rapport, 1963, 69–70. A detailed inventory of several registers and files appears in RHAF, XIX (1965–66), 655–64; XX (1966–67), 146–66, 669–700; XXIV (1970–71), 111–42.

The following series were used in preparing vol. X:

- Dossiers
  - 255: Diocèses du Canada
    - .109: Diocèse de Saint-Boniface
  - 420: Clergé
    - .005: Truteau, Alexis-Frédéric
  - 901: Fonds Lartigue-Bourget
    - .059: Voyage à Rome de Mgr Bourget, 1869
    - .079: Chanoine Joseph-Octave Paré à Mgr Bourget, 1840, 1874
- RCD: Registres et cahiers divers. 110 vols.
- RDM: Registres des dispenses de mariages. 65 vols.
- RLB: Registres des lettres de Mgr Bourget. 25 vols. A descriptive inventory of Mgr Bourget*'s correspondence from 1837 to 1850 was published in APQ, Rapport, 1945–46, 137–224; 1946–47, 81–175; 1948–49, 343–477; 1955–57, 177–221; AQ, Rapport, 1961–64, 9–68; 1965, 87–132; 1966, 191–252; 1967, 123–70; 1969, 3–146.
- RLL: Registres des lettres de Mgr Lartigue. 9 vols. An inventory of Mgr Lartigue*'s correspondence from 1819 to 1840 appears in APQ, Rapport, 1941–42, 345–496; 1942–43, 1–174; 1943–44, 207–334; 1944–45, 173–266; 1945–46, 39–134.

ARCHIVES DE L'ARCHIDIOCÈSE DE QUÉBEC. Contains about 1,060 feet of documents, an analytical card file for all documents before 1930, and a Répertoire général des registres officiels de l'archvêché in 6 vols., from 1659 to the present. A guide to these archives can be found in SCHÉC, Rapport, 1934–35, 65–73. Since the publication of DCB, II, the AAQ has instigated a system of alphabetical-numerical classification; it is given below but was not used in the individual bibliographies of this volume.

Series relevant to the period of vol. X include:

- A: Évêques et archevêques de Québec
  - 210 A: Registres des lettres expédiées, X–XXII. 1819–80. An inventory of Mgr Joseph Signay*'s correspondence for 1825–40 can be found in APQ, Rapport, 1936–37, 125–330; 1937–38, 21–146; 1938–39, 180–297.

C: Secrétairerie et chancellerie
  CB: Structures de direction
    1 CB: Vicaires généraux, I–XIV. 1742–1867
  CD: Discipline diocésaine
    515 CD: Séminaire de Nicolet, 1800–74
    61 CD: Paroisses. Sainte-Marie de Beauce, II. 1851–1906
    71 CD: Religieux. Oblats de Marie-Immaculée, I. 1844–1913
  CN: Église canadienne
    330 CN: Rivière-Rouge, 1818–70. 4 vols.
    331 CN: Diocèse de Saint-Boniface, 1850–1900
    36 CN: Colombie-Britannique, I–III. 1835–1929
  CP: Église du Québec
    26 CP: District et diocèse de Montréal, II–XII. 1823–98.

ARCHIVES DE LA SOCIÉTÉ DE JÉSUS, PROVINCE DU CANADA FRANÇAIS, Saint-Jérôme (Terrebonne). These archives were founded in 1844 by Father Félix Martin*. Originally they were housed at the Collège Sainte-Marie in Montreal, and were designated by the abbreviation ACSM. In 1968 they were transferred to the noviciate of the Jesuits of the ecclesiastical province of French Canada, at Saint-Jérôme, and are now designated by the abbreviation ASJCF. In the year of their founding these archives received a rich gift from the religious of the Hôtel-Dieu in Quebec. They contain numerous documents relating to the history of the missions of the Society of Jesus in Canada [see ARCHIVES DU COLLÈGE SAINTE-MARIE, DCB, I, 686].

Vol. X of the DCB mentions several documents found in:

A section of 140 metal boxes containing about 8,000 numbered documents (personal papers or correspondence) in the form of original manuscripts or copies
Section A (documents relating to the Jesuit missions in Ontario around the Great Lakes), 1845–1924, about 8,000 numbered documents
Section B-106 (letters and fragments of letters of Jean-Baptiste Meilleur), 118 items
Section D-7 (various documents relating to the fathers of the Society of Jesus)

ARCHIVES DE LA SOCIÉTÉ HISTORIQUE DU SAGUENAY, Chicoutimi, Que. This important repository for the history of the Saguenay was organized by the Société historique du Saguenay, but also received documents from the Séminaire de Chicoutimi and the research notes on the history of the region accumulated by Mgr Victor Tremblay after 1920. The ASHS also holds recorded and printed information, oral history, maps, photographs (43,000, as well as 65,000 negatives), a museum, and a library. The classification system uses titles for sections and numbers for each unit; there is an index. The Documents and the Dossiers cover the whole period of the history of the Saguenay from its discovery in 1535 and contain a little information on its earlier history. Since 1920 the society has been collecting oral history, "les Mémoires d'anciens." The SHS has published books and pamphlets since 1934. One of the repository's most important holdings is its collection of Publications saguenéennes which contains almost all the newspapers and periodicals published in the region. A more complete description of ASHS can be found in Victor Tremblay, "Les archives de la Société historique du Saguenay," RHAF, IV (1950–51), 3–16.

The sections used in preparing this volume were:

Documents. 5,220 originals, 93 copies
Dossiers. About 35,000 items, totalling 21,300 pages
  Price, 1810– . [Inventory in progress.]
Mémoires d'anciens. 692 memoirs, totalling 3,550 typed pages

ARCHIVES DE LA VILLE DE MONTRÉAL. The archives division of the Secrétariat municipal of the city of Montreal was created in 1913 to hold the city's administrative documents. The AVM contains 12,000 feet of documents classified into files or volumes. The section Documents administratifs is composed of all the official papers from 1796 to the present. The section Documentation contains extracts from articles in newspapers, periodicals, and other printed matter reporting on subjects or individuals relating to the administration and history of Montreal. This last section contains the correspondence (originals and copies) of several mayors and the original music of Alexis Contant*. The AVM also holds copies of material from other archives including the terrier of the Sulpiciens and documents relevant to the mission of Saint-François-Xavier of Caughnawaga. There are indexes which will soon be available on microfilm. Materials used in vol. X include:

Documentation
  B: Biographies autres que celles des maires et des conseillers. Classified by numerical order with an alphabetical card file.
  Biographies de conseillers. Arranged alphabetically.
  Biographies de maires. Arranged alphabetically.
  36: Commerces, industries
  10: Banques

.4: Banque d'Épargne de Montréal
.6: Banque des Marchands
Documents administratifs, 1796– .
Registres des procès-verbaux du comité des Finances
Registres des procès-verbaux du conseil municipal

ARCHIVES DE LA VILLE DE QUÉBEC. The archives department of Quebec City was officially organized in 1925 under the direction of Valère Desjardins. Its most important original documents are those of the municipal administration from the time of the incorporation of Quebec in 1833 until the founding of the AVQ. The archives contains at least 1,200 cubic feet to which will soon be added a large number of municipal documents. The oldest documents, in broken series, go back as early as 1796, but complete series begin from 1814.

The archives is in the process of reorganization (classifying and preparing an inventory), but there are already several finding aids (a list can be found in the guide prepared by the AVQ) and a complete list of collections will soon be available. While the latter is being prepared, the archives is proceeding with a complete inventory of the Fonds Baillairgé, which contain 400 plans and original drawings of the buildings of Quebec by Charles Baillairgé* dated 1846–99. The AVQ plans to publish a descriptive inventory of these drawings and plans, and will make photographs and slides available.

For the period covered by vol. X the documents of the municipal administration are those of the municipal council and each of the different committees (Aqueduc, Chemins, Feu, Finances, Police, Règlements, Traverse, etc.), except from 1836 to 1840. In 1836, the corporate charter was not renewed and the city was administered for four years by justices of the peace. When the registries of the Cour municipal from 1848 are transferred to the AVQ, the full collection of documents for the period 1833–1928 will include about 600 volumes. The main groups for this period are:

Registres des procès-verbaux du conseil municipal, 1833–36, 1840–1928
Registres des procès-verbaux de chaque comité, 1833–36, 1840–1928
Pièces justificatives présentées au conseil par chaque comité, 1833–36, 1840–1928
Rapports présentés au conseil par chaque comité, 1833–36, 1840–1928

ARCHIVES DES SŒURS GRISES, Montreal. The documents that were at the Hôpital Général de Montréal when Madame d'Youville [Dufrost*] came there as administratrix in 1747 make up the Fonds "Charon," and are the basis of this archival repository. Subsequently, items necessary for the general administration of the community were added. The classification for this repository is alphabetical for the dossiers and chronological within each dossier. These archives contain thousands of documents, the earliest dating from 1663, and about 300 maps and plans.

The principal documents used in vol. X were:

"Ancien journal, 1688–1877"
"Chapitre des fondations, 1849"
"Chroniques de Saint-Boniface (Man.), 1843– "
"Correspondance de Saint-Boniface, 1843– "
"Registre d'admissions, vêtures et professions, 1771– "

ARCHIVES DU SÉMINAIRE DE NICOLET. Located since 1969 in a building of the seminary of Nicolet, the ASN is kept in 8 filing cabinets and 26 metal boxes. Although the oldest original document is dated 1706, the majority are from the 19th and 20th centuries. Among the most important sections are the Section Henri Vassal, which includes material on the Odanak Indian reserve (near Pierreville, Que.), and the Archives de la seigneurie de Nicolet, given to the seminary by the seigneur, Arthur St Lawrence Trigge, in 1939. The latter collection includes a large number of volumes and registers from the seigneury. The following documents were used in vol. X:

Collection Charles-Édouard Bois, 44 vols. of notes and historical documents [copies at PAC, MG 24, B26 (Jean-Baptiste Meilleur collection)]
Section de 26 Boîtes métalliques
Section Polygraphie
Section Séminaire (documents on the seminary from its founding in 1803 until its sale to the Quebec government in 1966)

ARCHIVES DU SÉMINAIRE DE QUÉBEC. One of the most important collections of documents in North America. The archives dates from the founding of the seminary in 1663, but Mgr Thomas-Étienne Hamel* and Mgr Amédée-Edmond Gosselin* may be considered to have founded the ASQ at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century. The ASQ contains some 1,172 feet of documents (seminary and private papers, the oldest from 1636 and the majority from 1675 to 1950), 2,000 maps, and 160 feet of engravings and photographs.

For vol. X the following were used:

Carton Laverdière. 1 carton
Fichier des anciens du séminaire

Fonds Henri-Raymond Casgrain. Abbé Casgrain's letters and various manuscripts that he kept. Index. MSS 0400–0507

Fonds René-Édouard Caron. 13 cartons containing notarial acts and a series of manuscripts (MSS 764–817, documents used in codifying the laws of Lower Canada)

Fonds Verreau. Includes Fonds Viger, hence frequently called Viger-Verreau. The collections of Abbé Hospice-Anthelme Verreau* and of Jacques Viger*, principally composed of about a hundred cartons, several large notebooks, and the series of Viger's manuscript volumes entitled "Ma Saberdache." [See, Fernand Ouellet, "Inventaire de la Saberdache de Jacques Viger," APQ, Rapport, 1955–57, 31–171.]

Journal du séminaire, 1849–1962. 15 vols.

Lettres, M, 171 items; S, 2 cartons, 188 items; T, 156 items; X, 1863–67, 384 items; Y, 127 items

Manuscrits, 26, "Journal de Mgr Méthot, 1865–1866"; 611, "Journal de Mgr M.-E. Méthot, I, 1er juill.–18 déc. 1870"; 626–27, "Journal de H. Laverdière, 16 oct. 1858–23 mars 1868"; 651, "Journal de Prosper Vincent, 1863–1865"; 676–77, "Journal de C.-F. Légaré, 25 mars 1865–17 avril 1873"; 764–817, see, Fonds René-Édouard Caron

Polygraphie. 324 cartons

Seigneuries, LXVIII–LIX, Laval; LXX, Acquisitions diverses

Séminaire. 274 cartons

S.M.E., Résolutions du conseil du séminaire ou Plumitifs, 1766–1950

Université, 1852–1952. 368 cartons

ARCHIVES DU SÉMINAIRE DE SAINT-SULPICE, Montreal. An important repository for the history of the Montreal region and of the Sulpicians. On his departure in 1665 Paul de Chomedey* de Maisonneuve left there the greater part of his papers, dating from 1642. This repository, divided into 49 sections, contains 190 feet of documents for the years 1586–1950, and about 1,200 maps and plans.

The following sections were used in vol. X:

Communautés religieuses

Histoire et biographies, 2e partie: biographies. 88 items arranged in chronological order. 1657–1926

Œuvres et institutions diverses

ARCHIVES DU SÉMINAIRE DE TROIS-RIVIÈRES. In 1918 the authorities of the seminary, gave Abbé Albert Tessier the task of arranging the archives of the institution. Three years later he published the first work of what would become the collection of "Pages Trifluviennes." In 1926 a fire completely destroyed the library and its contents; because of this the institution received books from Abbé H.-A. Scott, Cyrille Tessier, Édouard Bureau, and René-Montarville Boucher* de La Bruère. Then, in 1934, important gifts of documents were added including the Pierre Boucher collection and the Hart collection. The latter contains thousands of accounts, notes, and letters on Canadian economic life in the 19th century. The archives, housed at the Séminaire Saint-Joseph, is a valuable source for the political, religious, and economic history of the region. ASTR also holds numerous maps and newspapers of Trois-Rivières, the most important for the period 1865–1963. For a more complete description see, AQ, Rapport, 1961–64, 69–134.

Documents from the following sections were used in vol. X:

Fonds et papiers

Archives du diocèse de Trois-Rivières. 16 feet. The largest part is the Louis-François Laflèche collection. 8 drawers

Archives de la famille Hart. 9 drawers. Contains many documents on the Hart family, the first Jews to settle in Canada. The oldest document is dated 1760. Detailed index

Papiers J.-Napoléon Bureau. 6 inches

Correspondance, 1860–69

Trifluviana

Trifluviens du 17e au 20e siècles. 4 drawers. Arranged alphabetically

Personnages canadiens. 4 drawers

Trois-Rivières: institutions et vie sociale. 3 drawers

Commerce et industries. Hall & Baptist

Mauriciana

Le Saint-Maurice: chantiers, navigation, sport. 1 drawer

George Baptist: Correspondance, 1867–72, 1875; Pièces comptables, 1860–74

La Mauricie: territoire, histoire, missions. 1 drawer

ARCHIVES GÉNÉRALES DES RELIGIEUSES HOSPITALIÈRES DE SAINT-JOSEPH, Montreal. In process of being catalogued. This repository was previously known as Archives des Religieuses hospitalières de Saint-Joseph de l'Hôtel-Dieu de Montréal.

The principal documents used in vol. X include:

Actes de décès, 1861–90

Annales de sœur Césarine Raymond, 1756–1861

Annales de sœur Joséphine Paquet, 1860–81

Obédiences des Religieuses hospitalières de Saint-Joseph de l'Hôtel-Dieu de Montréal, 1827–76

Registres des entrées, 1787–1851. 1 vol.
Registres des procès-verbaux des vêtures et professions, 1787–1847

ARCHIVES HISTORIQUES OBLATES, Ottawa. An important repository for the history of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate in Canada from the time of their arrival in 1841. Even before 1930 Father Jean-Marie-Rodrigue Villeneuve* had begun to collect a large number of documents relating to the Oblates. In 1933, Father Léo Deschâtelets obtained from Rome copies of the writings of the order's founder, minutes of general and executive meetings, and letters from the first Oblates in Canada.

The AHO holds personal papers including the manuscript of Father Louis Le Jeune*'s Dictionnaire and the notes of Father Louis Babel*'s trip to Labrador. There are also many Indian language manuscripts, some written by Oblates [see Gaston Carrière, "Une riche collection de manuscrits en langues indiennes," Culture (Québec), XVIII (1957), 105–12].

In 1941, the archives began to microfilm numerous documents, which were important to the history of the Oblates in Canada, from other repositories. Now the AHO's most valuable possession is its large number of copies (typescripts, photocopies, or microfilm), which enable the researcher to find, in one location, almost all documents relating to the Oblates in Canada. The microfilm section alone comprises more than 500,000 pages and a descriptive file with about 250,000 cards. There are several indexes and also a photographic archives and a library of about 10,000 volumes including a few works printed in Indian languages and a large collection of Oblate publications, in particular Missions des O.M.I., which are to the Oblates what the Relations were to the Jesuits.

ORIGINAL documents used in vol. X include:

Dossiers
  Orégon et Colombie-Britannique, 1847–1928. 1,923 items
Fonds manuscrits
  Flavien Durocher. [Pierre Cholenec], "Vie de Catherine Tekakwita appelée en algonquin Mitakwenibekwe, morte en odeur de sainteté au Sault St Louis en 1680, à l'âge de 24 ans, traduit de l'algonquin par Flavien Durocher."

COPIES held at AHO from the following repositories were used in volume X:

Archives de la Propagation de la Foi de Paris
  F. 182: Ottawa, rapports des missions, 1848–76
  F. 202: Vancouver, rapport des missions, 1847–1922
Archives générales des oblats de Marie-Immaculée, Rome
  Dossiers
    "Histoire de la mission de Notre-Dame-des-Sept-Douleurs établie au fond du lac Athabasca."
Archives paroissiales
  Saint-Sauveur, Codex historicus
Archives provinciales des oblats de Marie-Immaculée, Montréal
  Codex historicus
  Dossiers

ARCHIVES JUDICIAIRES DE MONTRÉAL. Materials used in vol. X include:

Greffes: Stanley Clark Bagg, 1842–56
  J.-L. Coutlée, 1867–1914
  Charles Cushing, 1869–1910
  Louis-Michel Darveau, 1871–74
  Alphonse-Clovis Décary, 1866–98
  William M. Easton, 1843–74
  Isaac Jones Gibb, 1835–67
  Léonard-Ovide Hétu, 1859–1903
  William Ross, 1835–89
Procédures non-contentieuses
Registre d'état civil
Louis Richard, La famille Masson. 173 pages

ARCHIVES JUDICIAIRES DE QUÉBEC. Materials used in vol. X include:

Greffes: Étienne Boudreault, 1816–25
  Louis-Michel Darveau, 1856–68
  Edward Graves Meredith, 1876–1938
Registre d'état civil

ARCHIVES NATIONALES DU QUÉBEC. The administrators of New France took back to France, after 1763, documents relating to the government of the colony – an action contrary to international law at the time but agreed to under articles 43, 44, and 45 of the capitulation of Montreal. Only archives having a legal value for individuals remained in the country and these were to suffer many misfortunes before an official repository was created. The Bureau des Archives de la province de Québec – now the Archives nationales du Québec – was created in 1920 [see Gilles Héon, "Bref historique des Archives du Québec," ANQ, Rapport, 1970, 13–25]. Some 3,300 feet of documents are preserved there today (official and private papers, originals and copies), the majority for the period 1663–1867. In 1968, the ANQ published an État général des archives publiques et privées du Québec and established a new system of classification of documents. Cited in vol. X:

Archives privées. Being classified numerically
  Autographes. Copies, 1/2 inch

René-Édouard Caron, 1842–76. 2 feet
  Lettres reçues
  Documents juridiques
  Divers, 1851–73
Collection Chapais, Fonds Langevin
  Sir Hector-Louis Langevin, 1826–1903. 22 items (some originals are at PAC)
Collection Pierre-Georges Roy
Ludger Duvernay, 1805–48. 1 foot. An inventory was published in APQ, Rapport, 1926–27, 145–258.
Famille Chaussegros de Léry
  Alexandre-René, 1845–76. 2 inches
Famille Hale, 1842, 1847, 1930. 10 pages
Fonds Papineau-Bourassa
  Famille Papineau, 1801–1902. 40 feet
Jean-Joseph Girouard, 1822–55. 8 inches
John Heath, 1822–45, 1861. 12 pages
Port de Québec, 1779–1922. 28 vols.
Quebec Board of Trade, 1832–1932. 39 vols., 2 cartons
PQ: Province de Québec
  Éducation, 1867–1959. 2,165 feet
QBC: Québec et Bas-Canada
  Instruction publique, 1842–99. 236 vols.

BIBLIOTHÈQUES DE L'UNIVERSITÉ DE MONTRÉAL. In April 1971 the libraries of the Université de Montréal created the Service des collections particulières whose purpose was to make available to researchers the numerous valuable documents that the university had acquired through purchase and donation. At the same time the service began a series of publications. Used in vol. X:

Collection Baby. Made up of an important collection of original material gathered by François-Louis-Georges Baby* (1832–1906), and bequeathed to the Université de Montréal. Including more than 20,000 items, it covers almost every subject in Canadian history from 1602 to 1905. In 1942 Camille Bertrand began to inventory this collection and to arrange the material into two large divisions: Documents divers and Correspondance générale. Documents divers mainly consists of individual items arranged under 20 general titles in alphabetical order from A to S. The division includes 42 files, 10 boxes, 200 registers and books, and 18 folio-volumes. Correspondance générale, arranged alphabetically by names of the signatories of the letters, contains about 12,000 original letters kept in 120 boxes. The collection is too large and varied to describe here in full but the researcher may consult either the repository's 20,000 manuscript index cards or the Catalogue de la Collection François-Louis-Georges Baby, rédigé par Camille Bertrand, préface de Paul Baby et introduction par Lucien Campeau (Publ. du Service des collections particulières, Bibliothèques de l'Université de Montréal, Montréal, 1971). Typescript copies of most items in the Collection Baby are held by PAC.

BIBLIOTHÈQUE NATIONALE DU QUÉBEC, DÉPARTEMENT DES MANUSCRITS, Montreal. In 1965 the Bibliothèque Saint-Sulpice (since 1967, the Bibliothèque nationale du Québec) owned enough archival material to create an autonomous manuscript department. This department now holds papers collected from 1844 by the Sulpicians and recent acquisitions. There are 2,230 feet of documents; the oldest, dated 1316, is part of the Jacques Mordret collection. The manuscript collections include mainly private and literary papers, the majority of the private papers being from the 19th century and of the literary papers from the 20th century. Besides these documents the manuscript department of the BNQ holds 6,000 maps and plans and 30,000 photographs. The collection used in vol. X was that of the Société historique de Montréal. In 1970 the Société historique de Montréal deposited at BNQ its complete collection of manuscripts, archives, documents, and books, which covers 975 feet. This collection was previously housed at the library of the École des Hautes Études Commerciales de Montréal. The main documents cited in vol. X are:

Collection La Fontaine. For a complete inventory of this collection see, Inventaire de la collection Lafontaine, Elizabeth Nish, compil. (Publ. du Centre d'étude du Québec, Bibliographie pour servir à l'étude de l'histoire du Canada français, 2, Montréal, 1967.)

MCCORD MUSEUM, Montreal. Begun from the private archives collected between 1860 and 1919 by David Ross McCord*. The documents are kept in about 364 boxes and cover the period 1682–1970. In addition the McCord Museum holds a photographic archives which includes the celebrated Notman Photographic Archives – about 400,000 prints and negatives – a most important source for research on 19th and 20th century Canada and Canadians.

The following collections were used in vol. X:

Stanley and Abner Bagg papers. Ledgers, letter books, account books, receipts, etc., referring to various business enterprises, especially the Lachine Canal. 1810–45.

Hale family papers. Principally the papers of Edward Hale, 1801–75. Includes private and business correspondence relating to the British American Land Company, settlement of the Eastern Townships, rebellion of 1837, travel in Upper and Lower Canada, social and political life in Montreal, Quebec, Kingston, and Sherbrooke, etc. Index available

McGill University Archives, Montreal. Founded in 1962 and placed under the direction of Alan D. Ridge, the McGill University Archives holds documents produced and received by the administration of the university, by its researchers and professors. Certain personal papers are also found there. The repository contains 2,500 square feet of documents of which the oldest is dated 1807 and concerns the correspondence of the Royal Institution for the Advancement of Learning. Other archival repositories exist at McGill University including the McCord Museum, the McLennan Library (Rare Books and Special Collections Division), and the Osler Library.

The archives has several indexes and published inventories of limited range to aid the researcher. A more complete description of this repository can be found in Alan D. Ridge, "The McGill University Archives," Archives, Journal of the British Records Association (London), VIII, no.37 (April 1967), 16–23.

The following sections were used in preparing vol. X:

Board of Governor's minute books, 1829– . 19 vols.
Board of the Royal Institution for the Advancement of Learning. Minutes, 1835–56. 2 vols.
Correspondence of the principals, 1829–
Dawson family personal papers, 1849–1901. 3 cubic feet
Official papers of Sir John William Dawson, 1855–99. 54 bundles. The archives has published an inventory of the first seven bundles.

Metropolitan Toronto Central Library, Toronto. The manuscript collection of MTCL contains approximately 500 feet of Canadian documents. There are several large sets of personal papers and business records and many single pieces: diaries, account books, letter books, etc. Most of the material is from the 19th century with the emphasis on pre-1850 Ontario politics.

The materials used in the preparation of vol. X include:

Anderson Ruffin Abbott papers
Robert Baldwin papers
Henry John Boulton papers
John Hillyard Cameron papers
Consumer's Gas Company papers
Denison family papers
Minute-books of the Toronto Choral Society, 1845, and the Philharmonic Society, 1846–47
Plan of Toronto, surveyed and compiled by W. S. and H. C. Boulton, Toronto [1858(?)]
Publisher's proofs of a number of Charles Dawson Shanly's poems
J. H. Richardson, "Reminiscences of the medical profession in Toronto, 1829–1905." (typescript copy)
Vaughan Maurice Roberts papers
John Ross Robertson collection, sketches by John Arnot Fleming
Toronto, Mechanics' Institute papers
Robert John Turner legal papers relating to cases in the Court of Chancery, Upper Canada, 1837–56

New Brunswick Museum, Saint John, N.B. Established in 1930, the N.B. Museum became a provincial institution in 1942. Parent organizations, such as the Natural History Society of New Brunswick, had been acquiring manuscripts for nearly a century; these materials were transferred to the museum's Department of Canadian History in 1932 and form the nucleus of the present archives. For further information see: W. A. Squires, The history and development of the New Brunswick Museum (1842–1945) (N.B. Museum pub., Administrative series, 2, Saint John, N.B., 1945). For a further description of the collections see: New Brunswick Museum, Department of Canadian History, Archives Division, Inventory of manuscripts, 1967.

The following collections were especially useful in vol. X:

Brown, Hon. James (1790–1870), journal (photocopy), 1844–70
Chandler, Edward Barron (1800–80), papers, 1821–70
Chipman family, papers, 1764–1879
Ganong manuscript collection, 1686–1941, "The province of New Brunswick," unpublished MS by W. F. Ganong
Milner, Dr William Cochrane (1846–1939), collection, 1744–1930; Chandler correspondence
New Brunswick Historical Society, papers, 1811–75; Steeves, Hon. W. H. (1814–73), correspondence, 1858–1860
New Brunswick land grants, 1826–67, Gloucester County, 1830–65
Register of marriages for the city and county of Saint John, 1812–1880, in 10 vols, with an index
Tilley family, papers, 1845–1931; Correspondence between Sir Samuel Leonard Tilley and Edward Barron Chandler

Webster manuscript collection, 1610–1956, Chandler correspondence

Ontario Department of Public Records and Archives, Toronto. A Bureau of Archives was established in 1903 and departmental status was conferred by legislation in 1923. As constituted in 1971, the department includes three branches – the archives, records services, and historical branch. The archives branch is authorized to acquire, preserve, and analyse all records of significance of the Ontario government. It also acquires, through donation or purchase, manuscripts, maps, photographs, pictures, posters, and early newspapers relating to the history of the province. Unpublished inventories, calendars, catalogue entries, guides, and other finding aids are available in the archives.

The most important materials used in the preparation of vol. X include:

Bethune (Alexander Neil) papers
Blake (Edward and family) papers
Buell (A. N.) papers
Campbell (Sir Alexander) papers
Carstairs and Reid research papers – Legislative Assembly
Cartwright family papers
Clarke (Colonel Charles) papers
Gowan (James R. and Ogle R.) papers
Hodgins (John George) collection
Jarvis-Powell papers
Jones (Solomon) papers
Macaulay (John) papers
Mackenzie-Lindsey collection
Marston collection
Merritt (William Hamilton) papers
Ridout papers
Robinson (Sir John Beverley) papers
Shanly (Francis) papers
Strachan (John) papers
Street (Samuel) papers
Toronto City Council Records
RG 1: Records of the Department of Lands and Forests
  Series A: Offices of surveyor general and commissioner of crown lands
    I: Correspondence
    IV: Schedules and land rolls
  Series C: Lands branch
    I: Land grants
    IV: Township papers
RG 8: Records of the Department of the Provincial Secretary
  Series I-7: Office of the clerk of the Legislative Assembly
  Series I-7-B: Sessional Papers
    1. Indexes
    2. Sessional papers (by years)
    3. Railway sessional papers
RG 22: Court Records
  Series 7: Courts of General Quarter Sessions

Provincial Archives of British Columbia, Victoria. Established in 1893, this is the oldest archival institution in western Canada. Its manuscript collection is rich in material on the exploration of the Pacific northwest by land and by sea and in material for the fur trade period. The official records for the colonial period (1849–71) are remarkably complete; records for the provincial period are also held. Substantial collections of private papers, some business records, and a large number of maps, including many of early cartographic interest, are held. There is an extensive collection of visual records – photographs, paintings, and lithographs. Integral to PABC's holdings is an extensive and valuable collection of some 50,000 volumes of books and pamphlets as well as printed ephemera relating to the Pacific northwest. The archives holds almost complete files of newspapers for the colonial period and selected titles for later years.

The collections of PABC have been used extensively in the preparation of this volume. The principal sources of information have been the correspondence of the employees of the HBC, both official and private, the correspondence and records of colonial governors, secretaries, and other government officials, and departmental correspondence. Several other major collections of papers have also been drawn upon often: the Archibald McDonald papers, the James Douglas papers, the Kenneth McKenzie papers, the Crease collection, and the John Sebastian Helmcken collection.

Provincial Archives of New Brunswick, Fredericton. Established in 1968, the PANB contains government records series from 1785 as well as several private manuscript collections, including that of the York-Sunbury Historical Society. Records and manuscripts formerly with the New Brunswick Legislative Library have also been transferred to the archives.

Materials used in the preparation of vol. X include:

Department of Justice, Probate Court records
Lieutenant governor's letter book, 1867–74
New Brunswick, Executive Council, Draft minutes, 1843–56

Provincial Archives of Newfoundland and Labrador, St John's. Created by an act of the Newfoundland House of Assembly in 1959, the provincial archives took over the collection and preservation of existing public archives from Memorial University of Newfoundland, which had performed the task in the previous three years. Before 1956 government documents were scattered through departmental offices.

The main holdings of the PANL consist of Newfoundland government documents. In addition the archives holds either microfilm and/or transcript copies of the British colonial records, 1689–1934, and the records of the Northern District Court, Harbour Grace, 1799–1945. With the exception of newspapers, 1810–1969, the remainder of the collection consists of miscellaneous court records, government publications, private papers, and business records. For a list of the collections held by PANL see: A preliminary inventory of the records in the Provincial Archives of Newfoundland and Labrador, comp. John P. Greene ([St John's], 1970).

The materials mainly used in the preparation of vol. X include:

Government documents:

- Newfoundland, Department of the Colonial Secretary, Letter books, 1747–1864, 1867–1934
- Newfoundland, Executive Council, Minutes, 1861–65
- Newfoundland, Governor's office, Dispatches to the Colonial Office, 1824–59
- Newfoundland, Sessions Court, Harbour Grace, Records, 1825–35

PUBLIC ARCHIVES OF CANADA, Ottawa. In 1873 the government of Canada commissioned Abbé H.-A.-J.-P. Verreau* to investigate the holdings of English and French archives with a view to copying documents concerning the early history of Canada. The work of transcribing and microfilming such manuscripts has proceeded since that time. The PAC also holds, and continues to acquire, extensive private and official manuscript and record collections particularly relating to the 19th and 20th centuries.

Many unpublished finding aids are available only in the archives, but between 1951 and 1967 the Manuscript Division published a series of Preliminary Inventories. In 1971 the first General Inventory, Manuscripts, Volume I, MG 1–MG 10 (Ottawa, 1971) appeared launching a new series to replace the old inventories – "It reworks them, completes them and presents them in a more systematic fashion." The only section of the General Inventory which applies to vol. X is "MG 9, Provincial, local and territorial records." Until the General Inventory is completed the following Preliminary Inventories will remain useful to researchers of this period:

- Manuscript Group 17, Religious archives (1967)
- Manuscript Group 19, Fur trade and Indians, 1763–1867 (1954)
- Manuscript Group 23, Late eighteenth century papers (1957)
- Manuscript Group 24, Nineteenth century pre-confederation papers (1961)
- Manuscript Group 26, Prime ministers' papers (1958)
- Manuscript Group 27, Political figures, 1867–1948 (1960)
- Manuscript Group 28, Records of post-confederation corporate bodies (1960)
- Manuscript Group 29, Nineteenth century post-confederation manuscripts, 1867–1900 (1962)
- Manuscript Group 30, Twentieth century manuscripts (1966)
- Record Group 1, Executive Council, Canada, 1764–1867 (1953)
- Record Group 2, Privy Council Office; Record Group 3, Post Office Department (1960)
- Record Group 4, Civil and Provincial Secretaries' Offices, Canada East, 1760–1867; Record Group 5, Civil and Provincial Secretaries' Offices, Canada West, 1788–1867 (1953)
- Record Group 7, Governor General's Office (1953)
- Record Group 8, British military and naval records (1954)
- Record Group 9, Department of Militia and Defence, 1776–1922 ([1957])
- Record Group 10, Indian affairs (1951)
- Record Group 11, Department of Public Works; Record Group 12, Department of Transport (marine; railways and canals) (1951).
- Record Group 19, Department of Finance (1954)

Unpublished addenda for the above inventories are available for consultation at the PAC. Also available are typescript copies of the following unpublished inventories:

- "Manuscript Group 12, War Office, Treasury, Audit Office, and others." This collection is in the process of transfer through Manuscript Groups 13 to 16. It is not known in 1971 exactly which departments will continue to be listed in MG 12 and which will be transferred.
- "Record Group 6, Department of the Secretary of State."
- "Record Group 31, Dominion Bureau of Statistics."
- "Record Group 68, Registrar General."
- For Record Group 30, which contains the papers of the Canadian National Railways and the various companies that preceded it, an inventory is in progress.

Manuscript Group 25, which contains numerous genealogies and is a holding unit for minor collections, is also in the process of revision.

The following collections, many of which contain original manuscript material, were found useful in the preparation of vol. X:

MG 9
  A: New Brunswick
    12: Local Records, 1762–1894
MG 12
  D: Treasury
    T28: Treasury Board out letters, various, 1761–1823
MG 17
  B: Anglican
    2: Church Missionary Society, 1821–1950 (microfilm)
MG 19
  A: Fur Trade: General
    2: Ermatinger family
      Series 2. Edward Ermatinger
    21: Hargrave papers
  E: Red River Settlement
    1: Selkirk papers
    7: Inkster, John
  F: Indians
    1: Claus papers
MG 23
  D: New Brunswick
    1: Chipman, Ward, 1767–1843
      Series 1. Lawrence collection: Ward Chipman, muster master's office, 1771–85
  G II: Quebec and Lower Canada: political figures
    18: Hale, John, 1799–1882
  I: Colonies general
    6: Waldo, Samuel, 1764
MG 24
  A: British officials and political figures
    13: Bagot, Sir Charles, 1816–43
    16: Elgin, James Bruce, Eighth Earl of, 1823–58
    17: Harvey, Sir John, 1825–41
    19: Roebuck, John Arthur, 1831–53
    20: Head, Sir Edmund, 1831–61
    25: Head, Sir Francis Bond, 1836–41
    27: Durham, John George Lambton, First Earl of, 1837–42
    40: Colborne, Sir John, 1830 [1839]
  B: North American political figures and events
    1: Neilson collection, 1666–1912
    11: Baldwin, William Warren, and Robert, 1807–55
      Series 2: Related papers, 1825, 1850–55
    16: Cochran papers, 1812–54
    18: Mackenzie, William Lyon, 1818–68
    19: Chamberlin, Brown, 1818–94
    24: Rolph, Dr John, 1824, 1837–85
    29: Howe, Joseph, 1830–73
    30: Macdonald-Langlois papers, 1831–1926
    40: Brown, George, 1837, 1848–80
    50: O'Callaghan, Dr Edmund Bailey, 1840–60
  D: Industry, commerce, and finance
    8: Wright papers, 1806–69
      1: Wright, Philemon, Sr, and Philemon, Jr, 1806, 1837, 1853, 1869
    16: Buchanan papers, 1813–83
    21: Baring Brothers & Co., 1818–72
    47: Robertson collection, 1766–1852
  E: Roads, railways, and canals
    1: Merritt papers, 1775–1897
      Series 1: Merritt, Thomas, 1775–1836
      Series 2: Merritt, William Hamilton, 1804–62
    9: Gzowski, Sir Casimir S., 1845, 1852–71
  F: Military and naval figures
    53: Clinton, Sir William Henry, 1821–29
  I: Immigration, land, and settlement
    9: Hill collection, 1798–1942
    33: Keefer papers, 1817–72
    65: Sherwood, Adiel, 1836–46
    79: Anderson, Thomas B., 1846–50
  K: Education and cultural development
    2: Coventry, George, 1793–1865
    19: Robertson, Peter, 1847–54
MG 26
  A: Macdonald papers, 1832–91
  B: Mackenzie papers, 1852–92
    2: Letterbooks, 1872–83
  F: Tupper papers, 1843–1915
MG 27
  I: 1867–1896
    D: Cabinet ministers
      4: Cartier papers, 1835–73
      8: Sir Alexander T. Galt papers, 1858–91
      15: Sir Samuel Leonard Tilley, 1882
    E: Members of the House of Commons and the Senate
      5: Luther H. Holton, 1864
      30: Ferguson, Thomas Roberts, 1857–1964 (copies from originals in possession of C. S. Ferguson, London, Ont.)
    F: Provincial political figures
      2: W. H. Pope papers, 1860–79
    I: Correspondence of political figures
      17: James O'Reilly, 1869, 1873
  II: 1896–1921
    D: Cabinet ministers

    - 14: R. W. Scott papers, 1843–1913
- MG 28
  - III: Business establishments
    - 6: Gilmour and Hughson Limited, 1845–1926
    - 11: W. & J. Sharples Reg'd., 1854–1923
- MG 29
  - B: Economic development and social life
    - 13: Lowe, John, 1848–1912
  - F: North West Mounted Police, military units, and events
    - 13: Denison, George Taylor III, 1847–1925
  - G: Arts, letters, and education
    - 27: Morgan, Henry James, 1866–1913
- MG 30
  - D: Education and cultural development
    - 9: Johnson, George, 1855–1910
    - 62: Audet, Francis-Joseph, 1918–42
- RG 1
  - E: State records of the Executive Council
    - 1: Minute books, 1764–1867
    - 3: Upper Canada state papers, 1791–1841
    - 7: Submissions to council, 1841–67
    - 13: Blue Books, 1824–64
    - 14: Correspondence, 1769–1874
  - L: Land records of the Executive Council
    - 1: Minute books, 1787–1867
    - 3: Petitions, Upper Canada and Canada, 1791–1867
    - 3^{L}: Miscellaneous records, Quebec and Lower Canada, 1764–1842
    - 7: Miscellaneous records, 1765–1867
- RG 2
  - Series 1: Minutes and orders in council, 1867–1949
  - Series 2: Records, 1867–1930
- RG 4
  - A: Civil secretary's correspondence, 1760–1841
    - 1: S Series, 1760–1840
  - B: Miscellaneous records, 1763–1867
    - 28: Bonds, licences, and certificates, 1763–1867
    - 29: Militia records, 1774–1865
    - 36: Municipal records, 1830–67 Provincial Red Book, 1845
    - 37: Rebellion records, 1837–53
    - 48: Exploration journals, 1830, 1833
  - C: Provincial secretary's correspondence, 1765–1867
    - 1: Numbered correspondence, 1839–67
- RG 5
  - A: Civil secretary's correspondence, 1791–1840
    - 1: Upper Canada sundries, 1766–1840
  - B: Miscellaneous records, 1788–1866
  - C: Provincial secretary's correspondence, 1821–67
    - 1: Numbered correspondence, 1821–67
- RG 6
  - A1: General records, 1867–1952
  - C: Secretary of state for the provinces, 1867–73
    - 1: General correspondence, 1867–73
- RG 7
  - G1: Dispatches from the Colonial Office, 1784–1909
  - G9: Drafts of dispatches to the Colonial Office, 1792–1909
  - G10: Drafts of secret and confidential dispatches to the Colonial Office, 1856–1913
  - G12: Letter books of dispatches to the Colonial Office, 1799–1902
  - G16: Letter books, Upper Canada, 1793–1841
  - G17: Letter books, Canada, 1839–1910
    - A: Governor's internal letter books, 1839–1909
  - G20: Civil secretary's correspondence, 1841–1909
- RG 8
  - I: C series
    - A: Correspondence of the military secretary of the commander of the forces, 1767–1870
      - 1: Subject files, 1767–1870
      - 2: Letter books, 1796–1870
    - B: Records of the Canadian command, 1785–1883
      - 5: Militia rolls and pay lists, 1838–43
    - C: Records of the Nova Scotia command, 1762–1899
      - 18: Correspondence of the commanding officer in New Brunswick, 1844–71
    - D: Miscellaneous records, 1757–1896
      - 2: Order books, 1764–1894
      - 5: Miscellaneous records relating to the Fenian raids, 1866–70
- RG 9
  - I: Pre-confederation records
    - A: Adjutant General's Office, Lower Canada, 1776–1847
      - 3: Ordres généraux, 1805–46
    - B: Adjutant General's Office, Upper Canada, 1795–1846
      - 1: Correspondence, 1802–47
      - 4: Pensions and land grants, 1814–51
      - 5: Registers of officers, 1824–47
    - C: Adjutant General's Office, United Canada, 1846–69
      - 1: Correspondence, 1846–69
      - 4: General orders, 1846–68
      - 6: Register of officers, 1846–69

      - 8: Subject files, 1846–68
  - II: Post-confederation records
    - A: Deputy minister's office, 1867–1920
      - 1: Correspondence, 1867–1903
- RG 10
  - A: Administration records, period of imperial control, 1755–1860
    - 1: Governor general's and lieut.-governor's offices
    - 8: Civil secretary as superintendent general of Indian affairs
- RG 11
  - Series 2: Roads and bridges (general), 1765–1856
- RG 12
  - A: Department of Marine
    - 1: Shipping registers, 1787–1933
- RG 19
  - A: Minister of finance
    - 1: Correspondence
  - D: Department of the Inspector General and Department of Finance
    - 4: Records transferred from other departments, 1843–83
      - (a) Provincial secretary, C.E., 1843–67
        Provincial secretary, C.W., 1843–67
- RG 30: Canadian National Railways
- RG 31:
  - A1: Census records, 1825–71
- RG 68
  - 1: Registers and plan books, 1860–1955 (indexed)

Public Archives of Manitoba, Winnipeg. In 1884 the librarian of the Legislative Library of Manitoba began to assemble a small collection of manuscripts. In 1952 the government named an official archivist and in 1955 the archives became by law an official repository. In 1971 the archives contained about 2,100 feet. The oldest document, relating to the North West Company, is dated about 1795. As well as original material the PAM has an excellent collection of maps and microfilm of certain John A. Macdonald papers. The archives are arranged alphabetically by person and subject. The researcher is aided by a central file for all documents and by biographical files. For a listing of PAM material see, Public Archives of Manitoba, Preliminary Inventory, 1955.

The following documents were used in vol. X:

- Adams George Archibald, 1870–72. 2 feet, 6 inches
- Church of England registers, Diocese of Rupert's Land. Microfilm
  - St Andrew's Church
    - Records of baptisms, 1845–72
    - Records of burials, 1835–84
    - Records of marriages, 1860–83
  - St John's Church
    - Records of baptisms, 1813–79
    - Records of burials, 1821–75
    - Records of marriages, 1820–82
- Miss Davis' School. 10 inches
- John Inkster, 1837–76. 1 inch
- Alexander Morris, 1845–1911. 7 feet, 6 inches
  - Ketcheson Collection, 1845–1911. 6 cartons.
    PAM bought this collection in 1951 from Frederick G. Ketcheson who had obtained the papers from the estate of Edmund Montague Morris, son of Alexander Morris.
    - Correspondence, 1845–1911
    - Telegram and letter books, 1873–77
  - Lieutenant-governor's collection, 1872–88
    - Correspondence, 1872–77
    - Letter books, 1874–88
- Red River Settlement, 1832–70
  - Copies of miscellaneous letters and documents, 1832–36. 110 pages
  - Red River Census, 1832–70. 5 inches
  - Samuel Taylor, 1849–67. 127 pages
    - Journal kept at Moose Factory, 1849–63
    - Red River Settlement, 1863–67
- Louis Riel papers, 1860–1926. 2 feet, 11 inches
  - Correspondence and papers, 1860–1926.
    550 documents, 1869–85
  - Family papers, 1869–1923. 15 inches
- Alexander Ross family papers, 1810–1903. 10 inches
  - Correspondence and papers, 1810–1903
- Settlement and pioneers, *c.*1870–*c.*1920. 9 feet, 6 inches. This section is arranged alphabetically by name and place; correspondence, newspapers, memoirs, business papers.

Public Archives of Nova Scotia, Halifax. Founded in 1857 when the Nova Scotian government decided to preserve and arrange "the ancient records and documents illustrative of the History and progress of Society in this province," thus establishing the first provincial archives in Canada. The present fireproof building was officially opened on 14 Jan. 1931, and records were transferred from various government departments. The archives also contains court papers, municipal records, family and business papers, collections of societies such as the Nova Scotia Historical Society, community and church records, microfilm copies of deeds and wills from county registries of deeds and courts of probate, and a collection of Nova Scotian newspapers. For further information see: C. B. Fergusson, The Public Archives of Nova Scotia (PANS Bull., no.19, Halifax, 1963). For a further description of the collections used in the preparation of vol. X see: Catalogue or list of manuscript documents, arranged, bound and catalogued under the direction of the commissioner of public records . . . (Halifax, 1877; 2nd ed., 1886). Available for use at PANS are sections of an "Inventory of manuscripts" which is now being compiled for publication in 1972.

Collections of importance in the preparation of vol. X include:

- Private papers:
  - Mather Byles Almon papers
  - Bliss family papers
  - Enos Collins papers, 1817–1860
  - Pierce Stevens Hamilton diary, 1861–78
  - John Inglis papers
  - James William Johnston letters
  - Johnstone family papers
  - Joseph Howe papers
  - Beamish Murdoch papers
  - Simon Bradstreet Robie papers
  - Sir Charles Tupper papers
- Genealogies and compilations:
  - "Collection of genealogies of Nova Scotian families (Cumberland County)," compiled by Thornton Henry Lodge, 1954
  - "Pictou County cemeteries' list," compiled by Henry C. Ritchie, 1951, 1956
  - "Yarmouth genealogy, 1761–1913," compiled by George Stayley Brown
- Official records:
  - Community records, Truro Township book
  - Halifax County death registrations, June quarter, 1874; March quarter, 1877
  - Pictou County death certificates for the quarter ending 31 March 1877

Public Archives of Prince Edward Island, Charlottetown. The PAPEI was created by an act of the Legislative Assembly which received royal assent in 1964 and is located in the library building of Confederation Centre. The nucleus of the collection was documents received from various government offices, and material that had been stored in Province House. Funds for the operation of the archives are provided by an annual vote of the legislature, the archives being a division of the Department of the Provincial Secretary.

Materials used in the preparation of vol. X include:

- Henry Jones Cundall letter book, 27 March 1867–26 May 1871
- Robert Bruce Stewart and David Stewart letter book, no.1, 16 March 1821–21 Aug. 1834
- Prince Edward Island, Executive Council, Minutes, 1847–79

Queen's University Archives, Kingston, Ont. During the past century the Queen's University Archives has developed as a non-governmental repository with collections of private papers and records of national significance. Its holdings include the records of Queen's University from its founding in 1841, the personal papers of noted faculty members and of Canadians prominent in literature, politics, journalism, and business, and many family and business records pertaining to eastern Ontario.

Materials used in the preparation of vol. X include:

- William Macaulay papers
- Alexander Mackenzie papers
- Alexander Morris papers
- Edmund Morris papers
- Queen's University records, Correspondence series 1, Liddell correspondence
- James Williamson papers
- John Young papers

Saskatchewan Archives Board, Regina and Saskatoon. Created in 1945 by a provincial statute, The Archives Act, the Saskatchewan Archives Board is a joint university and government board which supervises the Saskatchewan archives. The archival repository has two offices situated at the University of Saskatchewan, one on the Regina campus and the other on Saskatoon's. The original collections of the SAB included manuscripts and documents of the government of the North-West Territories; this collection had been assembled by an archival service existing at the University of Saskatchewan since 1935. The repository contains about 15,000 feet of documents, private and official; the oldest date back to about 1800 but the largest part cover the period 1875–1960. SAB holds an important collection of microfilmed Saskatchewan newspapers, about 1,500 maps, more than 17,000 photographs, and a large number of pamphlets. There are also microfilm copies of documents from other archives containing material on Saskatchewan. For a list of the collections and documents of this repository see, SAB, Report, 1945–46 through to . . . 1970.

Since 1948 the archives has published a review, Saskatchewan History, appearing three times yearly. Among its other publications is: Saskatchewan executive and legislative directory, 1905–1970 (1971).

The following documents were used in preparing vol. X:

- Kennedy, Dan (Ochankugahe) papers. 64 articles by D. Kennedy on the history and legends of the Assiniboines (typescript copies and manuscripts)
- Saskatchewan Historical Society. Secretary,

1936–46, correspondence and documents, 1862–1946, clippings. 20 feet
  - 37: Hon. James McKay, Biographical note compiled by R. H. Leveson-Gower, Hudson's Bay Company, October 1943
  - 100: Correspondence and documents re Cypress Hills massacre

Supreme Court of Ontario
  - Regina v George Bennett, 1880. Judge's notes and testimony, 55 pages (photocopies; originals at the Supreme Court of Ontario, Registrar's office, Osgoode Hall, Toronto)

United Church Archives, Toronto. The Canadian Methodist Historical Society was organized in 1899, and the Presbyterian Historical Committee in 1917; the collections were consolidated in 1950 and the United Church Archives was constituted in its present form in 1953. Since that time, regional depositories have been established in each of the four western provinces, in Montreal, Halifax, and St John's, Nfld. Collections gathered by college librarians and private individuals have been consolidated in all of these centres. In 1967 a large collection of Methodist material relating to the Maritime provinces which had been gathered at Mount Allison University for almost a century was moved to and consolidated with a similar Presbyterian collection at Pine Hill College in Halifax.

The collection at Toronto is the largest, and includes correspondence of the home and foreign missionary societies of the denominations now within the United Church, as well as microfilm copies relating to Canada from the parent societies in Great Britain and the United States. The collection also contains the official records of the various bodies merged into the United Church and copies of almost all the denominational publications, papers of prominent individuals within these churches, some parish records for Ontario, pictures of home and overseas mission work, printed works relating to the history of the denomination, the archives of the Ryerson Press, and the official records and files of correspondence of the various boards, departments, and committees of the Canadian Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational, and Evangelical United Brethren churches.

Materials used in the preparation of vol. X include:

John Maclean collection
Egerton Ryerson papers
Canada Presbyterian Church, Acts and Proceedings of the General Assembly, 1870–75
Canada Presbyterian Church, Minutes of Synod, 1861–69
Methodist Church of Canada, Journal of Proceedings of the 1st General Conference, 1874, 2nd General Conference, 1878
Missionary Synod of Canada, Minutes, 1843–47
Presbyterian Church of Canada, Minutes of Synod, 1844–61
Presbyterian Church in Canada, Acts and Proceedings of the General Assembly, 1875–80
Presbyterian Church in Canada, Presbytery of Toronto, Minutes, 1875–80
United Presbyterian Church in Canada, Minutes of Synod, 1848–61
Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada, Minutes of Conference, 1834–74
Methodist Missionary Society (London), Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, records (available on microfilm)

University of Toronto Archives. Includes the manuscript and printed material produced by the operations of the university. The archives contains: general administrative records, created, for example, by offices of the president, the registrar, heads of faculties, etc.; minutes, correspondence, routine records of faculties and departments; publications by students, alumni, societies; publications about the University of Toronto; University of Toronto theses and dissertations; photographs and paintings; microfilms, tape recordings, film, etc., relating to the university. Finding aids are available within the archives, describing most of the accessioned material.

Materials used in the preparation of vol. X include:

Office of the Chief Accountant. Financial Records
  - 41: University quarterly accounts, September-December 1871
  - 109: Final report of the commission of inquiry of 1848 into the affairs of King's College and Upper Canada College
  - 117: King's College Council minute book, III, 1842–48

Sir Daniel Wilson's journal, Toronto, 1851–1892. (Typescript copy from original diary of the extracts pertaining to university affairs.)

University of Western Ontario Library, London, Ont. The library is the official depository for the Archives of the Society of Friends in Canada. The deposit of their papers began in 1926 and constituted the first major set of papers in the collection founded by Dr Fred Landon* and continued by Dr J. J. Talman and Robert Lee. The Regional History Department was formally organized in 1942 with Miss Elsie McLeod (Mrs Wilfred Jury) as head. The Regional History Collection is attempting to form a comprehensive archives on southwestern Ontario. Major holdings include court, educational, and municipal records for several counties centring on London; records of business firms; and personal, political, or literary papers of local personalities.

Major collections used in the preparation of vol. X include:

27: Ermatinger papers
28: Donnelly family papers
234: Proudfoot family papers (William Proudfoot journals, 1832–50)

ENGLAND

Hudson's Bay Company Archives, London. The HBC archives comprise over thirty thousand volumes and files of records dating from the founding of the company in 1670. The archives as constituted at present were established in 1932, and the work of organization proceeded thereafter [see R. H. G. Leveson Gower, "The archives of the Hudson's Bay Company," Beaver, outfit 264 (December 1933), 40–42, 64; Joan Craig, "Three hundred years of records," Beaver, outfit 301 (autumn 1970), 65–70]. A publishing programme was undertaken by the Hudson's Bay Record Society [see section II], and in 1949 the HBC and PAC arranged jointly to microfilm the records. Information on the PAC copies is found in PAC Report, 1950, 13–14; 1952, 16–18; 1953–54, 21–22; 1955–58, 44–46.

Documents from the following categories were used in the preparation of vol. X:

Section A: London office records
  A.1/: Minute books of the governor and committee
  A.5/: London correspondence books – outward
    General series, 1753–1871
  A.6/: London outward correspondence books – HBC official
  A.7/: London locked private letter books, 1823–75
  A.8/: London correspondence with the British government
  A.11/: London inward correspondence from HBC posts
  A.12/: London inward correspondence from governors of HBC territories
  A.16/: Officers' and servants' ledgers, account books, etc.
  A.30/: Lists of servants in Hudson's Bay, 1798–1816
  A32/: Servants' contracts
  A.33/: Commissioned officers' indentures and agreements
  A.34/: Servants' characters and staff records
Section B: North America trading post records
  B.3/a: Albany journals
  B.89/a: Île-à-la-Crosse journals
  B.89/b: Île-à-la-Crosse correspondence books
  B.99/a: Kenogamissi journals
  B.99/e: Kenogamissi reports on districts
  B.113/b: Fort Langley correspondence books
  B.113/c: Fort Langley correspondence inward
  B.135/e: Moose District reports
  B.223/b: Fort Vancouver correspondence books
  B.226/a: Fort Victoria post journals
  B.226/b: Fort Victoria correspondence books
  B.226/c: Fort Victoria correspondence inward
  B.239/c: York correspondence inward
  B.239/k: Northern Department of Rupert's Land, Minutes of council
  B.240/a: Fort Yukon journals
Section C: Records of ships owned or chartered by the HBC
  C.1: Ships' logs
Section D: Journals and correspondence books, etc., of governors-in-chief of Rupert's Land, commissioners, etc.
  D.4/: George Simpson's correspondence outward
  D.5/: George Simpson's correspondence inward
Section F: Records relating to companies connected with or subsidiary to the HBC
  F.4/: North West Company account books
Section G: Maps, both manuscript and published (not including maps which are attached to journals or other documents)
  G.1/: Manuscript charts

Public Record Office, London. For an introduction to the contents and arrangement of these archives see: Guide to the contents of the Public Record Office (3v., London, 1963–68).

The documentary series cited in vol. X include:

Admiralty
  Adm. 37: Ships' muster books. Series II (1804–42)
  Adm. 38: Ships' muster books. Series III (1793–1878)
Colonial Office [see R. B. Pugh, The records of the Colonial and Dominions offices (PRO Handbooks, 3, 1964)]
  CO 5: America and West Indies, original correspondence, etc. (1606–1807)

CO 42: Canada, original correspondence (1700–1922)
CO 60: Columbia, British, original correspondence (1858–71)
CO 188: New Brunswick, original correspondence (1784–1867)
CO 189: New Brunswick, entry books (1796–1867)
CO 194: Newfoundland, original correspondence (1696–1922)
CO 217: Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, original correspondence (1710–1867)
CO 218: Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, entry books (1710–1867)
CO 226: Prince Edward Island, original correspondence (1769–1873)
CO 305: Vancouver Island, original correspondence (1846–67)
CO 478: Vancouver Island, miscellanea (1863–65), blue books of statistics in three volumes
CO 537: Colonies, general: original correspondence: supplementary, 1759–1929

Foreign Office [see: Records of the Foreign Office 1782–1939 (PRO Handbooks, 13, 1969)]
FO 5: General correspondence, America, United States of. Series II (1793–1905)
FO 414: Confidential print, America, North, 1711–1941. Correspondence relating to the U.S. and Canada, and to Mexico (up to 1919 only)

War Office
WO 1: Correspondence, in-letters and papers (1755–1868). Includes original dispatches, letters, and papers addressed to the secretary-at-war, 1755–95, and to the secretary of state for war, 1794–1865. Also some bundles of correspondence addressed to the commander-in-chief
WO 25: Registers, various (1660–1938). Commissions, appointments, descriptions, returns of service, etc.
WO 32: Correspondence, registered papers, general series (1855–1964)
WO 55: Ordnance office, miscellanea (1568–1923)
WO 69: Returns, Artillery records of services, etc. (1765–1906)
WO 71: Judge Advocate General's office, courts martial, proceedings (1668–1956)

Various
PRO 30/6: Carnarvon papers (1833–98)

For copies in the PAC of documents in the Colonial Office of the PRO see PAC, Preliminary Inventory, Manuscript Group 11 (Ottawa, 1951).

SCOTT POLAR RESEARCH INSTITUTE, Cambridge. Established in 1920 as a centre of polar research and as a memorial to Captain R. F. Scott and his companions. Since 1957 it has been a sub-department within the Department of Geography in the University of Cambridge. The institute includes a museum, research laboratories, a library, and an extensive archives of manuscripts related to both polar regions. Around the nucleus of the Lefroy bequest (1941), which included papers of Sir John* and Lady Jane Franklin [GRIFFIN] and of Sophia Cracroft, the institute has built an important and growing collection of materials related to the exploration of northern Canada.

The following are the most important collections used in the preparation of vol. X:
MS 116/: Penny Craik gift, 1950
57/1–10: Letters from Sherard Osborn to William Penny, 1850–56
MS 248/: Lefroy bequest, 1941
121–122: Jane Franklin's two-volume journal August-September 1860, 1–5 Jan. 1861
160: Jane Franklin's journal, July-August 1846
163/3: Jane Franklin's journal notes, July-August 1860
242: Sophia Cracroft's journal at Sitka, 12 May–14 June 1870
247/73–96: Sophia Cracroft's letters home, 13 Dec. 1860–9 June 1862; 23 Jan.–18 July 1870
MS 395/: Pares loan. George Back's Arctic papers. (A large collection of journals, correspondence, notes, etc.)
MS 695/: Sophia Cracroft's letter home, February-April 1861
MS 768/: George H. Richards's private journal aboard HMS Assistance. 17 Aug. 1853–28 May 1854
MS 864/1: Émile-Frédéric de Bray, "Journal de bord de l'enseigne de vaisseau Émile-Frédéric de Bray à bord de la frégate anglaise 'La Resolue.' Expédition polaire de 1852–1853 envoyée à la recherche de Sir John Franklin."
MS 864/2–4: George de Bray, "Notice sur la participation de l'enseigne de vaisseau de Bray à l'expédition britannique de 1852–1854 envoyée à la recherche des navires de Sir John Franklin perdus dans les mers polaires," La Rochelle, 1926; copies of documentary and genealogical material relating to Émile de Bray

UNITED SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL, London. Formed in 1965, the USPG is responsible for continuing the work formerly carried on by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (incorporated by royal charter, 1701) and the Universities' Mission to Central Africa (founded, 1857). The archives is in the process of reorganizing and reclassifying some material. Thus classifications used by Canadian archives holding USPG microfilm do not always correspond to those of the archives itself. However indexes are available at USPG and most dated references are easily transferred. For copies of USPG archives documents in the PAC see: PAC, Preliminary Inventory, Manuscript Group 17 (Ottawa, 1967).

Documents from the following groups were used in preparing this volume:

Journal of proceedings of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Comprises bound and indexed volumes of the proceedings of the general meetings held in London from 1701, and four appendices, A, B, C, D (1701–1860) of which only the last two (1840–60) have references to Canada.

C/CAN: Unbound letters from Canada, 1752–1860. Letters from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Lower Canada, and Toronto groupings were used. Nominal card index is available at USPG.

D: Original letters received from 1850, bound in volumes. Handlist of writers and places, not alphabetical, available at USPG.

E: Reports from SPG missionaries from 1856, bound in volumes. Handlist available at USPG.

II. PRINTED PRIMARY SOURCES

A. OFFICIAL PUBLICATIONS AND CONTEMPORARY WORKS

[ARTHUR, GEORGE.] The Arthur papers; being the Canadian papers mainly confidential, private, and demi-official of Sir George Arthur, K.C.H. last lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada in the manuscript collection of the Toronto Public Libraries. Edited by Charles Rupert Sanderson. 3 vols. Toronto, 1957–59.

[BEGG, ALEXANDER.] Alexander Begg's Red River journal and other papers relative to the Red River resistance of 1869–1870. Edited with an introduction by William Lewis Morton. (Champlain Society publication, XXXIV.) Toronto, 1956.

BEGG, ALEXANDER, and WALTER R. NURSEY. Ten years in Winnipeg. A narration of the principal events in the history of the city of Winnipeg from the year A.D., 1870, to the year A.D., 1879, inclusive. Winnipeg, 1879.

[BLACKWOOD, FREDERICK TEMPLE, and HENRY HOWARD MOLYNEUX HERBERT.] Dufferin-Carnarvon correspondence, 1874–1878. Edited by Cornelis Willem de Kiewiet and Frank Hawkins Underhill. (Champlain Society publication, XXXIII.) Toronto, 1955.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

Blue Books, used for 1859–70 (copies in PABC).

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

Journals of the Legislative Assembly of the province of British Columbia . . . , used for 1876–79.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Debate on the subject of confederation with Canada reprinted from the Government Gazette Extraordinary of March, 1870. Victoria.

Journals of the Legislative Council of British Columbia . . . , used for 1868–70.

[BRUCE, JAMES, and ALBERT HENRY GEORGE GREY.] The Elgin-Grey papers, 1846–1852. Edited with notes and appendices by Arthur George Doughty. (PAC publication.) 4 vols. Ottawa, 1937.

CANADA

HOUSE OF COMMONS

House of Commons debates, used for 1867–80.

Journals of the House of Commons of the dominion of Canada . . . , used for 1867–74.

SENATE

Debates of the Senate . . . , used for 1872–79.

Sessional papers . . . of the dominion of Canada, used for I (1867–68)–XV (1882).

CANADA, PROVINCE OF

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

Debates. See Debates of the Legislative Assembly of United Canada.

Journals of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada . . . , used for 1841–67.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Journaux du Conseil législatif de la province du Canada, used for 1862–67.

Parliamentary debates, used for 1846–67 (microfilm project of the Canadian Library Association)

Parliamentary debates on the subject of the confederation of the British North American provinces. . . . Quebec, 1865; reprinted, Ottawa, 1961.

Sessional papers . . . of the Province of Canada, used for XVIII (1860)–XXVI (1866).

Statutes of the Province of Canada . . ., used for 1847–59.

The Canadian North-West, its early development and legislative records; minutes of the councils of the Red River Colony and the Northern Department of Rupert's Land. Edited by Edmund Henry Oliver. (PAC publication, 9.) 2 vols. Ottawa, 1914–15.

Champlain Society. "Founded in 1905, with headquarters in Toronto, for the purpose of publishing rare and inaccessible materials relating to the history of Canada. Its publications are issued only to elected members, limited in number. . . ." Publications related to vol. X include:

XIX: McLean's notes of twenty-five year's service (Wallace).

XXIV: Hargrave correspondence (Glazebrook).

XXVII: Loyalist narratives (Talman).

XXVIII: [Mactavish], Letters of Letitia Hargrave (MacLeod).

XXXIII: [Blackwood and Herbert], Dufferin-Carnarvon correspondence (de Kiewiet and Underhill).

XXXIV: Begg's Red River journal (Morton).

XLIV: Palliser papers (Spry).

Champlain Society. Ontario Series. The Champlain society was invited by the Ontario government to prepare and publish a series of documentary volumes "to preserve in printed form . . . a representative selection of the more interesting and significant records of the past. . . ." This series is sold through normal publishing channels. Publications relevant to vol. X include:

I: Valley of the Trent (Guillet).

V: Town of York, 1793–1815 (Firth).

VI: Muskoka and Haliburton (Murray).

VII: Valley of the Six Nations (Johnston).

VIII: Town of York, 1815–1834 (Firth).

Commission géologique du Canada. See Geological Survey of Canada

Debates of the Legislative Assembly of United Canada: volume I, 1841. Edited by Elizabeth Nish. (Debates of the Legislative Assembly of United Canada, 1841–1867, published under the direction of the Centre d'Étude du Québec and the Centre de recherche en histoire économique du Canada français. General editor, Elizabeth Nish.) Montreal, 1970.

Documentary history of education in Upper Canada from the passing of the Constitutional Act of 1791 to the close of Rev. Dr. Ryerson's administration of the education department in 1876. Edited by John George Hodgins. 28 vols. Toronto, 1894–1910.

Documents relating to the constitutional history of Canada, 1759–1791. Edited by Adam Shortt and Arthur George Doughty. Ottawa, 1907; second and revised edition, in two parts, Ottawa, 1918.

Documents relating to the constitutional history of Canada, 1791–1818. Edited by Arthur George Doughty and Duncan A. McArthur. Ottawa, 1914.

Documents relating to the constitutional history of Canada, 1819–1828. Edited by Arthur George Doughty and Norah Story. Ottawa, 1935.

Dufferin-Carnarvon correspondence. See: [Blackwood, Frederick Temple. . . .]

Elgin-Grey papers. See: [Bruce, James. . . .]

Fenety, George Edward. Political notes and observations; or, a glance at the leading measures that have been introduced and discussed in the House of Assembly of New Brunswick. . . . Fredericton, 1867.

Geological Survey of Canada / Commission géologique du Canada

Billings, Elkanah. Catalogues of the Silurian fossils of the island of Anticosti, with descriptions of some new genera and species. Montreal, London, New York, and Paris, 1866.

Dowling, Donaldson Bogart. General index to the reports of progress, 1863 to 1884. Ottawa, 1900.

Memoir 154: W. H. Twenhofel. Geology of Anticosti Island. Ottawa, 1928.

Report of progress from its commencement to 1863; illustrated by 498 wood cuts in the text, and accompanied by an atlas of maps and sections. (Geological Survey of Canada, director, William Edmond Logan.) Montreal, London, Paris, New York, 1863; reprinted with an introduction and appendix, 1865. [Commonly known as Geology of Canada.]

Report of progress for 1876–77. Montreal, 1878.

Great Britain, Parliament, 1857 (Session II)

House of Commons papers, XV, 224, 260

Report from the select committee on the Hudson's Bay Company; together with the proceedings of the committee, minutes of evidence, appendix and index.

[Hargrave, James.] The Hargrave correspondence, 1821–1843. Edited with introduction and notes by George Parkin de Twenebrokes Glazebrook. (Champlain Society publication, XXIV.) Toronto, 1938.

Hargrave, Letitia. See [Mactavish.]

Head, Francis Bond. A narrative. London, 1839. Republished as A narrative with notes by William Lyon Mackenzie. Edited with introduction by Sydney Francis Wise. (Carleton Library series, 43.) Toronto, Montreal, 1969.

[Howe, Joseph.] The speeches and public letters of Joseph Howe (based upon Mr. Annand's edition of 1858). Revised and edited by Joseph Andrew Chisholm. 2 vols. Halifax, 1909.

Hudson's Bay Record Society. Initiated in 1938 by the Hudson's Bay Company after classification of its London archives, begun in 1932, had progressed to the point where publication was feasible. Membership in the society is limited. Inquiries should be directed to: the Hon. Secretary, Beaver House, Great Trinity Lane, London, E.C.4, England.

PUBLICATIONS

General editor for vols. I–XXII, E. E. Rich; for vols. XXIII–XXV, K. G. Davies; for XXVI, A. M. Johnson. 26 vols. published to date. Vols. I–XII, issued in association with the Champlain Society, Toronto, were reprinted in 1968 by Kraus Reprint Division of Kraus-Thomson Organization Limited, Nendeln, Liechtenstein.

I: [Simpson, George.] Journal of occurrences in the Athabasca Department by George Simpson, 1820 and 1821, and report. Edited by Edwin Ernest Rich, with an introduction by Chester Martin. 1938.

II: [Robertson, Colin.] Colin Robertson's correspondence book, September 1817 to September 1822. Edited with an introduction by Edwin Ernest Rich, assisted by R. Harvey Fleming. 1939.

III: Minutes of council Northern Department of Rupert Land, 1821–31. Edited by R. Harvey Fleming, with an introduction by Harold Adams Innis. 1940.

IV: [McLoughlin, John.] The letters of John McLoughlin from Fort Vancouver to the governor and committee, first series, 1825–38. Edited by Edwin Ernest Rich, with an introduction by William Kaye Lamb. 1941.

VI: [McLoughlin, John.] The letters of John McLoughlin from Fort Vancouver to the governor and committee, second series, 1839–44. Edited by Edwin Ernest Rich, with an introduction by William Kaye Lamb. 1943.

VII: [McLoughlin, John.] The letters of John McLoughlin from Fort Vancouver to the governor and committee, third series, 1844–46. Edited by Edwin Ernest Rich, with an introduction by William Kaye Lamb. 1944.

X: [Simpson, George.] Part of dispatch from George Simpson, Esqr, governor of Ruperts Land to the governor & committee of the Hudson's Bay Company, London, March 1, 1829. Continued and completed March 24 and June 5, 1829. Edited by Edwin Ernest Rich, with an introduction by William Stewart Wallace. 1947.

XVI: [Rae, John.] John Rae's correspondence with the Hudson's Bay Company on Arctic exploration, 1844–1855. Edited by Edwin Ernest Rich, assisted by Alice M. Johnson, with an introduction by J. M. Wordie and R. J. Cyriax. 1953.

XVIII: [Black, Samuel.] A journal of a voyage from Rocky Mountain Portage in Peace River to the sources of Finlays Branch and North West Ward in summer 1824. Edited by Edwin Ernest Rich, assisted by Alice M. Johnson, with an introduction by R. M. Patterson. 1955.

XIX: [Colvile, Eden.] London correspondence inward from Eden Colvile, 1849–1852. Edited by Edwin Ernest Rich, assisted by Alice M. Johnson, with an introduction by William Lewis Morton. 1956.

XXI: Rich, History of the HBC. I: 1670–1763. [see section IV]

XXII: Rich, History of the HBC, II: 1763–1870.

XXIV: Northern Quebec and Labrador journals and correspondence, 1819–35. Edited by Kenneth Gordon Davies, assisted by Alice M. Johnson, with introduction by Glyndwr Williams. 1963.

Journal de l'Assemblée législative de la Province du Canada. . . . See Canada, Province of, legislative assembly, Journals. . . .

Journal de l'Instruction publique, Québec, Montréal. Monthly. I (1857)–XXIII (1879). Official publication of the Department of Public Instruction, published variously at Quebec and Montreal. It must not be confused with the Journal of Education which is also an official publication of the same department. They were completely independent journals, and neither was a translation of the other.

Journal of Education for Ontario, Toronto. A monthly publication which began, I (January 1848), as the Journal of Education for Upper Canada, it was the official publication of the province's department of education. Title changed in 1867 to the Journal of Education for Ontario which continued to XXX (July 1877).

[Langelier, Jean-Chrysostome.] List of lands granted by the crown in the province of Quebec from 1763 to 31st December 1890. Quebec, 1891.

[Logan et al.] Geology of Canada. See Geological Survey of Canada.

Lower Canada

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Journals of the House of Assembly of Lower-Canada, used for 1824–37.

SPECIAL COUNCIL

Journaux du Conseil spécial de la province du Bas-Canada, used for 1838–40.

Loyalist narratives from Upper Canada. Edited with introduction and notes by James John Talman. (Champlain Society publication, XXVII.) Toronto, 1946.

[McClure, Robert John LeMesurier.] The discovery of the north-west passage by H.M.S. "Investigator," Capt. R. M'Clure, 1850, 1851, 1852, 1853, 1854. Edited by Sherard Osborn. London, 1856.

[Macdonald, John Alexander.] The letters of Sir John A. Macdonald, 1836–1857. Edited by J. K. Johnson. —— 1858–1861. Edited by J. K. Johnson and Carole B. Stelmack. (PAC publications, The Papers of the Prime Ministers series, I, II.) Ottawa, 1968, 1969.

[McLean, John.] John McLean's notes of twenty-five year's service in the Hudson's Bay territory. Edited by William Stewart Wallace. (Champlain Society publication, XIX.) Toronto, 1932.

[Mactavish, Letitia.] The letters of Letitia Hargrave. Edited with introduction and notes by Margaret Arnett MacLeod. (Champlain Society publication, XXVIII.) Toronto, 1947.

Mandements, lettres pastorales et circulaires des évêques de Québec. Henri Têtu et Charles-Octave Gagnon, éditeurs. 4 vols. Québec, 1887–88. 13 vols. Québec, 1889–1955.

Manitoba

Statutes of the province of Manitoba . . ., used for 1873–78.

Manitoba: the birth of a province. Edited by William Lewis Morton. (Manitoba Record Society publication, I.) Altona, Man., 1965.

Manitoba Record Society publications. General editor, William David Smith.

I: Manitoba: birth of a province (Morton).

III: James Wickes Taylor correspondence (Bowsfield).

Morris, Alexander. The treaties of Canada with the Indians of Manitoba and the North-West Territories. . . . Toronto, 1880.

Murray, Alexander Hunter. Journal of the Yukon, 1847–48. Edited with notes by Lawrence Johnston Burpee. (PAC publication, 4.) Ottawa, 1910.

Muskoka and Haliburton, 1615–1875; a collection of documents. Edited with an introduction by Florence Beatrice Murray. (Champlain Society publication, Ontario series, VI.) Toronto, 1963.

New Brunswick

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Journals of the House of Assembly of the province of New Brunswick . . ., used for 1824–81.

Reports of the debates of the House of Assembly of the province of New Brunswick . . ., used for 1854–66.

Synoptic report of the proceedings of the House of Assembly of New Brunswick . . ., used for 1834–68.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Debates of the Legislative Council of New Brunswick, used for 1866.

Journals of the Legislative Council of the province of New Brunswick, used 1836–72.

Newfoundland

Blue books, used for 1832–74 (copies in PANL).

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Journal of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland . . ., used for 1834–63.

Nova Scotia

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Debates and proceedings of the House of Assembly . . . of the province of Nova Scotia, used for 1855–71.

Journal and proceedings of the House of Assembly of the province of Nova Scotia, used for 1836–68.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Journal of the proceedings of Her Majesty's Legislative Council of the province of Nova Scotia, used for 1836–67.

Ontario

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

Journals of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario . . ., used for 1867–72.

Sessional papers . . . of the province of Ontario, used for III (1870–71)–XIII (1881).

Statutes of the province of Ontario . . ., used for 1878, 1879.

The papers of the Palliser expedition, 1857–1860. Edited with an introduction and notes by Irene

Mary Spry. (Champlain Society publication, XLIV.) Toronto, 1968.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Debates and proceedings of the House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island, used for 1855–79.

Journal of the House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island, used for 1825–73.

Journal of the House of Assembly of the province of Prince Edward Island, used for 1874–79.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Debates and proceedings of the Legislative Council of Prince Edward Island, used for 1856–60, 1871–73.

Debates and proceedings of the Legislative Council of the province of Prince Edward Island, used for 1874–75.

Journal of the Legislative Council of Prince Edward Island, used for 1830–73.

Journal of the Legislative Council of the province of Prince Edward Island, used for 1874–75.

PROVOST, HONORIUS. Le séminaire de Québec: documents et biographies (Publications des archives du séminaire de Québec, II.) Québec, 1964.

PUBLIC ARCHIVES OF CANADA

NUMBERED PUBLICATIONS

4: Murray, Journal of the Yukon (Burpee).

9: Canadian North-West (Oliver).

THE PAPERS OF THE PRIME MINISTERS SERIES

I: [J. A. Macdonald], Letters (Johnson).

II: [J. A. Macdonald], Letters (Johnson and Stelmack).

OTHER PUBLICATIONS

[Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty).

Canadian directory of parliament (Johnson). [see section III]

Guide to Canadian ministries since confederation. [see section III]

Union list of manuscripts (Gordon). [see section III]

QUEBEC

A complete, descriptive list of Quebec government publications is found in Répertoire des publications gouvernementales du Québec de 1867 à 1964. André Beaulieu et al., éditeurs. Québec, 1968.

Department of Lands and Forests. See [Langelier, Jean-Chrysostome], List of lands. . . .

Department of Public Instruction. See Journal de l'Instruction publique.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

Journaux de l'Assemblée législative du Québec, used for 1875–80.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL

Journaux du Conseil législatif de la province de Québec, used for 1867–77.

[RYERSON, ADOLPHUS EGERTON.] "The story of my life," by the late Rev. Egerton Ryerson, D.D., LL.D., (being reminiscences of sixty years' public service in Canada). Edited by John George Hodgins. Toronto, 1883.

SCADDING, HENRY. Toronto of old: collections and recollections illustrative of the early settlement and social life of the capital of Ontario. Toronto, 1873. Republished as Toronto of old. Abridged and edited by Frederick Henry Armstrong. Toronto, 1966.

[TAYLOR, JAMES WICKES.] The James Wickes Taylor correspondence, 1859–1870. Edited by Hartwell Bowsfield. (Manitoba Record Society publication, III.) Altona, Man., 1968.

The town of York, 1793–1815: a collection of documents of early Toronto. Edited with an introduction by Edith Grace Firth. (Champlain Society publication, Ontario series, V.) Toronto, 1962.

The town of York, 1815–1834: a further collection of documents of early Toronto. Edited with an introduction by Edith Grace Firth. (Champlain Society publication, Ontario series, VIII.) Toronto, 1966.

TURCOTTE, LOUIS-PHILIPPE. Le Canada sous l'Union, 1841–1867. 2 vols. Québec, 1871–72; 2e édition, 1882.

UPPER CANADA

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Journal of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada . . ., used for 1821–40.

The valley of the Six Nations: a collection of documents on the Indian lands of the Grand River. Edited with an introduction by Charles M. Johnston. (Champlain Society publication, Ontario series, VII.) Toronto, 1964.

The valley of the Trent. Edited with an introduction and notes by Edwin Clarence Guillet. (Champlain Society publication, Ontario series, I.) Toronto, 1957.

B. NEWSPAPERS

Various sources have been used for discovering the titles and affiliations of newspapers during the period of this volume. These include: J. W. Dafoe, "Early Winnipeg newspapers," HSSM Papers, 3rd ser., no.3 (1947), 14–24; J. R. Harper, Historical directory of New Brunswick newspapers and periodicals (Fredericton, 1961); "Chronological list of Newfoundland newspapers in the public collections at the Gosling Memorial Library and Provincial Archives," compiled by Ian McDonald (copy deposited in the Reference Library, Arts and Culture Centre, St John's); Ella Naomi Tratt, "A survey and listing of Nova Scotian newspapers with particular reference to the period before 1867," unpublished MA thesis, Mount Allison University, Sackville, N.B., 1957 (copy in PANS); Catalogue of Canadian newspapers in the Douglas Library, Queen's University, compiled by L. C. Ellison et al. (Douglas Library Occasional Papers, 1, Kingston, 1969); Early Toronto newspapers, 1793–1867: a catalogue of newspapers published in the Town of York and the City of Toronto from the beginning to confederation, ed. E. G. Firth (Toronto, 1961); W. L. Cotton, "The press in Prince Edward Island," Past and present of Prince Edward Island . . ., edited by D. A. MacKinnon and A. B. Warburton (Charlottetown, [1906]), 112–21; R. L. Cotton, "Early press," Historic highlights of Prince Edward Island, ed. M. C. Brehaut (Prince Edward Island Hist. Soc. pamphlet, Charlottetown, 1955), 40–45; and Beaulieu et Hamelin, Journaux du Québec. Because this last includes such complete details on all the papers covered, full descriptions of the Quebec newspapers are not given in the following listing.

Acadian Recorder, Halifax. Published from 16 Jan. 1813 until 10 May 1930. The paper was a weekly from 1813 until 27 Aug. 1863, a tri-weekly from 5 Sept. 1863 until 1930, and a daily from 1868 until 1930.

British Colonist, Halifax. Its full name was British Colonist: A Literary, Political and Commercial Journal. Published from 25 June 1848 until 31 Dec. 1874 as a tri-weekly; a weekly was added in January 1849 and a daily edition later. From 11 Sept. 1851 until January 1855, the full title was British Colonist and North American Railway Journal.

British Colonist, Victoria. See Colonist

Brockville Recorder and the Eastern Johnstown and Bathurst Districts Advertiser, Brockville, Ont. Began publication on 16 Jan. 1821 as a weekly and became a daily on 10 Nov. 1873. Bought out the Times (Brockville) and on 1 Feb. 1918 became the Recorder and Times, which continued to be published in 1971.

Canadian Churchman, Toronto. See Church

Canadian Citizen, Ottawa. See Ottawa Citizen

Canadian Free Press, London, Ont. See London Free Press

Le Canadien, Québec. Published from 22 Nov. 1806 until 11 Feb. 1893.

Cariboo Sentinel, Barkerville, B.C. Published from 6 June 1865 to 30 Oct. 1875 although publication was suspended for several short periods. The paper was published at various times as a weekly, a semi-weekly, and a semi-monthly.

Central Canada Citizen, Ottawa. See Ottawa Citizen

Christian Guardian, Toronto. Published as a weekly at York (later Toronto) from 21 Nov. 1829 until 10 June 1925 when it was superseded by the New Outlook which ceased publication on 24 Feb. 1939. A general index of the Christian Guardian for the years 1829–67 is available at the United Church Archives, Toronto. A selective index for church news, general historical information, and genealogical information is in preparation for the period after 1867.

Church, Cobourg, Toronto, and Hamilton, Ont. Published as a weekly from 6 May 1837 to 25 July 1856. Began publication in Cobourg, then moved to Toronto from 11 July 1840 to 14 July 1843 when it returned to Cobourg only to move again to Toronto on 17 July 1846. Between 5 Aug. 1852 and 16 June 1853 the title was the Canadian Churchman. Between 3 Aug. 1855 and 25 July 1856 the Church was published in Hamilton.

Colonist, Victoria. Published under various titles from 11 Dec. 1858 to the present. Until 28 July 1860 the full name was the British Colonist; from 31 July 1860 to 23 June 1866, Daily British Colonist; from 25 June 1866 to 31 Dec. 1886, the Daily British Colonist and Victoria Chronicle; and from 1 Jan. 1887 to the present, Daily Colonist. The paper began as a weekly, then on 16 May 1859 a tri-weekly issue was begun. The weekly continued to 1888 as the Weekly British Colonist. The paper published five issues per week beginning on 31 July 1860, and after 16 Feb. 1861 became a full-scale daily.

Courier, St John's. See Morning Courier and General Advertiser

Le Courrier du Canada, journal des intérêts canadiens, Québec. Published from 2 Feb. 1857 to 11 April 1901.

Daily British Colonist and Victoria Chronicle. See Colonist

Daily Colonist, Victoria. See Colonist

Daily Ledger, St John's. See Public Ledger and Newfoundland General Advertiser

Daily Mail and Empire, Toronto. See Mail; Globe

Daily News, Saint John, N.B. See Morning News

Daily Telegraph, Saint John, N.B. See Telegraph

Eastern Chronicle, Pictou and New Glasgow, N.S. Its full name was Eastern Chronicle and Pictou County Advocate. Published from 1843 until 1865 as a weekly in Pictou and from 4 Jan. 1866 until 1953 as a semi-weekly in New Glasgow.

L'Événement, Québec. Published from 13 May 1867 to 31 March 1966.

Evening Standard, Victoria. See Victoria Daily Standard

Examiner, Charlottetown. Published from 7 Aug. 1847 until 1919 or 1920 when it was absorbed by the Guardian (Charlottetown). The Examiner was a weekly from 1847 until May 1877 when it became a daily only. A few months later the weekly edition was revived, and both editions continued.

Examiner, Toronto. Published as a weekly from 3 July 1838 until 29 Aug. 1855 when it merged with the Globe.

Gazette, Montreal. Began publication on 3 June 1778 and continued in 1971.

Globe, Toronto. Began as a weekly on 5 March 1844, became a semi-weekly 4 Nov. 1846, a tri-weekly, 3 July 1849, and a daily, 1 Oct. 1853. A second weekly series began 6 July 1849 and continued to 28 Jan. 1914; its title changed to Weekly Globe and Canadian Farmer on 5 Jan. 1877. A second semi-weekly series was published from 19 Oct. 1853 to 2 July 1855 when it became a tri-weekly which lasted until 1864. There was a second daily, the Evening Globe, from 19 Dec. 1861 to 20 July 1908. The Western Globe, published weekly in Toronto but issued from London, C.W., lasted from 16 Oct. 1845 until at least 1851. Title became the Globe and Mail when it merged with the Daily Mail and Empire (Toronto) on 23 Nov. 1936 and publication continued under this title in 1971.

Herald, Montreal. Published from 19 Oct. 1811 until 18 Oct. 1959.

Island Argus, Charlottetown. A weekly, published from 4 Nov. 1869 until it was absorbed by the Examiner on 25 Feb. 1881 when the name became the Examiner and Island Argus.

Islander, Charlottetown. Its full title was the Islander or Prince Edward Weekly Intelligencer and Advertiser until 21 Jan. 1853 when it became the Islander or Prince Edward Island Weekly Intelligencer and Advertiser. It was published from 2 Dec. 1842 until 1874 as a weekly. A new owner changed its title in 1872 to Prince Edward Islander: A Weekly Newspaper of General Intelligence. It was absorbed by the Patriot in 1874.

Journal de Québec. Published from 1 Dec. 1842 until 1 Oct. 1889.

Leader, Toronto. Began publication as a semi-weekly on 1 July 1852 and as a weekly on 7 July. A daily edition was added on 11 July 1853. The semi-weekly ceased publication in 1864 but the daily and weekly editions continued to 1878. The Leader absorbed several Toronto newspapers including, for a time, the Toronto Daily Patriot and Express.

London Advertiser, London, Ont. A daily, begun 27 Oct. 1863 as the London Evening Advertiser and Family Newspaper, its name changed to London Evening Advertiser on 23 May 1865 and to Daily Advertiser in the spring of 1869. On 4 Dec. 1880 its name became the London Advertiser. The Weekly Advertiser was begun in 1864, and its name had changed to Western Advertiser by 1873; in 1875 it combined with the Weekly Liberal (Toronto) to become the Western Advertiser and Weekly Liberal (London and Toronto), but by 1884 the title was again Western Advertiser.

London Free Press, London, Ont. Began publication as a weekly on 2 Jan. 1849 as the Canadian Free Press. A daily edition, the London Free Press and Daily Western Advertiser, began on 5 May 1855 and, except for a brief interruption in the late 1850s, continued in 1971. The Canadian Free Press continued as a weekly, probably until 6 March 1868.

Mail, Toronto. Began publication as a daily on 30 March 1872. Its name was changed to the Toronto Daily Mail on 2 Aug. 1880. The paper merged with the Empire (Toronto) to become the Daily Mail and Empire on 7 Feb. 1895. A weekly edition was also published. The Daily Mail and Empire merged with the Globe to become the Globe and Mail on 23 Nov. 1936.

Mainland Guardian, New Westminster, B.C. Published on a semi-weekly basis from 28 Aug. 1869 until 21 Aug. 1889 or later (21 Aug. 1889 issue was the last available to DCB for examination but does not contain a notice that it was the last issue of the paper).

Manitoba Free Press, Winnipeg. Founded on 30 Nov. 1872 as a weekly, it became a daily on 6 July 1874. On 2 Dec. 1931 its name changed to the Winnipeg Free Press, still published in 1971.

Mélanges religieux, Montréal. Published from 14 Dec. 1840 until 6 July 1852.

La Minerve, Montréal. Published from 9 Nov. 1826 to 27 May 1899.

Le Monde canadien, Montréal. Published between 19 Sept. 1867 and 5 July 1900.

Montreal Daily Witness. Published from 13 Aug. 1860 until 11 July 1913.

Montreal Gazette. See Gazette

Montreal Herald. See Herald

Montreal Herald and Daily Commercial Gazette. See Herald

Montreal Weekly Witness. Its prospectus appeared on 15 Dec. 1845 with publication beginning on 5 Jan. 1846 and continuing to May 1938.

Morning Chronicle, Halifax. Published under various titles from 24 Jan. 1844 to the present. It began as a tri-weekly, then expanded in 1877 to a daily; it was also printed as a weekly from 1844 until 1912. The name changed to the Halifax Chronicle on 22 Jan. 1927; on 1 Jan. 1949 the paper merged with the Herald and its name became the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, which was shortened to the Chronicle-Herald on 26 Dec. 1959.

Morning Chronicle, Quebec. Published from 1847 to 1888.

Morning Courier and General Advertiser, St John's. Published from 1844 to 1878 as a semi-weekly. The name was changed in 1856 to the Courier.

Morning Freeman, Saint John, N.B. This paper began in 1849 as a weekly under the title St. John Weekly Freeman. The Morning Freeman was added in 1851 as a tri-weekly and lasted until 1878. The weekly continued until 1884.

Morning News, Saint John, N.B. Published from 1839 until 1884 but under a great variety of titles beginning with Commercial News and General Advertiser. The paper was, at different times, a weekly, a tri-weekly, and a daily. Used in this volume were issues appearing as the Morning News, the Saint John Daily News, and the Daily News.

Morning Telegraph, Saint John, N.B. See Telegraph

New Brunswick Reporter, Fredericton. A weekly, published from November 1844 until December 1902. Its full title was the New Brunswick Reporter and Fredericton Advertiser until its last years when it was the Reporter and Fredericton Advertiser.

Newfoundlander, St John's. Published from 1806 until 1884 although issues are only available from 1827. The paper was a weekly, then a semi-weekly.

Newfoundland Patriot, St John's. Published from 1834 to 1878 as a weekly, although issues are available only from 1854. In 1842 the name was changed to the Patriot & Terra Nova Herald; in 1877, it became the Patriot and Catholic Herald for four issues only; in 1878, it was the Patriot and Terra Nova Advocate.

New Nation, Winnipeg. Published from 7 January to September 1870. It was founded by Americans living in Red River, after the Nor'Wester ceased publication; in March 1870 it became the organ of Louis Riel*'s provisional government.

Nor'Wester, Winnipeg. The first newspaper published in the Red River Settlement, it was founded "in opposition to the existing order." It was published from 28 Dec. 1859 to 24 Nov. 1869.

Le Nouveau Monde, Montréal. See Le Monde canadien

Novascotian, Halifax. Published under various names from 1824 until 1925. From 1824 until 1892 the full name was Novascotian and Colonial Herald, then in 1892 it became a weekly called the Nova Scotian and Weekly Chronicle which lasted until 13 Oct. 1922. At that time the format changed and it was the Nova Scotian: Nova Scotia's Farm and Home Journal until it ceased publication.

L'Opinion publique, Montréal. Published from 16 Dec. 1892 until 16 June 1893.

Ottawa Citizen. Began as a weekly in the autumn of 1844 as the Packet, but changed to the Ottawa Citizen on 22 Feb. 1851 under which title it was still published in 1971. A semi-weekly edition was added on 4 Oct. 1859, which became a daily edition on 15 May 1865. The weekly continued to 1916 with the name changing to the Central Canada Citizen from 1909–12, then to the Canadian Citizen.

Patriot, Charlottetown. Published from 8 July 1865 until the present. The Patriot began as a weekly and became a semi-weekly in 1867; in mid-1874 it reverted to being a weekly but in 1875 it began to feature both editions again. Later it became a daily. [This paper is sometimes said to have begun publication on 5 July 1859 because it was numbered consecutively from the Protestant and Evangelical Witness which began on that date and ceased publication on 1 July 1865. For various reasons, including religious affiliation and financial support, it is not strictly correct to assume that the Patriot was a continuation of the Protestant.]

Patriot, Kingston, Ont., and Toronto. Began publication as a weekly in Kingston in 1828 as the Patriot and Farmer's Monitor. Moved to York (Toronto) on 7 Dec. 1832. A semi-weekly edition began in November 1833 and continued to April 1852; in March 1834 the title was changed to the Patriot, and in 1839 to the Toronto Patriot. In April 1850 a daily edition was added entitled the Toronto Daily Patriot and Express; it continued to 1855 and was absorbed, for a time, by the Leader (Toronto). The weekly ceased publication in 1878.

Patriot, St John's. See Newfoundland Patriot

Le Pays, Montréal. Published between 15 Jan. 1852 and 26 Dec. 1871.

Pilot and Journal of Commerce, Montreal. Appeared under various titles between 5 March 1844 and 25 March 1862.

Le Pionnier de Sherbrooke. Published from 13 Oct. 1866 until 11 May 1902.

Protestant and Evangelical Witness, Charlottetown. See Patriot

Public Ledger and Newfoundland General Advertiser, St John's. Published from 1820 to 1882 first as a semi-weekly, then as a tri-weekly, and finally as a daily in 1859, when it became the Daily Ledger.

Royal Gazette, Charlottetown. Published from 1791 to the present. This paper began as a semi-monthly entitled Royal Gazette, and Miscellany of the Island of Saint John published by the king's or queen's printer, and subsequently it became a weekly.

Royal Gazette and Newfoundland Advertiser, St John's. Published from 1807 to 1924 as a weekly, although issues are only available from 1810. In 1926 the paper became the Newfoundland Gazette which continues to the present.

Saint John Daily News. See Morning News

St. John Daily Telegraph and Morning Journal. See Telegraph

Standard, Winnipeg. See Weekly Manitoban and Herald of Rupert's Land and the North-Western Territory

Telegraph, Saint John, N.B. This paper, begun as the Weekly Telegraph, was published from 27 Sept. 1862 until July 1923, when it became the Telegraph-Journal which still exists as a daily. It was published at various times as a weekly, a semi-weekly, and a daily under a great many titles. The titles appearing in this volume include the Morning Telegraph, the Daily Telegraph, the St. John Daily Telegraph and Morning Journal, and the Telegraph-Journal.

Telegraph-Journal, Saint John, N.B. See Telegraph

Times, Halifax. Published under various names from 3 June 1834 until 1880: it was a weekly entitled the Times from 1834 until 27 June 1848. It became the New Times on 3 July until 30 December when it merged with the Courier to become the Times and Courier until 1867. In that year it merged with the Evening Reporter and became the Evening Reporter and Daily & Tri-weekly Times; finally on 13 Oct. 1879 it became the New Times and Reporter and lasted only one more year.

Times and General Commercial Gazette, St John's. Published from 29 Aug. 1832 until 23 March 1895 mainly as a semi-weekly but at times as a weekly.

Toronto Daily Mail. See Mail

Toronto Daily Patriot and Express. See Patriot

Toronto Patriot. See Patriot

Victoria Daily Standard. Published from 20 June 1870 until 4 Aug. 1888 as a daily. Was replaced by the Evening Standard (Victoria) which continued until sometime in 1889.

Victoria Gazette. Published from 25 June 1858 until 30 July 1860. Began as a semi-weekly which continued until 24 July 1858; on 28 July became the Daily Victoria Gazette which existed until 26 October. On 28 October reverted to Victoria Gazette as a tri-weekly lasting until 26 Nov. 1859. On 5 Dec. 1859 a new tri-weekly appeared under the same title and continued to 30 July 1860. A weekly issue appeared briefly on two occasions.

Weekly British Colonist, Victoria. See Colonist

Weekly Globe and Canadian Farmer, Toronto. See Globe

Weekly Manitoban and Herald of Rupert's Land and the North-Western Territory, Winnipeg. An independent liberal paper, it was founded on 15 Oct. 1870 and remained a weekly until 1874. It became the Standard from 28 Nov. 1874 until 20 Nov. 1875. Publication ceased in 1882.

Western Globe, London, Ont. See Globe

III. REFERENCE WORKS

ALLAIRE, JEAN-BAPTISTE-ARTHUR. Dictionnaire biographique du clergé canadien-français. 6 vols. Montréal, 1910–34.

ARMSTRONG, FREDERICK HENRY. Handbook of Upper Canadian chronology and territorial legislation. London, Ont., 1967.

AUDET, FRANCIS-JOSEPH. Les députés de Montréal (ville et comtés), 1792–1867. Montréal, 1943.

Australian dictionary of biography. General editor, Douglas Pike. 3 vols. Melbourne, 1966–69. [Two volumes covering the period 1788–1850 were published, 1966–67, and the first volume for the period 1851–1890 was published in 1969.] In progress.

Beaulieu, André, et Jean Hamelin. Les journaux du Québec de 1764 à 1964. (Les cahiers de l'Institut d'histoire, 6.) Québec et Paris, 1965.

A bibliography of the Prairie provinces to 1953. Compiled by Bruce Braden Peel. Toronto, 1956. —— supplement. Compiled by Bruce Braden Peel. Toronto, 1963. [New edition in progress.]

Boase, Frederic. Modern English biography, containing many thousand concise memoirs of persons who have died between the years 1851–1900 with an index of the most interesting matter. 3 vols. and 3 supplements. Privately printed in England, 1892–1921; reprinted [London], 1965.

British Museum general catalogue of printed books. (Photolithographic edition to 1955.) 263 vols. London, 1961–66.

Canada, an encyclopædia of the country: the Canadian dominion considered in its historic relations, its natural resources, its material progress, and its national development. Edited by John Castell Hopkins. 6 vols., Toronto, 1898–1900. Also, Index topical and personal to Canada: an encyclopædia of the country. Toronto and London, 1900.

The Canada directory for 1857–1858; containing names of professional and business men, and of the principal inhabitants. . . . Montreal, 1857.

The Canadian directory of parliament, 1867–1967. Edited by J. K. Johnson. (PAC publication.) Ottawa, 1968.

The Canadian parliamentary companion. Published in Quebec, 1862 and 1863, in Montreal from 1864 to 1874, and in Ottawa from 1875. Appeared irregularly from 1862, then annually from 1871. Became the Canadian parliamentary guide . . . early in the 20th century. Editors during the period of vol. X of the DCB were Henry James Morgan until 1875, then Charles H. MacKintosh.

The Catholic encyclopedia, an international work of reference . . . of the Catholic church. Edited by C. G. Herbermann et al. 15 vols., index, 1 supplement. New York, 1907–22.

Chadwick, Edward Marion. Ontarian families; genealogies of United-Empire-Loyalist and other pioneer families of Upper Canada. 2 vols. Toronto, 1894–98.

Classified digest of the records of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, 1701–1892. London, 1893.

Commemorative biographical record of the county of York, Ontario; containing biographical sketches of prominent and representative citizens and many of the early settled families. Toronto, 1907.

Cornish, George Henry. Cyclopædia of Methodism in Canada: containing historical, educational, and statistical information. . . . 2 vols. Toronto and Halifax, 1881–1903.

A cyclopædia of Canadian biography: being chiefly men of the time. Edited by George MacLean Rose. (Rose's national biographical series, I, II.) Toronto, 1886, 1888.

Dent, John Charles. The Canadian portrait gallery. 4 vols. Toronto, 1880–81.

Desjardins, Joseph. Guide parlementaire historique de la province de Québec, 1792 à 1902. Québec, 1902.

Dictionary of American biography [to 1928]. Edited by Allen Johnson and Dumas Malone. 20 vols., index. New York, 1928–37. 2 supplements [to 31 Dec. 1940], New York 1944, 1958. New edition, comprising 22 vols. in 11, New York, 1959. Concise DAB, New York, 1964. In progress.

Dictionary of national biography [to 1900]. Edited by Leslie Stephen and Sidney Lee. 63 vols.; supplement, 3 vols.; index and epitome. London, 1885–1903. 6 supplements for the 20th century. Concise DNB. 2 vols., 1952, 1961. In progress.

A directory of the members of the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia, 1758–1958. With an introduction by Charles Bruce Fergusson. (PANS publication, Nova Scotia series, II.) Halifax, 1958.

The dominion annual register and review for . . . 1878. —— 1879. —— 1880–1881. Edited by Henry James Morgan et al. Montreal, 1879, 1880, 1882.

The encyclopedia of Canada. Edited by William Stewart Wallace. 6 vols. Toronto, 1935–37. Newfoundland supplement. Edited by Robert Harold Blackburn. Toronto, 1949.

Gauthier, Henri. Sulpitiana. Montréal, 1926.

Great Britain, admiralty. The navy list . . . (London), used for 1813, 1844–77.

Guide to Canadian ministries since confederation, July 1, 1867–January 1, 1957. (PAC publication.) Ottawa, 1957. [Revision in progress.]

Guide to the principal parliamentary papers relating to the dominions, 1812–1911. Prepared by Margaret I. Adam et al. Edinburgh and London, 1913.

Harper, John Russell. Historical directory of New Brunswick newspapers and periodicals. Fredericton, 1961.

Le Jeune, Louis-Marie. Dictionnaire général de biographie, histoire, littérature, agriculture, commerce, industrie et des arts, sciences, mœurs, coutumes, institutions politiques et religieuses du Canada. 2 vols. Ottawa, 1931.

Morgan, Henry James. Bibliotheca Canadensis: or, a manual of Canadian literature. Ottawa, 1867; republished, Detroit, 1968.

——— Sketches of celebrated Canadians, and persons connected with Canada, from the earliest period in the history of the province down to the present time. Quebec and London, 1862.

Morice, Adrien-Gabriel. Dictionnaire historique des Canadiens et des Métis français de l'Ouest. Kamloops, B.C., Saint-Sauveur, Qué., and Saint-Boniface, Man., 1908.

Notices nécrologiques de la Congrégation des Oblats de Marie-Immaculée. 8 vols. Paris, 1860–1939.

Notman, William, and Fennings Taylor. Portraits of British Americans, with biographical sketches. 3 vols. Montreal, 1865–68.

O'Byrne, William Richard. A naval biographical dictionary; comprising the life and services of every living officer in Her Majesty's Navy, from the rank of admiral of the fleet to that of lieutenant. London, 1849.

Patents of Canada ... [1824–1855]. 2 vols. Toronto, 1860–65.
I: From 1824 to 1849. 1860.
II: From 1849 to 1855. 1865.

Place-names and places of Nova Scotia. With an introduction by Charles Bruce Fergusson. (PANS publication, Nova Scotia series, III.) Halifax, 1967.

Political appointments and elections in the Province of Canada from 1841 to 1860. Edited by Joseph-Olivier Coté. 1st ed., Quebec, 1860. ——from 1841 to 1865. 2nd ed., Ottawa, 1866. —— and appendix from 1st January, 1866, to 30th June, 1867, and index. Edited by Narcisse-Omer Coté. Ottawa, 1918.

Political appointments, parliaments and the judicial bench in the Dominion of Canada, 1867 to 1895. Edited by Narcisse-Omer Coté. Ottawa, 1896.

Public Archives of Nova Scotia Publications, Nova Scotia series:
II: Directory of N.S. MLAs (Fergusson).
III: Place-names of N.S. (Fergusson).

Roy, Pierre-Georges. Les avocats de la région de Québec. Lévis, Qué., 1936.

——— Fils de Québec. 4 vols. Lévis, Qué., 1933.

——— Les juges de la province de Québec. Québec, 1933.

A standard dictionary of Canadian biography; the Canadian who was who. Edited by Charles George Douglas Roberts and Arthur L. Tunnell. 2 vols. Toronto, 1934–38.

A statutory history of the steam and electric railways of Canada, 1836–1937, with other data relevant to operation of Department of Transport. Compiled by Robert Dorman. Ottawa, 1938.

Tanguay, Cyprien. Dictionnaire généalogique des familles canadiennes depuis la fondation de la colonie jusqu'à nos jours. 7 vols. [Montréal], 1871–90.

Union list of manuscripts in Canadian repositories. Edited by Robert S. Gordon et al. Ottawa, 1968. [Revision in progress.]

Walbran, John T. British Columbia coast names, 1592–1906, to which are added a few names in adjacent United States territory, their origin and history with map and illustrations. Ottawa, 1909.

Wallace, William Stewart. The Macmillan dictionary of Canadian biography. 3rd edition, revised and enlarged. London, Toronto, and New York, 1963.

Watters, Reginald Eyre. A check list of Canadian literature and background materials, 1628–1950, in two parts. Toronto, 1959. [New edition in progress.]

Watters, Reginald Eyre, and Inglis Freeman Bell. On Canadian literature, 1806–1960: a check list of articles, books, and theses on English-Canadian literature, its authors, and language. Toronto, 1966.

IV. STUDIES (books and theses)

Abbott, Maude Elizabeth [Seymour]. History of medicine in the province of Quebec. Toronto, 1931; McGill University publication, series VIII, no. 63, 1932.

Ahern, George et Michael Joseph. Notes pour servir à l'histoire de la médecine dans le Bas-Canada depuis la fondation de Québec jusqu'au commencement du XIXe siècle. Québec, 1923.

Atherton, William Henry. Montreal, 1535–1914. 3 vols. Montreal, Vancouver, and Chicago, 1914.
I: Under the French régime, 1535–1760.
II: Under British rule, 1760–1914.
III: Biographical.

Audet, Louis-Philippe. Histoire du conseil de l'Instruction publique de la province de Québec, 1856–1964. Montréal, 1964.

——— Le système scolaire de la province de Québec. 6 vols. Québec, 1950–56.

Beck, James Murray. The government of Nova Scotia. (Canadian government series, 8.) Toronto, 1957.

Begg, Alexander. History of the North-West. 3 vols. Toronto, 1894–95.

Bolger, Francis William Pius. Prince Edward Island and confederation, 1863–1873. Charlottetown, 1964.

Boon, Thomas Charles Boucher. The Anglican Church from the Bay to the Rockies; a history of the ecclesiastical province of Rupert's Land and its dioceses from 1820 to 1950. Toronto, 1962.

Borthwick, John Douglas. History and biographical gazetteer of Montreal to the year 1892. Montreal, 1892.

——— Montreal, its history, to which is added biographical sketches, with photographs, of many of its principal citizens. Montreal, 1875.

Campbell, Robert. A history of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, St. Gabriel Street, Montreal. Montreal, 1887.

Canada and its provinces; a history of the Canadian people and their institutions. Edited by Adam Shortt and Arthur George Doughty. 23 vols. Toronto, 1913–17.

Canadian Centenary Series. William Lewis Morton, executive editor; Donald Grant Creighton, advisory editor.
7: Craig, Upper Canada.
9: MacNutt, Atlantic provinces.
10: Careless, Union of the Canadas.
12: Morton, Critical years.

Canadian Government Series. General editors, Robert MacGregor Dawson, 1946–58; James Alexander Corry, 1958–61; Crawford Brough Macpherson, 1961– .
5: MacKinnon, Government of PEI.
7: Hodgetts, Pioneer public service.
8: Beck, Government of Nova Scotia.
14: Donnelly, Government of Manitoba.

Canadian Studies in History and Government Series. Edited by James Maurice Stockford Careless, 1958–60; Kenneth William Kirkpatrick McNaught, 1960–65; Goldwin Sylvester French, 1965– .
1: Moir, Church and state in Canada West.
2: Thompson, French shore problem in Nfld.
3: Cornell, Alignment of political groups.
7: Gunn, Political history of Nfld.
8: Wilson, Clergy reserves of Upper Canada.
14: Ormsby, Emergence of the federal concept.

Canniff, William. The medical profession in Upper Canada, 1783–1850. An historical narrative, with original documents relating to the profession, including some brief biographies. Toronto, 1894.

Careless, James Maurice Stockford. Brown of The Globe. 2 vols. Toronto, 1959–1963.
I: The voice of Upper Canada, 1818–1859. 1959.
II: Statesman of confederation, 1860–1880. 1963.

——— The union of the Canadas: the growth of Canadian institutions, 1841–1857. (Canadian centenary series, 10.) Toronto, 1967.

Carrière, Gaston. Histoire documentaire de la Congrégation des Missionnaires Oblats de Marie-Immaculée dans l'Est du Canada. 9 vols. Ottawa, 1957–70.

Carroll, John. Case and his cotemporaries; or, the Canadian itinerants' memorial: constituting a biographical history of Methodism in Canada, from its introduction into the province, till the death of the Rev. William Case in 1855. 5 vols. Toronto, 1867–77.

Chapais, Thomas. Cours d'histoire du Canada. 8 vols. Québec et Montréal, 1919–34.

Christie, Robert. A history of the late province of Lower Canada, parliamentary and political, from the commencement to the close of its existence as a separate province. . . . 6 vols. Quebec and Montreal, 1848–55.

Chronicles of Canada series. Edited by George McKinnon Wrong and Hugh Hornby Langton.
25: Duclos de Celles, Patriotes of 1837.
26: Grant, Tribune of N.S., Howe.
28: Colquhoun, Fathers of confederation.
31: Wood, All afloat.

Clark, Andrew Hill. Three centuries and the Island, a historical geography of settlement and agriculture in Prince Edward Island, Canada. Toronto, 1959.

Coats, Robert Hamilton, and R. Edward Gosnell. Sir James Douglas. (Makers of Canada series, anniversary edition, IX.) London and Toronto, 1926.

Colquhoun, Arthur Hugh Urquhart. The fathers of confederation; a chronicle of the birth of the dominion. (Chronicles of Canada series, 28.) Toronto, 1921.

Cornell, Paul Grant. The alignment of political groups in Canada, 1841–1867. (Canadian studies in history and government series, 3.) Toronto, 1962.

Craig, Gerald Marquis. Upper Canada: the formative years, 1784–1841. (Canadian centenary series, 7.) Toronto, London, and New York, 1963.

Creighton, Donald Grant. John A. Macdonald, the young politician. Toronto, 1952.

——— John A. Macdonald, the old chieftain. Toronto, 1955.

——— The road to confederation; the emergence of Canada: 1863–1867. Toronto, 1964.

David, Laurent-Olivier. Les patriotes de 1837–1838. Montréal, [1884].

Davin, Nicholas Flood. The Irishman in Canada. London and Toronto, 1877; reprinted Shannon, Eire, 1969.

Denison, Merrill. Canada's first bank; a history of the Bank of Montreal. 2 vols. Toronto and Montreal, 1966–67. Translated into French as La première banque au Canada; histoire de la Banque de Montréal by Paul A. Horguelin and Jean-Paul Vinay. 2 vols. Toronto, 1966–67.

Dent, John Charles. The last forty years: Canada since the union of 1841. 2 vols. Toronto, 1881.

——— The story of the Upper Canadian rebellion; largely derived from original sources and documents. 2 vols. Toronto, 1885.

Donnelly, Murray Samuel. The government of Manitoba. (Canadian government series, 14.) Toronto, 1963.

Drolet, Antonio. La ville de Québec, histoire municipale; III: de l'incorporation à la Confédération (1833–1867). (SHQ, Cahiers d'histoire, 19.) Québec, 1967.

Duclos de Celles, Alfred. The "Patriotes" of '37; a chronicle of the Lower Canadian rebellion. Translated from the French by William Stewart Wallace. (Chronicles of Canada series, 25.) Toronto, 1916.

Fauteux, Ægidius. Patriotes de 1837–1838. Montréal, 1950.

Giraud, Marcel. Le Métis canadien. Son rôle dans l'histoire des provinces de l'Ouest. (Travaux et mémoires de l'Institut d'ethnologie, XLIV.) Paris, 1945.

Grant, William Lawson. The tribune of Nova Scotia; a chronicle of Joseph Howe. (Chronicles of Canada series, 26.) Toronto, 1915.

Greenhill, Basil, and Ann Giffard. Westcountrymen in Prince Edward's Isle: a fragment of the great migration. London and Toronto, 1967.

Gregg, William. History of the Presbyterian Church in the dominion of Canada, from the earliest times to 1834; with a chronological table of events to the present time, and map. Toronto, 1885.

Gunn, Gertrude E. The political history of Newfoundland, 1832–1864. (Canadian studies in history and government series, 7.) Toronto, 1966.

Hannay, James. History of New Brunswick. 2 vols. Saint John, N.B., 1909.

——— Lemuel Allan Wilmot and Sir Leonard Tilley. (Makers of Canada series, anniversary edition, VIII.) London and Toronto, 1926.

Hargrave, Joseph James. Red River. Montreal, 1871.

Harris, Reginald V. The Church of Saint Paul in Halifax, Nova Scotia: 1749–1949. Toronto, 1949.

History of the county of Middlesex, Canada. From the earliest time to the present; containing an authentic account of many important matters relating to the settlement, progress and general history of the county; and including a department devoted to the preservation of personal and private records, etc. Toronto and London, Ont., 1889.

History of Toronto and county of York, Ontario; containing an outline of the history of the dominion of Canada; a history of the city of Toronto and the county of York, with the townships, towns, villages, churches, schools; general and local statistics; biographical sketches, etc., etc. 2 vols. Toronto, 1885.

Hodgetts, John Edwin. Pioneer public service; an administrative history of the united Canadas, 1841–1867. (Canadian government series, 7.) Toronto, 1955.

Hunter, Andrew Frederick. A history of Simcoe County. 2 vols. Barrie, Ont., 1909; reprinted, 1 vol. in 2 parts, Barrie, Ont., 1948.

Landmarks of Toronto; a collection of historical sketches of the old town of York from 1792 until 1833 and of Toronto from 1834 to [1914]. Edited by John Ross Robertson. 6 vols. Toronto, 1894–1914.

Lareau, Edmond. Histoire de la littérature canadienne. Montréal, 1874.

Lawrence, Joseph Wilson. The judges of New Brunswick and their times. Edited by Alfred Augustus Stockton. Saint John, N.B., 1907.

Lewis & Dryden's marine history of the Pacific northwest; an illustrated review of the growth and development of the maritime industry, from the advent of the earliest navigators to the present time, with sketches and portraits of a number of well known marine men. Edited by E. W. Wright. Portland, Ore., 1895; reprinted, New York, 1961.

Literary history of Canada: Canadian literature in English. Edited by Carl Frederick Klinck et al. Toronto, 1965.

Longley, James Wilberforce. Joseph Howe and Sir Charles Tupper. (Makers of Canada series, anniversary edition, VIII.) London and Toronto, 1926.

MacKinnon, Frank [Francis Perley Taylor]. The government of Prince Edward Island. (Canadian government series, 5.) Toronto, 1951.

MacMillan, John C. The history of the Catholic church in Prince Edward Island from 1835 till 1891. Quebec, 1913.

MacNutt, William Stewart. The Atlantic provinces: the emergence of colonial society, 1712–1857. (Canadian centenary series, 9.) Toronto, 1965.

——— New Brunswick, a history: 1784–1867. Toronto, 1963.

Makers of Canada series, anniversary edition. Illustrated under the direction of Arthur George Doughty and edited by William Lawson Grant. London and Toronto, 1926.
VI: Shortt, Sydenham.
VIII: Longley, Howe; Longley, Tupper; Hannay, Wilmot; Hannay, Tilley.
IX: Coats and Gosnell, Douglas.

Martin, Chester. Empire & commonwealth, studies in governance and self-government in Canada. Oxford, 1929.

Middleton, Jesse Edgar. The municipality of Toronto, a history. 3 vols. Toronto and New York, 1923.

Millman, Thomas Reagh. Jacob Mountain, first lord bishop of Quebec, a study in church and state, 1793–1825. (University of Toronto Studies, History and economics series, X.) Toronto, 1947.

Moir, John Sargent. Church and state in Canada West; three studies in the relation of denominationalism and nationalism, 1841–1867. (Canadian studies in history and government series, 1.) Toronto, 1959.

Monet, Jacques. The last cannon shot; a study of French-Canadian nationalism, 1837–1850. Toronto, 1969.

Morice, Adrien-Gabriel. A critical history of the Red River insurrection after official documents and non-Catholic sources. Winnipeg, 1935.

——— Histoire de l'Église catholique dans l'Ouest canadien du lac Supérieur au Pacifique (1659–1915). 4 vols. Saint-Boniface, Man., et Montréal, 1921–23.

——— History of the Catholic Church in western Canada from Lake Superior to the Pacific (1659–1895). 2 vols. Toronto, 1910.

——— The history of the northern interior of British Columbia formerly New Caledonia [1660 to 1880]. Toronto, 1904.

Morton, Arthur Silver. A history of the Canadian west to 1870–71; being a history of Rupert's Land (the Hudson's Bay Company's territory) and of the North-West Territory (including the Pacific slope). London, [1939].

Morton, William Lewis. The critical years: the union of British North America, 1857–1873. (Canadian centenary series, 12.) Toronto, 1964.

——— Manitoba, a history. 1st edition, Toronto, 1957; 2nd edition, Toronto, 1967.

Ormsby, Margaret Anchoretta. British Columbia: a history. Toronto, 1958.

Ormsby, William G. The emergence of the federal concept in Canada, 1839–1845. (Canadian studies in history and government series, 14.) Toronto, 1969.

Ouellet, Fernand. Histoire économique et sociale du Québec, 1760–1850, structures et conjoncture. (Histoire économique et sociale du Canada français.) Montréal et Paris, 1966. [Translation in progress.]

Pascoe, Charles Frederick. Two hundred years of the S.P.G.: an historical account of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, 1701–1900 (based on a digest of the society's records). 2 vols. London, 1901.

Prowse, Daniel Woodley. A history of Newfoundland from the English, colonial, and foreign records. London, and New York, 1895; revised edition, 1896.

Rich, Edwin Ernest. The history of the Hudson's Bay Company 1670–1870. Volume I: 1670–1763; Volume II: 1763–1870. (Hudson's Bay Record Society publications, XXI, XXII.) London, 1858–59. Another edition, 3 vols., Toronto, 1960. A copy of this work available in the PAC contains notes and bibliographical material omitted from the printed version.

Robertson, Ian Ross. "Religion, politics, and education in Prince Edward Island from 1856 to 1877." Unpublished MA thesis for McGill University. Montreal, 1968.

Ross, Victor, and A. St L. Trigge. A history of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, with an account of the other banks which now form part of its organization. 3 vols. Toronto, 1920–34.

Roy, Joseph-Edmond. Histoire du notariat au Canada depuis la fondation de la colonie jusqu'à nos jours. 4 vols. Lévis, Qué., 1899–1902.

Rumilly, Robert. Histoire de la province de Québec. 41 vols. parus. Montréal, 1940– .

Saunders, Edward Manning. Three premiers of Nova Scotia: the Hon. J. W. Johnstone, the Hon. Joseph Howe, the Hon. Charles Tupper, M.D., C.B. Toronto, 1909.

Savaète, Arthur. Voix canadiennes; vers l'abîme. 12 vols. Paris, n.d.

The shield of Achilles: aspects of Canada in the Victorian age/Le bouclier d'Achille: regards sur le Canada de l'ère victorienne. Edited by William Lewis Morton. Toronto and Montreal, 1968.

Shortt, Adam. Lord Sydenham. (Makers of Canada series, anniversary edition, VI.) London and Toronto, 1926.

Sissons, Charles Bruce. Egerton Ryerson: his life and letters. 2 vols. Toronto, 1937–47.

Société historique de Québec. cahiers d'histoire
19: Drolet, Ville de Québec.

Société historique du Saguenay. publications.
21: Tremblay, Histoire du Saguenay.

Stanley, George Francis Gilman. The birth of western Canada: a history of the Riel rebellions. London, 1936; Toronto, 1960.

——— Louis Riel. Toronto, 1963.

The storied province of Quebec; past and present. Edited by William Wood et al. 5 vols. Toronto, 1931–32.

Swainson, Donald Wayne. "The personnel of politics; a study of the Ontario members of the second federal parliament." Unpublished phd thesis for the University of Toronto. 1968.

Tassé, Joseph. Les Canadiens de l'Ouest. 2ᵉ éd., 2 vols. Montréal, 1878.

Thompson, Frederic Fraser. The French shore problem in Newfoundland: an imperial study. (Canadian studies in history and government series, 2.) Toronto, 1961.

Travaux et mémoires de l'institut d'ethnologie, Paris.
XLIV: Giraud, Le Métis canadien.

Tremblay, Victor. Histoire du Saguenay depuis les origines jusqu'à 1870. (Publications de la SHS, 21.) Chicoutimi, Qué., 1968.

Waite, Peter Busby. The life and times of confederation, 1864–67: politics, newspapers, and the union of British North America. Toronto, 1962; 2nd edition, with corrections, 1962.

Wallace, Frederick William. Wooden ships and iron men: the story of the square-rigged merchant marine of British North America, the ships, their builders and owners, and the men who sailed them. London, 1924; New York, 1925; Boston, 1937.

Wilson, [George] Alan. The clergy reserves of Upper Canada, a Canadian mortmain. (Canadian studies in history and government series, 8.) Toronto, 1968.

Wood, William. All afloat; a chronicle of craft and waterways. (Chronicles of Canada series, 31.) Toronto, 1914.

V. JOURNALS AND STUDIES (articles)

The Beaver. Winnipeg. Publication of the HBC. Monthly until March 1925; thereafter quarterly. I (outfit 250, 1920)– . Index for I (outfit 250, 1920)–outfit 284 (March 1954) published at unknown date.

British Columbia Historical Quarterly. Victoria. Quarterly, I (1937)–XV (1951) then semiannually to XXI (1957–58) which is the last volume to date. Published by the Provincial Archives of British Columbia in cooperation with the British Columbia Historical Association.

Bulletin des recherches historiques. Lévis, Québec. Monthly from 1895 to 1945 from which date some issues were published together; became a quarterly in 1951 until publication was suspended in 1956; thereafter published irregularly. Journal of archaeology, history, biography, bibliography, numismatology, etc. I (1895)– . Index: I (1895)–XXXI (1925). 4 vols. Beauceville, 1925–26. For subsequent years see manuscript index in ANQ. In addition, a nominal index for the same years is being prepared in the Dictionary offices. Founded by Pierre-Georges Roy*, the BRH became in March 1923 the journal of the ANQ (formerly APQ and AQ).

Les Cahiers des Dix. Montréal. I (1936)– . Annual review published by "Les Dix," a group of historians who formed a legal association on 6 Aug. 1935.

The Canadian Antiquarian and Numismatic Journal. Montreal. 1 (July 1872)–13 (1886); 2nd series, 1 (July 1889)–3 (May 1894); 3rd series, 1 (1898)–13 (1916); 4th series, I (1930)– . Founded in 1872 by the Canadian Numismatic and Antiquarian Society to publish reports of its activities and the results of its research (numismatics, collecting coins and medals, archaeology, and history). Publication was suspended in 1884, 1887–June 1889, 1895–96, 1901, and 1903–7.

Canadian Historical Association/La Société historique du Canada. Ottawa. The aims of the association are "to encourage historical research and public interest in history; to promote the preservation of historic sites and buildings, documents, relics, and other significant heirlooms of the past; to publish historical studies and documents as circumstances may permit." Publications include: annual reports, 1915– , and historical booklets.

The Canadian Historical Review. Toronto. Quarterly, I(1920)– . General Index, I(1920)–X(1929); XI(1930)–XX(1939); XXI(1940)–XXX(1949). Each issue includes a current bibliography of publications in English and French – a continuation of the annual Review of historical publications relating to Canada, edited by George MacKinnon Wrong, Hugh Hornby Langton, and William Stewart Wallace. I(for 1896)–XXII(for 1917 and 1918). Indexes for I–X, XI–XX.

CANADIAN CATHOLIC HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION/SOCIÉTÉ CANADIENNE D'HISTOIRE DE L'ÉGLISE CATHOLIQUE. Report/Rapport. Ottawa. This bilingual society, founded 3 June 1933, annually publishes French and English volumes with entirely different contents. I(1933–34)– (1965). Separate index for 1933–1957 [1960]. After 1965, the society discontinued publication of the Report and published instead Study Sessions/Sessions d'étude.

Canadian Journal. Toronto. Publication of the Canadian Institute which became the Royal Canadian Institute in 1914. Began as the Canadian Journal: a repertory of industry, science and art; and a record of the proceedings of the Canadian Institute, I (1852–53)–III (1854–55). Title was modified to the Canadian Journal of Industry, Science and Art, new series, I (1856)–XI (1866–67) and to the Canadian Journal of Science, Literature and History, XII (1868–70)–XV (1876–77). Superseded by the Proceedings of the Canadian Institute, Toronto, being a continuation of "The Canadian Journal of Science, Literature and History," third series, I (1879–83)–VII (1888–89). Merged for a few years with the Canadian Institute, Transactions, then published irregularly for a time as Canadian Institute, Proceedings, new series, I(1895–98). Published as Royal Canadian Institute, Proceedings, third series or series IIIa, I (1935–36)– .

Dalhousie Review. Halifax. Quarterly publication of Dalhousie University. I (1921–22)– .

HISTORICAL AND SCIENTIFIC SOCIETY OF MANITOBA. Winnipeg. Incorporated in 1879, the society was founded by historians and businessmen to encourage science and to make Manitoba known. Since its founding the society has had numerous publications. These include: Report, I (1880)–XXVII (1906); several series known as Transactions, 1 (Oct. 1882)–72 (Nov. 1906); new series, 1 (Nov. 1924)–5 (July 1930); 3rd series, 1 (1944–45)– (the title of these transactions varies: Publication, 1–2, 4–6; Transactions, 5–72; new series, 1–5; Papers, 3rd series); Manitoba History, I (March 1946)– . HSSM also published Manitoba historical atlas; a selection of facsimile maps, plans, and sketches from 1612 to 1969. Edited by John Warkentin and Richard I. Ruggles. Winnipeg, 1970.

"The journal of Arthur Thomas Bushby, 1858–1859." Edited by Dorothy Blakey Smith. BCHQ, XXI (1957–58), 83–160.

NOVA SCOTIA HISTORICAL SOCIETY. Collections. Halifax. 36 vols. to date. I (1878)– . Title Report and Collections was used in 1878 and in 1882–83.

Ontario History. Toronto. Originally published annually as Ontario Historical Society, Papers and Records, I(1899)–XXXVIII(1946). The title was changed to Ontario History with XXXVIII(1946). Quarterly publication began with XLI(1949) and continues to the present. Indexes can be found in three of the volumes: for I–XX in XX(1923); for I–XXXII in XXXII(1937); for XXXIII–XLIII in XLIII (1951). A cumulative index which is constantly updated can be purchased from the Ontario Historical Society.

ONTARIO LAND SURVEYORS ASSOCIATION. Annual Report. Toronto. Organized in 1886, the association began its publications in that year: Proceedings of the association of provincial land surveyors of Ontario at its first annual meeting. . . . Title varied after incorporation of the association in 1892 until 1912 when the publications began to appear as the Ontario Land Surveyors Association, Annual Report, which continued in 1971. General indexes are available in the 1914, 1925, 1935, 1945, 1955, 1960, and 1965 volumes. Various biographical indexes also appear in the reports of 1934, 1949, 1957, and 1965. The Annual Report, 1964 contains an index of all papers published from 1886.

Revue de l'université d'Ottawa. Ottawa. I (1931)– . Quarterly publication of the University of Ottawa. Publishes articles in French or English on the Bible, theology, canon and civil law, history, philosophy, science, and the arts. From 1932 to 1960 the review published in its Section spéciale particularly specialized articles in theology, canon law, and philosophy. General indexes are published for 1931–40, 1941–50, 1951–60.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA / SOCIÉTÉ ROYALE DU CANADA. Proceedings and transactions. Under the patronage of the Marquess of Lorne, the society was formed in 1882 for the encouragement of literature and science in Canada. Originally the society was composed of five sections – two for literature and three for sciences. The annual Mémoires of Section I and the Transactions of Section II include historical articles. First series: I (1882–83)–XII (1894). Second series: I (1895)–XII (1906). Third series: I (1907)–LVI (1962). Fourth series: I (1963)– . There are also index volumes.

Social History, a Canadian review / Histoire sociale, revue canadienne. Ottawa. 1 (April 1968)– . A semi-annual publication of the University of Ottawa and Carleton University. Published under the direction of an interdisciplinary committee from various Canadian universities. Concentrates exclusively on the social history of Canada and other countries.

SOCIÉTÉ CANADIENNE DE L'HISTOIRE DE L'ÉGLISE CATHOLIQUE. See CANADIAN CATHOLIC HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

SYLVAIN, PHILIPPE. "Libéralisme et ultramontanisme au Canada français; affrontement idéologique et doctrinal (1840–1865)," Shield of Achilles (Morton), 111–38, 220–55.

Contributors

Andre, John. Town planner, Borough of York, Ontario.
William Bent Berczy [in collaboration with J. R. Harper].

Andrews, Cater Wilson. Professor of biology, Memorial University of Newfoundland, St John's, Newfoundland.
William Jackman [in collaboration with G. M. Story].

Armstrong, Frederick H. Associate professor of history, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario.
George Anthony Barber. John Birrell. Thomas Clarkson. Charles Hunt. Ellis Walton Hyman. Benjamin Lyman. Donald McDonald. Andrew Mercer. Charles-Séraphin Rodier. Charles Roger. Jacques-Félix Sincennes. David Torrance.

Audet, Louis-Philippe. Professeur à la retraite, Saint-Bruno-de-Montarville, Québec.
Pierre-Urgel Archambault. Jean-Baptiste dit Jean-Philippe Boucher-Belleville. Cyrille Delagrave. Patrick Delaney. Jean-Baptiste Dupuy. Césaire Germain. Edward Hale. Léon Kérouac. Louis Lacoste. Étienne Mayrand. Hector Peltier. François-Joseph-Victor Regnaud. Louis-David Roy.

Bailey, Alfred Goldsworthy. Professor emeritus of history, University of New Brunswick, Fredericton, New Brunswick.
Joseph Marshall de Brett Maréchal, Baron d'Avray.

Baker, John Norman Leonard. Emeritus fellow, Jesus College, Oxford, England.
Sir Robert John Le Mesurier McClure.

Barker, Diane M. Manuscript editor, Dictionary of Canadian Biography/Dictionnaire biographique du Canada, University of Toronto Press, Ontario.
Enos Collins [in collaboration with D. A. Sutherland]. James Forman [with P. R. Blakeley]. John Geddie [with P. R. Blakeley].

Barnard, Julienne. Sillery, Québec.
Édouard Quertier.

Beck, J. Murray. Professor of political science, Dalhousie University, Halifax, Nova Scotia.
John Alexander Barry. Joseph Howe.

Bélanger, Noël, ptre. Professeur d'histoire, Université du Québec à Rimouski, Québec.
Pierre-Alexis Tremblay.

Betts, E. Arthur. Archivist, Maritime Conference, United Church of Canada, Halifax, Nova Scotia.
John Stewart.

Blakeley, Phyllis R. Assistant provincial archivist, Public Archives of Nova Scotia, Halifax, Nova Scotia.
William Blowers Bliss. James Cochran. James Forman [in collaboration with D. M. Barker]. John Geddie [with D. M. Barker]. Mary Eliza Herbert. Henry How. George Moir Johnston. Andrew Shiels.

Blakey Smith, Dorothy. Formerly assistant archivist, Provincial Archives of British Columbia, Victoria, British Columbia.
Ovid Allard. Edward Graham Alston. Arthur Thomas Bushby. Robert William Weir Carrall. John Evans. Lumley Franklin. Robert Ker. William Alexander Mouat.

Boissonnault, Charles-Marie. Écrivain, Québec, Québec.
Joseph Painchaud.

Bond, Courtney C. J. Formerly head, Canadian Section, National Map Collection, Public Archives of Canada, Ottawa, Ontario.
Edward Van Cortlandt. John Gilmour.

Bonenfant, Jean-Charles. Professeur de droit, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
René-Édouard Caron. Sir George-Étienne Cartier. Jacques Crémazie. Bernard Devlin. Eugène-Philippe Dorion. Magloire Lanctôt. Louis-Siméon Morin. John Buckworth Parkin. Louis Renaud. Louis-Philippe Turcotte.

Boon, Thomas C. B. Former archivist of Rupert's Land (Anglican Church), Winnipeg, Manitoba.
Henry Budd.

Bouchard, Antoine, ptre. Professeur agrégé de musique, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Joseph Casavant.

Bovey, John A. Provincial archivist, Provincial Archives of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba.
Lord Gordon Gordon.

Bowsfield, Hartwell. University archivist; lecturer in history, York University, Downsview, Ontario.
Alexander Christie. Francis Evans Cornish. Jean-Baptiste Lépine. Joseph Rolette (jr). Bernard Rogan Ross. Enos Stutsman.

Boylan, Douglas Bruce. Provincial archivist, Public Archives of Prince Edward Island, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island.
Francis Kelly. Alexander Laird.

Brock, Daniel James. Graduate student in history, University of Toronto, Ontario.
William E. Niles. John Talbot [in collaboration with J. J. Talman].

Buggey, Susan. National Historic Sites Service, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Ottawa, Ontario.
Isabella Binney Cogswell.

Burnside, Albert. Minister, Victoria Village United Church, Toronto, Ontario.
Francis Metherall.

Burroughs, Peter. Chairman, Department of history, Dalhousie University, Halifax, Nova Scotia.
John Arthur Roebuck.

Cameron, Wendy. Toronto, Ontario.
Charles Rubidge.

CARELESS, J. M. S. Professor of history, University of Toronto, Ontario.
George Bennett. George Brown. David Christie.

CARRIÈRE, GASTON, O.M.I. Historien des Oblats au Canada, secrétaire du Centre de recherche en histoire religieuse du Canada, Séminaire universitaire Saint-Paul, Ottawa, Ontario.
Flavien Durocher. Marie-Germain-Émile Eynard. Joseph-Bruno Guigues. Lucien-Antoine Lagier. Louis-Étienne-Delille Reboul.

CHABOT, RICHARD. Chargé de cours d'histoire du Canada, Université du Québec à Montréal, Québec.
Robert Nelson [in collaboration with J. Monet and Y. Roby].

CHALIFOUX, JEAN-PIERRE. Directeur, Service des publications officielles, Bibliothèque des sciences sociales, Université de Montréal, Québec.
Robert Lea MacDonnell. Andrew Robertson.

CHASSÉ, BÉATRICE. Archiviste, Archives nationales du Québec, Québec.
Antoine Légaré. John Maguire.

CLANCEY, MARY ELLEN DUBÉ. Secondary school teacher, Chester, Nova Scotia.
William H. Townsend.

COGSWELL, FREDERICK WILLIAM. Professor of English, University of New Brunswick, Fredericton, New Brunswick.
May Agnes Early (Fleming).

COLEMAN, MARGARET. Researcher, National Historic Sites Service, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Ottawa, Ontario.
Malcolm Cameron.

CONNERS, IBRA LOCKWOOD. Ottawa, Ontario.
David Fife.

COOKE, ALAN GORDON RICHARD. Assistant librarian and curator of manuscripts, Scott Polar Research Institute, Cambridge, England.
Jane Griffin (Lady Franklin). Richard King.

COOPER, JOHN IRWIN. Professor emeritus of history, McGill University, Montreal, Quebec; visiting professor, University of Guelph, Ontario.
John C. Becket. John Bethune. William Taylor. Hubert-Joseph Tétreau.

CORNELL, PAUL GRANT. Professor of history, University of Waterloo, Ontario.
John Ross. John Simpson.

COSBIE, WARING GERALD. Historian for the Toronto General Hospital, Toronto, Ontario.
William Rawlins Beaumont.

COUTU, JEAN. Professeur d'histoire de l'art, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Amable Gauthier.

CRAIG, G. M. Professor of history, University of Toronto, Ontario.
Marshall Spring Bidwell.

CREIGHTON, PHYLLIS. Research assistant, Dictionary of Canadian Biography/Dictionnaire biographique du Canada, University of Toronto Press, Ontario.
Edward Troy. John Robert Willis.

CRÊTE-BÊGIN, LOUISE. Licenciée en histoire, Sainte-Foy, Québec.
Charles-Christophe Malhiot.

CROSS, MICHAEL S. Dean of men, Victoria University; associate professor of history, University of Toronto, Ontario.
Caleb Hopkins. Daniel McLachlin.

DANSEREAU, ANTONIO, P.S.S. Archiviste, Collège de Montréal, Québec.
Jacques-Victor Arraud. Antoine Mercier.

DAVIDSON, R. I. K. Editor (social sciences), University of Toronto Press, Ontario.
George Monro. John Taylor.

DAVIS, WILLIAM L., S.J. Professor emeritus of history, Gonzaga University, Spokane, Wash., U.S.A.
Pierre-Jean De Smet.

DEMPSEY, HUGH A. Director of history, Glenbow Alberta Institute, Calgary, Alberta.
Onistah-sokaksin. Sotai-na.

DÉSILETS, ANDRÉE. Professeur d'histoire, Université de Sherbrooke, Québec.
Elkanah Billings [in collaboration with Yvon Pageau]. Marie-Julie-Marguerite Céré de La Colombière, dite sœur Mance. Lemuel Cushing. Albine Gadbois, dite Marie de Bonsecours. George Benson Hall. Marie-Anne-Marcelle Mallet. Isidore-Édouard-Candide Masson. Luc-Hyacinthe Masson. Marc-Damase Masson.

DEVEREUX, E. J. Associate professor of English, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario.
John Williams McCoubrey.

DODGE, ERNEST S. Director, Peabody Museum, Salem, Massachusetts, U.S.A.
Charles Francis Hall [with C. C. Loomis].

DOLMAN, CLAUDE ERNEST. Professor of microbiology, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, British Columbia.
James Bovell.

DORGE, LIONEL. Assistant professeur d'histoire, Université du Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba.
John Black. Jean-Baptiste Thibault.

DUBUC, ALFRED. Directeur, Département d'histoire, Université du Québec à Montréal, Québec.
William Molson.

DYSTER, BARRIE. Secretary, Community Aid Abroad, New South Wales, The Glebe, N.S.W., Australia.
George Duggan. John William Gamble. William Charles Gwynne. Thomas Dennie Harris. Francis Henry Medcalf. Duncan Milloy.

EDDY, EARL B. Port Credit, Ontario.
James Porter.

FALARDEAU, JEAN-CHARLES. Professeur titulaire de sciences sociales et de lettres, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Étienne Parent.

FARRIS, ALLAN L. Professor of church history, Knox College, University of Toronto, Ontario.
Michael Willis.

FERGUSSON, CHARLES BRUCE. Archivist, Public Archives of Nova Scotia, Halifax, Nova Scotia; associate professor of history, Dalhousie University, Halifax, Nova Scotia.
Maria Frances Ann Morris (Miller). Hugo Reid.

FERLAND, LÉONIE, S.G.M. Maison provinciale des sœurs grises, Montréal, Québec.
Scholastique Gosselin.

Firth, Edith. Associate Head, Metropolitan Toronto Central Library, Toronto, Ontario.
William Lawson.

Flemming, David B. Research historian, National Historic Sites Service, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Ottawa, Ontario.
Thomas Louis Connolly. Donald Charles MacLean.

Fleury, Alcide. Correcteur d'épreuves, Arthabaska, Québec.
Louis-Eusèbe Richard.

French, Goldwin Sylvester. Professor of history, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario.
Robert Alder. James Richardson. Shah-wun-dais (John Sunday). Conrad Vandusen.

Gagan, David P. Assistant professor of history, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario.
George Taylor Denison.

Gagnon, Jean-Pierre. Étudiant gradué en histoire, University of Toronto, Ontario.
Marc-Pascal de Sales Laterrière.

Gagnon, Serge. Professeur d'histoire, Université d'Ottawa, Ontario.
Alexis Mailloux.

Galarneau, Claude. Professeur d'histoire, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Jacques Dorion.

Garon, André. Étudiant gradué en histoire, Université d'Ottawa, Ontario.
Thomas Cushing Aylwin. James Leslie.

Gates, Lillian Francis. Ithaca, New York, U.S.A.
John Doel. Donald M'Leod.

Glazebrook, George Parkin de Twenebrokes. Formerly professor of history, University of Toronto, Ontario.
Frances Browne (Stewart). William Cawthra.

Globensky, Yvon. Chef de division, Ministère des Richesses Naturelles du Québec, Québec.
Hortense Globensky (Prévost).

Godfrey, Michael, lt. comdr. r.n. (retd). Record agent, East Molesey, Surrey, England.
James Hooper Kerr.

Goodwin, Craufurd David Wycliffe. Professor of economics, vice provost and director of international programs, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina, U.S.A.
William Alexander Thomson.

Greenhill, Basil. Director, National Maritime Museum, Greenwich, London, England.
Thomas Burnard Chanter.

Griezic, Foster J. K. Assistant professor of history, St Patrick's College, Carleton University, Ottawa, Ontario.
James Shaw.

Guillet, Edwin C. Consultant in Canadiana to the Librarian, Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario.
John Montgomery.

Gundy, H. Pearson. Formerly professor of English, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario; associate director and senior editor, McGill-Queen's University Press.
Charles Belford. Edward Jackson. Thomas Liddell.

Hamelin, Jean. Directeur, Département d'histoire, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Médéric Lanctot.

Hamelin, Marcel. Professeur d'histoire, Université d'Ottawa, Ontario.
Pierre Bachand.

Hamilton, William B. Associate professor of history of education, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario.
Hiram Blanchard. James Cuppaidge Cochran. Isaac LeVesconte. George Rogers McKenzie.

Harper, John Russell. Department of fine arts, Sir George Williams University, Montreal, Quebec.
William Bent Berczy [in collaboration with J. Andre]. Robert Stuart Duncanson. Paul Kane.

Hecht, Irene W. D. Assistant professor of history, Lewis and Clark College, Portland, Oregon, U.S.A.
Israel de Wolfe Andrews.

Henderson, John Lanceley Hodge. Professor of history; librarian, Huron College, London, Ontario.
William Craddock Bettridge.

Hertzman, Lewis. Professor of history, York University, Downsview, Ontario.
Anthony von Iffland.

Hiller, James K. Lecturer, Memorial University of Newfoundland, St John's, Newfoundland.
Robert Carter. Thomas Bulley Job.

Hodgins, Bruce W. Associate professor of history, Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario.
James Douglas Gordon. John Sandfield Macdonald. Sir Henry William Stisted. Philip VanKoughnet.

Holland, Clive A. Research assistant, Scott Polar Research Institute, Cambridge, England.
Sir George Back. Émile-Frédéric de Bray. Sherard Osborn.

Holmes, Kenneth L. Professor of history, Oregon College of Education, Monmouth, Oregon, U.S.A.
Donald Manson. Alexander Hunter Murray.

Hopwood, Victor George. Associate professor of English, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, British Columbia.
Robert Christopher Lundin Brown. William Wentworth-Fitzwilliam.

James, R. Warren. Director, Consumer Research Branch, Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Ottawa, Ontario.
John Rae. Hugh Bowlby Willson [in collaboration with J. S. Moir].

Jarvis, Julia. Toronto, Ontario.
William Benjamin Robinson.

Johnson, Alice Margaret. Formerly archivist, Hudson's Bay Company, London, England.
Erland Erlandson. Nicol Finlayson. John Keast Lord.

Johnson, J. K. Associate professor of history, Carleton University, Ottawa, Ontario.
James Rogers Armstrong. James William Cook. George Stephen Benjamin Jarvis. Donald Aeneas MacDonell. John Philip Roblin.

Johnson, Leo A. Assistant professor of history.

University of Waterloo, Waterloo, Ontario.
Andrew Norton Buell.

Johnston, Charles M. Professor of history, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario.
John Farrell. Ralph Leeming. Eliakim Malcolm.

Jones, Elwood H. Assistant professor of history, Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario.
Abraham Diamond.

Jones, Frederick. Research student, Selwyn College, Cambridge, England.
William Grey.

Kallmann, Helmut. Chief, Music Division, National Library of Canada, Ottawa, Ontario.
Jean-Chrysostome Brauneis. James Paton Clarke. Marie-Hippolyte-Antoine Dessane. James Dodsley Humphreys.

Kemp, Peter Kemp. Head, Naval Historical Branch, Ministry of Defence, London, England.
Sir George Augustus Westphal.

Klassen, Henry Cornelius. Assistant professor of history, University of Calgary, Alberta.
Luther Hamilton Holton.

Klinck, Carl F. Senior professor of English, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario.
James Lynne Alexander.

Lacourcière, Luc. Directeur, Archives de folklore, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Philippe-Joseph Aubert de Gaspé.

Lacroix, Jean-Michel. Traducteur, Dictionnaire biographique du Canada/Dictionary of Canadian biography, Les Presses de l'université Laval; professeur, Département d'études anglaises, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.

Lamb, William Kaye. Former dominion archivist, Vancouver, British Columbia.
William Irving. Sewell Prescott Moody. Edward Stamp. Alfred Penderell Waddington. James Murray Yale.

†Landon, Fred. London, Ontario.
Linus Wilson Miller.

Landry, Pierre. Licencié en histoire, Québec.
Edwin Atwater. Stanley Clark Bagg. Louis-Michel Darveau. John Sharples.

La Terreur, Marc. Directeur du volume X, Dictionnaire biographique du Canada/Dictionary of Canadian Biography; professeur d'histoire, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Henri-Émile Chevalier.

Lefebvre, Jean-Jacques. Ex-archiviste en chef, Cour supérieure, Palais de justice, Montréal, Québec.
Joseph-Ubalde Beaudry. Nazaire Dupuis. Isidore Hurteau. Charles-André Leblanc. Félix-Hyacinthe Lemaire. Jean-Baptiste Prat. Narcisse Valois.

Lessard, Claude. Archiviste, Université du Québec à Trois-Rivières, Québec.
Thomas Caron. Alexandre-René Chaussegros de Léry.

Lévesque, Ulric. Professeur d'histoire, Collège d'enseignement général et professionnel de La Pocatière, Québec.
John Le Boutillier.

Lindo, Patrick Richard. Historical consultant, National Historic Sites Service, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Ottawa, Ontario.
Robert Leonard Hazen.

Loomis, Chauncey C., Jr. Associate professor of English, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire, U.S.A.
Charles Francis Hall [in collaboration with E. S. Dodge].

Lortie, Léon. Historiographe de l'université de Montréal, Québec.
Aldis Bernard. Jean-Baptiste Meilleur.

Lucas, C. Glenn. Archivist-historian, United Church of Canada, Victoria University, Toronto, Ontario.
John Jennings. Jonathan Scott. Alexander Topp.

Lyon, John A. Port Hardy, British Columbia.
Joshua Spencer Thompson [in collaboration with G. A. Tripp].

McCalla, Douglas. Assistant professor of history, Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario.
George Percival Ridout. John Young.

McCloy, T. R. Chief librarian, Glenbow-Alberta Institute, Calgary, Alberta.
John Richards McKay.

McDougall, Robert L. Professor of English, Carleton University, Ottawa, Ontario.
Alexander Harris.

Mackenzie, Anthony A. Assistant professor of history, St Francis Xavier University, Antigonish, Nova Scotia.
Edmund Murray Dodd.

McKenzie, Ruth. Ottawa, Ontario.
Adiel Sherwood. William Smart.

MacKinnon, Charles F. Archivist, Public Archives of Canada, Ottawa, Ontario.
Charles Connell.

MacLean, Raymond A. Head, Department of history, St Francis Xavier University, Antigonish, Nova Scotia.
Colin Francis MacKinnon.

MacNutt, William Stewart. Professor of history, University of New Brunswick, Fredericton, New Brunswick.
James Carter. Robert Gowan. John Simcoe Saunders.

Macpherson, K. R. Supervisor, Manuscript Division, Ontario Department of Public Records and Archives, Toronto, Ontario.
Thomas Dick. Edward George O'Brien.

Magill, Maxwell Leroy. Toronto, Ontario.
Andrew Drew.

Mainer, George Graham. Toronto, Ontario.
Alfred Booker. Solomon Yeomans Chesley. William Hamilton. Hamilton Hartley Killaly. Roderick Matheson. Walter O'Hara.

†Manny, Louise. Newcastle, New Brunswick.
John Harley.

Marshall, J. Stewart. Macdonald professor of physics and meteorology; Director, McGill Observatory, McGill University, Montreal, Quebec.
Charles Smallwood.

Martineau, André. Archiviste, Archives publiques du Canada, Ottawa, Ontario.
Terence Joseph O'Neill.

Massey, Georges. Professeur d'histoire, Université du Québec à Trois-Rivières, Québec.
George Baptist.

Masters, Donald Campbell Charles. Professor of history, University of Guelph, Ontario.
Jasper Hume Nicolls.

Mathews, Hazel C. Fort Myers Beach, Florida, U.S.A.
George King Chisholm.

Mathieu, Jacques. Professeur d'histoire, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
John Heath. James Hodges.

Metcalf, George. Lecturer in history, King's College, University of London, England.
William Henry Draper.

Miller, Carman. Assistant professor of history, McGill University, Montreal, Quebec.
Thomas Brown Anderson. Charles Drolet. John Ponsonby Sexton.

Millman, T. R. Professor of church history, Wycliffe College, University of Toronto, Ontario.
Thomas Gummersall Anderson. James Beaven. Adam Elliot. William Macaulay. John George Delhoste MacKenzie.

Mitchell, Elaine Allan. Toronto, Ontario.
Angus Cameron.

Moir, John Sargent. Professor of history, Scarborough College, University of Toronto, Ontario.
Anson Green. Hugh Bowlby Willson [in collaboration with R. W. James].

Monet, Jacques, s.j. Professeur d'histoire, Université d'Ottawa, Ontario.
Henry Black. Thomas Edmund Campbell. Alexandre-Maurice Delisle. Batholomew Conrad Augustus Gugy. Louis Labrèche-Viger. Robert Nelson [in collaboration with R. Chabot and Y. Roby]. Edmund Bailey O'Callaghan.

Montagnes, Ian. Projects co-ordinator, University of Toronto Press, Ontario.
John Ellis.

Morley, Marjorie G. Provincial librarian, Provincial Library and Archives of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba.
Mathilda Davis.

Morley, William F. E. Curator of Special Collections, Douglas Library, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario.
William Henry Smith.

Morton, Desmond Paul. Assistant professor of history, Erindale College, University of Toronto, Ontario.
William Foster Coffin. Sir James Alexander Lindsay.

Morton, William Lewis. Vanier professor of history, Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario.
George-Antoine Bellecourt. Thomas Bunn. John Arnot Fleming. Alfred Henry Scott.

Muise, Delphin A. Historian, National Museum of Man, Ottawa, Ontario.
Edmund Mortimer McDonald.

Murray, Jean Elizabeth. Professor emeritus of history, University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan.
James Nisbet.

Neatby, Leslie Hamilton. Formerly professor of classics, University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan.
François Beaulieu. Sir Henry Kellett.

Newell, George R. Archivist, Provincial Archives of British Columbia, Victoria, British Columbia.
William George Cox. Jerome Harper. William Henry McNeill.

Nish, Elizabeth. Research director, Centre d'Étude du Québec, Sir George Williams University, Montreal, Quebec.
Rollo Campbell. Charles-Elzéar Mondelet. Timothy Lee Terrill. Joseph-Élie Thibaudeau.

Nix, James Ernest. Montreal, Quebec.
George Millward McDougall.

†O'Bready, Maurice, p.d. Sherbrooke, Québec.
William Locker Pickmore Felton. Edward Short.

Ormsby, Margaret A. Head, Department of history, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, British Columbia.
James Cooper. Sir James Douglas.

Ormsby, William G. Professor of history, Brock University, St Catharines, Ontario.
Jacob Keefer. William Rees.

Ostry, Bernard. Assistant under secretary of state, Department of the Secretary of State, Ottawa, Ontario.
James Ryan.

Ouellet, Fernand. Professeur d'histoire, Carleton University, Ottawa, Ontario.
Louis-Joseph Papineau.

Ouellet, Gérald G. Directeur, Section des sciences sociales, École normale, Moncton, Nouveau-Brunswick.
François-Lambert Bourneuf.

Pageau, Yvon. Professeur des sciences de la Terre, Université du Québec à Montréal, Québec.
Elkanah Billings [in collaboration with A. Désilets].

Palmer, Katherine Van Winkle. Director, Paleontological Research Institution, Ithaca, New York, U.S.A.
Philip Pearsall Carpenter.

Paquin, Michel. Chargé de recherche, Dictionnaire biographique du Canada/Dictionary of Canadian Biography, Les Presses de l'université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Charles-Honoré Laverdière.

Paradis, Jean-Marc. Professeur d'histoire, Université du Québec à Trois-Rivières, Québec.
Bonaventure Viger.

Paul-Émile, sœur (Louise Guay), s.g.c. Sœurs de la Charité d'Ottawa, Ottawa, Ontario.
Élisabeth Bruyère.

Peel, Bruce Braden. Librarian, University of Alberta, Edmonton, Alberta.
Pierre Falcon.

Pemberton, Ian C. B. Lecturer in history, University of Windsor, Ontario.
William McClure.

Percy, John R. Assistant professor of astronomy, Erindale College, University of Toronto, Ontario.
James Craig Watson.

Phelps, Marion L. Curator and assistant archivist,

Brome County Historical Society Museum and Archives, Knowlton, Quebec.
Philip Henry Moore.

Pilon, Henri. Manuscript editor, Dictionary of Canadian Biography/Dictionnaire biographique du Canada, University of Toronto Press; archivist, Trinity College, University of Toronto, Ontario.
Joseph-Ignace Aumond. Frederick Henry Baddeley. Robert Bell. Edward Mulberry Hodder. John Shedden.

Pincombe, Charles Alexander. Secondary school teacher, Atlantic Baptist College, Moncton, New Brunswick.
Jonathan Berry. Stephen Binney.

Pothier, Bernard. Historian, Canadian War Museum, National Museums of Canada, Ottawa, Ontario.
William End. Ferdinand-Edmond Gauvreau. Samuel Robert Thomson.

Pouliot, Léon, s.j. Assistant archiviste de la Compagnie de Jésus, Saint-Jérôme, Québec.
Antoine-Olivier Berthelet. Charles Conilleau. Hippolyte Moreau. Joseph-Octave Paré.

Preston, Richard Arthur. W. K. Boyd professor of history, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina, U.S.A.
Henry Charles Fletcher. Sir William O'Grady Haly. Sir William Rowan.

Provost, Honorius, ptre. Archiviste, Séminaire de Québec, Québec.
Patrick J. Doherty. Elzéar-Henri Juchereau Duchesnay. Louis Proulx.

Pryke, Kenneth George. Associate professor of history, University of Windsor, Ontario.
Mather Byles Almon. John Boyd. Ezra A. Churchill. Alexander Keith. James Charles McKeagney. Beamish Murdoch. Jeremiah Northup.

Ralston, H. Keith. Assistant professor of history, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, British Columbia.
John Sullivan Deas.

Raymond, Marcel. Ex-conservateur, Jardin botanique de Montréal, Québec.
Eugène Bourgeaux.

Rea, J. E. Associate professor of history, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba.
Robert Cunningham. Edward John Horan. Alexander McLeod.

Reaney, James. Professor of English, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario.
James Donnelly.

Reynolds, Arthur G. Registrar and associate professor of church history, Emmanuel College, University of Toronto, Ontario.
Thomas Hurlburt.

Rice, James Richard. Graduate student in history, London, England.
Edmund Hillyer Duval. Thomas Hilyard. Robert Shives. William Wright.

Rioux, Jean-Roch. Professeur d'histoire, Campus intercommunautaire Saint-Augustin, Cap-Rouge, Québec.
Gonzalve Doutre.

Ritchie, Thomas. Research officer, National Research Council, Ottawa, Ontario.
Henry Ruttan.

Robertson, Ian Ross. Historian, Mermaid, Prince Edward Island.
Herbert Bell. Daniel Brenan. George Coles. Nicholas Conroy. Donald Currie. George Dundas. James Douglas Haszard. Sir Robert Hodgson. John McDonald. Emanuel McEachen. William Henry Pope. Edward Reilly. William Swabey.

Robidoux, Réjean. Professeur de français, University of Toronto, Ontario.
Octave Crémazie.

Roby, Yves. Professeur d'histoire, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Pierre-Claude Boucher de La Bruère. Édouard-Élisée Malhiot. Robert Nelson [in collaboration with R. Chabot et J. Monet]. Ludger-Napoléon Voyer.

Roddick, Edna Madaline. London, Ontario.
Simeon Morrill.

Rome, David. Lecturer, McGill University; director, Jewish Public Library, Montreal, Quebec.
Adolphus Mordecai Hart.

Rosser, Frederick Thomas. Ottawa, Ontario.
Samuel Stearns Day. Robert Alexander Fyfe. Louis Roussy.

Rothney, Gordon Oliver. Professor of history, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba.
John Sewell Sanborn.

†Rousseau, Jacques. Professeur d'ethnobiologie, Centre d'études nordiques, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Louis-Ovide Brunet.

Roy, Patricia E. Assistant professor of history, University of Victoria, British Columbia.
John Deighton.

Ryerson, Stanley Bréhaut. Department of political science, University of Ottawa, Ontario; Département d'histoire, Université du Québec à Montréal, Québec.
Márk Szalatnay.

Sampson, William R. Assistant professor of history, University of Alberta, Edmonton, Alberta.
David Cameron. William Frederick Crate. Richard Lane. Kenneth McKenzie. Dugald Mactavish.

Savard, Pierre. Professeur d'histoire, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Louis-Moïse Brassard. Zéphirin Charest. Hippolyte Dubord. Félix-Odilon Gauthier.

Scollard, Robert Joseph, c.s.b. Periodicals librarian, University of St Michael's College, Toronto, Ontario.
Jean-Mathieu Soulerin.

Senior, Elinor Laurie. Graduate student in history, McGill University, Montreal, Quebec.
Robert Alsop. Edward Feild. Robert John Pinsent.

Senior, Hereward. Associate professor of history, McGill University, Montreal, Quebec.
D'Arcy Boulton. William Henry Boulton. Ogle Robert Gowan. Arthur Hopper.

Shufelt, Harry B. Knowlton, Quebec.
Edmund Leavens Chandler.

Smith, Allan C. L. Assistant professor of history, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, British Columbia.

John Nugent.

Smith, William David. Professor of history, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Curtis James Bird. James Ross.

Sniderman, Anne E. F. Verdun, Quebec.

Samuel Hazlewood. William Mercer Wilson.

Spencer, Stephen F. Graduate student in history, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario.

Thomas Nepean Molesworth.

Splane, Richard B. Director-General, Welfare Assistance and Services, Department of National Health and Welfare, Ottawa, Ontario.

Thomas Scatcherd.

Spragge, George W. Toronto, Ontario.

James William Bridgland. William Arthur Johnson.

Spray, William Arthur. Associate professor of history, St Thomas University, Fredericton, New Brunswick.

Henry Bliss. George Luther Hatheway. Amand Landry. William Henry Steeves. John Waddell. John Wilkinson.

Spry, Irene M. Associate professor of history, University of Ottawa, Ontario.

John Inkster.

Squires, William Austin. Curator emeritus, New Brunswick Museum, Fredericton, New Brunswick.

Charles Frederick Hartt.

Stacey, C. P. Professor of history, University of Toronto, Ontario.

John O'Neill.

Stanley, George F. G. Professor of Canadian studies and Curator of the Davidson Collection, Mount Allison University, Sackville, New Brunswick.

Louis Bétournay. Louis-Adolphe Casault. Marie-Anne Gaboury (Lagemodière). William Bernard O'Donoghue.

Stayner, C. St. C. Halifax, Nova Scotia.

James Spike.

Stelmack, Carole B. Editor-historian, Public Archives of Canada, Ottawa, Ontario.

Thomas Roberts Ferguson. Robert Alexander Harrison. Georges-Honoré Simard.

Stockdale, John Christie. Professeur adjoint d'anglais, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.

Charles Heavysege. Rosanna Eleanora Mullins (Leprohon).

Story, G. M. Professor of English, Memorial University of Newfoundland, St John's, Newfoundland.

William Jackman [with C. W. Andrews].

Story, Norah. Freelance writer and consultant, Toronto, Ontario.

Thomas Fisher.

Stuart-Stubbs, Basil. Librarian, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, British Columbia.

Sir Edward Belcher.

Sutherland, David Alexander. Graduate student in history, University of Toronto, Ontario.

Enos Collins [in collaboration with D. M. Barker]. John Holmes. James William Johnston.

Swainson, Donald. Associate professor of history, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario.

John Hillyard Cameron. John Willoughby Crawford. John Corry Wilson Daly. Asa Belknap Foster. John Bower Lewis. Samuel Sylvester Mills. James O'Reilly. Thomas Clark Street. Robert Wilkes.

Swift, Michael. Provincial archivist, Provincial Archives of New Brunswick, Fredericton, New Brunswick.

Edward Barron Chandler. William Todd.

Sylvain, Philippe. Professeur d'histoire, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.

Charles-Étienne Brasseur de Bourbourg. Francis Cassidy. George Edward Clerk. Vincislas-Paul-Wilfrid Dorion. Évariste Gélinas. Horace Greeley. Charles Laberge. Charles La Rocque. Hugh Murray. Alexis-Frédéric Truteau. Charles Wilson.

Symons, Thomas H. B. Associate professor of history; president and vice-chancellor, Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario.

George Ridout. John Ryerson. William Ryerson.

Talman, James John. Professor of history, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario.

Benjamin Cronyn. Hannibal Mulkins. John Talbot [in collaboration with D. J. Brock].

Taylor, Hugh Alexander. Director, Historical Branch, Public Archives of Canada, Ottawa, Ontario.

Francis Pym Harding.

Tessier, Yves. Directeur de la Cartothèque, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.

Robert-Shore-Milnes Bouchette.

Thomas, Christmas Edward. Research assistant, Public Archives of Nova Scotia, Halifax, Nova Scotia.

William Bullock. George McCawley. John George Marshall. Christopher Milner. Aubrey George Spencer.

Thomas, Lewis Gwynne. Professor of history, University of Alberta, Edmonton, Alberta.

Edward Ermatinger. Donald Gunn. William Henry Taylor.

Thomas, Lewis Herbert. Professor of history, University of Alberta, Edmonton, Alberta.

Alexis Reynard.

Thompson, Arthur Newey. Rector, St George's Anglican Church, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Alexander Neil Bethune.

Thompson, Charles A. Graduate student in history, Duke University, Durham, N.C., U.S.A.

Timothy O'Hea. Sir John Young.

Thompson, Frederic Fraser. Professor of history, Royal Military College of Canada, Kingston, Ontario.

Sir Thomas John Cochrane. Robert Law. Sir Henry Prescott.

Thompson, John Beswarick. Research historian, National Historic Sites Service, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Ottawa, Ontario.

John Simpson.

Tracy, Minerva. Wolfville, Nova Scotia.

John Davis. James De Mille. Charles Pedley.

TREMBLAY, VICTOR, P.D. Archiviste, Société historique du Saguenay, Chicoutimi, Québec.
William Evan Price.

TRIPP, GEORGE A. London, Ontario.
Joshua Spencer Thompson [in collaboration with J. A. Lyon].

TULCHINSKY, GERALD. Assistant professor of history, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario.
William Workman. John Young [in collaboration with B. J. Young].

TURNER, ALLAN REAMAN. Provincial archivist, Saskatchewan Archives Board; adjunct professor of history, University of Saskatchewan, Regina, Saskatchewan.
Hunkajuka. James McKay. Abraham Wikaskokiseyin.

TURNER, WESLEY B. Assistant professor of history, Brock University, St Catharines, Ontario.
William Dixon.

USHER, JEAN MYFANWY. Historian, National Museum of Man, Ottawa, Ontario.
Modeste Demers.

VACHON, CLAUDE. Archiviste, Fédération des commissions scolaires catholiques du Québec, Québec.
Joseph-Octave Beaubien.

VÉZINA, RAYMOND. Professeur d'histoire de l'art, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
Cornelius Krieghoff.

VOISINE, NIVE. Professeur d'histoire, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.
George Conroy. François-Magloire Derome.

WAITE, PETER B. Professor of history, Dalhousie University, Halifax, Nova Scotia.
William Garvie. John Kent. Sir John Gaspard Le Marchant. Jonathan McCully.

WALDON, FREDA F. Formerly chief librarian, Hamilton Public Library, Hamilton, Ontario.
Archibald Macallum.

WALKER, FRANK NORMAN. Toronto, Ontario.
Charles Dawson Shanly.

WALLACE, CARL MURRAY. Assistant professor of history, Laurentian University, Sudbury, Ontario.
John Adolphus Beckwith. Charles Fisher. William Hayden Needham. John Robertson. Lemuel Allan Wilmot.

WARD, NORMAN. Britnell professor of political science, University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan.
William Henry Lee.

WATERSTON, ELIZABETH. Assistant professor of English, University of Guelph, Ontario.
William James Anderson. Robert Middleton.

WATTS, ALFRED. Judge of the Provincial Court, West Vancouver, British Columbia.
George Pearkes.

WELLS, CLAIRE. Traductrice, Dictionnaire biographique du Canada/Dictionary of Canadian Biography, Les Presses de l'université Laval, chargée de cours, Extension de l'enseignement, Université Laval, Québec, Québec.

WELLS, ELIZABETH A. St John's, Newfoundland.
Thomas Bennett. Edmund Hanrahan. John Munn. Joseph Noad. John Valentine Nugent. Thomas Ridley. Joseph Woods.

WHITELEY, WILLIAM HENRY. Associate professor of history, Memorial University of Newfoundland, St John's, Newfoundland.
Johann August Miertsching.

WILBUR, RICHARD. Caraquet, New Brunswick.
John Henry Thomas Manners-Sutton. John Venner Thurgar.

WILSON, ALAN. Chairman, Department of history, Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario.
John Walpole Willis.

WILSON, J. DONALD. Assistant professor of history, Lakehead University, Thunder Bay, Ontario.
William Hincks.

WINDER, C. GORDON. Professor of geology, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario.
Sir William Edmond Logan.

WINKS, ROBIN W. Professor of history, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, U.S.A.
Wilson Ruffin Abbott.

WISE, SYDNEY FRANCIS. Director, Directorate of history, Canadian Forces Headquarters, Ottawa, Ontario
Sir Francis Bond Head.

WOLFENDEN, MADGE. Formerly assistant provincial archivist, Provincial Archives, Victoria, British Columbia.
Robert Burnaby. Sosthenes Maximilian Driard. Edward White.

WOOD, JOHN S. Gooderham professor of French, Victoria College, University of Toronto; translator into English of biographies in French, Dictionary of Canadian Biography/Dictionnaire biographique du Canada, University of Toronto Press, Ontario.

YON, ARMAND, PTRE. Professeur à la retraite, Sainte-Dorothée, Québec.
Paul-Henry de Belvèze.

YOUNG, BRIAN J. Instructor in history, University of Vermont, Burlington, Vermont, U.S.A.
John Alfred Poor. John Young [in collaboration with G. Tulchinsky].

Index

Included in the index are the names of persons mentioned in volume X. They are listed by their family names, with titles and first names following. Wives are entered under their maiden names with their married names in parentheses. Persons who appear in incomplete citations in the text are fully identified when possible. An asterisk indicates that the person has received a biography in a volume already published, or will probably receive one in a subsequent volume. A death date or last floruit date refers the reader to the volume in which the biography will be found. Numerals in bold face indicate the pages on which a biography appears. Titles, nicknames, variant spellings, married and religious names are fully cross-referenced.

Abbott, Anderson Ruffin, 3
Abbott, Elizabeth Caroline (Alston), 9
Abbott, Ellen. See Toyer
Abbott*, Sir John Joseph Caldwell (1821–93), 123, 136
Abbott, Jonas, 531
Abbott, Wilson Ruffin, 3
Aberdeen, Earl of. See Hamilton-Gordon
Abernethy, George, 427, 486
Abernethy, John, 38, 691
Abraham, Apolline (Lefebvre), 613
Abraham, Miriam (Franklin), 295
Abrams*, William (1785–1844), 333
Acheson*, Sir Archibald, 2nd Earl of Gosford and 1st Baron Worlingham (1776–1849), 11, 132, 163, 343, 440, 499, 555, 574, 582
Adair, Sir Frederick, 433
Adams, Betsy Almira (Hurlburt), 372
Adams, Ezra, 372
Adams, Maria (Macallum), 451
Addison*, Robert (1754?–1829), 436
Addison, Thomas, 83
Agassiz, Jean-Louis-Rodolphe, 338, 360
Ailleboust de Manthet, Catherine-Angélique d' (Wilson), 715
Aimard, Gustave (Olivier Gloux), 166
Ainsley, Mary Ann (Mouat), 535
Aisance, John, 12
Aka-kitsipimi-otas, 560
Albert Francis Charles Augustus Emmanuel, Prince Consort of England, 448
Alder, Robert, 3–5, 640
Alderman, Isaac W., 486
Alenza y Nieto, Leonardo, 410
Alexander, Emilia. See Nelles
Alexander*, Sir James Edward (1803–85), 52
Alexander, James Lynne, 5
Alfonso, Don, Duke of San Jaime, 542
Alfonso XII, King of Spain, 542
Alfred Ernest Albert, Duke of Edinburgh and of Saxe-Cobourg and Gotha, 625
Allan*, Andrew (1822–1901), 726
Allan*, George William (1822–1901), 392, 393
Allan*, Sir Hugh (1810–82), 18, 102, 123, 150, 293, 294, 501, 651, 657, 724, 725, 726
Allan*, William (1770–1853), 299
Allard, Justine (wife of Ovid), 6
Allard, Ovid, 5–6, 720
Allemand, Charlotte (Berczy von Moll), 50
Allen, Mr, 528
Allen, Elizabeth (Heath), 345
Allen, Elizabeth (Iffland), 376
Allen*, George Lyttleton (1810–82), 121, 313
Allen*, Sir John Campbell (1817–98), 288, 679
Allen, William, 328
Alleyn*, Charles (1817–90), 20
Alleyn, Zoé. See Aubert de Gaspé
Allison*, Joseph (1755?–1839), 188, 189, 551
Allison, Susanne (Aubert de Gaspé), 18
Allison, Thérèse. See Baby
Allison, Thomas, 18
Almon, Amelia Elizabeth (Johnston), 383
Almon, Mather Byles, 6–8, 73, 189, 232, 293, 365, 385
Almon, Rebecca. See Byles
Almon, Sophia. See Pryor
Almon*, William James (1754–1817), 6
Alsop, Robert, 8–9
Alston, Anna Maria. See Tuzo
Alston, Anne Charlotte. See Oxenden
Alston, Edward Graham, 9–10, 112, 113, 587
Alston, Elizabeth Caroline. See Abbott
Alston, George, 9
Alvarado, Juan Bautista, 240
Amable, Sœur. See Dorion, Cyphise
Amadeo I, King of Spain, 542
Amesbury, Joseph, 350
Amherst, Elizabeth Frances (Hale), 326
Amherst, William Pitt, 1st Earl Amherst, 326, 701
Amiot, Geneviève (Delagrave), 217
Amussat, Jean, 38
Andersen, Hans Christian, 112
Anderson, Ann. See Richardson
Anderson*, David (1814–85), 109, 324, 629, 673, 674
Anderson, Deliverance. See Butts
Anderson, Elizabeth Ann. See Hamilton
Anderson, Elizabeth Magdalene (Forsyth), 10
Anderson, Gustavus Alexander, 12
Anderson, Samuel, 11
Anderson, Sarah Ann (Bliss), 72, 73
Anderson, Thomas, 362
Anderson, Thomas Brown, 10–11

Anderson, Thomas Gummersall, 11–13, 269, 623
Anderson, William James, 13–14
André, Édouard, 82
Andrew, John Albion, 15
Andrews, Israel de Wolfe, 14–15
Andrews, Margaret (Morrill), 534
Angers*, Sir Auguste-Réal (1838–1919), 25
Angevin. See Cartier
Annand*, William (1808–87), 177, 367, 385, 395, 457, 539, 685
Anspach*, Lewis Amadeus (fl. 1799–1822), 588
Apawakaasi, 662
Apistchi-koimas. See Wikaskokiseyin
App-Griffith, Julia Howard (Bovell), 83
Appleton, Thomas, 91
Applewaite, Sarah (Bovell), 83
Archambault. See Guibord
Archambault, Françoise. See Toureault
Archambault, Georgine (Bruneau; Taillon), 16
Archambault, Jacques, 15
Archambault, Joséphine. See Beaupré
Archambault, Louis (cousin of PIERRE-URGEL), 16
Archambault*, Louis (1814–90), 15
Archambault, Louise. See Poulin
Archambault, Madeleine. See Bruguière
Archambault, Paul-Loup, 604
Archambault, Pierre-Amable, 15
Archambault, Pierre-Urgel, 15–16
Archambault*, Urgel-Eugène (1834–1904), 16
Archbold, George, 163
Archibald*, Sir Adams George (1814–92), 148, 387, 439, 457, 458, 474, 702
Archibald*, Samuel George William (1777–1846), 539
Ariail, Marie-Anne (Quertier), 604
Arles, Henri d'. See Beaudé, Henri
Armand, dit Chartrand, Joseph, 527
Armault, Camille (Waggaman), 462
Armstrong*, Sir Alexander (1818–99), 397
Armstrong, Eleanor (Beatty), 16
Armstrong, Hannah. See Dougall
Armstrong, James Rogers, 16, 262, 331
Armstrong, James Rogers (son), 16
Armstrong, John, 16
Armstrong, Mary. See Rogers
Armstrong, Mary (Ryerson), 16, 262
Armstrong, Phoebe Anne (Duggan), 16, 262
Armstrong*, William James (1826–89), 128
Arnold*, Benedict (1741–1801), 13
Arnoldi*, Daniel (1774–1849), 544
Arnot, Christian (Reid), 611
Arnot, Elizabeth (Fleming), 291
Arouet, François-Marie, dit Voltaire, 164
Arraud, Augustin, 16
Arraud, Jacques-Victor, 16–17
Arraud, Marguerite. See Florence
Arthur*, Sir George (1784–1854), 63, 259, 311, 334, 403, 639
Artz, Mary Ann (Willis), 704
Ash*, John (d. 1886), 479
Ashburton, Baron. See Baring
Ashmore, Sarah (Richardson), 615
Asselin, Louis-Napoléon, 226
Asselin, Malvina. See Derome
Assiniboine, the. See Battenotte
Atherton, Charles, 404
Atkinson, Ann (Lawson), 434
Atkinson, Elizabeth (Harris), 334
Atkinson, Matilda (Gamble), 299
Atwater, Albert, 17
Atwater, Edwin, 17–18
Atwater, Linus, 17
Atwater, Lucy Huntington. See Greene
Aubert*, Pierre (1814–90), 322
Aubert de Gaspé, Adélaïde (Saveuse de Beaujeu), 20
Aubert de Gaspé, Atala (Hudon), 20
Aubert de Gaspé, Catherine. See Tarieu de Lanaudière
Aubert de Gaspé, Elmire (Stuart), 20
Aubert*, de Gaspé, Ignace-Philippe (1714–87), 18
Aubert de Gaspé, Philippe-Ignace-François, 19, 20
Aubert de Gaspé, Philippe-Joseph, 13, 18–23
Aubert de Gaspé, Philomène, 20
Aubert de Gaspé, Pierre, 18
Aubert de Gaspé, Pierre-Ignace, 18
Aubert de Gaspé, Susanne. See Allison
Aubert de Gaspé, Susanne (Power), 20
Aubert de Gaspé, Thomas, 20
Aubert de Gaspé, Wilhelmine-Anaïs (Fraser), 20
Aubert de Gaspé, Zélie (Borne), 20
Aubert de Gaspé, Zoé (Alleyn), 20
Aubert* de La Chesnaye, Charles (1632–1702), 18
Aubin*, Napoléon (baptized Aimé-Nicolas) (1812–90), 20, 213
Aubry, Auguste-Eugène, 542
Auclair*, Élie-Joseph-Arthur (1866–1946), 431
Auclair*, Joseph (1813–87), 603
Audet*, Francis-Joseph (1867–1943), 503
Auger, Agathe. See Roy
Auldjo, Louis, 10
Aumon, Euphrosine. See Robichaud
Aumon, Ignace, 23
Aumond, Charles, 23
Aumond, Jane. See Cumming
Aumond (Aumon), Joseph-Ignace, 23–24
Austin*, Horatio Thomas (1801–65), 29, 408, 561, 562, 563
Auvergne, Mary Anne Charlotte d' (Prescott), 600
Avray. See Marshall
Ayer, Dolly (Chandler), 156
Aylmer, Baron. See Whitworth-Aylmer
Aylwin, Ann. See Blake
Aylwin, Eliza Margaret. See Felton
Aylwin, Louise-Catherine. See Connolly
Aylwin, Margaret Nelson. See Hanna
Aylwin, Thomas, 24
Aylwin, Thomas Cushing, 24, 134, 219, 548, 653
Ayres, Dr, 349

BABEL*, Louis (1826–1912), 737
Baby*, François-Louis-Georges (1832–1906), 738
Baby, Thérèse (Allison), 18
Bachand, Delphine. See Dufort
Bachand, Joseph, 24
Bachand, Josephte. See Fontaine
Bachand, Marie-Louise. See Marchand
Bachand, Pierre, 24–26, 420
Back, Ann (wife of John), 26

Back, Sir George, 26–29, 406, 407, 408, 454
Back, John, 26
Back, Theodosia Elizabeth. See Hammond
Bâcon, François, 345
Bacon, Rebecca (Watson), 698
Bacquet, Jean-Baptiste-Édouard, 134, 201, 301
Baddeley, Frederick Henry, 29–31
Baddeley, Susan. See Green
Badgley, Charles Howard, 382
Badgley, Elizabeth (Molson), 518, 525
Badgley*, Francis (1767–1841), 518
Badgley, John Thompson, 518, 519
Badgley*, William (1801–88), 219, 257, 326, 418, 518, 642, 724
Bagg, Catharine. See Mitcheson
Bagg, Mary Ann. See Clark
Bagg*, Robert Stanley (1848–1912), 32
Bagg*, Stanley (1786–1853), 31, 526
Bagg, Stanley Clark, 31–32
Bagnall*, James Douglas (1785–1856), 339
Bagot*, Sir Charles (1781–1843), 39, 254, 255, 311, 325, 403, 404, 462, 506, 527, 583
Bailey*, Loring Woart (1839–1925), 338
Baillargé*, Charles (1826–1906), 603, 735
Baillargé*, Louis de Gonzague (1808–96), 132, 162
Baillargeon*, Charles-François (1798–1870), 251, 429, 489, 493, 576, 603
Baillie*, Thomas (1796–1863), 41, 158, 315, 644, 703, 710
Bain, John, 336
Bainbridge, John, 71
Baird, Lydia (Talbot), 671
Baird*, Nicol Hugh (1796–1849), 403, 404
Baker, Miss (Simpson), 656
Baker, Cephas, 511
Baker, Sarah. See Mallory
Balcarres, Earl of. See Lindsay
Baldwin, Augusta Elizabeth (Ross), 632
Baldwin, Mary (Sherwood), 651
Baldwin*, Maurice Scollard (1836–1904), 209
Baldwin*, Robert (1804–58), 24, 62, 80, 81, 92, 93, 94, 95, 109, 110, 119, 124, 125, 126, 127, 132, 133, 134, 143, 160, 169, 254, 255, 256, 257, 263, 299, 311, 312, 325, 343, 358, 359, 364, 365, 380, 398, 440, 442, 462, 463, 465, 466, 468, 512, 515, 584, 610, 618, 622, 623, 632, 642, 705, 706, 708, 714
Baldwin*, William Warren (1775–1844), 61, 344, 618, 705
Ball, John, 81
Ballenden, Harriet (McKay), 475
Ballenden*, John (d. 1856), 390
Ballock, Jane (Wilmot), 710
Balzac, Honoré de, 410
Banks, James, 49
Bannerman*, Sir Alexander (1783–1864), 141, 184, 185, 331, 352, 400, 588
Baptist*, Alexander (1836–1917), 33, 34
Baptist, George, 32–34, 490
Baptist, Helen Oliver (McDougall), 34
Baptist, Isabella. See Cockburn
Baptist, Isabella (Houliston), 34
Baptist, Jane (Mackay), 34
Baptist, John, 33
Baptist, Margaret (Pentland), 34
Baptist, Phillis (Dean), 34
Barbeau*, Charles-Marius (1883–1969), 412, 413
Barbeau, Marie-Anne (Gauvreau), 302
Barber, Anna, 34
Barber, George Anthony, 34–35, 599
Barber, Lucinda. See Shortiss
Barbour, Margaret Nelson. See Brown
Barcelo, Jacob, 438
Barcelo, Luce. See Dorion
Barcelo, Luce (Lemaire), 438
Baring, Alexander, 1st Baron Ashburton, 483
Barnabo, Alessandro, 251
Barnard*, Édouard-André (1835–98), 15
Barr, Margaret Robinson (Gwynne; Poor), 590
Barramollach, Mary Macalpine (Macallum), 451
Barrande, Joachim, 65
Barrett, Alfred, 404
Barry, Sir David, 660
Barry, Eliza J. See Mercier
Barry, John Alexander, 35–36
Barry, Mary. See Black
Barry, Mary. See Jessop
Barry, Robert, 35
Barry, Sophia. See Pernette
Barthe*, Georges-Isidore (1834–1900), 505
Barthe*, Joseph-Guillaume (1818–93), 337, 555, 581
Barthe, Joséphine-Charlotte. See Meilleur
Barton, Margaret (Cronyn), 205
Basque, John, 446
Bathurst, Henry (bishop), 663
Bathurst, Henry, 3rd Earl Bathurst, 71
Battenotte, Louis (the Assiniboine), 699, 700
Baudry. See Beaudry
Bayard, Robertson, 679
Baynes, Robert Lambert, 244, 245
Beach, Eleanor (Morrill), 534
Beach*, Thomas Miller (Henri Le Caron) (1841–94), 559
Beaconsfield, Earl of. See Disraeli
Beamish, Elizabeth (Murdoch), 539
Beamish, Harriet Jane Ott, 539
Beamish, Thomas Ott, 539
Beardmore, Charles, 535
Beaton, Eleanor (Bridgland), 90
Beatty, Eleanor. See Armstrong
Beatty, John, 16
Beaty*, James (1798–1892), 43, 313
Beaubien, Caroline-Alix (Frémont), 37
Beaubien, Catherine-Élisabeth-Aglaé. See Chenet
Beaubien, Élizabeth. See Manseau
Beaubien, Jean-Louis, 36
Beaubien, Joseph-Octave, 36–37
Beaubien, Louis, 36
Beaubien*, Marguerite-Dorothée (1798–1848), 107
Beaubien*, Pierre (1796–1881), 589
Beauclerk, Laura Maria Theresa (Wentworth-Fitzwilliam, Lady Milton), 699
Beaudé*, Henri (Henri d'Arles) (1870–1930), 87
Beaudrieau, J.-Guillaume, 492
Beaudry, Caroline (Beaudry), 37
Beaudry, Félicité. See Dubreuil

Beaudry*, Jean-Louis (1809–86), 219, 625, 717
Beaudry, Joseph-Ubalde, 37–38, 59, 135, 434, 533, 620
Beaudry, Joseph-Ubalde (son), 37
Beaudry, Louis, 37
Beaudry, Pierre-Janvier, 37
Beaufort, Daniel Augustus, 104
Beaufort, Sir Francis, 42
Beaujeu. See Saveuse
Beaulieu. See Hudon-Beaulieu
Beaulieu, Étienne, 38
Beaulieu, François, 38
Beaulieu, Jacques, 38
Beaumont, William Rawlins, 38–39
Beaupré, Joséphine (Archambault), 16
Beaupré, Marie-Louise (Confoulan; Masson), 500
Beausoleil, Célestin, 545
Beaven, Elizabeth Speed. See Frowd
Beaven, James, 39–40, 270
Beaven, Mary (wife of Samuel), 39
Beaven*, Robert (1836–1920), 40
Beaven, Samuel, 39
Beaver*, Herbert (1800–58), 240
Beche, Sir Henry Thomas de la, 445
Beck*, Sir Adam (1857–1925), 375
Beck, Pierre, 53
Beck, William, 716
Becket, John C., 40–41, 129, 672
Beckett, Jane (Fife), 283
Beckwith, Ann. See Jouett
Beckwith, Harry, 41
Beckwith, John Adolphus, 41–42
Beckwith, Julie-Louise. See Le Brun
Beckwith, Marie Ann. See Berton
Beckwith, Nehemiah, 41
Bédard*, Elzéar (1799–1849), 132, 574, 580, 581, 582
Bédard*, Pierre-Stanislas (1762–1829), 566, 567, 568, 571
Bédos de Celles, François de, 153
Beecher, Harriet Elizabeth (Stowe), 44, 653
Beechey*, Frederick William (1796–1856), 27, 42, 407
Beemer, Jacob, 514
Beethoven, Ludwig van, 229
Begbie*, Sir Matthew Baillie (1819–94), 112, 113, 116, 245, 678
Begg*, Alexander (1839–97), 629, 645, 669
Begley, Thomas A., 404
Béland, Euphrosine (Caron), 136
Belcher, Andrew, 7, 42
Belcher, Diana. See Jolliffe
Belcher, Sir Edward, 42–43, 89, 396, 407, 455, 562, 563
Belcher*, Jonathan (1710–76), 42
Belcher, Marianne. See Geyer
Belcourt. See Bellecourt
Belford, Alexander, 43, 44
Belford, Charles, 43–44
Belford, Jennie. See Thomas
Belford, Robert J., 43, 44
Belknap, S. K., 293
Belknap, Sally (Foster), 293
Bell*, Alexander Graham (1847–1922), 102
Bell, Andrew, 446
Bell, Catherine. See Wallace
Bell, Frances (Lawson), 434
Bell, Herbert, 44–45
Bell, Jane. See Bowness
Bell, John (lawyer), 632
Bell, John (merchant), 721
Bell, John Gordon, 45
Bell, Margaret Waugh. See Buckham
Bell, Robert (father of ROBERT), 45
Bell, Robert, 45–46, 147, 645
Bell*, Robert (1841–1917), 445
Bell*, William (1780–1857), 660
Belleau, Louise (Boucher-Belleville), 75
Belleau*, Sir Narcisse-Fortunat (1808–94), 135, 147, 148
Bellecourt, Antoine, 46
Bellecourt (Bellecours), George-Antoine, 46–48
Bellecourt, Josephte. See Lemire
Bellefeuille. See Lefebvre
Bellemare, Raphaël, 304
Bellenoix. See Le Maître-Bellenoix
Bellerose*, Joseph-Hyacinthe (1820–99), 533
Belleville. See Boucher-Belleville
Bellew, Frank Henry Temple, 649
Bellingham*, Sidney Robert (1807–1900), 219, 220
Bellot*, Joseph-René (1826–53), 89, 90
Belvèze, Antoine-Jean-François de, 48
Belvèze, Marie-Josèphe-Jeanne. See Garrigues de Saint-Fauste
Belvèze, Paul-Henry de, 48–49
Beman, Elisha, 622
Beman, Esther. See Sayre
Beman, Susan (Boulton), 78
Bemister*, John (d. 1892), 8
Benjamin*, George (1799–1864), 80, 121, 312, 313, 314
Bennett*, Charles Fox (1793–1883), 8, 50, 716
Bennett, George, 49, 103
Bennett, Leah (wife of Thomas, Sr), 50
Bennett, Thomas (father), 50
Bennett, Thomas, 49–50, 600
Bennett, William, 617
Benning, James, 723
Benson, Charles Otis, 561
Bentham, Jeremy, 626
Benton, Rhoda Anne (Ellis), 270
Berczy, Louise-Amélie. See Panet
Berczy, William Bent, 50–51
Berczy von Moll, Charlotte. See Allemand
Berczy* von Moll, William (1744–1813), 50
Bergevin, Célestin, 148
Berlinguet*, François-Xavier (1830–1916), 603
Bernard, Lieutenant, 706
Bernard, Aldis, 51–52
Bernard, J. D., 23
Bernard, Mary Webb. See Meredith
Bernard, Sarah. See Couch
Bernier*, Joseph-Elzéar (1852–1934), 397
Berry, Jonathan, 52
Berry, Mary (wife of JONATHAN), 52
Berry, Thomas, 52
Berthelet, Amélia (Larocque), 53
Berthelet, Antoine-Olivier, 52–53

Berthelet, Charlotte. See Guy
Berthelet, Marguerite. See Viger
Berthelet, Marie-Angélique. See Chaboillez
Berthelet*, Pierre (d. 1830), 52
Berthelot*, Amable (1777–1847), 337
Berthelot, Caroline-Anne (Bouchette), 78
Berthelot*, Joseph-Amable (1815–97), 37, 143, 434
Berton, Marie Ann (Beckwith), 41
Bessels, Emil, 328
Bethune, Alexander Neil, 12, 53–57, 121, 206, 207, 381, 477
Bethune*, Angus (1783–1858), 53
Bethune*, Charles James Stewart (1838–1932), 53
Bethune, Elizabeth. See Hallowell
Bethune*, James Gray (1793–1841), 53
Bethune, Jane Eliza. See Crooks
Bethune*, John (1751–1815), 53, 57
Bethune, John, 53, 57–58
Bethune, Robert Henry, 53
Bethune*, Strachan (1821–1910), 58
Bethune, Véronique. See Waddin
Bétournay, Archange. See Vincent
Bétournay, Louis, 58–59, 143
Bétournay, Marie. See Mercil
Bétournay, Pierre, 59
Bétourné, dit La Violette, Adrien, 59
Bétourné, dit La Violette, Marie. See Deshaies
Bettridge, Mary. See Hounsfield
Bettridge, William, 60
Bettridge (Betteridge), William Craddock, 59–60, 206
Betts, Edward Ladd, 591
Bevan, Sophia (Mountain; Feild), 278
Bibaud*, Michel (1782–1857), 505
Bibeau, dit Portugal, Marie-Madeleine (Iffland; Edelston), 375
Bichat, Marie-François-Xavier, 236
Bickerstaff, Margaret Ann (Cronyn), 206
Bidwell*, Barnabas (1763–1833), 60, 706
Bidwell, Clara. See Willcox
Bidwell, Marshall Spring, 60–64, 109, 124, 343, 344, 573, 619, 624, 705
Bidwell, Mary. See Gray
Biggar, Herbert, 641
Biggar, Mary (Macallum), 451
Big Snake. See Omoxesisixany
Billings, Bradish, 64
Billings, Elkanah, 64–66, 361, 446, 447, 448
Billings, Helen Walker. See Wilson
Billings, Lamira. See Dow
Binney, Emily. See Pryor
Binney*, Hibbert (1819–87), 8, 73, 110, 178
Binney, Hibbert Newton, 66, 539
Binney, Lucy. See Creighton
Binney, Mary. See Bliss
Binney, Stephen, 66–67
Bird, Annabella. See Ross
Bird, Catherine (Swabey), 669
Bird, Curtis James, 67–68, 631
Bird, Frances. See Ross
Bird*, James Curtis (1773?–1856), 67
Bird, Mary. See Lowman
Birkett, William, 721
Birrell, Eliza. See Thompson
Birrell, Elizabeth (Hyman), 68
Birrell, George Sunley, 68
Birrell, John, 68
Birrell, Maria Louisa. See Sunley
Birrell, Ralph, 68
Black, Elizabeth (Wilmot), 710
Black, Henrietta. See Ross
Black, Henry, 68–69, 282
Black, James, 68
Black, John, 69–70, 629, 646
Black*, John (1818–82), 549
Black, Margaret. See Christie
Black, Margaret (wife of James), 68
Black, Martin Gay, 189
Black, Mary (Barry), 35
Black*, William (1760–1834), 35, 710
Blackburn*, Josiah (d. post-1890), 464
Black Snake Man. See Omoxesisixany
Blackstone, Sir William, 540
Blackwood*, Frederick Temple Hamilton-Temple, 1st Marquis of Dufferin and Ava (1826–1902), 148, 292, 330, 729
Blackwood, Hariot Georgiana. See Hamilton
Blaignier, Marie-Suzanne (Meilleur), 504
Blain de Saint-Aubin, Emmanuel, 229
Blair*, Adam Johnston Fergusson (1815–67), 725
Blair, Isabella (Shiels), 652
Blair, Janet (McKenzie), 477
Blais, Françoise (Casault), 152
Blake, Ann (Aylwin), 24
Blake, Anne Margaret. See Hume
Blake, Dominick Edward (father), 206
Blake, Dominick Edward, 206
Blake*, Edward (1833–1912), 102, 123, 206, 441, 467, 468
Blake, Frances Mary, 206
Blake, Margaret. See Cronyn
Blake, Mary Jane (Talbot), 671
Blake, Rebecca. See Cronyn
Blake*, Samuel Hume (1835–1914), 206, 510
Blake, Sophia (Cronyn), 206
Blake, Wilhelmina (Brough), 206
Blake*, William Hume (1809–70), 24, 206, 258, 529
Blakiston, Thomas Wright, 81
Blanc, Jean-Joseph-Charles-Louis, 166, 585
Blanchard, Eliza. See Cantrell
Blanchard, Hiram, 70–71, 457
Blanchard, Jane Walker (Waddell), 696
Blanchard, Jonathan, 70
Blanchard*, Jotham (1800–39), 70
Blanchard, Marin, 47
Blanchard, Nancy (Waddell), 695
Blanchard, Sarah. See Goggins
Blanchet*, François-Norbert (1795–1883), 221, 227
Blanchet*, François-Xavier (1776–1830), 566, 580
Blanchet*, Joseph-Goderic (1829–90), 163
Blanchet*, Pierre (1812–98), 165, 252
Blanchette, Josette (Kérouac), 401
Blanshard*, Richard (1817?–94), 196, 241, 243
Blinkhorn, Thomas, 196, 242
Bliss*, Daniel (1740?–1806), 709
Bliss, Elizabeth Ann (Odell), 73
Bliss*, George Pigeon (d.c. 1832), 710

Bliss, Hannah (Wilmot), 709
Bliss, Henry, 71–72, 644
Bliss*, Jonathan (1742–1822), 71, 72
Bliss, Lewis, 73
Bliss, Louisa (Kelly), 73
Bliss, Mary. See Worthington
Bliss, Mary (Binney), 73
Bliss, Sarah Ann. See Anderson
Bliss, William Blowers, 7, 71, 72–73, 395
Blomfield, Charles James, 278, 663
Blowers*, Sampson Salter (1743–1842), 72, 73
Blundell, James, 350
Bodley, Richard D., 647
Boggs, Charles, 395
Böhm-Bawerk, Eugen von, 608
Boire, Agnès (Lanctôt), 420
Bois*, Louis-Édouard (1813–89), 507
Boissier, Edmond, 82
Bolduc*, Jean-Baptiste-Zacharie (1818–89), 221
Bolingbroke, Viscount. See Saint-John
Bonald*, Guillaume-Sylvain de (d. 1891), 580
Bonald, Louis-Gabriel-Ambroise, Vicomte de, 579
Bonald, Mathilde-Sabine de. See Parent
Bonaparte, Charles-Louis-Napoléon. See Napoleon III
Bonaparte, Napoléon. See Napoleon I
Bond*, William Bennett (1815–1906), 138
Bondy. See Douaire
Bonnycastle*, Sir Richard Henry (1791–1847), 30, 178, 601
Booker, Alfred (father), 73
Booker, Alfred, 73–75, 558
Boott, Francis, 82
Borne, Louis-Eusèbe, 20
Borne, Zélie. See Aubert de Gaspé
Borrel, Théophile-Marie-Louise (Bray), 89
Borthwick*, John Douglas (1832–1912), 614
Bossange, Gustave, 203
Bossange, Hector, 203
Bossuet, Jacques-Bénigne, 579, 580, 585
Bostwick, David Augustus, 653
Boswell, Edward Jukes, 206
Bosworth*, Newton (d. 1848), 627
Botsford*, Amos (1744–1812), 157
Botsford*, Amos Edwin (1804–94), 67
Botsford*, Bliss (1813–90), 66
Botsford, Sarah. See Chandler
Botsford, Sarah Ann (Hazen), 341
Botsford*, William (1773–1864), 157, 271, 341
Boucher*, Adélard-Joseph (1835–1912), 31
Boucher, Cyrille, 542
Boucher-Belleville*, Jean-Baptiste (1763–1839), 76
Boucher-Belleville, Jean-Baptiste, called Jean-Philippe, 75–76, 576
Boucher-Belleville, Louise. See Belleau
Boucher-Belleville, Marguerite. See Porlier
Boucher-Belleville, Pierre, 75
Boucher* de Boucherville, Sir Charles-Eugène (1822–1915), 25, 26, 218, 438
Boucher de Grosbois, Charlotte (Mondelet), 526
Boucher* de Grosbois, Pierre (1622–1717), 18
Boucher de La Bruère, Catherine-Renée (Lacoste), 418
Boucher de La Bruère, Marie-Hippolyte. See La Broquerie
Boucher de La Bruère, Marie-Julie. See Weilbrenner
Boucher de La Bruère, Pierre-Claude, 76–77
Boucher* de La Bruère, Pierre-René-Joseph-Hippolyte (1837–1917), 77
Boucher de La Bruère, René, 76
Boucher* de La Bruère, René-Montarville (1867–1943), 736
Boucher de La Perrière, Joseph, 490
Boucher de La Perrière, Julie (Malhiot), 490
Boucherville. See Boucher
Bouchette, Caroline-Anne. See Berthelot
Bouchette, Clara. See Lindsay
Bouchette*, Joseph (1774–1841), 30, 32, 77
Bouchette, Marie-Louise-Adélaïde. See Chaboillez
Bouchette, Mary Ann. See Gardner
Bouchette*, Robert-Errol (1863–1912), 78, 586
Bouchette, Robert-Shore-Milnes, 77–78, 260, 546
Bouchy, Pierre-Henri, 228
Boult, Anne (Hincks), 349
Boulton*, D'Arcy (1759–1834), 78, 79
Boulton, D'Arcy (father of WILLIAM HENRY), 79
Boulton, D'Arcy, 78–79
Boulton, Elizabeth (Cameron), 118
Boulton*, George Strange (1797–1869), 79, 253
Boulton, Harriette Elizabeth. See Dixon
Boulton*, Henry John (1790–1870), 79, 118, 180, 310, 359, 433, 553, 600, 601, 656, 687, 688, 705
Boulton, James, 78, 441
Boulton, Louisa Charlotte. See Corbett
Boulton, Sarah Ann. See Robinson
Boulton, Susan. See Beman
Boulton, William Henry, 79–81, 119, 121, 619
Bourassa, Azélie. See Papineau
Bourassa*, Napoléon (1827–1916), 577
Bourbon. See Carlos; Alfonso
Bourbourg. See Brasseur
Bourdages*, Louis (1764–1835), 554, 567, 569, 574
Bourdages, Marie-Antoinette (Dubord), 261
Bourgeau, Delphine-Denise. See Perrault
Bourgeau, Victor-Henri, 657
Bourgeaux (Bourgeau), Eugène, 81–82
Bourgeaux, Françoise. See Missilier
Bourgeaux, Jacques, 81
Bourgeois, Jean-Baptiste, 25
Bourget*, Ignace (1799–1885), 17, 52, 107, 148, 151, 154, 165, 175, 176, 193, 237, 250, 251, 252, 266, 281, 315, 322, 416, 417, 421, 422, 429, 430, 527, 532, 578, 589, 689, 715, 733
Bourinot*, Sir John George (1837–1902), 413
Bourneuf, François, 83
Bourneuf, François-Lambert, 83
Bourneuf, Marie. See Doucet
Bourneuf, Michelle. See Énolle
Bouthillier, C.-E.-E., 422
Bouthillier*, Thomas (d. 1861), 545
Bovell, James, 39, 83–85, 350, 351, 381, 382
Bovell, John, 83
Bovell, Julia Howard. See App-Griffith
Bovell, Sarah. See Applewaite
Bowell*, Sir Mackenzie (1823–1917), 121, 136
Bowen*, Edward (1780–1866), 326, 337

Bowen, Eliza Cecilia (Hale), 326
Bowes*, John George (1812–64), 119, 224, 503, 620
Bowes-Lyon, Mary Isabella (Willis), 705, 706
Bowes-Lyon, Thomas, 11th Earl of Strathmore, 705
Bowlby, Elizabeth (Willson), 708
Bowman, Charles, 453
Bowman, James, 389, 390
Bowness, Jane (Bell), 44
Boxer, Edward, 404
Boyd, Angus, 86
Boyd, Ann. See MacDonald
Boyd, John (father), 85
Boyd, John, 85–86
Boyd, Mary. See MacDonald
Boyd, Robert, 660
Boyer, Louis, 589
Bradley, Katherine (Parkin), 587
Braithwaite, Joseph, 5
Bramley, James Irvine, 217
Branner, John Casper, 338
Brassard, Jean-Baptiste, 86
Brassard*, Louis-Marie (1726–1800), 86
Brassard, Louis-Moïse, 86
Brassard, Marie-Josephte. See Manseau
Brassard, Thomas-Léandre, 86
Brasseur de Bourbourg, Charles-Étienne, 86–88
Brassey, Thomas, 591, 725
Braün, Antoine-Nicolas, 493
Brauneis, Christine. See Hudson
Brauneis, Jean-Chrysostome (father), 88
Brauneis, Jean-Chrysostome, 88–89
Brauneis, Jeanet. See Johnson
Bray, Achille-Hector-Camille de, 89
Bray, Émile-Frédéric de, 89–90
Bray, Loetitia-Constance-Marie de. See Le Bléis
Bray, Théophile-Marie-Louise de. See Borrel
Brecken*, Frederick de St Croix (1828–1903), 613
Bréhaut, William-Henry, 219
Brenan, Daniel, 90
Brenan, Margaret (wife of DANIEL), 90
Brent, J. W., 450
Brésoles. See Moreau
Brett. See Marshall
Brett, Robert H., 702
Brew*, Chartres (1815–70), 698
Brewer, Emma (Hunt), 372
Bridgland, Eleanor. See Beaton
Bridgland, James W., 90
Bridgland, James William, 90–91
Bridgland, Maria. See Dennis
Bridgland, Martha Anne. See Jones
Brien-Desrochers, Louise (Leblanc), 434
Bright, Richard, 83
Brims, Christina (Keith), 395
Brin, Ursule (Céré de La Colombière), 156
Brisbane, Albert, 315
Bristow*, William (b. 1808; d.c. 1868), 130, 723
Brock*, Sir Isaac (1769–1812), 181, 329
Brodeur, Eusèbe, 153
Brongniart, Adolphe-Théodore, 106
Bronsdon, Joseph Russell, 130
Brooks, Edward Towle, 643
Brooks, Eleanor Hall (Sanborn), 641
Brooks, Samuel, 641
Broom, Louisa (Pinsent), 589
Brough, Charles Crosbie, 206
Brough, Wilhelmina. See Blake
Brougham, Henry Peter, 1st Baron of Brougham and Vaux, 260, 342, 514
Brousseau*, Jean-Docile (1825–1908), 676
Brousseau, dit Lafleur de Verchères, Marie-Françoise (Globensky), 306
Brown, Ann (Short), 654
Brown, Anne. See Nelson
Brown, Annie (Cunningham), 210
Brown, Catherine Edith (Sandeman), 101
Brown, George, 45, 49, 79, 80, 81, 91–103, 120, 122, 126, 127, 128, 144, 146, 169, 170, 171, 175, 200, 230, 258, 277, 304, 313, 356, 357, 359, 364, 415, 422, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 503, 598, 623, 624, 630, 632, 637, 641, 642, 645, 656, 667, 671, 672, 676, 703, 707, 725
Brown, George Mackenzie, 101
Brown, Henriette (Guibord, dit Archambault), 154, 527, 689
Brown*, James (1790–1870), 286
Brown, James (politician), 230
Brown, Jane (Wilson), 715
Brown*, John Gordon (1827–96), 93, 97, 102
Brown, Margaret (Crawford), 200
Brown, Margaret Nelson (Barbour), 99
Brown, Marianne. See Mackenzie
Brown*, Peter (1784?–1863), 91, 92, 93
Brown, Prudence (Hartt), 338
Brown, Robert (father of ROBERT CHRISTOPHER LUNDIN), 103
Brown*, Robert (1842–95), 9
Brown, Robert Christopher Lundin, 103–4
Brown*, Thomas Storrow (1803–88), 574
Brown, William 321
Browne, Anna Maria. See Noble
Browne, Frances (Stewart), 104–5, 453
Browne, Francis, 104
Browning, Arthur, 701
Brownson, Anna (Sherwood), 651
Brownson, Orestes Augustus, 175, 361
Bruce*, James, 8th Earl of Elgin and 12th Earl of Kincardine (1811–63), 14, 79, 93, 119, 131, 133, 144, 159, 257, 311, 312, 389, 392, 409, 411, 412, 415, 463, 464, 502, 512, 536, 548, 563, 622, 634, 642, 691, 707, 724
Bruce, John, 517
Bruguier. See also Bruyère
Bruguier, Charles, 107
Bruguier, Jean-Baptiste, 107
Bruguier, Sophie. See Mercier
Bruguière, Madeleine (Archambault), 15
Bruneau, Georgine. See Archambault
Bruneau, Julie (Papineau), 567, 577
Bruneau, Pierre, 567
Bruneau, Théophile, 576
Brunelle, Laura (Doutre), 249
Brunet, Augustin-Albert, 419
Brunet, Cécile. See Lagueux
Brunet, Jean-Olivier, 105
Brunet, Louis-Ovide, 105–7, 361

Brunet, Marie (Roy), 635
Brünnow, Franz Friedrich Ernst, 698, 699
Brunskill, Carrie (Clarkson), 174
Brunskill, Thomas, 174
Bruyère, Élisabeth, 107–8, 323, 691
Brydges*, Charles John (1827–89), 725
Buchan*, David (d.c. 1839), 26
Buchanan*, Alexander (1798–1851), 181, 624
Buchanan*, Alexander Carlisle (1808–68), 231
Buchanan*, Isaac (1810–83), 68, 74, 528, 559, 619, 720
Buchanan, James, 14, 552
Buchanan*, Peter (d. 1860), 720
Buchez, Philippe-Joseph-Benjamin, 585
Buchon, Joseph-Maximilien, dit Max, 410
Buckham, Margaret Waugh (Hawley; Bell), 45
Buckingham*, William (1832–1915), 629
Buckland, Francis Trevelyan, 449
Budd, Betsy. See Work
Budd, Elizabeth (DeMill), 223
Budd, Henry, 108–9
Budd, Henry (son), 109
Budden, John, 409, 412
Buddington, James, 43, 396
Budington, Sydney O., 327, 328
Buell, Andrew Norton, 109–10, 310, 311, 631
Buell, Ann Eliza. See Thorp
Buell, Calcina. See Richards
Buell, Martha. See Naughton
Buell*, William (1751–1832), 109
Buell*, William (1792–1862), 109, 631
Bull*, George Perkins (d.c. 1846), 309, 312, 313, 314
Bull, Mary J. (Kerr), 402
Buller*, Arthur (d. 1869), 505
Buller*, Charles (1806–48), 7, 142
Bulley, Sarah (Job), 381
Bullock, Mary. See Clinch
Bullock*, Richard (fl. 1799–1853), 557
Bullock William, 110–11, 454
Bulwer, Sir William Henry Lytton Earle, Baron Dalling and Bulwer, 724
Bulwer-Lytton, Edward George Earle Lytton, 1st Baron Lytton, 112, 196, 244
Bunn, Catherine. See Thomas
Bunn, Isabella. See Clouston
Bunn*, John (1800?–61), 67, 111, 215
Bunn, Rachel. See Harriott
Bunn, Thomas, 111
Burbage, Bridget (Jackman), 378
Burchill, George, 333
Bureau, Geneviève (Dorion), 236
Bureau*, Napoléon (1827–97), 237, 238
Burges, Frances Anne (Head), 342
Burgess, Rachel (Churchill), 172
Burgoyne, Sir John Fox, 402, 406
Burke, Edmund, 314
Burke, Patrick, 559
Burn, Eliza (Stisted), 667
Burnaby, Robert, 111–12
Burnaby, Sarah. See Meares
Burnaby, Thomas, 111
Burnard, Elizabeth (Chanter), 161
Burnard, Thomas, 161
Burnett, Emily. See Krieghoff
Burnett, Hamilton, 413
Burney, Charles, 663
Burnham, Achsah (Ermatinger), 273
Burnham*, Zaccheus (1777–1857), 273
Burns, Robert (poet), 653
Burns*, Robert (1789–1869), 442
Burpee*, Lawrence Johnston (1873–1946), 346, 347
Burton, Joseph Netterville, 667
Burton, Maria (Stisted), 667
Burton, Sir Richard Francis, 667
Burton, William, 360
Bush, Sarah. See Mallory
Bushby, Agnes. See Douglas
Bushby, Anne Sarah. See Stedman
Bushby, Arthur Thomas, 112–14, 247
Bushby, Joseph, 112
Bushnan, John, 27
Bussell, Margaret (McClure), 455
Butler, Frances (Harrison), 336
Butler*, Samuel (1835–1902), 334
Butts, Deliverance (Anderson), 11
Buydens, Marie-Jeanne (De Smet), 226
Byles, Mather, 6
Byles, Rebecca (Almon), 6
Byrns, Bridget (Doherty), 233
Bythesea, John, 406

CAISSIE, Pélagie (Landry), 426
Caldwell*, Sir John (1775–1842), 32
Caldwell*, William Bletterman (d. 1882), 47, 168
Calf Shirt. See Onistah-sokaksin
Callan, James, 557
Callan, Mary, 557
Callender-Campbell, Mary (O'Brien), 554
Calloway, William, 511
Cambridge, Duke of. See George William Frederick Charles
Cambridge, Lemuel, 161
Cameron*, Æneas (1757?–1822), 114, 115
Cameron, Angus (father of JOHN HILLYARD), 118
Cameron, Angus (father of MALCOLM), 124
Cameron, Angus, 114–15
Cameron, Cecilia Eliza. See Douglas
Cameron, Christina. See McGregor
Cameron, David, 115–18, 196, 242
Cameron*, Duncan (1764?–1848), 607
Cameron, Edith Rebecca (Doughty), 115
Cameron, Elizabeth. See Boulton
Cameron, Elizabeth. See Morison
Cameron, Ellen. See Mallet
Cameron, Euphemia. See McGregor
Cameron, James (father of ANGUS), 114
Cameron*, James (1817–51), 114
Cameron, Janet. See Farquharson
Cameron, John (brother of MALCOLM), 124
Cameron, John (educator), 480
Cameron, John Hillyard, 118–24, 125, 257, 312, 314, 336, 515, 561, 620
Cameron, Malcolm, 95, 119, 124–29, 169, 246, 359
Cameron*, Sir Matthew Crooks (1822–87), 79, 468, 504
Cameron*, Sir Roderick William (1823–1900), 607, 608

Campbel, John, 129
Campbel, Nelly. See Smith
Campbell. See Callender-Campbell
Campbell*, Sir Alexander (1822–92), 459
Campbell, Anne (Murray), 541
Campbell*, Sir Archibald (1769–1843), 710
Campbell, Bruce, 131
Campbell, Charles J., 121, 651
Campbell*, Sir Colin (1776–1847), 189, 364, 384, 534
Campbell*, Colin (1787–1853), 541
Campbell*, Sir Donald (1800–50), 90, 184
Campbell, Elizabeth. See Steel
Campbell*, Francis Wayland (b. 1837; d.c. 1910), 130
Campbell, Henriette-Julie. See Juchereau Duchesnay
Campbell*, John (1840–1904), 40
Campbell, Mary (Ridout), 618
Campbell, Peter Colin, 442
Campbell, Rollo, 41, 129–30
Campbell, Thomas Edmund, 130–31, 164
Campbell*, Sir William (1758–1834), 705, 706
Canac, dit Marquis, Pierre, 605
Canniff*, William (1830–1910), 610
Canning, George, 398
Cannon, Eleanore (Horan), 360
Canterbury, Viscount. See Manners-Sutton
Cantrell, Eliza (Blanchard), 70
Capreol*, Frederick Chase (1803–86), 80
Cardwell, Edward, Viscount Cardwell, 265, 443, 444
Carey, Mary (Le Marchant), 438
Caritat, Marie-Jean-Antoine-Nicolas de, Marquis de Condorcet, 585
Carle Tom. See Gélinas, Évariste
Carleton, Cousin May. See Early, May Agnes
Carleton*, Thomas (1735–1817), 341
Carling*, Sir John (1828–1911), 375
Carlisle, Sir Anthony, 691
Carlos, Don, Duke of Madrid, 542
Carman*, Albert (1833–1917), 616, 617
Carman*, Bliss (1861–1929), 498
Carmel-Levasseur, Louise (Viger), 694
Carmichael, James (merchant), 476
Carmichael*, James (1826–1908), 207
Carmichael*, James William (1819–1903), 476
Carnarvon, Earl of. See Herbert
Carnegie*, Sir James, 9th Earl of Southesk (1827–1905), 473
Caron, Augustin, 131
Caron, Charles-François, 107
Caron, Corine (Fitzpatrick), 136
Caron, Élisabeth. See Lessard
Caron, Euphrosine. See Béland
Caron*, Sir Joseph-Philippe-René-Adolphe (1843–1908), 136
Caron, Louis, 136
Caron, Marie-Joséphine (Taschereau), 136
Caron, Marie-Vénérande-Joséphine. See Deblois
Caron, René-Édouard, 131–36, 145, 217, 256, 580, 690
Caron, Thomas, 136–37
Carpenter, Anna. See Penn
Carpenter, Henry, 648
Carpenter, Lant, 137
Carpenter, Minna. See Meyer
Carpenter, Philip Pearsall, 137–38
Carr, Ursula Sarah (Harris), 334
Carrall, Elizabeth Amelia. See Macdonald
Carrall, James, 138
Carrall, Jane (wife of James), 138
Carrall, Robert William Weir, 138–40
Carrier, Charlotte (Thibault), 676
Carrier, Jean-Baptiste, 346
Carroll. See Carrall
Carroll*, John (1809–84), 536, 646, 692
Carson, Jessy (Job), 381
Carson*, William (1770–1843), 50, 179, 381, 551, 553, 601, 687
Carswell, Jane Elizabeth (Sexton), 647
Carter, Anne. See Hutchings
Carter, Anne. See Weston
Carter, Edward, 229
Carter, Emma. See Wellbeloved
Carter*, Sir Frederic Bowker Terrington (1819–1900), 8, 141, 399, 716
Carter, James, 140
Carter, Sir James, 140–41, 286, 713
Carter, John Bonham, 140
Carter, Margaret Spencer. See Coster
Carter, Mary Ann Elizabeth. See Miller
Carter, Mary Elizabeth Henrietta (Mondelet), 526
Carter, Peter W., 50
Carter, Robert, 141
Carter*, William (1751–1840), 141
Carter, William (son), 141
Carthew, John, 30
Cartier, François-Damien, 142, 143
Cartier, Sir George-Étienne, 37, 59, 97, 98, 99, 100, 120, 121, 122, 123, 128, 131, 134, 142–52, 155, 170, 220, 235, 258, 282, 293, 294, 304, 356, 361, 418, 422, 423, 424, 425, 429, 430, 434, 435, 464, 465, 466, 468, 481, 499, 533, 614, 632, 642, 654, 690, 725, 726, 727
Cartier, Henry, 142
Cartier, Hortense. See Fabre
Cartier, Hortense, 151
Cartier*, Jacques (1491–1557), 142, 166
Cartier, Jacques (grandfather of GEORGE-ÉTIENNE), 142
Cartier, Jacques (father of GEORGE-ÉTIENNE), 142
Cartier, Joséphine, 151
Cartier, Marguerite. See Paradis
Cartier, Reine-Victoria, 151
Cartier, dit l'Angevin, Jacques, 142
Cartier, dit l'Angevin, Marguerite. See Mongeon
Cartwright*, John Solomon (1804–45), 30, 254
Cartwright*, Sir Richard John (1835–1912), 122, 441
Carufel. See Sicard
Cary*, Lucius Bentinck, 10th Viscount Falkland (1803–84), 7, 66, 232, 365, 385
Casault, Françoise. See Blais
Casault, Julie-Cimodecée. See Cauchon
Casault, Louis, 152
Casault, Louis-Adolphe, 152
Casault*, Louis-Jacques (1808–62), 152, 432
Casault*, Sir Louis-Napoléon (1823–1908), 152, 488
Casavant, Antoine, 26
Casavant, Claver, 153

Casavant, Dominique, 152
Casavant, Joseph, 26, 152–53, 428
Casavant, Marie-Desanges. See Coderre
Casavant, Marie-Olive. See Sicard de Carufel
Casavant, Samuel, 153
Case*, William (1780–1855), 471, 647, 648
Casey. See Caissie
Casey, Willet, 548
Casey, William R., 403
Casgrain*, Charles-Eusèbe (1800–48), 580
Casgrain*, Henri-Raymond (1831–1904), 19, 22, 203, 204, 205, 433
Casgrain, Pierre-Thomas, 605
Cass, Lewis, 548
Casselman, Sarah (Cook), 195
Cassidy, Francis (father), 153
Cassidy, Francis, 51, 153–55, 435
Cassidy, Mary. See McPharlane
Caswell, Alexis, 384
Caswell, Henry, 536
Cathcart*, Charles Murray, 2nd Earl Cathcart (1783–1859), 255, 405
Catherine of Braganza, Queen, 342
Catlin, George, 390, 392
Cattley, George W., 404
Cauchon*, Joseph-Édouard (1816–85), 24, 152, 203, 213, 361, 418, 632, 723
Cauchon, Julie-Cimodecée (Casault), 152
Cauchon, Théotiste (Cauchon, dit Laverdière), 432
Cauchon, dit Laverdière. See also Laverdière
Cauchon, dit Laverdière, Charles, 432
Cauchon, dit Laverdière, Théotiste. See Cauchon
Caven, John, 612
Cawthra, John, 622
Cawthra*, Joseph (1759–1842), 155
Cawthra, Mary. See Turnpenny
Cawthra, Sarah Ellen. See Crowther
Cawthra, William, 155
Cayley*, William (1807–90), 128, 134, 257, 405
Cazeau*, Charles-Félix (1807–81), 87, 176, 604
Cazeneuve, Louis-Joseph-Charles, 266, 505
Celles. See Bédos; Duclos
Céré de La Colombière, François, 155
Céré de La Colombière, Marie-Julie-Marguerite, dite Sœur Mance, 155–56
Céré de La Colombière, Ursule. See Brin
Chabert, Joseph, 600
Chaboillez, Marie-Angélique (Berthelet), 53
Chaboillez, Marie-Louise-Adélaïde (Bouchette), 77
Chabot*, Jean (1807–60), 134, 217, 591
Chalmers, Arianna Margaretta Jekyll (Saunders), 643
Chalmers, James, 644
Chalmers, Thomas, 667
Chamberlin*, Brown (1827–97), 532
Chambers, Alicia. See Westphal
Champlain*, Samuel de (b.c. 1570; d.1635), 432
Chandler, Amanda Jane. See Darling
Chandler, Charles Henry, 157
Chandler, Daniel, 156
Chandler, Dolly. See Ayer
Chandler, Edmund Leavens, 156–57
Chandler, Edward Barron, 67, 157–61, 285, 315, 341, 495, 543, 666, 682, 711, 712
Chandler, Elizabeth. See Rice
Chandler, Horace Mitchell, 156
Chandler*, James Watson (1800–70), 286
Chandler, Joshua, 157
Chandler, Lydia. See Leavens
Chandler, Mary (Upham), 157
Chandler, Phoebe. See Millidge
Chandler, Samuel, 157
Chandler, Sarah (Botsford), 157
Chanter, Elizabeth. See Burnard
Chanter, Isabella. See Scott
Chanter, Moses, 161
Chanter, Robert Campbell, 161
Chanter, Thomas Burnard, 161
Chantler, Elizabeth (McDougall), 471
Chapais, Jean-Charles (father), 605
Chapais*, Jean-Charles (1811–85), 418
Chapais*, Sir Thomas (1858–1946), 133
Chapman*, Edward John (1821–1904), 446
Chapman, Henry, 724
Chapman*, Henry Samuel (1803–81), 567
Charbonnel*, Armand-François-Marie de (1802–91), 323, 662
Charencey, Henry de, 88
Charest, Antoine, 161
Charest, Marie-Anne. See Marchand
Charest, Zéphirin, 161–62, 267
Charles II, King of Great Britain and Ireland, 696
Charles, Lucy (Lucille, Lucinda) (Harris), 335
Chartier*, Étienne (1798–1853), 545, 567, 574, 575, 576, 602
Chartrand. See Armand
Chasley (Chassley), All Saints, 163
Chasley, Lené. See Yeomans
Chasseur, Pierre, 505
Chateaubriand, François-René de, Vicomte de Chateaubriand, 166
Chaussegros de Léry, Alexandre-René, 162–63
Chaussegros de Léry, Catherine-Charlotte-Élise. See Couillard
Chaussegros* de Léry, Charles-Étienne (1774–1842), 162
Chaussegros de Léry, Josephte. See Fraser
Chaussegros* de Léry, William-Henri-Brouague (1851–1914), 162
Chauveau*, Pierre-Joseph-Olivier (1820–90), 16, 36, 148, 203, 218, 401, 415, 418, 508, 542, 635
Chauvin, Jean, 413
Cheadle*, Walter Butler (1835–1910), 198, 699, 700
Chef de la Pluie. See Sotai-na
Chenet, Antoine, 36
Chenet, Catherine-Élisabeth-Aglaé (Beaubien), 36
Cheney, Mary Youngs (Greeley), 316
Chénier*, Jean-Olivier (1806–37), 307, 499
Cherrier*, Côme-Séraphin (1798–1885), 37, 52, 194, 237, 298, 417, 527, 533, 625
Cherrier, Georges-Hippolyte, 164
Cherrier, Rosalie (Papineau), 564
Cherubini, Luigi, 221
Chesley. See also Chasley
Chesley, Margaret Ann. See Vankoughnet
Chesley, Solomon Yeomans, 163–64
Chevalier, Henri-Émile, 164–67, 237

Chevalier, Sophronie. See Rouvier
Cheverus. See Lefebvre
Chicoux-Duvert, Hélène-Flavie (Drolet; Renaud), 614
Chiniquy*, Charles-Paschal-Télesphore (1809–99), 86, 374, 419, 488, 604
Chipman*, Ward (1787–1851), 140, 712
Chirat, Élisabeth (Mercier), 510
Chisholm, George King, 167
Chisholm, Isabella. See Land
Chisholm, Rebecca. See Silverthorn
Chisholm*, William (1788–1842), 167
Chitty, Joseph, 644
Chocarne, Bernard, 431
Chomedey* de Maisonneuve, Paul de (1612–76), 736
Choquet, Marie-Louise (Masson), 499
Choquette*, Charles-Philippe (1856–1947), 421
Chouinard*, Honoré-Julien-Jean-Baptiste (1850–1928), 205
Christie, Alexander, 69, 167–68
Christie, Alexander (son), 167
Christie, Alexander (grandson), 167
Christie, Anne. See Thomas
Christie, David, 168–71
Christie, Isabella. See Turnbull
Christie, Margaret. See Telfer
Christie, Margaret (Black), 69
Christie, Robert (father of David), 168
Christie*, Robert (1788–1856), 418, 627
Christie, Thomas, 168
Christie, William Joseph, 167
Christie*, William Plenderleath (1780–1845), 163
Church, Sir Richard, 59
Churchill, Ann. See Davidson
Churchill, Elizabeth. See Trefry
Churchill, Ezra, 171
Churchill, Ezra A., 171–72, 551
Churchill, George, 172
Churchill, John, 172
Churchill, John, 1st Duke of Marlborough, 663
Churchill, Rachel. See Burgess
Cinq-Mars, François, 75
Clare, William H., 450
Clark, Jane. See Mortimer
Clark, John (of Aberdeen, Scotland), 683
Clark, John (Halifax merchant), 189
Clark, Margaret (Coffin), 182
Clark, Mary (Dundas), 264
Clark, Mary Ann (Bagg), 31
Clark*, Thomas (1770?–1837), 668
Clarke*, Charles (1826–1909), 169, 464
Clarke, Helen. See Fullerton
Clarke*, Henry James (1833–89), 148
Clarke, Hugh Archibald, 173
Clarke, Isabella Elizabeth (Gamble), 299
Clarke, James, 44
Clarke, James Paton, 172–73
Clarke, Jane (Dorion), 236
Clarke*, John (1781–1852), 719, 720
Clarke, Lawrence, 276
Clarke, Margaret (Rubidge), 635
Clarkson, Benjamin Reid, 174
Clarkson, Carrie. See Brunskill
Clarkson, Edward Roper Curzon, 174
Clarkson, Elizabeth. See Farnham
Clarkson, Elizabeth (wife of John), 173
Clarkson, John, 173
Clarkson, John Brunskill, 174
Clarkson, Robert Guy, 174
Clarkson, Sarah. See Helliwell
Clarkson, Thomas, 173–74
Clay, John, 103
Clemens, Samuel Langhorne (Mark Twain), 44, 223
Clench, F. S., 389
Clench, Mrs F. S., 390
Clench, Harriet (Kane), 393
Clench, Victorine (Cornish), 198
Clérel de Tocqueville, Charles-Alexis-Henri, 573
Clerk, Sir George, 174, 175
Clerk, George Edward, 174–76
Clerk, Jean-Pio-Robert, 176
Clerk, Marie. See Law
Clerk, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth. See Dupuis
Cleveland, Chester B., 642
Clinch*, John (1747–1819), 110
Clinch, Mary (Bullock), 110
Clinton, Henry Pelham Fiennes Pelham, 5th Duke of Newcastle, 116, 117, 121, 122, 128, 146, 246, 264, 265, 289, 465, 588, 595, 596, 630, 666
Clopper, Henry Garrett, 314
Clouet, Josephte (Parent), 576
Clouet, Louise (Simard), 654
Clouet, Michel, 580, 654
Clouston, Isabella (Bunn), 111
Clouston*, James (fl. 1808–39), 284
Clut*, Isidore (1832–1903), 275, 614
Cochran*, Andrew William (1792–1849), 178
Cochran, Anna Mathilda. See Power
Cochran, Catherine. See Walsh
Cochran, Emily (Northup), 551
Cochran, James, 176–77
Cochran, James Cuppaidge, 177–78
Cochran, Rebecca. See Cuppaidge
Cochran*, William (d. 1833), 177
Cochrane, Sir Alexander Forrester Inglis, 178
Cochrane, Maria. See Shaw
Cochrane, Mary, 180
Cochrane, Mathilda. See Ross
Cochrane, Sir Thomas John, 178–80, 433, 553, 600, 601, 687
Cockburn, Sir George, 701
Cockburn, Isabella (Baptist), 34
Cockburn*, James (1819–83), 123
Cockran*, William (1797–1865), 108
Cocoran, Margaret. See Flood
Cocoran, Timothy, 176
Coderre, Marie-Desanges (Casavant), 152
Codner, Susan Grace (Wilson), 716
Coffin*, John (1729–1808), 180
Coffin, Margaret. See Clark
Coffin*, Nathaniel (1766–1846), 557
Coffin, Thomas (son of William Foster), 182
Coffin*, Thomas (1762–1841), 181
Coffin, William Foster, 180–82, 529
Cogswell*, Henry Hezekiah (1776–1854), 182, 189
Cogswell, Isabella. See Ellis
Cogswell, Isabella Binney, 182

Cogswell, William, 182
Colborne*, Sir John, 1st Baron Seaton (1778–1863), 12, 61, 130, 181, 206, 233, 260, 269, 307, 310, 342, 343, 344, 521, 531, 546, 582, 606, 634, 636, 655, 693
Coldwell*, William (1834–1907), 210, 629
Cole, John Ambler, 332
Colebrooke*, Sir William MacBean George (1787–1870), 158, 271, 341, 644, 711
Coleman, Anne (Young), 721
Coleman, Louisa (Diamond), 230
Coleman, William J., 176
Colenso, John William, 208
Coles, George, 182–88, 264, 265, 352, 397, 419, 594, 598, 612, 670
Coles, James, 182
Coles, Mercy. See Haine
Coles, Sarah. See Tally
Colledge, Lucy (Pope), 593
Colley, Mary (Fisher), 290
Collins, Enos, 188–90
Collins*, Francis (1801–34), 705
Collins, Hallet, 188
Collins, Margaret. See Halliburton
Collins, Martha (Cronyn), 206
Collins, Rhoda. See Peek
Collins, William Wilkie, 269
Collinson*, Sir Richard (1811–83), 396, 405, 454
Colvile, Andrew, 115, 478
Colvile*, Eden (1819–93), 69
Comte, Isidore-Auguste-Marie-François-Xavier, 586
Condorcet, Marquis de. See Caritat
Confoulan, Marie-Louise. See Beaupré
Conger, Wilson Seymour, 389
Conilleau, Charles, 190
Connell, Ann. See Fisher
Connell, Charles (father), 190
Connell, Charles, 190–91, 287
Connell, Mary. See Palmer
Connelly, Rosanna (Mullins), 536
Connolly, Amelia (Lady Douglas), 239, 247, 248
Connolly, Louise-Catherine (Aylwin), 24
Connolly, Mary Ellen (Tremblay), 686
Connolly, Thomas Louis, 191–93, 476
Connolly*, William (1787–1849), 239
Conroy, Catherine. See McDonald
Conroy, Christine. See Le Herron
Conroy, George, 193–94, 488
Conroy*, James Herron (d. 1856), 195
Conroy, Nicholas, 194–95
Conroy, Thomas, 194
Consigny, Antoine-Pierre-Louis, 75, 576
Constantin, Jean-Baptiste, 305
Contant*, Alexis (1859–1918), 734
Conybeare, William Daniel, 445
Cook, Christopher, 282
Cook, George, 195
Cook, George J., 195
Cook*, Hermon Henry (1837–1914), 195
Cook, James William, 195–96
Cook, John (father), 195
Cook, John, 195
Cook, John L., 195
Cook, Richard, 337
Cook, Sarah. See Casselman
Cook, Simon Sephrenus, 195
Cooke, Martha (Wilkes), 702
Cooke*, Thomas (1792–1870), 137
Cooper, Sir Astley Paston, 83, 610
Cooper, James, 116, 196–97, 216, 241, 242, 243
Cooper*, James Barrett (1811–88), 211, 339
Cooper, James Fenimore, 166
Cooper*, Robert (1822?–66), 459
Cooper, William, 419
Corbett, Mrs Abigail, 307
Corbett*, Griffith Owen (fl. 1851–88), 630
Corbett, Louisa Charlotte (Boulton), 78
Corcoran. See Cocoran
Cordner*, John (d. 1894), 357
Cormack*, William Epps (1796–1868), 419
Cormier*, Charles (1813–87), 615
Cornish, Francis Evans, 197–98
Cornish, Victorine. See Clench
Cornish, William King, 197
Cornut (Cornutus), Jacques-Philippe, 106
Cornwall*, Clement Francis (1836–1910), 139
Corrigan*, Robert (d. 1856), 120
Corriveau* (Corrivaux), Marie-Josephte, dite La Corriveau (1733–63), 21
Cosson, Ernest, 82
Coster, Margaret Spencer (Carter), 140
Costigan*, John (1835–1916), 230, 557
Côté*, Augustin (1818–1904), 203, 213
Côté*, Cyrille-Hector-Octave (1809–50), 491, 545, 546, 574, 576, 633
Couch, Sarah (Bernard), 51
Coughlan, Ann (Harley), 333
Couillard, Catherine-Charlotte-Élise (Chaussegros de Léry), 162
Couillard, Jean-Baptiste-Alexandre, 435
Couillard, Marguerite. See Wilson
Courbet, Jean-Désiré-Gustave, 410
Courcy, Henry de, 87
Coursol*, Charles-Joseph (1819–88), 219, 422
Court*, James (1811–83), 672
Covert*, John (1770?–1843), 253
Cowan, Cecilia Eliza. See Douglas
Cowan, Cecilia Eliza (Young), 117
Cowan, Malcolm, 708
Cox, Charles, 198
Cox, Sophia Elizabeth. See Webb
Cox, William George, 198–99
Cracroft, Sophia, 27, 29, 247, 319, 320, 748
Craig*, Sir James Henry (1748–1812), 580
Craigie*, William (1790–1863), 607
Cramp*, John Mockett (1796–1881), 130, 295
Cramp*, Thomas (1827–85), 683, 724
Crampe, Charlotte Augustina (O'Callaghan), 555
Crampton, Sir John Fiennes Twisleton, 14
Crane*, William (d. 1853), 426, 710
Crate, Sarah (wife of WILLIAM FREDERICK), 199
Crate, William Frederick, 199–200
Craufurd, Robert, 634
Crawford, Earl of. See Lindsay
Crawford*, George (1793?–1870), 200, 631, 632
Crawford, Helen. See Sherwood

Crawford, James, 200
Crawford, John Willoughby, 171, 200–1, 561
Crawford, Margaret. See Brown
Crawford, Margaret (Ross), 632
Crawley*, Edmund Albern (1799–1888), 384, 385
Crease*, Sir Henry Pering Pellew (1825–1905), 112
Creed, Eliza (McCully), 457
Creedon, Ellen Maria (Nugent), 552
Creighton, Lucy (Binney), 66
Crémazie, Jacques (father of JACQUES and OCTAVE), 201, 202
Crémazie, Jacques, 201–2, 203, 218, 418
Crémazie, Joseph, 202
Crémazie, Louis, 202
Crémazie, Marie-Anne. See Miville
Crémazie, Octave (baptized Claude-Joseph-Olivier), 21, 105, 201, 202–5, 229
Crépin, François, 82
Croates, Margaret (MacDonnell), 470
Crofton*, John Folliot (1801–85), 168
Croix-Nord. See Trunel
Crombie, Catherine Eliza (MacKenzie), 477
Crombie*, Ernestus (1832–83), 200
Crombie, Marcus C., 477
Cronyn, Benjamin, 55, 59, 60, 84, 121, 205–10, 270
Cronyn, Benjamin (son), 206
Cronyn, Margaret. See Barton
Cronyn, Margaret (Blake), 206
Cronyn, Margaret Ann. See Bickerstaff
Cronyn, Martha. See Collins
Cronyn, Mary Elizabeth. See Dixon
Cronyn, Mary G. See Goodhue
Cronyn, Rebecca (Blake), 206
Cronyn, Sophia. See Blake
Cronyn, Thomas, 205
Cronyn, Vershoyle, 206
Crooks*, Adam (1827–85), 509
Crooks*, James (1778–1860), 53
Crooks, Jane Eliza (Bethune), 53
Crooks, Ramsay, 628
Crosby, Elisha Oscar, 587
Crosby*, Thomas (1840–1914), 701
Cross, Martha (Steeves), 665
Crossman, William, 406
Crow, Mary (O'Neill), 558
Crowther, James, 155
Crowther, Sarah Ellen (Cawthra), 155
Crozier*, Francis Rawdon Moira (1796?–1848), 29
Crozier, Thomas, 587
Cruikshank, Ann (Roger), 627
Cruikshank, John, 118
Cullen, Paul, 191, 193
Cullen, Sarah (Parkin), 587
Cullimore, Grace (Spike), 664
Culloden, Baron. See George William Frederick Charles
Cumberland, Captain, 593
Cumberland, Duke of. See Ernest Augustus
Cumming, Jane (Aumond), 23
Cumming, Margaret (Jennings), 380
Cunard*, Joseph (1798–1865), 158
Cunard*, Sir Samuel (1787–1865), 185, 187, 189, 308, 596
Cundall, Robert, 352
Cunningham, Annie. See Brown
Cunningham, Barbara. See Newlands
Cunningham, Emily. See Woodman
Cunningham, John, 210
Cunningham, Patrick, 239
Cunningham, Robert, 210–11
Cuppaidge, Rebecca (Cochran), 177
Currie, Donald, 211
Currie, William, 85
Currier*, Joseph Merrill (1820–84), 23, 441
Curry, Charles, 656
Curry, Mary Rebecca (Wilkinson), 703
Curtain, Alice (Pedley), 587
Curtis, Anne Jeanette (Miller), 514
Cushing, Catherine. See Hutchins
Cushing, Elmer, 211
Cushing, Job, 211
Cushing, Lemuel, 211–12
Cushing, Lemuel (son), 212
Cushing, Matthew, 211
Cushing, Sarah (Sally). See Rice
Cushman, Josiah, 290
Cuthbert, Margaret (Rae), 605
Cuvier, Georges-Léopold-Chrétien-Frédéric-Dagobert, Baron, 65
Cuvillier*, Augustin (1779–1849), 219, 421
Cuvillier, Marie-Angélique (Delisle), 219
Cyr*, Narcisse (1823–84), 165

DAER and Shortcleuch, Baron of. See Douglas
Daggart. See Dykert
Daignault, Angélique (Vandandaigue, dit Gadbois), 297
Dalhousie, Earl of. See Ramsay
Dallas*, Alexander Grant (1818?–82), 244, 247, 478
Dallas, Jane. See Douglas
Dalling and Bulwer, Baron. See Bulwer
Dalton, Adelaide Annabella (Young), 729
Daly*, Sir Dominick (1798–1868), 93, 255, 256, 404, 670
Daly, John Corry Wilson, 212–13
Daly, John Porter, 610
Daly, Leonora. See Mayne
Daly*, Thomas Mayne (1828–85), 213
Daly*, Thomas Mayne (1852–1911), 213
Damour*, Pierre (1811–39), 492
Dandurand, Élisabeth (Doutre), 249
Dansereau, Charles, 575
Dansereau*, Clément-Arthur (1844–1918), 374
Dansereau, Cordélie. See Hurteau
Daoust*, Charles (1825–68), 237, 249, 304, 415, 421
Darling, Amanda Jane (Chandler; Patten), 156
Darling*, Sir Charles Henry (1809–70), 141, 495
Darveau, Grégoire, 213
Darveau, Henriette. See Giguère
Darveau, Louis-Michel, 204, 213–14
Darveau, Marie. See Simpson
Darwin, Charles Robert, 65, 84, 350, 713
Daunais, Amable, 527
Dauth, Rose de Lima, 510
David*, Laurent-Olivier (1840–1926), 153, 154, 155, 176, 237, 238, 415, 421, 422, 425, 499, 533, 544, 547

David, Marie-Madeleine (Lagier), 419
Davidson, Ann (Churchill), 171
Davidson, David, 10
Davidson, John, 404
Davies. See also Davis
Davies*, Benjamin (b. 1813; fl. 1881), 473
Davies, George, 519
Davies, George Crew, 519
Davies*, Sir Louis Henry (1845–1924), 195, 679
Davies, Robert, 672
Davignon, Joseph-François, 429, 545, 694
Davin*, Nicholas Flood (1843–1901), 49
Davis, John (HBC factor), 215
Davis, John, 214–15
Davis, Mathilda, 215
Davis, Nancy, 215
Davis, Richard, 214
Davis*, Robert Atkinson (b. 1841; fl. 1898), 474
D'Avray. See Marshall
Dawson, John T., 512
Dawson*, Sir John William (1820–99), 131, 137, 338, 446, 447, 704
Dawson*, Samuel Edward (1833–1916), 346
Dawson*, Simon James (1820–1902), 342
Day*, Charles Dewey (1806–84), 135, 620
Day, Jeremiah, 215
Day, John James, 625
Day, Samuel Stearns, 215–16
Dean, James, 33, 34
Dean, Phillis. See Baptist
Dean, William Warren, 230
Deas, Fanny. See Harris
Deas, John Sullivan, 216–17
Dease*, Peter Warren (1788–1863), 407
Debartzch*, Pierre-Dominique (1782–1846), 75
Deblois, Joseph, 136
Deblois, Marie-Vénérande. See Ranvoyzé
Deblois, Marie-Vénérande-Joséphine (Caron), 136
DeBlois, Stephen Wastie, 539
Decaisne, Joseph, 106
DeCarteret, Peter, 440
DeCelles. See Duclos
Dechamps, Victor-Auguste, 542
De Cosmos*, Amor (1825–97), 116, 117, 196, 246, 697
De Grassi, A., 405
Deighton, Emma (wife of Thomas), 217
Deighton, John, 217
Deighton, Thomas, 217
Delagrave, Cyrille, 217–18
Delagrave, François, 217
Delagrave, Geneviève. See Amiot
Delagrave, Louise. See Mason
Delaney*, John (d. 1883), 688
Delaney, Mary Ann. See Kennedy
Delaney, Patrick (Roman Catholic priest), 688
Delaney, Patrick, 218–19
Delisle (DeLisle), Alexandre-Maurice, 219–21, 522, 717
Delisle, Charles-Alexandre, 220
Delisle, Émilie (Thibaudeau), 675
Delisle, Jean-Baptiste, 219
Delisle, Marie-Angélique. See Cuvillier
Delisle, Mary. See Robinson
Delisle, Maurice-Nolan, 220
Delisle, Michel-Charles, 219
Delzenne, Catherine (Pélissier; Fabre, dit Laterrière), 431
Demers*, Jérôme (1774–1853), 488
Demers, Michel, 221
Demers, Modeste, 221–22, 227
Demers, Rosalie. See Foucher
DeMill, Elisha Budd, 223
DeMill, Elizabeth. See Budd
DeMill, Nathan Smith, 223
De Mille, Elizabeth Ann. See Pryor
De Mille, James, 223–24, 269
Dénéchaud*, Claude (d. 1836), 431
Dénéchaud, Eulalie-Antoinette (Laterrière), 431
Denison, Esther Borden. See Lippincott
Denison*, George Taylor (1783–1853), 224
Denison, George Taylor, 74, 224–25
Denison*, George Taylor (1839–1925), 224, 225
Denison*, John (1755–1824), 224
Denison, Lucy Maria Charlotte (Manners-Sutton), 494
Denison, Mary Anne. See Dewson
Denison, Richard Lippincott, 225
Denison, Robert Brittain, 225
Dennis, Jane Gray (Mulkins), 536
Dennis, John, 615
Dennis*, John Stoughton (1820–85), 74, 91, 282, 558
Dennis, Maria (Bridgland), 91
Dennis, Rebecca (Richardson), 615
Denroche, Edward, 536
Dent*, John Charles (1841–88), 120, 169, 181, 565, 705
Derby, Earl of. See Stanley
Derome, Éléonore. See Pagé
Derome, François, 225
Derome, François-Magloire, 225–26
Derome, Malvina. See Langevin
Derome, Malvina (Asselin), 226
Derome, Théotiste. See Labadie
Desaulniers. See Lesieur-Desaulniers
Desautels*, Joseph (1814–81), 689
Desbarats*, Georges-Pascal (1808–64), 22, 128
DesBarres, Augustus W., 179
DesBarres*, William Frederick (1800–85), 70
DesBrisay, Helen (Pope), 593
DesBrisay*, Theophilus (b. 1816; fl. 1888), 593, 594
Deschambault. See Fleury
Deschamps. See Éno
Deshaies, Marie (Bétourné, dit La Violette), 59
Désilets, Joseph-Octave, 533
Desjardins*, Alphonse (1854–1920), 47
Desmaray, Pierre-Paul, 429, 694
De Smet, Josse, 226
De Smet, Marie-Jeanne. See Buydens
De Smet, Pierre-Jean, 221, 226–28, 391
Desnoyers, Elmire. See Leblanc
Desnoyers, Mathias-Charles, 435
Desrochers. See Brien-Desrochers
Dessane, Irma. See Trunel de La Croix-Nord
Dessane, Louis, 228
Dessane, Marie. See Maurel
Dessane, Marie-Hippolyte-Antoine, 228–29

Dessaulles, Jean, 153
Dessaulles*, Louis-Antoine (1819–95), 154, 165, 213, 237, 250, 304, 315, 316, 429, 430
Devlin, Anna Eliza. See Hickey
Devlin, Bernard, 229–30
Devlin, Catherine. See Mellany
Devlin, Charles, 229
Devlin, Owen, 229
De Winton, Francis Walter, 405
De Witt, Jabez Dean, 518
DeWitt*, Jacob (1785–1859), 591
DeWolf, Thomas Andrew Strange, 7
Dewson, Mary Anne (Denison), 224
Diamond, Abraham, 230
Diamond, Elizabeth. See Jeffers
Diamond, John, 230
Diamond, Louisa. See Coleman
Diamond, Wellington Jeffers, 230
Dick, James, 231
Dick, John, 306
Dick, Thomas, 230–31
Dickson, George D., 230
Dickson*, James (fl. 1836), 276
Dies, Jane (Nelson), 544
Dietz, George, 530
Dionne*, Narcisse-Eutrope (1848–1917), 433
Disraeli, Benjamin, 1st Earl of Beaconsfield, 140
Dixon, Alexander, 231
Dixon, Clara. See Rowsell
Dixon, Elizabeth Jane (Irving), 378
Dixon, Esther. See O'Dwyer
Dixon, G. W., 389
Dixon, Harriette Elizabeth (Boulton; Smith), 79
Dixon, Mary Elizabeth (Cronyn; Wilson), 716
Dixon, William, 231–32
Doak, James, 140
Dobie, Sophia (Robertson), 620
Dodd, Archibald Charles, 232
Dodd, Caroline Maria. See Ritchie
Dodd, Edmund Murray, 232–33
Dodd, Mary Ann Sarah. See Weeks
Dodd, Susannah. See Gibbons
Dodd, Tommy. See Clarkson, Robert Guy
Dodds, James, 306
Dodge, William W., 260, 346
Doel, Hannah. See Huntly
Doel, John, 233, 529
Doherty, Bridget. See Byrns
Doherty, Marcus, 219
Doherty, Patrick, 233
Doherty, Patrick J., 233–34
Doiron, Jérôme, 47
Dollard*, William (1789–1851), 191
Donegani*, John (1798–1868), 52
Donnelly, J. J., 556
Donnelly, James, 234–35
Donnelly, Johannah. See Magee
Donnelly, Norah. See Kennedy
Donnelly, William, 234, 235
Dorion*, Sir Antoine-Aimé (1818–91), 37, 96, 97, 99, 101, 128, 144, 145, 146, 147, 210, 213, 236, 237, 238, 258, 355, 356, 357, 415, 465, 466, 467, 533, 548, 600, 625, 632, 642, 643, 676, 724, 725
Dorion, Catherine-Louise. See Lovell
Dorion, Célina, 236
Dorion, Charles, 236
Dorion, Cyphise, dite Sœur Amable, 236
Dorion, Edmond-Jacques, 236, 237
Dorion, Eugène-Philippe, 235–36
Dorion, Eugénie (Duclos de Celles), 236
Dorion, Geneviève. See Bureau
Dorion, Henriette-Amélie. See Saint-Ours
Dorion*, Hercule (1820–89), 236
Dorion, Jacques, 235, 236
Dorion, Jane. See Clarke
Dorion*, Jean-Baptiste-Éric (1826–66), 130, 236, 237, 252, 304, 415, 512, 615
Dorion, Joseph-Adolphe, 236
Dorion, Louis-Eugène, 236
Dorion, Luce (Barcelo), 438
Dorion, Marie. See Panet
Dorion, Nérée, 236
Dorion, Pierre, 236
Dorion*, Pierre-Antoine (1789–1850), 236
Dorion, Vincislas-Paul-Wilfrid, 37, 236–38
Dorion, Mrs Vincislas-Paul-Wilfrid. See Trestler
Dorman, Mary Elizabeth (Pearkes), 587
Dorval*, Marie-Louise, dite de Sainte-Élisabeth, 480
Dorval, Pierre-Férréol, 15
Doty, James, 661
Douaire Bondy, Clotilde-Héloise (Sincennes), 657
Doucet, Marie (Bourneuf), 83
Dougall, Hannah (Armstrong), 16
Dougall*, James (1810–98), 372
Dougall*, John (1808–86), 41, 175, 672, 715
Dougall, William, 16
Doughty, Edith Rebecca. See Cameron
Douglas, Agnes (Bushby), 113, 247
Douglas, Alexander, 238
Douglas, Alice (Good; Wiederhold), 247
Douglas, Lady Amelia. See Connolly
Douglas, Cecilia (Helmcken), 247
Douglas, Cecilia Eliza (Cowan; Cameron), 115, 117, 238, 240, 243
Douglas, Frances Harriet (Wentworth-Fitzwilliam, Lady Fitzwilliam), 699
Douglas*, Sir Howard (1776–1861), 72, 271, 495
Douglas, Sir James, 6, 112, 113, 115, 116, 117, 128, 196, 198, 221, 222, 238–49, 391, 426, 478, 486, 487, 552, 587, 665, 678, 697, 701, 720
Douglas, James (son of James), 247, 248
Douglas*, James (1800–86), 13, 376, 563, 564
Douglas, Jane (Dallas), 247
Douglas, Jane Hamilton, 238
Douglas, Jessie. See Hamilton
Douglas, John (father of James), 238
Douglas, John (politician), 403
Douglas, Martha (Harris), 247
Douglas, Sir Neill, 238
Douglas*, Thomas, 5th Earl of Selkirk, Baron Daer and Shortcleuch (1771–1820), 276, 297, 324, 469
Douillet, Emanuel, 116
Doull, John, 176
Douniol, Charles, 87
Douse, William, 183, 184
Doutre, Agnès (Lanctot), 422, 425

Doutre, Élisabeth. See Dandurand
Doutre, François, 249
Doutre, Gonzalve, 249–53, 422
Doutre, Jean-Baptiste, 249
Doutre*, Joseph (1825–86), 154, 219, 252, 417, 421, 422, 613
Doutre, Laura. See Brunelle
Doutre, Léon, 422
Douville, Joseph-Antoine-Irénée, 137
Dow, Lamira (Billings), 64
Dow*, William (d. 1868), 524, 723
Downsley, Anne (Shaw), 650
Doyle*, Sir Charles Hastings (1805–83), 73, 332, 443
Drapeau*, Stanislas (1821–93), 202, 582
Draper, Henry, 253
Draper, Mary. See White
Draper*, William George (d. 1868), 258
Draper, William Henry, 60, 80, 93, 118, 119, 125, 133, 136, 173, 253–59, 311, 312, 442, 462, 463, 502, 622, 668
Drew, Andrew, 259–60, 482
Drew, John, 259
Drew, Mary. See Henderson
Drew, Mary (wife of John), 259
Drewery. See Drury
Driard, Sosthenes Maximilian, 260
Dricoll, Mr, 282
Drolet, Angélique. See Hill
Drolet, Charles (father), 260
Drolet, Charles, 77, 260–61, 346
Drolet, Charles-Joseph-René, 614
Drolet, Hélène-Flavie. See Chicoux-Duvert
Drolet, Marguerite. See Quirouet
Drouin, Marie-Angélique (Painchaud), 563
Drummond*, Sir George Alexander (1829–1910), 725
Drummond*, Lewis Thomas (1813–82), 131, 203, 219, 418, 522, 632, 715, 723, 724
Drury, Thomas, 389
Dryden, Agnes (Porter), 599
Drysdale, Alica Murray (Stewart), 667
Dubois, Joséphine (Lacoste), 417
Dubois, Marguerite (Rolette), 628
Dubord, Alexis, 423, 424
Dubord, Bridget. See Furlong
Dubord, Hippolyte, 261–62
Dubord, Louis, 261
Dubord, Marie-Antoinette. See Bourdages
Dubreuil, Félicité (Beaudry), 37
Dubuc*, Sir Joseph (1840–1914), 210
Ducharme*, Charles-Joseph (1786–1853), 153
Duchartre, Pierre-Étienne-Simon, 105
Duchesnay. See also Juchereau
Duchesnay, Louise (Gugy), 322
Duck, George, 119
Duclos* de Celles, Alfred (1843–1925), 236
Duclos de Celles, Eugénie. See Dorion
Dudevant, Baronne. See Dupin
Dufferin and Ava, Marquis of. See Blackwood
Dufferin and Ava, Lady. See Hamilton
Dufort, Delphine (Bachand), 25
Dufresne, Alexandre, 430
Dufresne, Roger, 589
Dufrost* de Lajemmerais, Marie-Marguerite (Youville) (1701–71), 492, 493, 735
Dugas, Victoire (Reynard), 614
Duggan*, George (1783–1863), 262
Duggan, George, 16, 262–63, 299
Duggan, John (father), 262
Duggan, John, 262
Duggan, Mary (wife of John, Sr), 262
Duggan, Phoebe Anne. See Armstrong
Duguay, Josephte (Tremblay), 685
Duhamel, Louise (Hurteau), 373
Dumas, Marie-Josephte-Caroline (Masson), 499
Dumont, Julie. See Valière
Dumont, Julie (Leblanc), 435
Dumont, Philippe, 435
Dumouchel*, Léandre (1811–82), 499
DuMoulin*, John Philip (1834–1911), 207
Dumoulin*, Pierre-Benjamin (1798–1856), 526
Duncan, James (politician), 211
Duncan*, James (1805–81), 412
Duncan, Mary Tufton (Dundas), 264
Duncanson, Robert Stuart, 263–64
Duncombe*, Charles (1792–1867), 489
Dundas, George, 264–65, 352, 595, 612
Dundas, James, 264
Dundas, Mary. See Clark
Dundas, Mary Tufton. See Duncan
Dunlop*, William (1792–1848), 334, 536
Dunn*, John Henry (d. 1854), 62, 79, 343, 528, 529, 619
Dunn, Mathilde. See Leblanc
Dunn*, Oscar (1844–85), 415, 416, 417, 430, 435
Dupin, Aurore, Baronne Dudevant (George Sand), 410
Dupin, Pierre, 33
Duplessis. See Sirois
Duprat, Jean, 599
Dupuis, Alphonsine. See Saint-Onge
Dupuis (Dupuy), Anastasie (Landry), 426
Dupuis, Euphrasie. See Richard
Dupuis, Joseph, 265
Dupuis*, Joseph-Nazaire-Odilon (1871–1941), 265
Dupuis, Marie-Louise-Élisabeth (Clerk), 175
Dupuis, Nazaire, 265–66
Dupuy, Françoise. See Richard
Dupuy, Jean-Baptiste, 266–67
Dupuy, Joseph, 266
Dupuytren, Guillaume, Baron, 236
Duquette, Geneviève, 614
Durand, James, 359
Durfee, Amos, 482
Durham, Earl of. See Lambton
Durnford*, Elias Walker (1775–1850), 30
Durocher, Flavien, 267–68, 532
Durocher, Geneviève (Durocher), 267
Durocher*, Jean-Baptiste-Amable (1754–1811), 567
Durocher, Olivier-Amable, 267
Dusablé, Marie (Germain), 305
Duval, Edmund Hillyer, 268
Duval, Elizabeth. See Wood
Duval*, Jean-François-Joseph (1802–81), 120
Duval, Peter, 268
Duval, Sarah. See Turner
Duvernay, Louis-Napoléon, 374

Duvernay*, Ludger (1799–1852), 75, 374, 491, 492, 526, 546, 567, 568, 576, 577, 581
Duvert. See Chicoux-Duvert
Dyer, Matilda (Hilyard), 349
Dykert, Gertrude (Niles), 549

EARLY, Bernard, 268
Early, Mary (wife of Bernard), 268
Early, May Agnes (Fleming), 44, 268–69
Easton, Robert, 660
Eaton, Amos, 504
Ebierbing (Joe), 327, 328
Eccles, Anna (Lewis), 441
Edelston, Marie-Madeleine. See Bibeau, dit Portugal
Eden, Robert, 278
Edes, Mary (Howe), 362
Edinburgh, Duke of. See Alfred Ernest Albert
Edmond, Janet (Logan), 444
Edward VII, King of Great Britain and Ireland, 31, 74, 121, 145, 146, 220, 319, 351, 529, 625, 668, 726
Edward Augustus, Duke of Kent and Strathern, 13
Égalité, Philippe. See Orléans, Louis-Philippe-Joseph, Duc d'
Egan*, John (1811–57), 23
Egremont, Earl of. See Wyndham
Eichwald, Carl Eduard von, 65
Elgee, Jane (McClure), 454
Elgin, Earl of. See Bruce
Ellice*, Edward (1781–1863), 546
Ellice, Edward, 470
Elliot, Adam (father), 269
Elliot (Elliott), Adam, 12, 269–70
Elliot, Charlotte. See Racey
Elliot, Eliza Beulah. See Howells
Elliot, Margaret. See Little
Elliot, Sir Thomas Frederick, 567
Elliot, William, 450
Ellis, Anne (Jarvis), 270
Ellis, Frances Elizabeth (Grey), 318
Ellis, Isabella (Cogswell), 182
Ellis, John, 270
Ellis, Rhoda Anne. See Benton
Elmsley*, John (1801–63), 662
Elrington, Elisabeth Golding (Marshall), 497
Elwyn*, Thomas (d. 1888), 112
Emerson, Ralph Waldo, 537
Empey, Eve (VanKoughnet), 693
End, Lucy. See Morse
End, William, 270–72
Enemikeese. See Vandusen, Conrad
Engels, Friedrich, 670
Enniskillen. See Willoughby
Éno, dit Deschamps, Joséphine (Meilleur), 505
Énolle, Michelle (Bourneuf), 83
Épée, Charles-Michel de l', 298
Erlan, Anne. See Kilgallen
Erlandson, Erland, 272–73, 284
Ermatinger, Lieutenant, 694
Ermatinger, Achsah. See Burnham
Ermatinger*, Charles Oakes (1780?–1853), 273
Ermatinger, Edward, 273–74
Ermatinger*, Francis (1798–1858), 273, 486
Ermatinger*, Lawrence (d. 1789), 273
Ermatinger, Lawrence Edward, 273
Ernest Augustus, Duke of Cumberland and King of Hanover, 121, 309
Erxleben, C. A. (Miertsching), 513
Esson*, Henry (1793–1853), 606
Evans, Ann. See Thomas
Evans, Catherine. See Jones
Evans*, Ephraim (1803–92), 616, 701
Evans*, James (1801–46), 4, 373
Evans, John, 274–75
Evans, John J., 335
Evans, Martha (Evans), 274
Evans, Samuel, 10
Evans, Taliesin, 274
Evans, Thomas, 10
Evans, William, 10
Évanturel*, François (1821–91), 203, 213
Evarts, William Maxwell, 63
Everett, Alexander Hill, 606
Ewart, Thomas, 359
Exmouth, Viscount. See Pellew
Eynard, Jacques, 275
Eynard, Marie-Anne-Agathe. See Lévêque
Eynard, Marie-Germain-Émile, 275–76

FABRE*, Édouard-Charles (1827–96), 151, 252, 658
Fabre*, Édouard-Raymond (1799–1854), 52, 151, 236, 554, 555, 575
Fabre*, Sir Hector (1834–1910), 151, 154, 262, 304
Fabre, Hortense (Cartier), 151
Fabre, dit Laterrière, Catherine. See Delzenne
Fabre*, dit Laterrière, Pierre (1747–1815), 431
Fairbanks*, Charles Rufus (1790–1841), 383, 551
Fairchild*, George Moore (1854–1912), 413
Falcon, Mary. See Grant
Falcon, Pierre (father), 276
Falcon, Pierre (Pierriche), 276–77
Falconer, Henrietta (Roebuck), 626
Falkland, Viscount. See Cary
Fane, Lady Cecilia Georgiana, 593
Faraud*, Henri (1823–90), 275, 614
Faribault*, Georges-Barthélemi (1789–1866), 21
Farley, Anne (Scatcherd), 644
Farnham, Elizabeth (Clarkson), 174
Farquharson, Janet (Cameron), 114
Farr, Timothy J., 450
Farrell, James, 277
Farrell, Joan. See Patterson
Farrell, John, 277–78, 662
Farrell, Patrick, 234
Farwell, Abel, 371
Faucher* de Saint-Maurice, Narcisse-Henri-Édouard (1844–97), 163, 432
Faulkner, Elizabeth. See Trefry
Fauquier*, Frederick Dawson (1817–81), 56
Fauteux*, Ægidius (1876–1941) 41, 418
Favell, Mary (McKay), 475
Fawcett, Edgar, 260
Feild, Edward, 278–81, 318, 663
Feild, James, 278
Feild, Sophia. See Bevan
Fellenberg, Philipp Emanuel von, 497
Feller, Henriette. See Odin

Felton, Anna Maria. See Valls
Felton, Clara. See Lloyd
Felton, Eliza Margaret (Aylwin), 24
Felton*, William Bowman (1785–1866), 282
Felton, William Hughes, 282
Felton, William Locker Pickmore, 249, 281–82
Fenety*, George Edward (1812–99), 271, 287, 543, 711, 712
Fenton, John, 199
Ferdinand I, King of the Two Sicilies, 59, 497
Ferguson, Andrew, 282
Ferguson, Emily. See Gowan
Ferguson, Frances Jane. See Gowan
Ferguson*, Robert (1768–1851), 271
Ferguson, Thomas Roberts, 78, 282–83, 313, 623
Fergusson, Adam Johnston. See Blair
Fergusson, Mary, 670
Ferland*, Jean-Baptiste-Antoine (1805–65), 13, 87, 105, 203, 432
Fernald, Merritt Lyndon, 106
Ferrara, Francesco, 608
Ferres, James Moir, 321
Ferrier*, James (1800–88), 522, 524, 725
Fife, Agnes. See Hutchinson
Fife, David, 283–84
Fife, Jane. See Beckett
Fife, John, 283
Finlayson*, Duncan (1796?–1862), 284, 484
Finlayson, Elizabeth. See Kennedy
Finlayson, Nicol, 272, 284
Finlayson*, Roderick (1818–92), 242
Fish, Elizabeth (Foster), 293
Fish, Hamilton, 102
Fisher, Amelia. See Hatfield
Fisher, Ann (Connell), 191
Fisher, Charles, 140, 158, 159, 191, 271, 284–90, 494, 495, 666, 682, 710, 711, 712, 713
Fisher, Christine (Monro), 528
Fisher, Edwin Colley, 290
Fisher, Henry, 287, 628
Fisher, Irving, 608
Fisher, Isabella (Munn), 538
Fisher*, James (fl. 1783–1816), 375, 563
Fisher, John, 290
Fisher, John Arbuthnot, 1st Baron Fisher, 397
Fisher, Mary. See Colley
Fisher, Peter, 284
Fisher, Sarah. See Sykes
Fisher, Sarah Maria. See Thomson
Fisher, Susanna. See Williams
Fisher, Thomas, 290–91
Fitzbach, Marie, dite du Sacré-Cœur (Roy), 603
FitzGibbon*, James (1780–1863), 118, 344, 557
Fitzpatrick*, Sir Charles (1853–1942), 136
Fitzpatrick, Corine. See Caron
Fitzpatrick, John Bernard, 87
Fitzwilliam. See Wentworth-Fitzwilliam
Fitzwilliam, Lady. See Douglas
Fleming, Andrew Greig, 291
Fleming, Ann Cuthbert. See Rae
Fleming, Charles, 499
Fleming, Elizabeth. See Arnot
Fleming, James, 606
Fleming*, John (1786–1832), 606
Fleming, John Arnot, 291
Fleming, May Agnes. See Early
Fleming*, Michael Anthony (1792–1850), 180, 279, 398, 399, 553, 600, 601, 687, 688
Fleming*, Sir Sandford (1827–1915), 291, 466, 630
Fleming, William John, 269
Fletcher, Edward Charles, 291
Fletcher, Ellen Mary. See Shore
Fletcher, Frances. See Marsham
Fletcher, Harriet. See Marsham
Fletcher, Henry Charles, 291–92
Fletcher*, James Hayden (d. 1910), 211
Flett, George, 549, 550
Fleury de La Gorgendière, Marie-Louise (Juchereau Duchesnay), 388
Fleury* Deschambault, Louis-Joseph (1756–1824), 544
Flint, G. H., 346
Flood, Margaret (Cocoran), 176
Florence, Marguerite (Arraud), 16
Foley*, Michael Hamilton (1820–70), 465, 466
Fontaine, Josephte (Bachand), 24
Fontaine, Jules. See Crémazie, Octave
Foote, Phylina (Jones; Smart), 659
Forbes, Eliza (Holton), 354
Forbin-Janson*, Charles-Auguste-Marie-Joseph de (1785–1844), 220, 419, 421, 604, 689
Forget, Anastase, 266
Forgie, Helen (Shaw), 650
Forman, James (father), 292
Forman, James, 7, 292–93
Forman, Margaret Ann. See Richardson
Forman, Mary. See Gardner
Forrester*, Alexander (1805–69), 362, 534
Forsyth, Elizabeth Magdalene. See Anderson
Forsyth, Joseph Bell, 10
Forsyth, Thomas, 10
Fortier, Angelica (Hall), 329
Fortier, Marie-Josephte (Turcotte), 690
Fortier, Thomas, 576
Foster, Asa Belknap, 293–94
Foster*, Colley Lyons Lucas (d. 1843), 104
Foster, Elizabeth. See Fish
Foster, Sally. See Belknap
Foster, Samuel Willard, 157
Foster*, Stephen Sewell (1791–1868), 293
Fothergill*, Charles (1782–1840), 5
Foucher, Rosalie (Demers), 221
Fourier, François-Marie-Charles, 315, 585
Fox, Charles James, 573
Franchère*, Gabriel (1786–1863), 414
Franchère, Rose (Laberge), 414
Franck, César, 228
Frank, Jacob, 12
Franklin*, Benjamin (1706–90), 335
Franklin, Edward, 295
Franklin, Eleanor Anne. See Porden
Franklin, Lady Jane. See Griffin
Franklin*, Sir John (1786–1847), 26, 27, 28, 29, 38, 42, 89, 319, 320, 327, 328, 396, 397, 407, 408, 453, 454, 513, 514, 561, 562, 748
Franklin, Lewis, 294

Franklin, Lumley, 113, 294–95
Franklin, Miriam. See Abraham
Franklin, Selim, 295
Franklyn, William Hayles, 199
Fransoni, Joseph, 53
Fransoni, Luigi, 479
Fraser, Miss (Needham), 543
Fraser*, Alexander (1785?–1853), 462, 463
Fraser, Christina (Holmes), 353
Fraser*, John (d.1795), 162
Fraser, Josephte (Chaussegros de Léry), 162
Fraser*, Malcolm (1733?–1815), 22
Fraser*, Simon (1776–1862), 720
Fraser, Wilhelmine-Anaïs. See Aubert de Gaspé
Fraser, William, 20
Frasse, Louis, Vicomte de Plainval, 59
Fréchette, Jean-Baptiste, 580, 582, 583
Fréchette*, Louis-Honoré (1839–1908), 203
Frederick, Lucy (Young), 728
Freeman, Joseph, 36
Freer, Noah, 518
Frémont, Caroline-Alix. See Beaubien
Frémont*, Charles-Jacques (1806–62), 376
Frémont*, Jules-Joseph-Taschereau (1855–1902), 37
Friel*, Henry James (d. 1869), 45
Frobisher*, Sir Martin (1539?–94), 327
Frothingham, John, 335, 717
Frowd, Elizabeth Speed (Beaven), 40
Frowd, John Speed, 40
Fryfogle, Sebastian, 213
Fulford*, Francis (1803–68), 58, 548
Fuller, Robert, 172
Fuller*, Thomas Brock (1810–84), 55, 56
Fullerton, Helen (Clarke), 172
Funcken, Eugene, 277
Funcken, Louis G. F. H., 277
Furlong, Bridget (Dubord), 262
Fyfe, Jane. See Thomson
Fyfe, Rebecca S. See Kendall
Fyfe, Robert Alexander, 295–96

GABOURY (Gabourie), Charles, 296
Gaboury, Marie-Anne (Lagemodière), 296–97
Gaboury, Marie-Anne. See Tessier
Gadbois. See Vandandaigue
Gadbois, Albine, dite Marie de Bonsecours, 297–99
Gadbois, Azilda, 298
Gadbois, Malvina, 298
Gadbois, Philomène, 298
Gagnon*, Ernest (1834–1915), 228
Gagnon, Julien, dit Lucien, 545, 546
Gagnon*, Philéas (1854–1915), 19
Gale, Mary Ann (Needham), 543
Galt*, Sir Alexander Tilloch (1817–93), 10, 45, 46, 99, 100, 128, 131, 144, 145, 147, 231, 282, 326, 327, 355, 466, 548, 591, 631, 632, 641, 642, 643, 645, 674, 679, 684, 708, 717, 722, 725
Galt*, John (1779–1839), 706
Galt*, Sir Thomas (1815–1901), 632
Gamble, Clarke, 610
Gamble, Isabella Elizabeth. See Clarke
Gamble*, John (1755–1811), 299
Gamble, John William, 121, 262, 299–300
Gamble, Mary. See Macaulay
Gamble, Matilda. See Atkinson
Gamble, Minerva Anne. See Niles
Gamble*, William (1805–81), 290, 299
Gamelin, Marie-Émilie-Eugénie. See Tavernier
Ganong*, William Francis (1864–1941), 704
Gape, John. See Gowan, Robert
Gapper, Mary Sophia (O'Brien), 554
Gardiner, Anna. See Lane
Gardiner, Henry Lynedoch, 406
Gardiner, Sarah Sophia (Haszard), 339
Gardner, Mary (Forman), 292
Gardner, Mary Ann (Bouchette), 77
Gardner, Sarah (Townsend), 685
Garibaldi, Giuseppe, 304
Garland, John Bingley, 50
Garneau, Alfred, 203
Garneau*, François-Xavier (1809–66), 13, 21, 132, 165, 203, 218, 583, 635
Garnot, Pierre, 153
Garriépy, Marie-Reine (Renaud), 613
Garrigues de Saint-Fauste, Marie-Josèphe-Jeanne (Belvèze), 48
Garvie, John, 300
Garvie, William, 300–1, 460
Gaspé. See Aubert
Gass, George Wright, 719
Gastonguay, Louise (Lemaire), 437
Gates*, Horatio (1777–1834), 440, 518
Gaudin, James, 112
Gaulin*, Rémi (1787–1857), 322
Gauthier, Agapit, 301
Gauthier, Amable, 301
Gauthier, Antoine, 301
Gauthier, Augustin, 301
Gauthier, Euphrosine. See Gendron
Gauthier, Félix-Odilon, 301–2
Gauthier, Gosephte. See Girardin
Gauthier, Louis-Zéphirin, 301
Gauthier, Marie. See Trudelle
Gauthier, Marie-Sophie. See Lapane
Gauthier, dit Saint-Germain, Louise (Krieghoff), 408, 409, 410
Gauvreau, Félicité. See Le Maître-Bellenoix
Gauvreau, Ferdinand-Edmond, 302
Gauvreau, Louis (father of FERDINAND-EDMOND), 302
Gauvreau, Louis (husband of Félicité Le Maître-Bellenoix), 503
Gauvreau, Marie-Anne. See Barbeau
Gavazzi*, Alessandro (1808–89), 164, 487, 715
Gay, Antoinette (Regnaud), 611
Geddes, Anne Catherine (Macaulay), 453
Geddes*, John Gamble (1811–91), 607
Geddie, Charlotte Lenora Harrington. See MacDonald
Geddie, John (father), 302
Geddie, John, 302–3, 308
Geddie, Mary. See Menzies
Gélina, Évariste, 303–5, 580
Gélinas, Jean, 304
Gélinas, Joseph, 304
Gélinas, Mathilde-Sabine. See Parent
Gélinas, Théotiste. See Hudon-Beaulieu

Gélineau, Étienne, 304
Gemmell, Robert, 124
Gemmill, John Robert, 127
Gendron, Euphrosine (Gauthier), 301
Genevay, Charlotte Magenty. See Mount
Geoffrion*, Christophe-Alphonse (1843–99), 316
George III, King of Great Britain and Ireland, 142, 503
George IV, King of Great Britain and Ireland, 19, 189, 503
George William Frederick Charles, 2nd Duke of Cambridge, Earl of Tipperary, and Baron Culloden, 291, 292, 695
Géricault, Théodore, 392
Gérin*, Elzéar (1843–87), 148
Gérin-Lajoie*, Antoine (1824–82), 133, 203, 267, 304, 432, 580, 584
Gérin-Lajoie, Joséphine-Henriette. See Parent
Germain, Césaire, 305
Germain, Césaire-Ernest, 305
Germain, Édouard-Pépin, 305
Germain, Jean-Baptiste, 305
Germain, Joseph-Gérasime, 305
Germain, Marie. See Dusablé
Germain, Zoé. See Pépin
Gerrard*, Samuel (1767–1857), 524
Geyer, Marianne von (Belcher), 42
Gibb, Isaac Jones, 523
Gibbons, Susannah (Dodd), 232
Gibbs*, Thomas Nicholson (1821–83), 128
Gibson*, David (1804–64), 91, 344
Gibson, Janet (Young), 722
Giffard* de Moncel, Robert (1587–1668), 18, 579
Giguère, Henriette (Darveau), 214
Gilbert, Moses, 354, 357
Gillespie, Alexander, 394
Gillespie*, Robert (1785–1863), 394
Gillies, John, 176
Gilmor, Charles Todd, 74
Gilmour, Allan (uncle of JOHN), 305, 306
Gilmour*, Allan (1805–84), 305, 306
Gilmour*, Allan (1816–95), 306
Gilmour, Caroline. See White
Gilmour, David, 305, 306
Gilmour, James, 306
Gilmour, John (father of JOHN), 305
Gilmour*, John (1791–1869), 295
Gilmour, John, 305–6
Gilmour, Margaret (Rubidge), 635
Gilmour, Margaret. See Urie
Gilmour, Matilda. See White
Gilpin*, John Bernard (1810–92), 362
Gingras, Léon, 87
Gipps, Sir George, 706
Girardin, Gosephte (Gauthier), 301
Girod*, Amury (d. 1837), 307, 574
Girouard*, Désiré (1836–1911), 600
Girouard*, Jean-Joseph (1795–1855), 306, 499, 574, 655
Girouard, Mathilde. See Prat
Glackmeyer*, Louis-Édouard (1793–1881), 105, 132
Gladman*, George (1800–63), 273, 481
Gladstone, William Ewart, 58, 368, 443
Glass, Henry, 124
Glass, John, 724
Glencairn, Lord. See Gordon, Lord Gordon
Glenelg, Baron. See Grant
Glenn, Margaret Emma (Marshall d'Avray), 497
Globensky, Auguste-France, 306
Globensky, Frédéric-Eugène, 306
Globensky, Hortense (Prévost), 306–7
Globensky, Marie-Françoise. See Brousseau, dit Lafleur de Verchères
Globensky*, Maximilien (1793–1866), 307
Gloux, Olivier. See Aimard, Gustave
Glover, Amelia (Jarvis), 379
Glynn, Hannah (McClure), 455
Goderich, Viscount. See Robinson
Goggins, Sarah (Blanchard), 70
Goldie, Thomas Leigh, 326
Golpin, Mary (Hunt), 372
Gooch, Sir Daniel, 331
Good, Alice. See Douglas
Good, Charles, 247
Good, James, 331
Gooderham, Henry, 331
Goodhue*, George Jervis (1799–1870), 206, 403
Goodhue, Mary G. (Cronyn), 206
Goodrich, Samuel Griswold, 527
Gordon. See Hamilton-Gordon
Gordon*, Sir Arthur Hamilton, 1st Baron Stanmore (1829–1912), 101, 140, 160, 192, 265, 288, 289, 332, 340, 495, 713
Gordon, Elizabeth Amelia. See Macdonald
Gordon, Ellen Catherine. See Powell
Gordon, George (George Herbert, John Herbert Charles). See Gordon, Lord Gordon
Gordon*, George Nicol (1822–61), 303, 308
Gordon, Lord Gordon, 307–8
Gordon, James Douglas, 303, 308
Gordon, John (father of JAMES DOUGLAS), 308
Gordon, John (lumber merchant), 33
Gordon, John William, 406
Gordon, Mary. See Ramsey
Gordon, Thomas, 33
Gore*, Sir Charles Stephen (1793–1869), 236
Gore, Graham, 28
Gosford, Earl. See Acheson
Gosselin*, Amédée-Edmond (1863–1941), 735
Gosselin, Antoine, 690
Gosselin*, Auguste-Honoré (1843–1918), 611
Gosselin, Joseph, 308
Gosselin, Josephte. See Pageot
Gosselin, Scholastique, 308–9
Gosset, William Driscoll, 246
Goudie, Catherine (Workman), 717
Gouin, Georges-Alexandre, 33
Gould, Ira, 591, 717, 723
Gould, Jay, 307
Gourlay*, Robert Fleming (1778–1863), 705, 706
Gowan, Alice. See Hitchcock
Gowan, Aliza Amelia (Peck), 313
Gowan, Emily (Ferguson), 314
Gowan, Frances Jane (Ferguson), 282, 313
Gowan, Francis Anne. See Turner
Gowan, Harcourt, 313

Gowan*, Sir James Robert (1815–1909), 314
Gowan, John Hunter, 309
Gowan, Margaret. See Hogan
Gowan, Nassau C., 313
Gowan, Ogle Robert, 80, 109, 110, 118, 121, 255, 282, 299, 309–14, 325, 360, 554
Gowan, Robert, 314–15
Gower, Elizabeth. See Logan
Graham, Elizabeth. See Grant
Graham, Ketchum, 230
Grahame*, James Allan (1825–1905), 486
Grandin*, Vital-Justin (1829–1902), 556, 614
Grant, Charles, Baron Glenelg, 62, 63, 189, 342, 343, 344, 345, 600, 601, 619, 710, 711, 712
Grant, Charles William, 5^e Baron de Longueuil, 428, 429
Grant, Christina Theresa (Keefer), 394
Grant*, Cuthbert (d. 1799), 276
Grant*, Cuthbert (1796?–1854), 276
Grant, Elizabeth (McKenzie; Graham), 476
Grant*, George Monro (1835–1902), 44, 193, 369
Grant, James, 462
Grant*, Sir James Alexander (1831–1920), 128
Grant, Marie-Charles-Joseph. See Le Moyne de Longueuil
Grant, Mary (Falcon), 276
Grant, Ulysses Simpson, 316, 328, 485, 556, 559
Grant*, William Lawson (1872–1935), 369
Grasett*, Henry James (1808–82), 54, 55
Grassie, George, 293
Gravel, J.-A., 236
Graves, Robert James, 83
Gray, Asa, 82, 106
Gray*, John Hamilton (1812–87), 594, 595, 596, 597, 679
Gray*, John Hamilton (1814–89), 287, 289, 543
Gray, Mary (Bidwell), 60
Gray, Thomas, 537
Greeley, Horace, 315–16
Greeley, Mary. See Woodburn
Greeley, Mary Youngs. See Cheney
Greeley, Zaccheus, 315
Greely, Jonathan, 624
Green, Anson, 316–18, 358, 638
Green, Columbus H., 318
Green, Eliza, 318
Green, Hannah (Hopkins), 358
Green, Jacob, 65
Green, John, 358
Green, Joseph, 316
Green, Lydia. See Vorce
Green, Rachel. See Hopkins
Green, Susan (Baddeley), 29
Green, William Saunders Sebright, 587
Greene, Lucy Huntington (Atwater), 18
Gregory XVI, 53
Gregory*, John (1806–61), 497
Greive*, Edward (1797–1845), 32
Grenier, Gabriel, 580
Grenier, Marie-Angélique (Paré), 578
Grenier, Marie-Mathilde-Henriette (Parent), 580
Grey, Frances Elizabeth. See Ellis
Grey, Sir George, 116, 494
Grey, Harriet. See White
Grey, Harry, 318
Grey, Sir Henry George, Viscount Howick and 3rd Earl Grey, 158, 179, 184, 257, 285, 342, 434, 712
Grey, William, 280, 318–19
Grey, William, 9th Earl of Stamford, 318
Griffen, Mary (Ryerson), 640
Griffin, Henry, 519, 520
Griffin, Jane (Lady Franklin), 247, 319–20, 407, 478, 562, 563, 748
Griffin, John, 319
Griffin, Mary. See Guillemard
Griffin, Mary (Simpkinson), 320
Griffith. See App-Griffith
Grinnell, Henry, 27, 319, 327, 328
Grondin, Élisabeth (Proulx), 602
Grosbois. See Boucher
Groulx*, Lionel-Adolphe (1878–1967), 569
Guévremont, Jean-Baptiste, 657
Gugy, Bartholomew Conrad Augustus, 320–22, 326, 337
Gugy, Juliana. See O'Connor
Gugy*, Louis (1770–1840), 320 502
Gugy, Louise. See Duchesnay
Gugy, Mary. See McGrath
Guibord, dit Archambault, Henriette. See Brown
Guibord*, dit Archambault, Joseph (d. 1869), 154, 527, 689
Guigues, Bruno, 322
Guigues, Joseph-Bruno, 107, 108, 322–24, 429, 609, 662
Guigues, Thérèse. See Richier
Guillemard, Mary (Griffin), 319
Guillemot, Eugène, 568
Guillon, Augustine-Marie (Reboul), 609
Guizot, François-Pierre-Guillaume, 611
Gunn, Donald, 324–25
Gunn, Jean (Manson), 495
Gunn, Margaret. See Swain
Gunn, William 324
Gurnett*, George (1792?–1861), 310, 528
Guthrie, George James, 660
Guy, Charlotte (Berthelet), 53
Guy, Louis, 53
Guyon, Marie-Anne (Tétreau), 674
Gwynne, Anne Murray. See Powell
Gwynne, Eliza. See Nelson
Gwynne*, John Wellington (1814–1902), 325
Gwynne, Margaret Robinson. See Barr
Gwynne, William, 325
Gwynne, William Charles, 325–26
Gzowski*, Sir Casimir Stanislaus (1813–98), 258, 355, 356, 404

HACKETT, William, 691
Hadden, Lieutenant, 691
Hagarty*, Sir John Hawkins (1816–1900), 561
Hagerman*, Christopher Alexander (1792–1847), 62, 63, 119, 253, 254, 257, 259, 310, 311, 668, 705, 706
Hagerman, Daniel, 60
Hagerman, Mary Jane (Robinson), 371
Haggart*, John Graham (1836–1913), 294
Haine, Mercy (Coles), 183

Halcro*, Joshua (d. 1825), 720
Haldane*, John (d. 1857), 477
Hale, Edward (uncle of EDWARD), 326
Hale, Edward, 321, 326–27
Hale, Edward John, 326
Hale, Eliza Cecilia. See Bowen
Hale, Elizabeth Frances. See Amherst
Hale*, Jeffrey (1803–64), 326
Hale*, John (1765–1838), 326
Haliburton*, Robert Grant (1831–1901), 362
Haliburton*, Thomas Chandler (1796–1865), 72, 363, 364, 539
Hall, Abraham Oakey, 555
Hall, Angelica. See Fortier
Hall, Charles Francis, 320, 327–29
Hall, Frederick, 504
Hall, George Benson (father), 329
Hall, George Benson, 33, 329–30
Hall, James, 65, 445, 446
Hall, Mary Jane. See Patterson
Hall, Peter Patterson, 329
Halliburton*, Sir Brenton (1775–1860), 140, 189, 387
Halliburton, John Croke, 364
Halliburton, Margaret (Collins), 189
Hallowell, Elizabeth (Bethune), 58
Halpen, Helen (Sexton), 646
Haly, Aylmer, 330
Haly, Harriett. See Hebden
Haly, Richard O'Grady, 330
Haly, Sir William O'Grady, 330
Hamel, André-Remi, 131
Hamel, Charles, 21
Hamel, Joseph, 30
Hamel*, Théophile (1817–70), 715
Hamel*, Thomas-Étienne (1830–1913), 135, 432, 589, 735
Hamilton, Alicia (Killaly), 402
Hamilton, Anne. See Kilgallen
Hamilton, Elizabeth Ann (Anderson), 12
Hamilton, Hariot Georgiana, Lady Dufferin and Ava (Blackwood), 292
Hamilton, Herbert. See Gordon, Lord Gordon
Hamilton, James Matthew, 12
Hamilton, Jessie (Douglas), 238
Hamilton, Mary (Taylor), 673
Hamilton, William, 330–31
Hamilton, William (son), 331
Hamilton-Gordon, George, 4th Earl of Aberdeen, 55
Hamlin, Laura (Miller), 514
Hammond, Theodosia Elizabeth (Back), 29
Hampden. See Hart, Adolphus Mordecai
Handy, Martha Jane (Killaly), 402
Haney, Mary Jane. See Todd
Hanna, Margaret Nelson (Aylwin), 24
Hannah. See Tookolito
Hannay*, James (1842–1910), 140, 271, 543, 714
Hanrahan, Edmund, 331–32
Hanrahan, Mary (wife of EDMUND), 332
Harbidge, George, 108
Hardee, William Joseph, 648
Harding, Francis Pym, 332
Harding*, Harris (1761–1854), 214
Hardy*, Campbell (1831–1919), 362
Hargrave*, James (1798–1865), 485
Hargrave, Letitia. See Mactavish
Harley, Ann. See Coughlan
Harley, John, 332–33
Harley, Mary Ann, 333
Harley, William, 332, 333
Harper, Jerome, 333–34
Harper*, Thaddeus (1829–98), 333, 334
Harrington, Harriet Amelia (Van Cortlandt), 691
Harrington, Maria (McLachlin), 480
Harriott*, John Edward (1797–1866), 391
Harriott, Rachel (Bunn), 111
Harris, Alexander, 334–35
Harris, Dennis, 247
Harris, Elijah, 124
Harris, Elizabeth. See Atkinson
Harris, Fanny (Deas), 216
Harris, Lucy. See Charles
Harris, Martha. See Douglas
Harris, Mary. See Redford
Harris, Thomas Dennie, 335–36
Harris, Ursula Sarah. See Carr
Harris, William (Bible Christian minister), 511
Harris, William (minister of the Independent Congregation), 334
Harris, William Robert, 335
Harrison, Anna E. See Muckle
Harrison, Frances. See Butler
Harrison, Gilbert Henry, 617
Harrison, James, 617
Harrison, Kennithina Johana. See Mackay
Harrison, Mary (Medcalf), 504
Harrison, Richard, 336
Harrison, Robert Alexander, 123, 336–37
Harrison*, Samuel Bealey (1802–67), 254, 255, 404
Harrison, Thomas, 617
Harrison, William Henry, 483
Hart*, Aaron (1724–1800), 337
Hart, Aaron Philip, 337
Hart, Adolphus Mordecai, 337–38
Hart*, Benjamin (1779–1855), 337
Hart, Constance Hatton (Hart), 337
Hart*, Ezekiel (d. 1843), 337
Hart, Frances. See Lazarus
Hart*, Gerald Ephraim (1849–1936), 337
Hart, Theodore, 724
Hartley, Edward, 445
Hartman*, Joseph (d. 1859), 725
Hartt, Charles Frederick, 338
Hartt, Jarvis William, 338
Hartt, Lucy. See Lynde
Hartt, Prudence. See Brown
Harvey, Agnes (Northup), 551
Harvey*, Daniel Cobb (1886–1966), 363
Harvey, Lady Elizabeth. See Lake
Harvey*, Sir John (1778–1852), 50, 278, 365, 385, 386, 433, 438, 551, 553, 601, 710, 712
Harwood. See Lotbinière
Haslett, John James, 45
Hasseltine, Nancy Judson (Sanborn), 643
Haszard, George, 339
Haszard, James Douglas, 339
Haszard, Jane (wife of Thomas Rhodes), 339

Haszard, Sarah Sophia. See Gardiner
Haszard, Susanna Jane. See Nelmes
Haszard, Thomas Rhodes, 339
Hatfield, Amelia (Fisher), 285, 287
Hatheway, Calvin Luther, 339
Hatheway, George Luther, 339–41
Hatheway, Martha. See Slason
Hatheway, Sarah (wife of Calvin Luther), 339
Hatt*, Richard (1769–1819), 436
Hatt, Susan (Leeming), 436
Hatton, Sarah (Johnston), 382
Haviland*, Thomas Heath (1796–1867), 161
Haviland*, Thomas Heath (1822–95), 597
Hawe, Ellen (O'Callaghan), 555
Hawkins*, Alfred (1802?–54), 627
Hawkins*, Ernest (1802–68), 40
Hawkins, Harriett (Molesworth), 516
Hawkins, John Summerfield, 449
Hawley, Margaret Waugh. See Buckham
Haws*, John (1797–1858), 349
Hawthorne, Margaret (Taylor), 671
Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 347
Hays*, Moses Judah (1789–1861), 405
Haythorne*, Robert Poore (1815–91), 597
Hazen, Deborah. See Murray
Hazen, Robert Leonard, 285, 341–42, 711, 712
Hazen, Sarah Ann. See Botsford
Hazen*, William (1738–1814), 341
Hazen*, William (1768–1816), 341
Hazlewood, Samuel, 342
Head, Anna Gabriella (Mendes; Roper), 342
Head*, Sir Edmund Walker (1805–68), 97, 131, 140, 158, 181, 258, 285, 286, 342, 356, 464, 494, 543, 644, 647, 666, 712, 713
Head, Frances Anne. See Burges
Head, Sir Francis Bond, 62, 63, 124, 233, 253, 254, 310, 311, 317, 342–45, 484, 530, 607, 618, 619, 622, 641, 646, 693
Head, James Roper Mendes, 342
Head, Julia Valenza. See Somerville
Healey, John R., 203, 213
Hearne, Eliza (McKeagney), 475
Heath, Elizabeth. See Allen
Heath, Émilie. See Reeves
Heath, James William Adhémar, 346
Heath, John, 345–46
Heath, William, 345
Heavysege, Charles, 346–48
Heavysege, Harriet (Pettigrew), 346
Heavysege, Mary Ann. See Oddy
Hebden, Harriett (Haly), 330
Hébert, Marie (Richard), 615
Hébert, Maurice, 413
Hébert, Noël, 615
Hector*, Sir James (1834–1907), 81
Hedge, Samuel, 450
Helliwell, Sarah (Clarkson), 174
Hellmuth*, Isaac (1817–1901), 208, 209
Helmcken, Cecilia. See Douglas
Helmcken*, John Sebastian (1824–1920), 247
Hemans, Williby, 516
Henderson, Edward, 112
Henderson, James, 354
Henderson, Mary (Drew), 259
Hendrie, William, 650, 651
Hendry*, William (fl. 1826–43), 284
Héneau, Sophie (Mayrand), 502
Heney, Thérèse (Mayrand), 503
Henning, Thomas, 291
Henry, Alexander, 297
Henry, Eliza (McKeagney), 475
Henry, Julie (Lépine), 439
Hensley*, Joseph (1824–94), 187
Hepburn*, John (fl. 1819–52), 26, 27
Herbe Odoriférante. See Wikaskokiseyin
Herbert, Catherine (wife of Nicholas Michael), 348
Herbert, Henry Howard Molyneux, 4th Earl of Carnarvon, 192, 330, 357
Herbert, Mary Eliza, 348
Herbert, Nicholas Michael, 348
Herbert*, Sarah (1824–46), 348
Herbomez*, Louis d' (1822–90), 222
Herigault, Émélie (Peltier), 588
Heron*, Francis (1794–1840), 495
Hervey, Robert, 64
Hesse, Christina (Mills), 515
Hétu, Léonard-Ovide, 600
Heywood, Peter, 42
Hickey, Anna Eliza (Devlin), 230
Hicks, Étienne-Hippolyte, 689
Hicks, Hannah (Niles), 548
Hill, Angélique (Drolet), 260
Hill, Clarissa (Todd), 681
Hill, Elizabeth Adams (Poor), 590
Hill*, Philip Carteret (1821–94), 177, 395
Hill*, Thomas (d. 1860), 140
Hilyard, Henry, 349
Hilyard, Margaret. See Miles
Hilyard, Matilda. See Dyer
Hilyard, Thomas (father), 349
Hilyard, Thomas, 348–49
Hilyard, Thomas K., 349
Himsworth, Louisa. See Morrison
Himsworth, William Alfred, 436
Hincks, Anne. See Boult
Hincks*, Sir Francis (1807–85), 24, 55, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 119, 125, 126, 127, 129, 134, 143, 144, 159, 169, 170, 224, 311, 314, 321, 325, 350, 355, 359, 441, 463, 464, 468, 508, 512, 536, 548, 620, 632, 642, 645, 654, 656, 708, 715, 724, 725, 727
Hincks, Maria Ann. See Yandell
Hincks, Sarah Maria (wife of WILLIAM), 350
Hincks, Thomas, 536
Hincks, Thomas Dix, 349
Hincks, William, 349–50
Hind*, Henry Youle (1823–1908), 291
Hindenlang*, Charles (d. 1839), 420, 546
Hingston*, Sir William Hales (1829–1907), 138
Hinxman, Helen Harriet Gordon (Osborn), 562
Hitchcock, Alice (Gowan), 313
Hobson, Mary Ann (Swabey), 669
Hodder, Edward, 350
Hodder, Edward Mulberry, 39, 84, 350–51
Hodder, Frances. See Tench
Hodder, Mary (wife of Edward), 350
Hodges, James, 351–52

Hodgins*, Thomas (1828–1910), 336
Hodgson, Fanny. See McDonell
Hodgson, Rebecca. See Robinson
Hodgson, Robert, 352
Hodgson, Sir Robert, 186, 265, 352–53, 461
Hogan, Margaret (Gowan), 309
Hogarth, William, 413
Holden, Thomas, 632
Holland, Philip J., 539
Holloway, William Cuthbert Elphinstone, 404
Holmes*, Benjamin (1794–1865), 321, 625, 722
Holmes, Christina. See Fraser
Holmes, Christy. See Monroe
Holmes, John (father of JOHN), 353
Holmes*, John (Jean) (1799–1852), 202, 504, 611
Holmes, John, 353–54
Holmes*, Simon Hugh (1831–1919), 353, 383
Holmes, William, 564
Holton, Anner. See Phillips
Holton, Aurora (Mills), 516
Holton, Eliza. See Forbes
Holton, Ezra, 354
Holton, Luther Hamilton, 101, 354–58, 466, 708, 723, 724, 725
Homer*, Joshua Attwood Reynolds (1827–86), 530
Hood*, Robert (1800?–21), 26, 27
Hook, Hannah (Sanborn), 641
Hooker, Alfred, 354
Hooker, Sir William Jackson, 81, 82
Hope*, Adam (1813–82), 68
Hope, Thomas Charles, 444
Hopkins, Caleb, 126, 169, 316, 358–60
Hopkins, Edward Martin, 486
Hopkins, Hannah. See Green
Hopkins, Mary. See Swayze
Hopkins, Rachel (Green), 316, 358
Hopkins, Silas, 358
Hopper, Anna. See Sparling
Hopper, Arthur (father), 360
Hopper, Arthur, 360
Hopper, Sara (wife of Arthur, Sr), 360
Horan, Edward John, 105, 360–61, 488, 542, 561
Horan, Eleanore. See Cannon
Horan, Frances Agnes (Maguire), 488
Horan, Gordian, 360
Horan, Henrietta (Murray), 541
Horton. See Wilmot-Horton
Horton, William, 644
Houliston, George Baillie, 34
Houliston, Isabella. See Baptist
Hounsfield, Mary (Bettridge), 59
How, Henry, 361–62
How, Louisa Mary. See Watkins
How, Thomas, 361
Howard*, John George (1803–90), 270
Howe, Catherine Susan Ann. See McNab
Howe, John (father of JOSEPH), 362
Howe, John (brother of JOSEPH), 362
Howe, Joseph, 7, 13, 36, 71, 85, 158, 159, 160, 172, 189, 232, 285, 287, 353, 362–70, 384, 385, 386, 387, 438, 441, 456, 457, 458, 460, 468, 476, 497, 539, 540, 551, 591, 592, 652, 664, 679, 685, 714
Howe, Mary. See Edes
Howells, Eliza Beulah (Elliot), 270
Howells, Emily Susanna (Johnson), 270
Howells, William Dean, 44
Howick, Viscount. See Grey
Howlan*, George William (1835–1901), 194, 596, 597, 613
Howland*, Sir William Pearce (1811–1907), 101, 299, 668
Howley*, Michael Francis (1843–1914), 688
Howley, William, 60, 278, 453, 663
Hoyles*, Sir Hugh William (1815–88), 141, 332, 400, 716
Hubbard, William Peyton, 3
Hubert*, Petrus (1810–82), 33
Hubert*, René-Auguste-Richard (1811–84), 415
Hudon, Atala. See Aubert de Gaspé
Hudon, Ephrem, 417, 524
Hudon, Hyacinthe, 689
Hudon, J.-Eusèbe, 20
Hudon-Beaulieu, Théotiste (Gélinas), 304
Hudson, Christine (Brauneis), 88
Hughes, John, 191
Hugo, Victor-Marie, 164, 166
Hume, Andrew, 558
Hume, Anne Margaret (Blake), 206
Hume, Joseph, 514, 626
Humphreys, Caroline Amelia. See Ridout
Humphreys, Francis, 370
Humphreys, James Dodsley, 370–71
Humphreys, Mary Hardwick. See Unwin
Hunkajuka, 371–72
Hunt, Charles, 372
Hunt, Charles Brewer, 372
Hunt, Emma. See Brewer
Hunt, John, 372
Hunt, John Inkerman Alexander, 372
Hunt, Mary. See Golpin
Hunt*, Thomas Sterry (1826–92), 105, 445, 446, 448
Hunter*, Charles (d. 1839), 77
Hunter*, James (1817–82), 109, 275
Huntington*, Herbert (1799–1851), 232, 365
Huntington*, Lucius Seth (1827–86), 123, 150, 293, 294
Huntley*, Sir Henry Vere (1795–1864), 184, 339, 352, 461, 669
Huntly, Hannah (Doel), 233
Huot, Hector-Siméon, 580
Huot*, Pierre-Gabriel (1831–1913), 262
Hurlburt, Betsy Almira. See Adams
Hurlburt, Hannah. See Mosier
Hurlburt, Heman, 372
Hurlburt, Thomas, 372–73
Hurteau, Cordélie (Dansereau), 374
Hurteau, Françoise. See Lamarre
Hurteau, Gabriel, 373
Hurteau, Isidore, 373–74
Hurteau, Louise. See Duhamel
Hutchings, Anne (Carter), 141
Hutchins, Catherine (Cushing), 212
Hutchinson, Agnes (Fife), 283
Huxley, Thomas Henry, 349, 350
Hyman, Annie Maria. See Niles
Hyman*, Charles Smith (1854–1926), 68, 374, 375

Hyman, Elizabeth. See Birrell
Hyman, Ellis Walton, 68, 374–75, 549
Hyman, Frances L. See Kingsley
Hyman, Jacob, 374
Hyman, Jesse Willett, 375
Hyman, Sarah (wife of Jacob), 374

IFFLAND, Anthony (Antoine) von, 375–76
Iffland, Elizabeth von. See Allen
Iffland, John (Johann), 375
Iffland, Marie-Madeleine. See Bibeau, dit Portugal
Imoda, Jean B., 560
Ingall, F. L., 32
Ingersoll*, Laura (Secord) (1775–1868), 181
Inglis*, John (1777–1850), 110, 383, 453, 539, 663
Ings, John, 339, 594, 596
Inkster*, Colin (1843–1934), 377, 631
Inkster, John (uncle), 377
Inkster, John (Orkney Johnny), 376–77
Inkster, Mary. See Sinclair
Ireland, Moses, 530
Irumberry* de Salaberry, Charles-Michel d' (1778–1829), 13, 181
Irumberry* de Salaberry, Charles-René-Léonidas d' (1820–82), 677
Irumberry* de Salaberry, Melchoir-Alphonse d' (1813–67), 404
Irving, Elizabeth Jane. See Dixon
Irving*, John (1854–1936), 217, 378
Irving, William, 377–78
Isbister*, Alexander Kennedy (1822–82), 47

JACKMAN*, Arthur (Viking Arthur) (1843–1907), 378
Jackman, Bridget. See Burbage
Jackman, Thomas, 378
Jackman, William, 378–79
Jackson, Edward, 379
Jackson, Emmeline (Sanford), 379
Jackson, Henry Beecroft, 274
Jackson, John (businessman), 517
Jackson, John (clergyman), 18
Jackson, John (engineer), 404
Jackson, Lydia Ann. See Sanford
Jackson, William, 386, 591, 725
Jackson, William Walrond, 84
Jacobs*, Peter (b.1805; fl.1858), 4
Jalbert*, François (d.1854), 527
James, Philip, 511
Jameson*, Robert Sympson (d.1854), 109, 132, 310, 610
Jannasch*, Hermann Theodor (1849–1931), 513
Jannasch, Marie. See Miertsching
Janson. See Forbin-Janson
Jarvis, Amelia. See Glover
Jarvis, Anna Maria. See Mountain
Jarvis, Anne. See Ellis
Jarvis, Elizabeth Ann (Robinson), 622
Jarvis, George Stephen Benjamin, 164, 379–80
Jarvis, John C., 723
Jarvis, Julia. See Sherwood
Jarvis*, Samuel Peters (1792–1857), 12, 618
Jarvis*, Stephen (1756–1840), 379
Jarvis*, William (1756–1817), 618, 622
Jarvis*, William Botsford (1799–1864), 618
Jean, Caroline Susan (LeVesconte), 440
Jeffers, Elizabeth (Diamond), 230
Jefferson, Thomas, 569
Jenkins*, John Edward (1838–1910), 231
Jenner, Edward, 497
Jennings, John (father), 380
Jennings, John, 380–81
Jennings, Margaret. See Cumming
Jennison, Susan (Spencer), 663
Jérôme, Angélique (Rolette), 628
Jervis, John, Earl of St Vincent, 178
Jessop, Mary (Barry), 35
Jetté*, Sir Louis-Amable (1836–1920), 148, 149, 155, 423
Jewett. See Jouett
Job, Jessy. See Carson
Job, John (father of THOMAS BULLEY), 381
Job, John (brother of THOMAS BULLEY), 381
Job*, Robert (1794–1849), 381
Job, Samuel, 381
Job, Sarah. See Bulley
Job, Thomas Bulley, 381
Job, Thomas Raffles, 381
Jobin*, André (1786–1853), 500
Jobin, Virginie (Masson), 500
Joe. See Ebierbing
Johnson, Mr, 282
Johnson, Arthur Jukes, 382
Johnson, Dederika. See Memlingh
Johnson, Edwin, 587
Johnson*, Emily Pauline (1862–1913), 270
Johnson, Emily Susanna. See Howells
Johnson*, George (1837–1911), 368
Johnson*, George Henry Martin (1816–84), 270
Johnson, James Bovell, 382
Johnson, Jeanet (Brauneis), 88
Johnson, John, 381
Johnson*, John Mercer (1818–68), 286
Johnson, Laura Eliza. See Jukes
Johnson, William Arthur, 55, 84, 381–82
Johnston, Amelia Elizabeth. See Almon
Johnston, Elizabeth. See Lichtenstein
Johnston, Elizabeth (Ritchie), 383
Johnston, George, 382
Johnston, George Moir, 382–83
Johnston*, Hugh (1790–1850), 711
Johnston, James William, 7, 73, 232, 352, 353, 364, 365, 383–88, 440, 457
Johnston, Lewis, 383
Johnston, Louisa. See Pryor
Johnston, Sarah. See Hatton
Johnston, Sarah Mortimer. See Smith
Johnston*, William (d.1828), 352
Johnston*, William (1784–1870), 652
Johnston, William Martin, 383
Johnstone. See Johnston
Joinville, Prince de. See Orléans
Jolliffe, Diana (Belcher), 42
Joly* de Lotbinière, Sir Henri-Gustave (1829–1908), 25, 26, 36, 602, 615
Jones, A., 647
Jones, Catherine (Evans), 274

Jones, Catherine (Marshall), 496
Jones, David, 109
Jones*, David Thomas (1799–1844), 108
Jones*, Ephraim (1750–1812), 310
Jones, John Matthew, 362
Jones*, Jonas (1791–1848), 310, 379, 483
Jones, Martha Anne (Bridgland), 91
Jones, Mary (Ruttan), 637
Jones, Owen, 649
Jones*, Peter (1802–56), 640, 648
Jones, Phylina. See Foote
Jones*, Solomon (1756–1822), 310
Jones*, Thomas Mercer (1796–1868), 459
Jones, W. H., 534
Jordan, Alex, 81
Jouett, Ann (Beckwith), 41
Juchault de Lamoricière, Christophe-Louis-Léon, 542
Juchereau* Duchesnay, Antoine-Louis (1767–1825), 388
Juchereau* Duchesnay, Charles-Edmond (1854–1901), 389
Juchereau Duchesnay, Édouard-Louis-Antoine, 236
Juchereau Duchesnay, Élisabeth-Suzanne. See Taschereau
Juchereau Duchesnay, Elzéar-Henri, 163, 388–89, 603
Juchereau Duchesnay, Henriette-Julie (Campbell), 131
Juchereau Duchesnay, Henri-Théodore, 152
Juchereau Duchesnay, Julie. See Perrault
Juchereau Duchesnay, Marie-Louise. See Fleury de La Gorgendière
Judah, Adolphus H., 3
Judah*, Henry Hague (1808–83), 219, 220
Judah, Jane. See Toyer
Jukes, Laura Eliza (Johnson), 381
Juneau*, Salomon (1793–1856), 533

KANADQUA, 104
Kane, Frances. See Loach
Kane, Harriet. See Clench
Kane, Michael, 389
Kane, Paul, 166, 227, 389–94, 427
Kaulback, Henry Adolphus Newman, 172
Kavanagh, John, 8
Kay, Thomas, 724
Keble, John, 84
Keefer, Catherine. See Lampman
Keefer, Christina Theresa. See Grant
Keefer*, George (1773–1858), 394
Keefer, Jacob, 394–95
Keefer, James, 200
Keefer*, Samuel (1811–90), 200, 404, 405
Keith, Alexander, 395–96
Keith, Christina. See Brims
Keith, Donald, 395
Keith, Donald George, 395
Keith, Eliza (Keith), 395
Keith, Sarah Ann. See Stalcup
Kellett, Sir Henry, 42, 43, 89, 396–97, 454, 455, 562
Kellett, John Dalton, 396
Kelly, Catherine. See Lennon
Kelly, Francis, 397–98
Kelly*, James Butler Knitt (1832–1907), 73
Kelly, Louisa. See Bliss
Kemner* Laflamme, Joseph-Clovis (1849–1910), 106
Kendall*, Edward Nicholas (1800?–45), 27, 38
Kendall, Rebecca S. (Fyfe), 296
Kennedy*, Alexander (1781?–1832), 284
Kennedy*, Sir Arthur Edward (1810–83), 117
Kennedy, Elizabeth (Finlayson), 284
Kennedy, John, 234
Kennedy, Mary Ann (Delaney), 218
Kennedy, Norah (Donnelly), 234
Kennedy, Patrick, 234
Kennedy*, William (1814–90), 89, 407
Kenney*, Sir Edward (1800–91), 66
Kent, Ann Susanna (Willis), 706
Kent, John, 8, 141, 180, 331, 398–401, 601, 687, 716
Kent*, John (fl.1807–88), 53
Kent and Strathern, Duke of. See Edward Augustus
Ker, James, 401
Ker, Janet (Ker), 401
Ker, Jessie. See Russell
Ker, Robert, 401
Kérouac, Charles de, 401
Kérouac, Éléonore. See Létourneau
Kérouac, Josette. See Blanchette
Kérouac, Léon, 401–2
Kerr, Elizabeth (Leston; Spike), 664
Kerr*, James (1765?–1846), 68
Kerr, James Hooper, 402
Kerr, Mary J. See Bull
Kershaw, John, 717
Kertland, Sarah Georgina (Molesworth), 516
Keys, Lolitia (McDonnell; Sexton), 647
Kielly, Edward, 601
Kilgallen, Anne (Erlan; Hamilton), 331
Killaly, Alicia. See Hamilton
Killaly, Hamilton Hartley, 164, 402–6, 648, 708
Killaly, John A., 402
Killaly, Martha Jane. See Handy
Killam, Thomas, 551
Kimberley, Earl of. See Wodehouse
Kincardine, Earl of. See Bruce
King*, Edwin H. (1828–96), 10, 684
King, Elizabeth. See Lumley
King*, George Edwin (1839–1901), 340
King, Richard (father), 406
King, Richard, 28, 319, 406–8
King*, William (1812–95), 707
Kingsley, Frances L. (Hyman), 375
Kinnear*, William Boyd (1796–1868), 286, 712
Kipp, Joseph, 560
Kirby, Ann (Macaulay), 452
Kirby*, William (1817–1906), 538, 656
Kirkland, James, 612
Kirkland, Marion (Reid), 612
Kirouac. See Kérouac
Kittson*, Norman Wolfred (1814–88), 46, 47, 168, 628
Klattsasine* (Klatsassan) (d.1864), 104, 697
Kmoch, George, 284
Knapp, Joseph, 723
Kneeshaw, Richard, 450
Knight, Ann Cuthbert. See Rae
Knight, Joseph Philip, 371
Knight, William, 372

Knowlton*, Paul Holland (d.1863), 531
Kohlmeister*, Benjamin Gottlieb (1756–1844), 284
Kossuth, Lajos, 670
Krieghoff (Kreighoff), Cornelius, 264, 408–14
Krieghoff, Emily (Burnett; de Wendt), 409, 413
Krieghoff, Ernst, 409
Krieghoff, Isabella Ludivica. See Wauters
Krieghoff, Johann Ernst, 408
Krieghoff, Louise. See Gauthier, dit Saint-Germain

LABADIE, Évariste-Odilon, 691
Labadie, Théotiste (Derome), 226
Labatt*, John Kinder (d.1866), 372
Labelle, François, 266, 505
Labelle*, François-Xavier-Antoine (1833–91), 723
Labelle, Ludger, 148
Laberge, Ambroise, 414
Laberge, Charles, 414–17
Laberge, Hélène-Olive. See Turgeon
Laberge, Rose. See Franchère
Labouchere, Henry, 1st Baron Taunton, 258, 439
Labrèche, Louis, 417
Labrèche, Marguerite-Julie. See Viger
Labrèche-Viger, Caroline. See Laflamme
Labrèche-Viger, Louis, 154, 417, 524, 533
La Brède, Baron de. See Secondat
La Broquerie, Marie-Hippolyte de (Boucher de La Bruère), 76
La Bruère. See Boucher
La Chesnaye. See Aubert
La Colombière. See Céré
Lacombe*, Albert (1827–1916), 46, 47, 82, 471, 661, 702
Lacordaire, Jean-Baptiste-Henri, 580
Lacoste, Alexandre, 418
Lacoste*, Sir Alexandre (1843–1923), 154, 418, 435
Lacoste, Catherine-Renée. See Boucher de La Bruère
Lacoste, Charlotte Magenty. See Mount
Lacoste, Joséphine. See Dubois
Lacoste, Louis (father), 417
Lacoste, Louis, 417–19
Lacoste, Louis-René, 418
Lacoste, Marie-Antoinette-Thaïs. See Proulx
Lacroix, Marie-Louise (Rodier), 625
Lacroix, Paul, 625
Ladde, Harriot Conway (Willson), 709
Laflamme. See Kemner
Laflamme, Caroline (Labrèche-Viger), 417
Laflamme*, Toussaint-Antoine-Rodolphe (1827–93), 252, 415, 417
Laflèche*, Louis-François (1818–98), 137, 161, 192, 193, 304
Lafleur*, Théodore (1821–1907), 675
Lafleur de Verchères. See Brousseau
La Fontaine*, Sir Louis-Hippolyte (1807–64), 24, 37, 92, 93, 94, 95, 119, 125, 126, 127, 132, 133, 134, 135, 143, 151, 219, 255, 256, 257, 261, 311, 312, 321, 359, 431, 440, 462, 463, 466, 487, 512, 515, 526, 527, 564, 567, 568, 570, 576, 577, 579, 583, 584, 622, 642, 714, 715, 722, 724
Laforce* Langevin, Jean-Pierre-François (1821–92), 194, 218, 226, 430, 488
Lafrance, Louis, 614, 615
Lafrenaye, Pierre-Richard, 219, 249
Lagacé*, Pierre-Minier (1830–84), 228
Lagemodière, Jean-Baptiste, 296, 297
Lagemodière, Julie (Riel), 297
Lagemodière, Marie-Anne. See Gaboury
Lagemodière, Reine, 297
Lagier, André, 419
Lagier, Jean-Marie, 419
Lagier, Lucien-Antoine, 419
Lagier, Marie-Madeleine. See David
Lagimonière (Lagimodière, Lajimodière). See Lagemodière
Lagorce, Charles-Irénée, 297, 298
La Gorgendière. See Fleury
Lagueux, Cécile (Brunet), 105
Laidlaw*, George (1828?–89), 651
Laird, Alexander, 419–20
Laird*, Alexander (b.c. 1830; fl.1881), 419
Laird*, David (1833–1914), 211, 308, 419, 595, 597, 612
Laird, Janet. See Orr
Lajemmerais. See Dufrost
Lajoie. See Gérin-Lajoie
Lajoie, Thècle (Mailloux), 488
Lake, Elizabeth (Lady Harvey), 278
Lalande*, Louis (1869–1944), 418
Lalonde, Agathe (Valois), 690
Lamarck, Chevalier de. See Monet
Lamarre, Françoise (Hurteau), 374
Lamb, William, 2nd Viscount Melbourne, 345
Lambton*, John George, 1st Earl of Durham (1792–1840), 7, 78, 142, 254, 257, 260, 345, 364, 384, 491, 500, 505, 506, 527, 582, 623, 655
La Mennais, Hugues-Félicité-Robert de, 87, 569, 580, 585
Lamoricière. See Juchault
Lampman, Catherine (Keefer), 394
Lanaudière. See Tarieu
Lanctôt, Agnès. See Boire
Lanctot, Agnès. See Doutre
Lanctôt, Alexis, 420
Lanctôt, Angélique. See Raymond
Lanctot, Edmond, 420
Lanctot, Hippolyte, 420
Lanctôt, Magloire, 25, 420
Lanctot, Mary. See Miller
Lanctot, Médéric, 148, 249, 304, 420–26
Lanctôt, Pierre, 420
Lanctot, Philéas, 425
Land, Isabella (Chisholm), 167
Land*, Robert (1738?–1818), 167
Landon*, Fred (1880–1969), 746
Landry, Allain, 426
Landry, Amand, 426
Landry, Anastasie. See Dupuis
Landry, Jean-Étienne, 36
Landry, Pélagie. See Caissie
Landry*, Sir Pierre-Amand (1846–1916), 426
Lane, Anna (Gardiner; wife of RICHARD), 427
Lane, Mary. See McDermot
Lane, Richard, 426–27, 486
Langan, Julia (Leslie), 440
Langan, Patrick, 440

Langevin. See also Laforce
Langevin*, Sir Hector-Louis (1826–1906), 45, 147, 192, 226, 677, 686
Langevin, Malvina (Derome), 226
Langford*, Edward Edwards (d.1895), 116, 117, 196, 243, 246, 478
Langlois, Mary (Metherall), 511
Langmuir*, John Woodburn (b.1835; fl.1912), 467
Langton*, John (1808–94), 406
Langtry*, John (1834–1906), 56
Lanman*, Charles (1819–95), 346, 347
Lapane, Marie-Sophie (Gauthier), 301
La Perrière. See Boucher
Lapham, Increase Allen, 484
Lareau*, Edmond (1848–90), 166
Laroche, Arline (Voyer), 695
Larochelle*, Louis-Napoléon (1834–90), 163
Larocque, Alfred, 52
Larocque, Amélia. See Berthelet
La Rocque (Larocque), Charles, 266, 416, 427–31
Larocque, François-Alfred-Chartier, 53
La Rocque, Henri, 428
Larocque*, Joseph (1808–87), 175, 428, 429
Larocque, Louis-Isaac, 694
La Rocque, Sophie. See Robert
Lartigue*, Jean-Jacques (1777–1840), 163, 428, 429, 505, 532, 570, 578, 689, 733
Larue, Félicité (Thibaudeau), 676
La Rue*, François-Alexandre-Hubert (1833–81), 106, 203
Laterrière. See Fabre
Laterrière, Eulalie-Antoinette. See Dénéchaud
Laterrière, Jean-Pierre de Sales. See Fabre, dit Laterrière, Pierre
Laterrière, Marc-Pascal de Sales, 431–32
Laterrière*, Pierre-Jean de Sales (1789–1834), 18, 375
Lathern*, John (1831–1905), 714
Latimer, Charles, 548
La Tour. See Saint-Étienne
Lauder*, Abram William (1834–84), 632
Lauder*, William Waugh (b.c. 1858; fl.1893), 371
Laurier*, Sir Wilfrid (1841–1919), 423
Lavallée, Augustin, 153
Lavallée*, Calixa (1842–91), 153
Laverdière. See also Cauchon
Laverdière, Charles-Honoré, 432–33
La Violette. See Bétourné
Laviolette*, Godefroy (1826–95), 533
Law, Ewan, 175
Law, George Henry, 110, 516
Law, James, 721
Law, Marie (Clerk), 174, 175
Law, Robert, 433–34
Lawrason*, Lawrence (1803–82), 533
Lawrence*, Joseph Wilson (1818–92), 285
Lawson, Ann. See Atkinson
Lawson, Frances. See Bell
Lawson*, George (1827–95), 534
Lawson, Henry, 211
Lawson, John, 352
Lawson*, William (1772–1848), 7, 73, 293
Lawson, William (father of WILLIAM), 434
Lawson, William, 434
Lazarus, Frances (Hart), 337
Lea, Margaret (MacDonnell), 470
Leach*, William Turnbull (1805–86), 607
Leader, John Temple, 260
Leavens, Lydia (Chandler), 156
Leblanc, Charles, 434
Leblanc, Charles-André, 153, 154, 249, 434–35
Leblanc, Elmire (Desnoyers), 435
Leblanc, Joseph, 422
Leblanc, Julie. See Dumont
Leblanc, Louise. See Brien-Desrochers
Leblanc, Marguerite. See Wilson
Leblanc, Mathilde (Dunn), 435
Le Bléis, Loetitia-Constance-Marie (Bray), 89
Leboudais, A., 653
Le Boutillier, Elizabeth. See Robin
Le Boutillier, John, 435
Le Brun, Julie-Louise (Beckwith), 41
Le Caron, Henri. See Beach, Thomas Miller
Lee, Harriet Louisa. See Smith
Lee, Robert, 456
Lee, Robert Edward, 334
Lee, William, 435
Lee, William Henry, 435–36
Leeming, Ralph, 436–37
Leeming, Susan. See Hatt
Leeming, William, 437
Lees, Sir Harcourt, 309
Lefaivre, Robert-Alexis, 690
Lefebvre, Apolline. See Abraham
Lefebvre, Jean-Baptiste, 613
Lefebvre, Sophie (Renaud), 613
Lefebvre* de Bellefeuille, Charles-Louis (1795–1838), 532
Lefebvre* de Bellefeuille, Joseph-Édouard (1840–1926), 252, 537
Lefebvre de Cheverus, Jean-Louis, 688
Légaré, Antoine, 437
Légaré, Ignace, 437
Légaré*, Joseph (1795–1855), 410
Légaré, Marie. See Parant
Leggett, Sibylla Amelia Maria Sophia (Morris), 534
Leggo*, William (1822–88), 359
Le Herron, Christine (Conroy), 194
Leichhardt, Friedrich Wilhelm Ludwig, 558
Le Jeune, Julie-Catherine (Rodier), 624
Le Jeune*, Louis-Marie (1857–1935), 737
Lemaire, Félix-Hyacinthe, 437–38
Lemaire, Ignace, 437
Lemaire, Louise. See Gastonguay
Lemaire, Luce. See Barcelo
Le Maître-Bellenoix, Félicité (Gauvreau; Mayrand), 503
Le Marchant, Sir Denis, 438
Le Marchant, John Gaspard (father), 438
Le Marchant, Sir John Gaspard, 399, 433, 438–39, 534, 551, 590
Le Marchant, Margaret Anne. See Taylor
Le Marchant, Mary. See Carey
Le May*, Léon-Pamphile (1837–1918), 203, 690
Le Mesurier, John, 454
Lemieux*, François-Xavier (1811–64), 632
Lemire, Josephte (Bellecourt), 46

Le Moine*, Sir James MacPherson (1825–1912), 13
Le Moyne de Longueuil, Marie-Charles-Joseph, Baronne de Longueuil (Grant), 374
Lempriere, Thomas James, 514
Lennon, Catherine (Kelly), 397
Leonard*, Elijah (1814–91), 374, 375
Le Petit Chef. See Wikaskokiseyin
Lépine*, Ambroise-Dydime (1834?–1923), 59, 198, 230, 439, 476, 556, 557
Lépine, Jean-Baptiste (father), 439
Lépine, Jean-Baptiste, 439
Lépine, Julie. See Henry
Leprohon, Jean-Lucien, 536
Leprohon, Rosanna Eleanora. See Mullins
Léry. See Chaussegros
Lesieur-Desaulniers, Isaac-Stanislas, 430
Leslie, James (father), 440
Leslie, James, 219, 440
Leslie, Julia. See Langan
Lesperance*, Jean Talon (1838–91), 44
Lessard, Élisabeth (Caron), 131
Lesslie*, James (1800–85), 126, 127, 233
Leston, Elizabeth. See Kerr
Leston, Francis, 664
L'Estrange, Professor, 534
Letellier* de Saint-Just, Luc (1820–81), 26, 204, 213
Létourneau, Éléonore (Kérouac), 401
Levasseur. See Carmel-Levasseur
Le Vasseur*, Nazaire (1848–1927), 229
Lévêque, Marie-Anne-Agathe (Eynard), 273
LeVesconte, Caroline (MacDougall), 440
LeVesconte, Caroline Susan. See Jean
LeVesconte, Isaac, 172, 440–41
LeVesconte, Jane. See Malzard
LeVesconte, Peter, 440
Lewis, Anna. See Eccles
Lewis, Elizabeth Susan. See Wilson
Lewis, Sir George Cornewall, 406
Lewis, Helen. See Street
Lewis, J. B., 441
Lewis, John Bower, 441
Lewis*, John Travers (1825–1901), 55, 536
Lewis, Mary (Ryerson), 638
Libya, Baron of. See Wilson
Lichtenstein, Elizabeth (Johnston), 383
Liddell, Janet. See Martin
Liddell, John, 441
Liddell, Susan Anne Jane. See Stewart
Liddell, Thomas, 441–43
Lightenstone. See Lichtenstein
Lilly, Emma Gaden (Noad), 551
Lincoln, Abraham, 514
Lindsay, Clara (Bouchette), 78
Lindsay, James, 7th Earl of Balcarres and 24th Earl of Crawford, 443
Lindsay, Sir James Alexander, 443–44
Lindsay, Maria Margaret Frances. See Pennington
Lindsay, Lady Sarah Elizabeth. See Savile
Lindsey*, Charles (1820–98), 43
Linfoot, John, 529
Linnaeus, Carolus (Carl von Linné), 138
Lippincott, Esther Borden (Denison), 224
Lisgar, Baron. See Young
Little, Margaret (Elliot), 269
Little*, Philip Francis (1824–97), 331, 399
Little Chief; Little Soldier. See Hunkajuka
Livingston, Robert R., 403
Lloyd, Clara (Felton), 282
Lloyd, Hoyes, 296
Lloyd, Thomas, 282
Loach, Frances (Kane), 389
Locke, John (philosopher), 572
Locke, John (politician), 457
Lockhart, Letitia (Mactavish), 485
Logan, Elizabeth (Gower), 448
Logan, Hart (brother of William Edmond), 444
Logan, Hart (uncle of William Edmond), 444
Logan, Janet. See Edmond
Logan, William, 444
Logan, Sir William Edmond, 30, 65, 137, 444–49
Loid, Thomas, 517
Longueuil, 5e Baron de. See Grant
Longueuil, Baronne de. See Le Moyne
Longworth, Nicholas, 264
Lord, John Keast, 449–50
Lorimier, Jean-Baptiste de, 163
Lotbinière. See Joly
Lotbinière* Harwood, Louis de (1866–1934), 89
Loudon*, James (1841–1916), 350
Louis-Philippe I, King of France, 260, 497
Lount*, Samuel (1791–1838), 622, 639, 641
Lovell, Catherine-Louise (Dorion), 235, 236
Lovell*, John (d.1893), 537
Lowe, James, 479
Lowe*, Thomas (1824–1912), 486
Lowman, Mary (Bird), 67
Lucas, Louis, 260
Lucier, Félicité (Manson), 496
Lugger*, Robert (1793–1837), 270, 437
Lumley, Elizabeth (King), 406
Lumley, Sir William, 663
Lundy*, Benjamin (d.1839), 206
Lundy*, Francis James (1814–68), 58
Lushington, Lady Henrietta. See Prescott
Lusignan, Adeline de. See Roy
Lusignan, Alexandre de, 635
Lusignan*, Alphonse (1843–92), 425, 430
Lyell, Sir Charles, 84, 445
Lyman, Benjamin, 450–51
Lyman, Charles, 450
Lyman, Delia Almira. See Wells
Lyman, Elisha, 450
Lyman, Hannah. See Stiles
Lyman*, Henry (1813–97), 450, 451
Lyman, Lewis, 450
Lyman, Richard, 450
Lyman, Roswell Corse, 450
Lyman*, William (1794–1857), 450
Lynch*, John Joseph (1816–88), 192, 510, 662
Lynde, Lucy (Hartt), 338
Lynds, David B., 696
Lynds, Susan (Waddell), 696
Lyon. See Bowes-Lyon
Lyons, James, 404
Lysons*, Sir Daniel (1816–98), 131
Lytton. See Bulwer-Lytton

Macallum, Archibald, 451–52
Macallum, Donald, 451
Macallum, Maria. See Adams
Macallum, Mary. See Biggar
Macallum, Mary Macalpine. See Barramollach
Macaulay, Ann. See Kirby
Macaulay, Anne Catherine. See Geddes
Macaulay, Charlotte Sarah. See Vesconte
Macaulay*, James (1759–1822), 299
Macaulay*, Sir James Buchanan (1793–1859), 257
Macaulay*, John (1792–1857), 30, 453, 622
Macaulay, Mary (Gamble), 299
Macaulay*, Robert (1744–1800), 452
Macaulay, William, 452–53
McBeth, Adam, 550
MacBeth, Mary (Nisbet), 549, 550
MacBeth, Robert, 549
MacCabe, Cornelius, 193
McCarthy, D'Alton, 78
McCaul*, John (1807–86), 172, 173, 270
McCawley, Anne. See Odell
McCawley, George, 110, 453–54
McClean, Arthur, 310
McClellan, George Brinton, 291
M'Clintock*, Sir Francis Leopold (1819–1907), 89, 319, 327, 396, 397, 407, 408, 563
McClure, Constance Ada. See Tudor
McClure, Hannah. See Glynn
McClure, Jane. See Elgee
McClure, John, 455
McClure, Margaret. See Bussell
McClure, Robert, 454
McClure, Sir Robert John Le Mesurier, 28, 42, 396, 397, 454–55, 513, 562, 563
McClure, Sarah. See Trelford
McClure, William, 455–56
McColl, Margaret (McDonald), 459
McConnell, John, 642, 674
McCord*, David Ross (1844–1930), 738
McCord, Robert, 306
McCord*, Thomas (1828–86), 135, 488
McCord*, William King (1803–58), 587
McCoubrey, John Williams, 456
McCrae, Robert Barlow, 280
McCuaig, Dorothy (Ridout), 619
McCulloch*, Thomas (1777–1843), 302, 303, 353, 539
McCulloch, William, 303
McCully, Clarence, 457
McCully, Eliza. See Creed
McCully, Esther. See Pipes
McCully, Jonathan, 71, 300, 456–59
McCully, Samuel, 456
McDermot*, Andrew (1789–1881), 47, 168, 427
McDermot, Annabella. See Ross
McDermot, Charles Edward, 67
McDermot, Mary (Lane), 427
McDonald, Alexander, 459
Macdonald, Alexander, 462
Macdonald, Alexander Francis, 463
MacDonald*, Angus (1831–89), 186, 264, 265, 595, 596, 612
MacDonald, Ann (Boyd), 85
McDonald*, Archibald (1790–1853), 239, 720
MacDonald*, Bernard Donald (1789–1859), 47, 186, 194, 461
McDonald, Catherine (Conroy), 194
MacDonald, Charlotte Lenora Harrington (Geddie), 303
McDonald, Donald, 459–60
Macdonald*, Donald Alexander (1817–96), 463, 464
McDonald, Edmund Mortimer, 300, 383, 460
Macdonald, Elizabeth Amelia (Gordon; Carrall), 139
McDonald, Frances. See Mitchell
McDonald, George, 460
MacDonald*, James (1828–1912), 71, 383, 395, 441
McDonald*, John (1742–1811), 460
Macdonald, John (surveyor), 459
McDonald, John, 397, 460–62
Macdonald*, Sir John Alexander (1815–91), 10, 23, 31, 44, 79, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 128, 131, 136, 139, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 157, 160, 170, 171, 191, 192, 201, 210, 247, 257, 258, 277, 282, 288, 289, 293, 294, 311, 312, 314, 332, 336, 340, 356, 361, 364, 369, 387, 422, 441, 458, 460, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 476, 481, 499, 515, 533, 561, 591, 593, 597, 598, 632, 643, 645, 650, 651, 656, 668, 674, 677, 685, 698, 713, 717, 725, 727, 729
Macdonald, John Sandfield, 98, 99, 101, 102, 126, 128, 144, 145, 146, 213, 219, 356, 420, 462–69, 642, 667, 668, 676, 693, 725
McDonald, Margaret. See McColl
Macdonald, Margaret (McDonald), 460
Macdonald, Marie Christine. See Waggaman
MacDonald, Mary (Boyd), 85
Macdonald, Nancy (Macdonald), 462
McDonald, Roderick C., 461
Macdonald*, Rolland (1809?–81), 164
MacDonald*, Ronald (1798–1854), 226, 512
Macdonald, Stuart, 198
Macdonell*, Alexander (1762–1840), 310
Macdonell*, Alexander (d.1835), 475
MacDonell, Archibald, 469
McDonell, Catherine (Thomson), 680
MacDonell, Donald Aeneas, 469–70
McDonell, Fanny (Hodgson), 352
McDonell, Isabella (Macdonell), 469
McDonell, John (baptised François-Marie-Joseph), 545
Macdonell*, John (1785–1812), 618
McDonell, Mary (MacDonell), 469
Macdonell*, Miles (1769–1828), 469
McDonnell, Francis, 647
MacDonnell, George, 470
McDonnell, Lolitia. See Keys
MacDonnell, Margaret. See Croates
MacDonnell, Margaret. See Lea
MacDonnell, Richard, 470
MacDonnell, Robert, 470
MacDonnell, Robert Lea, 470–71
McDouall*, Robert (d.1848), 12
McDougall*, Alexander (1760–1821), 114
MacDougall, Caroline. See LeVesconte
McDougall, David, 471, 472
Macdougall, Duncan, 557
McDougall, Elizabeth. See Chantler

McDougall, George Millward, 471–72
McDougall, Helen Oliver. See Baptist
MacDougall, Isaac Duncan, 441
McDougall*, John Chantler (1842–1917), 471, 472
McDougall*, John Lorn (1838–1909), 128
MacDougall*, Sir Patrick Leonard (1819–94), 292
McDougall, Thomas, 34
McDougall*, William (1822–1905), 70, 94, 95, 96, 98, 100, 101, 125, 126, 149, 169, 276, 368, 465, 468, 630, 677
McDowall*, Robert (1769?–1841), 660
McDuff, Thomas, 306
Macé*, Catherine (1616–98), 156
McEachen, Emanuel, 472–73
MacFarlane, Roderick, 276
Macfarlane*, Thomas (1834–1907), 445
McGee*, Thomas D'Arcy (1825–68), 123, 154, 193, 229, 231, 277, 347, 466, 561, 625, 725
MacGeorge*, Robert Jackson (1811?–84), 172
McGill*, James (1744–1813), 58
McGill*, Peter (1789–1860), 10, 132, 134, 326, 519, 520, 591, 715
McGill, William, 264, 472
MacGillivray, Angus, 85
McGillivray*, John (1777?–1855), 462
McGillivray*, William (1764?–1825), 114
McGovern, "Annie," 49
McGrath, Mary (Gugy), 322
McGregor, Christina (Cameron), 124
McGregor, Euphemia (Cameron), 124
MacGregor, Frances (Mitcheson), 32
McGregor*, James (1759–1830), 476
McGregor, Sarah (McKenzie), 476
Machar*, John (1796–1863), 442
Machray*, Robert (1831–1904), 673
Macintosh*, John (d.1884), 90, 419, 461
MacIntyre*, Peter (1819–91), 186, 194, 195, 594, 595, 597
McKay, Augusta, 473
McKay, Catherine. See White
McKay, Harriet. See Ballenden
McKay, James (father), 473
McKay, James, 473–75
Mackay, Jane. See Baptist
McKay, John, 475, 549, 550
McKay, John Richards, 475
McKay*, Joseph William (1829–1900), 6
Mackay, Kennithina Johana (Harrison), 336
McKay, Margaret. See Rowand
McKay, Mary. See Favell
Mackay*, Robert (1816–88), 37, 249
Mackay*, Robert (1840–1916), 34
McKay*, William (1772–1832), 12
McKeagney, Eliza. See Hearne
McKeagney, Eliza. See Henry
McKeagney, James Charles, 59, 475–76
McKenney, Henry, 645
McKenzie, Agnes. See Russell
Mackenzie*, Sir Alexander (1764–1820), 38
Mackenzie*, Alexander (1822–92), 95, 101, 102, 123, 126, 127, 128, 157, 171, 191, 211, 219, 283, 292, 294, 330, 357, 359, 599, 727
M'Kenzie, Angus, 620
MacKenzie, Catherine Eliza. See Crombie
McKenzie*, Donald (1783–1851), 495
McKenzie, Elizabeth. See Grant
Mackenzie, George, 91
McKenzie, George Rogers, 476–77
Mackenzie, Hope Fleming, 128
McKenzie, Janet. See Blair
McKenzie, John, 476
MacKenzie, John, 477
Mackenzie*, John (1790–1855), 606
MacKenzie, John George Delhoste, 382, 477
McKenzie, Kenneth (father), 477
McKenzie, Kenneth, 242, 477–79
Mackenzie, Marianne (Brown), 91
Mackenzie, Robert, 12
McKenzie, Sarah. See McGregor
Mackenzie, William James, 651
Mackenzie*, William Lyon (1795–1861), 61, 62, 95, 109, 118, 160, 170, 225, 233, 254, 259, 262, 309, 310, 314, 343, 344, 358, 359, 395, 398, 482, 484, 489, 529, 530, 533, 546, 555, 557, 559, 573, 618, 622, 623, 639, 641, 642, 671
McKerlie, Daniel, 169, 170
MacKinnon, Colin Francis, 475, 479–80
MacKinnon, John, 479
MacKinnon, Una. See MacLeod
Mackintosh, J. C., 293
McLachlin, Daniel (Donhuil), 480–81
McLachlin, Daniel, 481
McLachlin, Hugh (father of Daniel), 480
McLachlin, Hugh (brother of Daniel), 480
McLachlin, Hugh (son of Daniel), 481
McLachlin, John, 481
McLachlin, Maria. See Harrington
McLachlin, William, 480
McLean, Alexander, 462, 463
MacLean, Annie. See Warren
McLean*, Archibald (1791–1865), 257, 462, 693
MacLean (McLean), Donald Charles, 481–82
MacLean, Duncan, 594
McLean*, John (1797?–1890), 272, 273, 284
McLean*, John (1828–86), 209
McLelan*, Archibald Woodbury (1824–90), 368
MacLellan, Malcolm, 479
MacLennan, Donald Ban, 468
MacLennan, John, 468
MacLeod (Kingston merchant), 722
McLeod, Alexander, 482–83, 546
McLeod*, Archibald Norman (fl.1796–1837), 720
McLeod*, Clement Henry (1851–1917), 658
M'Leod, Donald, 483–84, 514
McLeod, Ellen Norman. See Morrison
McLeod*, Peter (d.1852), 635
MacLeod, Tormad, 85
MacLeod, Una (Eunice) (MacKinnon), 479
MacLeod, William B., 479
McLoughlin, David, 486
McLoughlin*, John (1784–1857), 239, 240, 241, 247, 484, 485, 486, 495, 496
McLoughlin, John (son), 496
McMahon*, Patrick (1796–1851), 175
McMaster, James Alphonsus, 542
MacMechan*, Archibald McKellar (1862–1933), 223

McMechan, John, 68
McMicken*, Gilbert (1813–91), 559
McMicking, T., 656
McMillan*, James (d.1858), 495, 720
MacMillan*, John C. (1862–1926), 461
McMullen, George W., 293, 294, 698
McMullen*, John Mercier (1820–1907), 627
McNab*, Alexander (1811–91), 317
MacNab*, Sir Allan Napier (1798–1862), 35, 96, 97, 119, 120, 124, 127, 131, 144, 170, 225, 256, 257, 259, 277, 311, 321, 462, 464, 591, 607, 623, 632, 637, 642, 676, 715, 716, 721
McNab, Catherine Susan Ann (Howe), 363
McNab, James, 385
McNab, John, 630
McNally, Walter, 44
McNaughton, William, 657
McNeill, Martha (wife of WILLIAM HENRY), 485
McNeill, Mathilda (wife of WILLIAM HENRY), 485
McNeill, Rebecca (wife of William Henry, Sr), 484
McNeill, William Henry (father), 484
McNeill, William Henry, 484–85, 535
McPhail, Daniel, 295
McPharlane, Mary (Cassidy), 153
Macpherson*, Sir David Lewis (1818–96), 355, 467, 522, 632, 651, 668, 725
Macpherson, Elizabeth Sarah Badgley. See Molson
McPherson, John, 374
McPherson*, Murdoch (1796?–1863), 541
Macrae, Flora (Matheson), 501
MacRobie, Dorothy (Roger), 627
Mactavish, Dugald (father), 485
Mactavish, Dugald, 199, 426, 427, 485–87
McTavish*, John George (d.1847), 485
Mactavish, Letitia. See Lockhart
Mactavish*, Letitia (Hargrave) (1813–54), 485, 486
MacTavish*, Newton McFaul (1877–1941), 413
Mactavish*, William (1815–70), 70, 485
Madden*, Mary Anne (Sadlier) (1820–1903), 536
Madeline. See Qua-hail-ya
Madrid, Duke of. See Carlos
Magee, Johannah (Donnelly), 234
Maguire, Catherine. See O'Hara
Maguire, Frances Agnes. See Horan
Maguire, John, 487–88
Maguire, Matthew, 487
Maguire*, Thomas (1776–1854), 428
Maillé (Maillet). See Mallet
Maillet*, Marie (1610–77), 156
Mailloux, Alexis, 488–89, 605
Mailloux, Amable, 488
Mailloux, Thècle. See Lajoie
Maisonneuve. See Chomedey
Maitland*, Sir Peregrine (1777–1854), 233, 557, 705, 706
Makoyi-ksiksinum. See Sotai-na
Malcolm, Eliakim, 489–90
Malcolm, Finlay, 489
Malcolm, Samantha. See Sexton
Malcolm, Tryphena (wife of Finlay), 489
Malhiot, Adolphe, 491
Malhiot, Charles-Christophe, 490–91, 544
Malhiot, Édouard-Élisée, 77, 78, 491–92, 545, 546
Malhiot, François-Xavier-Amable, 490
Malhiot, Julie. See Boucher de La Perrière
Malhiot, Julie-Éliza. See Montour
Mallet, Ellen (Cameron), 118
Mallet, Marguerite. See Sarrazin
Mallet, Marie-Anne-Marcelle, 492–93, 603
Mallet, Vital, 492
Mallory, Sarah (Baker; Bush; Smart), 659
Malzard, Jane (LeVesconte), 440
Mance, Sœur. See Céré
Mance*, Jeanne (1606–73), 156
Manners-Sutton, Charles, 494, 663
Manners-Sutton, Charles, 1st Viscount Canterbury, 494
Manners-Sutton, Georgiana. See Tompson
Manners-Sutton, John Henry Thomas, 3rd Viscount Canterbury, 140, 159, 271, 286, 287, 289, 493–95, 666
Manners-Sutton, Lucy Maria Charlotte. See Denison
Manners-Sutton, Thomas, 494
Manseau, Élizabeth (Beaubien), 36
Manseau, Joseph-Amable, 31
Manseau, Marie-Josephte (Brassard), 86
Manson, Donald (father), 495
Manson, Donald, 495–96
Manson, Félicité. See Lucier
Manson, Jean. See Gunn
Manthet. See Ailleboust
Many Spotted Horses. See Aka-kitsipimi-otas
Marchand*, Félix-Gabriel (1832–1900), 16, 25, 415
Marchand, Louis, 25
Marchand*, Louis-Wilfrid (1834–96), 533
Marchand, Marie-Anne (Charest), 161
Marchand, Marie-Louise (Bachand), 25
Marchessault*, Siméon (1805?–55), 75
Marcotte, Marie-Josephte (Saincennes), 656
Marcoux, François-Xavier, 163
Marcy, William Learned, 14, 63
Maréchal. See Marshall
Maria Carolina, Queen of the Two Sicilies, 497
Marie de Bonsecours. See Gadbois
Marie de Sainte-Euphrasie. See Pelletier
Marie du Sacré-Cœur. See Fitzbach
Marie du Sacré-Cœur. See Valois
Marion, Amable, 143
Markland*, George Herchmer (1790?–1862), 343
Markland*, Thomas (1757–1840), 12
Marlborough, Duke of. See Churchill
Marquis. See Canac
Marsan*, Isidore-Amédée (1844–1924), 15
Marsden*, William (1807–85), 36
Marsh, David O., 374
Marshall, Catherine. See Jones
Marshall, Charles, 526
Marshall, Elisabeth Golding. See Elrington
Marshall, John George, 496–97
Marshall, Joseph, 496
Marshall, Joseph Head, 1st Baron d'Avray, 497
Marshall, Margaret (wife of Joseph), 496
Marshall d'Avray, Laurestine Marie, 497
Marshall d'Avray, Margaret Emma. See Glenn
Marshall de Brett Maréchal, Joseph, 2nd Baron d'Avray, 497–98

Marsham, Charles, 2nd Earl of Romney, Viscount Romney, 291
Marsham, Charles, 3rd Earl of Romney, Viscount Marsham, 292
Marsham, Lady Frances (Fletcher), 291
Marsham, Lady Harriet (Fletcher), 292
Martin*, Chester (1882–1958), 364, 365, 369
Martin*, Félix (1804–86), 734
Martin, George, 347
Martin, James, 331
Martin, Janet (Liddell), 441
Marx, Karl Heinrich, 670
Mary of the Sacred Heart. See Valois, Salomé
Mason, Louise (Delagrave), 218
Mason, Margaret (Young), 720
Masse, Adeline (Roy), 635
Masseras, Eugène, 164
Massicotte*, Édouard-Zotique (1867–1947), 502
Masson, Adolphe, 501
Masson, Alfred, 501
Masson, Cécile (Masson), 500
Masson, Damase, 501
Masson, Damien, 500
Masson, Eustache, 500
Masson, Gilles, 498
Masson, Isidore-Édouard-Candide, 498–99
Masson*, Joseph (1791–1847), 10, 498
Masson, Louis, 499
Masson*, Louis-François-Roderick (Rodrigue) (1833–1903), 498
Masson, Luc-Hyacinthe, 499–500, 544
Masson, Marc-Damase, 500–1
Masson, Marie-Geneviève-Sophie. See Raymond
Masson, Marie-Josephte-Caroline. See Dumas
Masson, Marie-Louise. See Beaupré
Masson, Marie-Louise. See Choquet
Masson, Odile. See Watier
Masson, Pierre, 500
Masson, Pierre-Marc, 500
Masson, Scholastique. See Pfeiffer
Masson, Virginie. See Jobin
Masson, Wilfred (Wilfrid), 498
Masson, Wilfrid-Antoine, 220
Massue, L.-H., 144
Matheson, Annabella. See Russel
Matheson*, Arthur James (b.1845; fl.1913), 501
Matheson, Flora. See Macrae
Matheson, John, 501
Matheson, Mary Fraser. See Robertson
Matheson, Roderick, 501–2, 650
Mathew, Theobald, 191
Mathews* (Matthews), Peter (1786–1838), 639, 641
Matrine. See Qua-hail-ya
Matthew*, George Frederick (1837–1923), 338
Maurel, Marie (Dessane), 228
Mayne, Leonora (Daly), 213
Mayrand, Agathe. See Roy
Mayrand, Étienne, 502–3
Mayrand, Félicité. See Le Maître-Bellenoix
Mayrand, Jean-Baptiste, 502
Mayrand, Sophie. See Héneau
Mayrand, Thérèse. See Heney
Mazenod, Charles-Fortuné de, 322
Mazenod, Charles-Joseph-Eugène de, 275, 419, 609
Meagher, Nicholas Hogan, 71
Meahan, James, 271
Meares, Sarah (Burnaby), 111
Measam, Julie (Simard), 654
Mecham*, George Frederick (1829–59), 396, 397
Medcalf, Alfred, 504
Medcalf, Francis Henry, 503–4
Medcalf, Martha (wife of William), 503
Medcalf, Mary. See Harrison
Medcalf, William, 503
Medley*, John (1804–92), 495
Meilleur, Jean, 504
Meilleur, Jean-Baptiste, 15, 75, 76, 266, 326, 401, 418, 504–9, 527, 583, 603
Meilleur, Joséphine. See Éno, dit Deschamps
Meilleur, Joséphine-Charlotte (Barthe), 505
Meilleur, Marie-Suzanne. See Blaignier
Mekaisto, 662
Melbourne, Viscount. See Lamb
Mellany, Catherine (Devlin), 229
Memlingh, Dederika (Johnson), 381
Mendes, Anna Gabriella. See Head
Mendes, Fernando, 342
Mendes, Moses, 342
Menzies*, George (d.1847), 656
Menzies, Mary (Geddie), 302
Mercer, Andrew, 509–10
Mercer, Andrew Francis, 509, 510
Mercer, Graeme, 715
Mercer, Mary, 509
Mercier, Antoine (father), 510
Mercier, Antoine, 510–11
Mercier*, Augustin (fl.1818–50), 375
Mercier, Élisabeth. See Chirat
Mercier, Eliza J. (Barry), 36
Mercier*, Honoré (1840–94), 16, 25
Mercier, Sophie (Bruguier), 107
Mercil (Mercille), Marie (Bétournay), 59
Meredith*, Edmund Allen (1817–98), 584
Meredith, Mary Webb (Bernard), 51
Meredith*, Sir William Ralph (1840–1923), 645
Mérimée, Prosper, 150
Merivale, Herman, 245
Mérode, Xavier de, 542
Merrill, Mary (Poor), 590
Merritt*, William Hamilton (1793–1862), 127, 255, 403, 708
Metcalfe*, Sir Charles Theophilus, 1st Baron Metcalfe (1785–1846), 24, 69, 92, 93, 118, 119, 132, 133, 143, 219, 233, 255, 256, 257, 263, 311, 359, 404, 462, 502, 512, 522, 619
Metherall, Francis, 511–12
Metherall, Mary. See Langlois
Metherall, Mary. See Nelson
Metzler, Mary Elizabeth (Spike), 664
Mexborough, Earl of. See Savile
Meyer, Minna (Carpenter), 138
Michaux*, André (1746–1802), 105
Michel*, Sir John (1804–86), 74
Middleton, Robert, 512–13
Miertsching, C. A. See Erxleben
Miertsching, Erdmuth. See Naacké

Miertsching, Johann, 513
Miertsching, Johann August, 513–14
Miertsching, Marie (Jannasch), 513
Mignault, Pierre-Marie, 428
Miles, Elijah, 230
Miles, Margaret (Hilyard), 349
Milette, Alexis, 301
Mill, John Stuart, 607, 608
Miller, Anne Jeanette. See Curtis
Miller, Benjamin, 514
Miller, Garret Trafalgar Nelson, 534
Miller, Laura. See Hamlin
Miller, Linus Wilson, 483, 514
Miller, Maria Frances Ann. See Morris
Miller, Mary (Lanctot), 420
Miller, Mary Ann Elizabeth (Carter), 140
Millet, Jean-François, 410
Millidge, Phoebe (Chandler), 157
Millidge*, Thomas (d.1838), 620
Milloy, Alexander, 515
Milloy*, Donald (d.1907), 515
Milloy, Duncan, 515
Milloy, Euphemia. See Thompson
Milloy, William, 515
Mills, Aurora. See Holton
Mills, Christina. See Hesse
Mills*, David (1831–1903), 294
Mills, Frederick W., 228
Mills, James, 515
Mills, John B., 404
Mills, Samuel Sylvester, 515–16
Milner, Christopher, 516
Milnes*, Sir Robert Shore (1746–1837), 77
Milton, Lady. See Beauclerk
Milton, Viscount. See Wentworth-Fitzwilliam
Minixi. See Onistah-sokaksin
Minns, William, 664
Missilier, Françoise (Bourgeaux), 81
Mitchell, Frances (McDonald), 459
Mitchell, James, 459
Mitchell*, Peter (1824–99), 288
Mitcheson, Catherine (Bagg), 32
Mitcheson, Frances. See MacGregor
Mitcheson, Robert, 32
Miville, Marie-Anne (Crémazie), 201, 202
Mixter, Charles Whitney, 608, 609
Moberly*, Walter (1832–1915), 112
Moffatt*, George (1787–1865), 440, 520, 524, 591, 708
Moffatt, John Ogilvy, 524
Moile, Nicholas Thirning. See Bliss, Henry
Molesworth, Arthur Nepean, 516
Molesworth, Balfour Nepean, 517
Molesworth, Harriett. See Hawkins
Molesworth, Sarah Georgina. See Kertland
Molesworth, Thomas Nepean, 516–17
Moll. See Berczy
Molloy, John W., 178
Molson, Anne (Molson), 519, 522
Molson, Elizabeth. See Badgley
Molson, Elizabeth Sarah Badgley (Macpherson), 522
Molson*, John (1764–1836), 517, 518, 519, 520
Molson*, John (1787–1860), 23, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 524, 525
Molson, John, III, 522, 525
Molson, John Henry Robinson, 520, 521, 523, 524
Molson, Martha (wife of Thomas), 520
Molson, Sarah Insley. See Vaughan
Molson*, Thomas (1791–1863), 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524
Molson, William, 219, 517–26
Molson, William (son), 522
Molson, William Markland, 524
Molt*, Theodore Frederick (d.1856), 229
Moncel. See Giffard
Monck*, Charles Stanley, 4th Viscount Monck and 1st Baron Monck (1819–94), 103, 122, 146, 148, 405, 465, 466, 467
Mondelet, Charles-Elzéar, 37, 154, 219, 506, 526–28, 579, 689
Mondelet, Charlotte. See Boucher de Grosbois
Mondelet*, Dominique (1799–1863), 526, 527, 653
Mondelet*, Jean-Marie (1772–1848), 526
Mondelet, Mary Elizabeth Henrietta. See Carter
Monet, Jean-Baptiste-Pierre-Antoine de, Chevalier de Lamarck, 65
Mongeon, Marguerite (Cartier, dit l'Angevin), 142
Monk*, Samuel Cornwallis (1814–88), 37, 424, 624
Monro, Christine. See Fisher
Monro, George, 528–29
Monro, John, 528
Monroe, Christy (Holmes), 353
Montalembert, Charles-Forbes-René de, 580
Monteagle of Brandon, Baron. See Spring-Rice
Montesquieu, Baron de. See Secondat
Montgomery, Alexander, 529
Montgomery, John, 344, 459, 482, 510, 529–30, 641
Montgomery, Mary. See Wilmot
Montgomery*, Richard (1736–75), 13
Montigny. See Testard
Montigny, M. de, 422
Montour, Julie-Éliza (Malhiot), 490
Montour*, Nicolas (1760?–1808), 490
Montpetit*, André-Napoléon (1840–98), 218, 695
Montpetit*, Édouard (1882–1954), 586
Moodie, Susanna. See Strickland
Moody, Janet McAuslyn. See Watson
Moody, Joshua, 530
Moody*, Richard Clement (1813–87), 112, 245, 246, 701
Moody, Sewell Prescott, 530–31
Moore, Catherine. See Streit
Moore*, Dennis (1817–87), 379
Moore, Harriet A. See Stone
Moore, Sir John, 433
Moore, Nicholas, 531
Moore, Philip Henry, 531–32
Moore, T. E. L., 396
Moore, William, 550
Moquin, Louis, 24
Moreau, Hippolyte, 532
Moreau*, Louis-Zéphirin (1824–1901), 430
Moreau*, Marguerite. See Tremblay
Moreau, Pierre, 153, 154, 434, 435
Moreau, Raphaël, 532
Moreau* de Brésoles, Judith (1620–87), 156
Moresby, Sir Fairfax, 196, 243

Morgan*, Henry James (1842–1913), 680
Morin*, Augustin-Norbert (1803–65), 37, 95, 96, 119, 126, 133, 134, 135, 143, 144, 151, 169, 170, 201, 226, 256, 321, 462, 464, 508, 512, 526, 533, 548, 574, 580, 581, 591, 632, 642, 654, 722, 724, 725
Morin, Félicité. See Peltier
Morin, Joseph, 533
Morin, Louis-Siméon, 135, 219, 417, 533
Morisset*, Gérard (1898–1970), 301, 413
Morison, Elizabeth (Cameron), 115
Morreau, James, 514
Morrill, Eleanor. See Beach
Morrill, Margaret. See Andrews
Morrill, Simeon, 533–34
Morrin*, Joseph (1792–1861), 376
Morris*, Alexander (1826–89), 472, 474, 650
Morris, Catherine M., 534
Morris*, Charles (1711–81), 534
Morris, Guy, 534
Morris*, James (1798–1865), 127, 650
Morris, Maria Frances Ann (Miller), 534–35
Morris*, Patrick (1789–1849), 179, 398, 553, 601, 687
Morris, Sibylla Amelia Maria Sophia. See Leggett
Morris*, William (1786–1858), 119, 255, 257, 502, 650
Morrison, Donald, 303
Morrison, Ellen Norman (McLeod), 482
Morrison*, Joseph Curran (1816–85), 656
Morrison, Louisa (Himsworth), 436
Morse, Lucy (End), 271
Mortimer, Jane (Clark; Topp), 683
Morton, George Elkana, 593
Mosely, Eliza Jane (Willis), 704
Mosier, Hannah (Hurlburt), 372
Moss*, Thomas (1836–81), 336
Mott, Andrew Cook, 535
Mouat, Mary Ann. See Ainsley
Mouat, William, 535
Mouat, William Alexander, 535–36
Mount, Charlotte Magenty (Genevay; Lacoste), 418
Mountain, Anna Maria (Jarvis), 380
Mountain*, George Jehoshaphat (1789–1863), 58, 547, 548
Mountain, Harriet Mary (Nicolls), 548
Mountain*, Jacob (1749–1825), 53, 57, 452, 570
Mountain, Jacob (great-grandson), 278
Mountain*, Salter Jehoshaphat (1770?–1830), 5, 380
Mountain, Sophia. See Bevan
Mount Stephen, Baron. See Stephen
Mowat*, Sir Oliver (1820–1903), 99, 100, 101, 102, 118, 171, 193, 359, 466, 509, 510, 530, 707
Mower, Nahum, 717
Moyen, Jean, 106
Muckle, Anna E. (Harrison), 336
Mulgrave, Earl of. See Phipps
Mulkins, Hannibal, 536
Mulkins, Jane Gray. See Dennis
Mullen, Eldon, 498
Müller, Friedrich Max, 608
Mullett, James, 514
Mullins, Francis, 536
Mullins, Rosanna. See Connelly
Mullins, Rosanna Eleanora (Leprohon), 536–38
Mullock*, John Thomas (1807–69), 279, 399, 400
Mulvany, Frances Elizabeth (Shanly), 648
Muncaster, Baron. See Pennington
Munden, Naomi (Munn), 538
Munn, David, 518
Munn, Isabella. See Fisher
Munn, John, 331, 538–39, 600, 618
Munn, Naomi. See Munden
Munn, Stewart, 538
Munn, Robert Stewart, 538
Munn, William Punton, 538
Munro (Munroe). See Monro
Munro, Hugh, 271
Munro, Thomas, 174
Murchison, Sir Roderick Impey, 65, 408
Murdoch, Andrew, 539
Murdoch, Beamish, 363, 539–40
Murdoch, Elizabeth. See Beamish
Murdoch, James, 539
Murdoch, William, 73
Murphy, Captain, 264
Murphy, Robert, 587
Murray*, Alexander (1811–84), 445, 446, 447, 448
Murray, Alexander Hunter, 540–41
Murray, Anne. See Campbell
Murray, Deborah (Hazen), 341
Murray, Henrietta. See Horan
Murray, Hugh (father), 541
Murray, Hugh, 541–43
Murray*, John (1720–94), 341
Murray, Margaret. See Robertson
Murray, Marian (O'Hara), 557
Murray*, Robert (d. 1853), 506
Musgrave*, Sir Anthony (1828–88), 139
Musson, Eliza (Spencer), 663

Naacké, Erdmuth (Miertsching), 513
Napier, Sir Charles, 332
Napier, George, 74
Napoleon I, Emperor of France, 190, 305, 334, 497, 634
Napoleon III, Emperor of France, 48, 164, 165, 166, 448
Nares*, Sir George Strong (1831–1915), 29, 320, 563
Nasmyth, James, 231
Naughton, Martha (Buell), 109
Nault*, André (1830–1924), 439, 476
Needham, Sir Joseph, 117
Needham, Mark D., 543
Needham, Mrs Mark D. See Fraser
Needham, Mary Ann. See Gale
Needham, William Hayden, 14, 543–44
Neilson*, John (1776–1848), 61, 69, 132, 134, 219, 512, 567, 580
Neilson, John, 512
Neilson, Samuel, 512
Neilson, William, 512
Nelles*, Abraham (1805–84), 270
Nelles, Emilia (Alexander), 5
Nelles, Robert, 5
Nelles*, Samuel Sobieski (1823–87), 317
Nelmes, Susanna Jane (Haszard), 339
Nelson, Anne (Brown), 99
Nelson, Belle (Ridout), 619

Nelson, Eliza (Gwynne), 325
Nelson, Eugène, 547
Nelson, Horatio, Viscount Nelson, 700, 701
Nelson*, Hugh (1830–93), 530
Nelson, Jane. See Dies
Nelson, Mary (Metherall), 511
Nelson, Robert, 143, 261, 490, 491, 492, 499, 544–47, 569, 576
Nelson, Thomas, 99
Nelson, William, 99, 544
Nelson*, Wolfred (1792–1863), 76, 78, 376, 544, 545, 574, 575, 577, 715
Nevins, Jane (Wright), 718
Newcastle, Duke of. See Clinton
Newlands, Barbara (Cunningham), 210
Newman, John Henry, 54, 548
Nicolas, François, 527
Nicolls, Gustavus, 547
Nicolls, Harriet Mary. See Mountain
Nicolls, Heriot Frances. See Thomson
Nicolls, Jasper Hume, 547–48
Niedermeyer, Louis, 228
Niles, Annie Maria (Hyman), 375, 549
Niles, Gertrude. See Dykert
Niles, Hannah. See Hicks
Niles, Henry, 548
Niles, Minerva Anne (Wenham; Gamble), 299
Niles, Stephen, 548
Niles, W. H., 65
Niles, William E., 375, 548–49
Nina, Lorenzo, 251
Nisbet, James, 549–50
Nisbet, Mary. See MacBeth
Nisbet, Thomas, 549
Noad, Emma Gaden. See Lilly
Noad, Joseph, 550–51
Nobili*, John (1812–56), 221
Noble, Anna Maria (Browne), 104
Nolet (sorceress), 20
Nordheimer*, Abraham (d. 1860?), 371
Nordheimer*, Samuel (1824–1912), 371
Normanby, Marquis of. See Phipps
Normandeau*, Louis (1812–91), 428, 429
Normandin, Étienne, 153
North, Brownlow, 516
Northup, Agnes. See Harvey
Northup, Emily. See Cochran
Northup, Jeremiah, 172, 551–52
Northup, John, 551
Northup, Joseph, 551
Notman*, William (1826–91), 263
Nugent, Ellen Maria. See Creedon
Nugent, John, 552
Nugent, John Valentine, 552–53, 687
Nunns, J. F., 371

Oakes*, Forrest (d. 1783), 273
O'Beirne*, Eugene Francis (Mr O'B) (fl. 1811–64), 700
O'Brien, Edward George, 554
O'Brien, James (Bronterre), 313
O'Brien, John, 361
O'Brien, Lucius, 554
O'Brien*, Lucius James (1796–1870), 554
O'Brien*, Lucius Richard (1832–99), 393, 554
O'Brien, Mary. See Callender-Campbell
O'Brien, Mary Sophia. See Gapper
O'Bryan, William, 511
O'Callaghan, Charlotte Augustina. See Crampe
O'Callaghan, Ellen. See Hawe
O'Callaghan, Edmund Bailey, 20, 361, 545, 554–56, 575
O'Connell, Daniel, 313, 559, 580
O'Connor, Feargus, 313
O'Connor*, John (1824–87), 561
O'Connor, Juliana (Gugy), 320
Oddy, Mary Ann (Heavysege), 346
Odell, Anne (McCawley), 453
Odell, Elizabeth Ann. See Bliss
Odell*, William Franklin (1774–1844), 315, 453, 644, 711
Odell*, William Hunter (1811–91), 73
Odin*, Henriette (Feller) (1800–68), 428, 633, 675
O'Donoghue, William Bernard, 439, 556–57, 559
O'Dwyer, Esther (Dixon), 231
Offenbach, Jacques, 228
Ogden, Ann. See Richardson
Ogden*, Charles Richard (1791–1866), 181, 337, 526
Ogden, David, 10
Ogden*, Peter Skene (1794–1854), 241, 242, 391, 426, 486
Ogle, George, 309
O'Hara, Catherine (Maguire), 487
O'Hara, Fanny. See Taylor
O'Hara, Marian. See Murray
O'Hara, Robert, 557
O'Hara, Walter, 557
O'Hea, Timothy, 558
Oliphant*, Laurence (1829–88), 164
Olivier, Henri, 633
O'Lone, Hugh F., 645
O'Mahony, John, 559
O'Meara*, Frederick Augustus (1814–88), 12
Omoxesisixany* (d. 1858), 392
O'Neill, Anne (wife of Terence Joseph), 560
O'Neill, John, 74, 282, 556, 558–59
O'Neill, Mary. See Crow
O'Neill (O'Neil), Terence Joseph, 80, 559–60
Onistah-sokaksin, 560–61
Onslow, Georges, 228
O'Reagan, Anthony, 419
O'Reilly, Bridget, 509, 510
O'Reilly, James, 561
O'Reilly, Mary Jane. See Redmond
O'Reilly, Peter, 561
Orléans, François-Ferdinand-Philippe-Louis-Marie d', Prince de Joinville, 625
Orléans, Louis-Philippe-Joseph, Duc d' (Philippe Égalité), 582
Orr, Elizabeth (Poor), 590
Orr, Janet (Laird), 419
Osborn, Edward, 561
Osborn, Eliza. See Todington
Osborn, Helen Harriet Gordon. See Hinxman
Osborn, Noel, 562
Osborn, Sherard, 42, 43, 455, 561–63
Osler*, Sir Edmund Boyd (1845–1924), 393

Osler*, Featherston (1838–1924), 336
Osler*, Featherstone Lake (1805–95), 54
Osler*, Sir William (1849–1919), 39, 84, 382
O'Sullivan*, Michael (1784–1839), 526
Oswald, James, 394
Otter, William, 663
Ouimet, Benjamin, 492
Ouimet*, Gédéon (1823–1905), 204, 305, 533
Owen*, William Fitzwilliam (1774–1857), 396
Oxenden, Anne Charlotte (Alston), 9
Oxenden*, Ashton (1808–92), 58, 548

PACAUD, Charles-Adrien, 77
Paddock, Anna (Thurgar), 681
Pagé, Éléonore (Derome), 225
Pageot, Josephte (Gosselin), 308
Paget, Sir James, 38
Paillé (Paillard), Louise (Prat), 599
Painchaud*, Charles-François (1782–1838), 488, 602, 604
Painchaud, François, 563
Painchaud, Geneviève. See Parant
Painchaud, Joseph, 18, 563–64
Painchaud, Marie-Angélique. See Drouin
Palliser*, John (1817–87), 81, 473
Palmer*, Edward (1809–89), 184, 186, 187, 194, 264, 420, 461, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598
Palmer, Mary (Connell), 191
Palmerston, Viscount. See Temple
Panet*, Bernard-Claude (1753–1833), 46, 604, 675
Panet, Charles, 236, 604
Panet, Louise-Amélie (Berczy), 50
Panet, Marie (Dorion), 235
Panet*, Philippe (1791–1855), 134, 582
Panet*, Pierre-Louis (1761–1812), 50
Papin*, Joseph (1825–62), 282, 415, 422, 533
Papineau, Augustin-Cyrille, 429
Papineau, Azélie (Bourassa), 577
Papineau*, Denis-Benjamin (1789–1854), 134, 255, 256, 566
Papineau, Ezilda, 321, 577
Papineau, Gustave, 321
Papineau, Joseph (father), 565
Papineau*, Joseph (1752–1841), 564, 565
Papineau, Julie. See Bruneau
Papineau, Lactance, 575
Papineau, Louis-Joseph, 13, 18, 61, 62, 75, 76, 77, 132, 142, 143, 160, 213, 236, 237, 260, 321, 337, 355, 415, 418, 429, 491, 505, 512, 526, 527, 544, 545, 546, 554, 555, 564–78, 579, 580, 581, 584, 585, 626, 642, 655, 694
Papineau*, Louis-Joseph-Amédée (1819–1903), 545, 547
Papineau, Marie-Louise (Truteau), 688
Papineau, Rosalie. See Cherrier
Pâquet*, Benjamin (1832–1900), 686
Paquin, Jacques, 532
Paradis, Marguerite (Cartier), 142
Parant, Geneviève (Painchaud), 563
Parant, Marie (Légaré), 437
Parant, Pierre, 579
Paré, Joseph-Octave, 250, 578
Paré, Léon, 578
Paré, Marie-Angélique. See Grenier
Parent, Étienne, 32, 132, 203, 304, 579–87
Parent, Étienne-François, 579
Parent, Hélène (Roy), 635
Parent, Joséphine-Henriette (Gérin-Lajoie), 580
Parent, Josephte. See Clouet
Parent, Marie-Augustine (Sulte), 580
Parent, Marie-Mathilde-Henriette. See Grenier
Parent, Mathilde-Sabine (Gélinas; Bonald), 304, 580
Parisis, Pierre-Louis, 87
Parke, Ephraim Jones, 645
Parker*, Sir Horatio Gilbert (1862–1932), 538
Parker*, Robert (1796–1865), 288, 341
Parkin, Edward, 587
Parkin, Edward Bradley, 587
Parkin*, Sir George Robert (1846–1922), 498
Parkin, John Buckworth, 587
Parkin, Katherine. See Bradley
Parkin, Sarah. See Cullen
Parkman*, Francis (1823–93), 13
Parley, Peter. See Goodrich, Samuel Griswold
Parry*, Sir William Edward (1790–1855), 42, 454
Parsons*, Robert John (d. 1883), 8, 553, 687
Partelow*, John Roy (1800–65), 159, 285, 712
Paterson, James, 336
Patmore, Coventry, 347
Patrizi, Constantin, 193
Patten, Amanda Jane. See Darling
Patterson, Joan (Farrell), 277
Patterson, Mary Jane (Hall), 329
Patterson*, Peter (d. 1851), 32, 329
Patteson*, Thomas Charles (1836–1907), 469, 632
Peache, Alfred, 208
Peacocke, George J., 74
Pearkes, George, 587
Pearkes, Mary Elizabeth. See Dorman
Peck, Aliza Amelia. See Gowan
Peck, Ebenezer, 653
Peck, William, 313
Pedley, Alice. See Curtain
Pedley, Charles, 587–88
Pedley, James, 587
Pedley, Sarah. See Stowell
Peek, Rhoda (Collins), 188
Peel, Sir Robert, 257, 345, 394, 443, 494, 705, 728
Peenaquim, 661
Peers*, Henry Newsham (1821–64), 486
Pelham, George, 110
Pélissier, Catherine. See Delzenne
Pell, James, 517
Pelletier, Rose-Virginie, dite Marie de Sainte-Euphrasie, 17
Pellew, Edward, Viscount Exmouth, 110
Pelly, George, 486
Peltier, Émélie. See Herigault
Peltier, Félicité (Morin), 533
Peltier, Hector, 470, 588–89
Peltier, Suzanne Ellen. See Van Felson
Peltier*, Toussaint (1792–1854), 588
Penn, Anna (Carpenter), 137
Pennefather, Sir John Lysaght, 332
Pennington, John, 1st Baron Muncaster, 443
Pennington, Maria Margaret Frances (Lindsay), 443

Penny*, Edward Goff (1820–81), 355
Penny, John, 306
Penny*, William (1809–92), 29, 561, 562
Pentland, Margaret. See Baptist
Pentland, William Charles, 34
Pépin, Zoé (Germain), 305
Perley*, Moses Henry (1804–62), 14, 338, 653
Pernette, Sophia (Barry), 36
Perrault*, Charles-Norbert (d. 1832), 375
Perrault*, Charles-Ovide (1809–37), 577, 600
Perrault, Delphine-Denise (Bourgeau; Sincennes), 657
Perrault*, Jean-Baptiste-Olivier (1773–1827), 18, 388
Perrault, Julie (Juchereau Duchesnay), 388
Perrault, Louis, 555
Perrault, Mathilde. See Roy
Perry*, Peter (1793–1851), 60, 62, 94, 343, 624
Pestalozzi, Johann Heinrich, 497
Peters, Joseph, 590
Petit Chef, Le. See Wikaskokiseyin
Peto, Sir Samuel Morton, 351, 591
Pettigrew, Harriet. See Heavysege
Pfeiffer (Payfer), Scholastique (Masson), 500
Phelan, James Julien Theodore, 219
Phelan*, Patrick (1795–1857), 107, 361, 463
Phillips, Anner (Holton), 354
Phillips, John, 445
Phillips*, Thomas (1781–1849), 34, 35
Phipps, Sir Constantine Henry, 1st Marquis of Normanby and 2nd Earl of Mulgrave, 601
Pickard, John, 288
Pierce, Jason C., 519
Pierce, John A., 710
Pierriche. See Falcon
Piers, Henry, 77
Piers, Lewis, 176
Piers*, Temple (1783–1860), 176
Pigeon, Félix, 613
Pigeon, Marie-Anne (Renaud), 613
Pigeon, Véronique-Aimée. See Trudelle
Pigeyre, Marie (Soulerin), 662
Pike*, Warburton (1861?–1915), 38
Pim*, Bedford Clapperton Trevelyan (1826–86), 396, 397, 407, 455
Pineo, Henry Gesner, 71
Pinkham*, William Cyprian (1844–1928), 209
Pinsent, Louisa. See Broom
Pinsent, Robert John, 589–90
Pinsent*, Sir Robert John (1834–93), 589
Pinsonnault, Gédéon, 527
Pinsonnault, Joseph, 527
Pinsonnault*, Pierre-Adolphe (1815–83), 190, 430, 662
Pipes, Esther (McCully), 456
Pius IX, 95, 148, 193, 250, 315, 429, 430, 431, 493, 542, 715
Plainval, Vicomte de. See Frasse
Plante, Édouard-Gabriel, 432
Platt, Prudence (Roblin), 624
Playfair*, Andrew William (d. 1868), 650
Playfair, Sir Lyon, 1st Baron Playfair, 362
Plenderleath, William. See Christie, William
Plessis*, Joseph-Octave (1763–1825), 162, 488, 578, 604
Plimsoll, Miss, 409
Plinguet*, Jacques-Alexis (d. 1893 or 1894), 237
Point*, Pierre (1802–96), 190
Polette, Antoine, 418
Pollok, Arthur, 305
Pollok, John, 305
Pominville, François-Pierre, 59, 143
Poole*, Thomas Wesley (1831?–1905), 636
Poor, Elizabeth. See Orr
Poor, Elizabeth Adams. See Hill
Poor, John Alfred, 590–93, 722
Poor, Laura Elizabeth, 592, 593
Poor, Margaret Robinson. See Barr
Poor, Mary. See Merrill
Poor, Silvanus, 590
Poore, Sir Edward, 391
Pope, Helen. See DesBrisay
Pope*, James Colledge (1826–85), 187, 195, 211, 397, 398, 473, 594, 596, 597, 598, 613
Pope*, John Henry (1824–89), 642
Pope*, Joseph (1803–95), 184, 188, 593
Pope*, Sir Joseph (1854–1926), 593
Pope, Lucy. See Colledge
Pope, William Henry, 186, 187, 194, 264, 265, 419, 593–99, 612, 679
Porden, Eleanor Anne (Franklin), 319
Porlier, Jacques, 76
Porlier, Marguerite (Boucher-Belleville), 76
Porter, Agnes. See Dryden
Porter*, Charles (fl. 1807–36), 453
Porter, James, 599
Porter, John, 124
Portugal. See Bibeau
Poterat, Marquis de, 275
Poulin, Louise (Archambault), 16
Powell, Anne Murray (Gwynne), 325
Powell, Ellen Catherine (Gordon), 308
Powell, John, 529
Powell*, William Dummer (1755–1834), 325, 618
Powell*, William Frederick (fl. 1851–81), 481
Power, Anna Mathilda (Cochran), 177
Power*, Michael (1804–47), 578
Power, Susanne. See Aubert de Gaspé
Power*, William (1800–60), 20, 487
Prag, Martin, 216
Prat, Charles-Ferdinand, 599
Prat, Jean-Baptiste, 599
Prat, Jean-Baptiste, dit John Pratt, 599–600
Prat, Louise. See Paillé
Prat, Mathilde. See Roy
Prat, Mathilde (Girouard), 600
Pratt, John. See Prat, Jean-Baptiste
Pratte, François-Xavier, 615
Préfontaine, Christophe, 144
Prendergast, James Luke, 331
Prescott, Henrietta (Lady Lushington), 600
Prescott, Sir Henry, 180, 398, 433, 600–1, 687
Prescott, Isaac, 600
Prescott, Mary Anne Charlotte. See Auvergne
Prevost*, Sir George (1767–1816), 566
Prévost, Guillaume (father), 306
Prévost, Guillaume, 306
Prévost, Hortense. See Globensky

Prevost*, James Charles (1810–91), 243
Prévost, Josephte. See Quévillon
Price*, David Edward (1826–83), 602
Price*, Evan John (1840–99), 602
Price*, James Hervey (1797–1882), 94, 125, 127, 299
Price, Jane. See Stewart
Price*, William (1789–1867), 601, 635
Price, William Evan, 601–2
Prince, Hermine (Richard), 615
Prince*, John (1796–1870), 642
Pritzel, Georg August, 105
Proulx, Élisabeth. See Grondin
Proulx, Louis (father), 602
Proulx, Louis, 389, 602–3
Proulx, Marie-Antoinette-Thaïs (Lacoste), 418
Provancher*, Léon (1820–92), 105, 106, 508, 635
Provencher*, Joseph-Norbert (1787–1853), 221, 308, 676, 677
Provost*, Théophile-Stanislas (1834–1904), 86
Prowse*, Daniel Woodley (1834–1914), 180, 279, 400, 433, 600
Pryor, Elizabeth Ann (De Mille), 223
Pryor, Emily (Binney), 66
Pryor, John (politician), 6
Pryor*, John (1805–92), 223
Pryor, Louisa (Wentworth; Johnston), 386
Pryor, Sophia (Almon), 6
Pryor*, William (d. 1884), 189
Punton, William, 538
Pusey, Edward Bouverie, 84
Putnam, Charles Simonds, 709
Putnam, William, 548, 549

QUA-HAIL-YA, 217
Quertier, Édouard, 604–5
Quertier, Hélier, 604
Quertier, Marie-Anne. See Ariail
Quesnel*, Frédéric-Auguste (1785–1866), 405
Quévillon, Josephte (Prévost), 306
Quévillon*, Louis-Amable (1749–1823), 301
Quiblier*, Joseph-Vincent (1796–1852), 17, 89
Quirouet, François, 260
Quirouet, Marguerite (Drolet), 260

RACEY, Charlotte (Elliot), 270
Racine*, Antoine (1822–93), 685
Racine*, Dominique (1828–88), 685
Rae, Alexander, 184
Rae*, Ann Cuthbert (Knight; Fleming) (1788–1860), 606
Rae, Eliza (wife of JOHN), 606
Rae, John (father of JOHN), 605
Rae, John, 605–9, 708, 709
Rae*, John (1813–93), 319, 407, 541
Rae, Margaret. See Cuthbert
Rae*, William Glen (1809?–45), 486
Rafinesque, Constantine Samuel, 65
Raimbault, Jean, 602
Rainy Chief. See Sotai-na
Rambau*, Alfred-Xavier (1810–56), 75
Rameau* de Saint-Père, François-Edmé (1820–99), 47
Ramezay*, Jean-Baptiste-Nicolas-Roch de (1708–77), 13
Ramsay*, Sir George, 9th Earl of Dalhousie (1770–1838), 516, 526, 528, 544, 655
Ramsay, George, 12th Earl of Dalhousie and 1st Baron Ramsay, 590
Ramsay*, Thomas Kennedy (1826–86), 135
Ramsey, Mary (Gordon), 308
Rankin*, Alexander (1788–1852), 271, 712
Rankin, Arthur, 126
Rankin*, Charles (1797–1886), 259
Rankin*, Robert (1801–70), 306, 314, 315
Ransom, Abigail (Street), 668
Ranvoyzé, Marie-Vénérande (Deblois), 136
Ravensberg. See Brasseur de Bourbourg, Charles-Étienne
Raymond, Angélique (Lanctôt), 420
Raymond, Jean-Moïse, 420
Raymond*, Joseph-Sabin (1810–87), 429, 430
Raymond*, Marie-Geneviève-Sophie (Masson) (1798–1882), 498
Raymond, Rémi, 429
Read*, Robert (1814–96), 294
Reade, Alfred, 271, 644, 711
Reade*, John (1837–1919), 346, 347
Reboul, Augustine-Marie. See Guillon
Reboul, Louis-Antoine, 609
Reboul, Louis-Étienne-Delille, 609–10
Red Crow. See Mekaisto
Redford, Mary (Harris), 334
Redmond, Mary Jane (O'Reilly), 561
Redon, Louis, 260
Redpath*, John (1796–1869), 405, 525
Rees, Evans, 610
Rees, William, 610–11
Reeves, Émilie (Heath), 346
Reeves*, John (1752?–1829), 588
Regnaud, Antoinette. See Gay
Regnaud, François-Joseph-Victor, 611
Reid, Christian. See Arnot
Reid, Hugo, 611–12
Reid, Marion. See Kirkland
Reid, Peter, 611
Reid, Robert, 104
Reigen, Frederick, 137
Reilly, Edward, 264, 612–13
Reilly, Hannah (wife of EDWARD), 613
Renaud, Hélène-Flavie. See Chicoux-Duvert
Renaud, Jean-Baptiste (father of LOUIS), 613
Renaud, Jean-Baptiste (brother of LOUIS), 613
Renaud, Louis, 613–14
Renaud, Marie-Anne. See Pigeon
Renaud, Marie-Reine. See Garriépy
Renaud, Napoléon, 614
Renaud, Sophia. See Lefebvre
Renaud, Zoé-Aimée (Trudel), 614
Rendell, Stephen, 381
Reynard, Alexis, 614–15
Reynard, Alexis-Joseph, 614
Reynard, Victoire. See Dugas
Ricard, Pascal, 322
Rice, Elizabeth (Chandler), 157
Rice, Sarah (Sally) (Cushing), 211
Richard, Charles-Auguste, 615
Richard*, Édouard (1844–1904), 615

Richard, Euphrasie (Dupuis), 265
Richard, Françoise (Dupuy), 266
Richard, Hermine. See Prince
Richard, Louis-Eusèbe, 615
Richard, Marie. See Hébert
Richards*, Albert Norton (1822–97), 201
Richards, Calcina (Buell), 110
Richards*, George Henry (1820–1900), 562, 563
Richards*, Stephen (1820–94), 467
Richards*, Sir William Buell (1815–89), 312, 463
Richardson, Ann (Ogden; Anderson), 10
Richardson, James (father of JAMES), 615
Richardson, James, 615–17
Richardson*, James (1810–83), 445
Richardson*, John (1755?–1831), 10
Richardson*, Sir John (1787–1865), 26, 27, 28, 38
Richardson*, John (1796–1852), 536
Richardson, Margaret Ann (Forman), 293
Richardson, Rebecca. See Dennis
Richardson, Sarah. See Ashmore
Richier, Thérèse (Guigues), 322
Ridley, Thomas, 538, 617–18
Ridley, Thomas Harrison, 617, 618
Ridley, William, 617
Ridout, Belle. See Nelson
Ridout, Caroline Amelia (Humphreys), 371
Ridout, Dorothy. See McCuaig
Ridout, George, 62, 344, 345, 618–19
Ridout, George (father of GEORGE PERCIVAL), 619
Ridout, George Percival, 80, 119, 619–20
Ridout, John, 618
Ridout, Joseph Davis, 619, 620
Ridout, Mary. See Campbell
Ridout, Mary Ann. See Wright
Ridout, Mary Hardwick. See Unwin
Ridout*, Samuel Smith (1778–1855), 371, 509, 619
Ridout*, Thomas (1754–1829), 618, 619
Ridout*, Thomas Gibbs (1792–1861), 619
Riel*, Jean-Louis (1817–64), 47
Riel, Julie. See Lagemodière
Riel*, Louis (1844–85), 59, 67, 70, 111, 148, 149, 198, 210, 230, 296, 297, 357, 377, 439, 468, 472, 476, 556, 557, 559, 628, 630, 631, 646, 669, 677, 729, 756
Rintoul*, William (1797–1851), 92
Ripon, Earl of. See Robinson
Ritchie, Miss, 238
Ritchie, Caroline Maria (Dodd), 232
Ritchie, Elizabeth. See Johnston
Ritchie*, John William (1808–90), 679
Ritchie, Thomas, 383
Ritchie, Thomas Weston, 249
Ritchie*, William (1804–56), 720
Ritchie*, Sir William Johnstone (1813–92), 286, 543, 712, 713
Ritchot*, Noël-Joseph (1825–1905), 70, 645, 646
Ritchot, Ursule (Valois), 690, 691
Robb, Charles, 445
Robert, Sophie (La Rocque), 428
Roberts*, Sir Charles George Douglas (1860–1943), 498
Roberts, George Goodridge, 498
Roberts*, William Randall (1830–97), 558, 559
Robertson, Andrew, 620, 641
Robertson*, Colin (1779?–1842), 297
Robertson, George R., 620, 641
Robertson, James, 620
Robertson, John, 159, 287, 620–22
Robertson*, Joseph Gibb (1820–99), 620
Robertson*, Margaret (Murray) (fl. 1865–87), 620
Robertson, Mary Fraser (Matheson), 501
Robertson, Robert, 620
Robertson, Sophia. See Dobie
Robertson*, William Wilcox (1825–99), 620
Robertson-Ross*, Patrick (1828–83), 729
Robichaud, Euphrosine (Aumon), 23
Robie*, Simon Bradstreet (1770–1858), 232, 352, 383
Robin, Elizabeth (Le Boutillier), 435
Robinson*, Christopher (1763–98), 622
Robinson, Elizabeth Ann. See Jarvis
Robinson, Esther. See Sayre
Robinson, Frederick John, Viscount Goderich and 1st Earl of Ripon, 180, 206
Robinson, George, 179
Robinson, J. H., 166
Robinson, Sir James Lukin, 336
Robinson*, Sir John Beverley (1791–1863), 78, 79, 121, 253, 343, 344, 530, 622, 705
Robinson*, John Beverley (1821–96), 510
Robinson, Mary (Delisle), 219
Robinson, Mary Jane. See Hagerman
Robinson*, Peter (1785–1838), 104, 343, 618, 622, 636
Robinson, Rebecca (Hodgson), 352
Robinson, Sarah Ann (Boulton), 79
Robinson, William Benjamin, 256, 257, 283, 405, 622–24
Robinson*, Sir William Cleaver Francis (1834–97), 352
Roblin*, David (1812–63), 624
Roblin, John Philip, 624
Roblin, Philip, 624
Roblin, Prudence. See Platt
Robson, Ebenezer, 701
Robson*, John (1824–92), 245, 246
Rodier, Charles-Séraphin, 624–26
Rodier*, Charles-Séraphin (1818–90), 625
Rodier*, Édouard-Étienne (1802–40), 142, 505, 545, 574, 624
Rodier, Jean-Baptiste, 624
Rodier, Julie-Catherine. See Le Jeune
Rodier, Marie-Louise. See Lacroix
Rodier, Pierre, 624
Roebuck, Ebenezer, 626
Roebuck, Henrietta. See Falconer
Roebuck, John Arthur, 514, 626–27, 655
Roebuck, Zipporah. See Tickell
Rogan, Elizabeth (Ross), 629
Rogan, Frank, 629
Roger, Ann. See Cruikshank
Roger, Charles (father), 627
Roger, Charles, 627–28
Roger, Dorothy. See MacRobie
Rogers, Charles (British historian), 627
Rogers, Charles (soldier), 627
Rogers*, James (1726?–90), 16, 193
Rogers, Mary (Armstrong), 16

Rogers, Robert Vashon, 536
Rolette, Angélique. See Jérôme
Rolette*, Jean-Joseph (1781–1842), 628
Rolette (Rollette), Joseph, 628, 669
Rolette, Marguerite. See Dubois
Rolph*, John (1793–1870), 60, 61, 62, 95, 126, 127, 169, 325, 343, 484, 705
Rolph, Joseph T., 270
Romanes, George, 442
Romney. See Marsham
Roper, Anna Gabriella. See Head
Rorke*, John (1807–96), 332
Rosamond, Bennett, 650
Rosamond, James, 650
Rose*, George MacLean (1829–98), 44
Rose*, Sir John (1820–88), 150, 368, 405, 684
Ross. See Robertson-Ross
Ross*, Alexander (1783–1856), 324, 629
Ross, Annabella (McDermot; Bird), 67
Ross, Augusta Elizabeth. See Baldwin
Ross, Bernard Rogan, 629
Ross, Christina (Ross), 629
Ross*, Donald (1797?–1852), 67, 390, 629
Ross, Elizabeth. See Rogan
Ross, Frances (Bird), 67
Ross, Henrietta (Black), 549
Ross, James, 629–31
Ross, James (father of BERNARD ROGAN), 629
Ross*, Sir James Clark (1800–62), 29, 454, 561
Ross*, Sir John (1777–1856), 26, 28, 406, 407, 561
Ross, John, 144, 200, 336, 561, 631–33
Ross, Margaret. See Crawford
Ross, Margaret. See Smith
Ross, Mathilda (Cochrane), 178
Ross, Sarah (wife of Alexander), 629
Ross, William, 629
Rottermond*, Édouard-Sylvestre, Comte de (1813–58), 445
Rousseau*, Jacques (1905–70), 106
Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 573, 585
Rousselot, Benjamin-Victor, 689
Roussy, Louis, 428, 633–34, 675
Rouvier, Sophronie (Chevalier), 165
Rouvroy, Claude-Henri de, comte de Saint-Simon, 585
Roux*, Jean-Henry-Auguste (1760–1831), 17
Rowan, Sir Charles, 634
Rowan, Charles, 634
Rowan, Martha. See Sprong
Rowan, Mary. See Wilson
Rowan, Robert (father of WILLIAM), 634
Rowan, Robert (brother of WILLIAM), 634
Rowan, Sir William, 634–35
Rowand*, John (1787–1854), 391
Rowand, Margaret (McKay), 473
Rowsell, Clara (Dixon), 231
Roy, Adeline. See Masse
Roy, Adeline (Lusignan), 635
Roy, Agathe (Mayrand; Auger), 502
Roy, Guillaume-Ernest, 422
Roy, Hélène. See Parent
Roy, James Alexander, 363, 367, 369
Roy, Joseph, 635
Roy, Louis-David, 635
Roy, Marie. See Brunet
Roy, Marie. See Fitzbach
Roy, Mathilde (Perrault; Prat), 600
Roy*, Pierre-Georges (1870–1953), 205, 413, 763
Rubidge, Charles, 635–36
Rubidge*, Frederick Preston (1806–98), 164, 635
Rubidge, Margaret. See Clarke
Rubidge, Margaret. See Gilmour
Rubidge, Robert, 635
Rudolph, John Charles, 587
Rueff, Jules, 260
Rundle*, Robert Terrill (1811–96), 4, 391, 471, 472
Rush, Richard, 403
Russel, Annabella (Matheson), 501
Russell, Agnes (McKenzie), 477
Russell*, Alexander Jamieson (1807–87), 446
Russell, Andrew, 45
Russell, Henry, 370
Russell, Jessie (Ker), 401
Russell, John, 1st Earl Russell, 76, 77, 254, 345, 364, 367, 438, 553, 574, 581, 626, 640
Russell, Joseph, 333
Russell*, Willis (1814–87), 627
Ruttan, Henry, 636–37
Ruttan, Henry Jones, 637
Ruttan, Margaret. See Steele
Ruttan, Mary. See Jones
Ruttan, William, 636
Ryan, Edward, 48
Ryan*, Henry (d. 1832), 638
Ryan, James, 637–38
Ryan*, Michael Patrick (1825–93), 230
Ryan, Thomas, 684
Ryerson*, Adolphus Egerton (1803–82), 4, 16, 45, 54, 63, 125, 253, 255, 256, 262, 317, 323, 442, 459, 466, 467, 616, 638, 639, 640, 641, 646
Ryerson, Edwy, 638
Ryerson*, George (1792–1882), 638, 639
Ryerson, John, 4, 317, 373, 616, 638–40, 641
Ryerson*, Joseph (1761–1854), 638, 640
Ryerson, Mary. See Armstrong
Ryerson, Mary. See Griffen
Ryerson, Mary. See Lewis
Ryerson, Sophia Mehetabel. See Stickney
Ryerson, William, 4, 638, 639, 640–41

SADLIER, James, 175
Sadlier, Mary Anne. See Madden
Sagard*, Gabriel (christened Théodat) (fl. 1614–34), 166
Saincennes. See also Sincennes
Saincennes, Jacques, 656
Saincennes, Marie-Josephte. See Marcotte
Saint-Aubin. See Blain
Sainte-Élisabeth. See Dorval
Saint-Étienne* de La Tour, Charles de (1593–1666), 426
Saint-Fauste. See Garrigues
Saint-Germain. See Gauthier
Saint-John, Henry, 1st Viscount Bolingbroke, 314
Saint-Just. See Letellier
Saint-Maurice. See Faucher

Saint-Michel, Charles, 512
Saint-Onge, Alphonsine (Dupuis), 266
Saint-Ours*, Charles-Louis-Roch de (1753–1834), 236, 428
Saint-Ours, François-Roch de, 236
Saint-Ours, Henriette-Amélie de (Dorion), 236
Saint-Père. See Rameau
Saint-Réal. See Vallières
Saint-Simon, Comte de. See Rouvroy
St Vincent, Earl of. See Jervis
Salaberry. See Irumberry
Sanborn, David Edwin, 641
Sanborn, Edwin David, 641
Sanborn, Eleanor Hall. See Brooks
Sanborn, Hannah. See Hook
Sanborn, John Sewell, 418, 641–43, 654
Sanborn, Nancy Judson. See Hasseltine
Sand, George. See Dupin, Aurore
Sandeman, Catherine Edith. See Brown
Sandom*, Williams (d. 1858), 259, 404, 454
Sandwell*, Bernard Keble (1876–1954), 517
Sanford, Emmeline. See Jackson
Sanford, Lydia Ann (Jackson), 379
Sanford*, William Eli (1838–99), 379
Sangster*, Charles (1822–93), 536
Sangster*, John Herbert (1831–1904), 452
San Jaime, Duke of. See Alfonso
Santoni*, Jacques-Philippe (b.1820; fl. 1892), 322
Sargent, Charles Sprague, 106
Sarrazin, Marguerite (Mallet), 492
Saunders, Arianna Margaretta Jekyll. See Chalmers
Saunders*, Edward Manning (1829–1916), 369
Saunders, Elizabeth Sophia. See Storie
Saunders*, John (1754–1834), 643
Saunders, John Simcoe, 643–44, 712
Savage, Alfred, 450
Savage, John, 559
Saveuse de Beaujeu, Adélaïde. See Aubert de Gaspé
Saveuse de Beaujeu, Georges-René, 20
Savile, John, 3rd Earl of Mexborough, 443
Savile, Lady Sarah Elizabeth (Lindsay), 443
Sawyer, David, 692
Sax, Pierre-Télesphore, 686
Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, Duke of. See Alfred Ernest Albert
Say, Jean-Baptiste, 571
Sayer, Pierre-Guillaume, 47, 168, 324
Sayre, Esther (Robinson; Beman), 622
Scadding*, Henry (1813–1901), 54, 610, 671
Scarborough, James, 535
Scatcherd, Anne. See Farley
Scatcherd, Isabella. See Sprague
Scatcherd, John, 644
Scatcherd, Robert Colin, 645
Scatcherd, Thomas, 45, 644–45
Schadow von Godenhaus, Friedrich Wilhelm von, 408
Schiller, Charles Edward, 219
Schultz*, Sir John Christian (1840–96), 67, 324, 630, 631
Scobie*, Hugh (1811–53), 656
Scollen*, Constantin (1841–1902), 661
Scott, Alfred Henry, 70, 645–46
Scott, Sir George Gilbert, 281
Scott, Harriet Sophia (VanKoughnet), 693
Scott, Henri-Arthur, 413, 736
Scott, Isabella (Chanter), 161
Scott, Jonathan, 646
Scott*, Sir Richard William (1825–1913), 45, 122, 201, 277, 323, 361, 441, 465, 466, 468, 641, 668
Scott, Robert Falcon, 748
Scott*, Thomas (1746–1824), 509
Scott*, Thomas (1846?–70), 59, 198, 439, 476, 556, 646
Scott, Sir Walter, 5, 21, 175
Scott*, William Henry (d. 1851), 306
Seaton, Baron. See Colborne
Secondat, Charles-Louis de, Baron de La Brède et de Montesquieu, 586
Secord, Laura. See Ingersoll
Seen from Afar. See Peenaquim
Seghers*, Charles John (1839–86), 222
Selkirk, Earl of. See Douglas
Selwyn*, Alfred Richard Cecil (1824–1902), 66, 448
Semple*, Robert (1766–1816), 276
Sénécal*, Louis-Adélard (1829–87), 220
Senior, Nassau William, 608
Sentenne, Léon-Alfred, 250, 252
Seringe, Nicolas-Charles, 81
Serooskerken. See Tuyll
Seward, William Henry, 15, 483, 514
Sewell*, Jonathan (1766–1839), 18, 326, 570
Sexton, Helen. See Halpen
Sexton, James Ponsonby, 647
Sexton, Jane Elizabeth. See Carswell
Sexton, John, 646, 647
Sexton, John Ponsonby, 646–47
Sexton, Lolitia. See Keys
Sexton, Samantha (Malcolm), 489
Seymour*, Frederick (1820–69), 117, 198, 199, 697
Seymour, Horatio, 337
Shade*, Absalom (1793–1862), 622
Shah-wun-dais, 647–48
Shanly, Charles Dawson, 648–49
Shanly, Frances Elizabeth. See Mulvany
Shanly*, Francis (1820–82), 648, 703
Shanly, James, 648
Shanly*, Walter (1819–99), 648
Shanly, William, 648
Sharples, Charles, 649
Sharples, Henry, 649
Sharples, John, 649–50
Sharples*, John (1848–1913), 649
Sharples, William (uncle of JOHN), 480, 649
Sharples, William (son of JOHN), 649
Shaw, Andrew, 717
Shaw, Anne. See Downsley
Shaw, Duncan, 665
Shaw, Helen. See Forgie
Shaw, James, 650
Shaw, Maria (Wheate; Cochrane), 178
Shaw, Richard, 650
Shaw*, Robert (1799–1882), 519
Shaw, William, 708
Shea*, Sir Ambrose (1815–1905), 8, 398, 400, 716
Shea*, Sir Edward Dalton (1820–1913), 8

Shea, John, 456
Sheard*, Joseph (1813–83), 155
Shedden, Jean. See Wyllie
Shedden, John (father), 650
Shedden, John, 650–51
Sheppard*, George (1819–1912), 98, 464
Sherwood, Adiel, 310, 380, 651–52
Sherwood, Anna. See Brownson
Sherwood*, George (1811–83), 200, 405, 631, 650
Sherwood, Helen (Crawford), 200
Sherwood*, Henry (1807–55), 79, 80, 118, 119, 200, 256, 257, 310, 311, 528, 619
Sherwood, Julia (Jarvis), 380
Sherwood*, Levius Peters (1777–1850), 200, 631, 705
Sherwood, Mary. See Baldwin
Sherwood, Thomas, 651
Shickluna, Louis, 515
Shiels, Andrew, 652–53
Shiels, Ellen (wife of Andrew), 652
Shiels, Isabella. See Blair
Shiheileedza, 104
Shinguacouse, 623
Shives, Martha. See Wiggins
Shives, Robert (father), 653
Shives, Robert, 653
Shore, Ellen Mary (Fletcher), 291
Shore*, George (d. 1851), 71
Shore, John, 1st Baron Teignmouth, 291
Short, Ann. See Brown
Short, Charles John, 654
Short, Edward, 641, 653–54
Short*, John (1830–87), 653
Short, John Quirk, 653
Short, Robert, 654
Short, Robert Quirk, 653
Shortiss, Lucinda (Barber), 34
Sibley*, Henry Hastings (1811–91), 168, 628
Sicard de Carufel, Marie-Olive (Casavant), 153
Sicotte*, Louis-Victor (1812–89), 25, 144, 145, 219, 405, 418, 420, 464, 465, 466, 507, 725
Signay*, Joseph (1778–1850), 46, 47, 221, 488, 604, 675, 733
Sigogne*, Jean-Mandé (1763–1844), 83
Silliman, Benjamin, 361
Silliman, Benjamin (son), 361
Silverthorn, Rebecca (Chisholm), 167
Simard, Georges-Honoré, 654–55
Simard, Julie. See Measam
Simard, Louise. See Clouet
Simard, Pierre, 654
Simcoe*, John Graves (1752–1806), 644, 706
Simonds*, Charles (1783–1859), 157, 315, 543
Simpkinson, Mary. See Griffin
Simpson, Caleb P., 230
Simpson*, Sir George (1787?–1860), 6, 27, 28, 47, 114, 115, 239, 240, 241, 242, 244, 272, 273, 284, 390, 392, 393, 426, 473, 486, 496, 541, 629, 720, 724
Simpson, John, 626, 655–56
Simpson, John, 656
Simpson, Mrs John. See Baker
Simpson, Marie (Darveau), 213
Simpson*, Thomas (1808–40), 28, 407
Simpson, William B., 655
Simpson, Zipporah. See Tickell
Sincennes, Clotilde-Héloise. See Douaire Bondy
Sincennes, Delphine-Denise. See Perrault
Sincennes, Jacques-Félix, 656–58
Sinclair*, James (1806–58), 168, 377
Sinclair, Mary (Inkster), 377
Sinclair, Thomas, 484
Sinclair, William, 377
Sinotte, Jérémie, 424
Sirois-Duplessis, Joseph, 686
Sissons*, Charles Bruce (1879–1965), 639
Sitting Bull* (1834–90), 227
Sitting on an Eagle Tail. See Sotai-na
Skakel*, Alexander (1776–1846), 444, 606
Skey, James, 691
Skinner, James Atchison, 74
Skinner*, Thomas James (d. 1889), 116, 242
Skroeder, John, 33
Slason, Martha (Hatheway), 339
Small*, James Edward (d. 1869), 253, 528
Smallwood, Charles, 658–59
Smart, Alexander, 659
Smart, Margaret (wife of Alexander), 659
Smart, Phylina. See Foote
Smart, Sarah. See Mallory
Smart, William, 659–60
Smart, William (son), 659
Smith, Miss, 661
Smith, Mrs, 661
Smith, Adam, 91, 571, 607, 680, 708
Smith*, Sir Albert James (1822–83), 140, 160, 286, 287, 288, 340, 426, 498, 544, 713
Smith*, Andrew (d. 1910), 84
Smith, Bernard, 193
Smith*, Charles Douglas (fl. 1812–24), 339
Smith, Charles M., 698
Smith*, Sir Donald Alexander, 1st Baron Strathcona and Mount Royal (1820–1914), 70, 111, 487, 631, 677
Smith, George, 382
Smith*, Goldwin (1823–1910), 79, 102
Smith, Gustave, 89, 228, 229
Smith, Harriet Louisa (Lee), 436
Smith, Harriette Elizabeth. See Dixon
Smith*, Henry (d. 1866), 94, 97, 470
Smith*, Sir Henry (1812–68), 591
Smith, Hollis, 642
Smith, James, 263
Smith, Margaret (Ross), 629, 630
Smith, Mary (Willis), 704
Smith, Nelly (Campbel), 129
Smith*, Philander (d. 1870), 616
Smith*, Samuel (1756–1826), 436
Smith, Sarah Mortimer (Johnston), 382
Smith*, Titus (1768–1850), 534
Smith, W. R., 111
Smith, William, 445
Smith, William Alexander. See De Cosmos, Amor
Smith, William Henry, 660–61
Smithurst*, John (1807–67), 108
Smyth*, Sir Edward Selby (1819–96), 330
Smyth*, George Stracy (1767?–1823), 71

Smyth, Peter, 172, 475
Snake, 12
Sohon, Gustavus, 391
Sola*, Alexander Abraham de (1825?–82), 337
Solomon, Moses, 371
Somerville*, Alexander (1811–85), 74
Somerville, Julia Valenza (Head), 342
Sonntag, William, 263
Sotai-na (Sotenah, Sotena), 661–62
Soulerin, Jean-Mathieu, 662–63
Soulerin, Marie. See Pigeyre
Soulerin, Mathieu, 662
Southesk, Earl of. See Carnegie
Sowatsi-tapitowpi. See Sotai-na
Sowerby, James de Carle, 65
Sparling, Anna (Hopper), 360
Spencer, Aubrey George, 279, 280, 281, 318, 663–64
Spencer, Eliza. See Musson
Spencer, Susan. See Jennison
Spencer, William, 663
Spike, Daniel, 664
Spike, Elizabeth. See Kerr
Spike, Grace. See Cullimore
Spike, James, 362, 664
Spike, Mary Elizabeth. See Metzler
Spragge*, John Godfrey (1806–84), 118
Sprague, Isabella (Scatcherd), 645
Spring-Rice, Thomas, 1st Baron Monteagle of Brandon, 140, 180
Sprong, Martha (Rowan), 634
Staines*, Robert John (1820–54), 116, 196, 242
Stairs*, William James (1819–1906), 177
Stalcup, Sarah Ann (Keith), 395
Stamford, Earl of. See Grey
Stamp, Edward, 216, 217, 664–65
Stamp, Maria (wife of EDWARD), 665
Stanley, Edward George Geoffrey Smith, 14th Earl of Derby, Baron Stanley, 180, 257, 345, 402, 404, 606
Stanley, John Mix, 391, 392
Stanmore, Baron. See Gordon
Stanser*, Robert (1760–1828), 516
Stark, John, 186
Starnes*, Henry (1816–96), 625
Starr, George H., 176
Stedman, Anne Sarah (Bushby), 112
Steel, Elizabeth (Campbell), 130
Steele*, Elmes Yelverton (1781–1865), 622
Steele, Margaret (Ruttan), 636
Steeves, Gilbert Martin, 666
Steeves, Henry. See Stief, Heinrich
Steeves, James Abel, 666
Steeves, James Thomas, 666
Steeves, Joseph, 665
Steeves, Martha. See Cross
Steeves, Mary (Steeves), 666
Steeves, William Henry, 286, 665–67
Stefansson*, Vilhjalmur (1879–1962), 328, 454
Steinhauer*, Henry Bird (1804–85), 471
Stephen*, Sir George, Baron Mount Stephen (1829–1921), 684
Stephen, Sir James, 179, 180, 345
Stephens, George Washington, 249
Stephens*, Harrison (1801–81), 722, 723
Stevenson*, David Barker (1802–59), 624
Stewart*, Alexander (1794–1865), 232, 456
Stewart, Alica Murray. See Drysdale
Stewart*, Charles James (1775–1837), 5, 53, 57, 206, 269
Stewart, Frances. See Browne
Stewart, Hope James, 390
Stewart, Jane (Price), 601
Stewart, John, 667
Stewart, Peter DesBrisay, 264
Stewart, Susan Anne Jane (Liddell), 441
Stewart, Thomas Alexander, 104
Stickney, Sophia Mehetabel (Ryerson), 638, 640
Stief, Heinrich (Henry Steeves), 665, 666
Stiles, Hannah (Lyman), 450
Stinson*, Joseph (1801?–62), 317
Stisted, Charles, 667
Stisted, Eliza. See Burn
Stisted, Sir Henry William, 467, 667–68
Stisted, Maria. See Burton
Stokes, William, 83
Stone, Harriet A. (Moore), 531
Storie, Elizabeth Sophia (Saunders), 644
Stowe, Harriet Elizabeth. See Beecher
Stowell, Sarah (Pedley), 588
Strachan, George Cartwright, 224
Strachan, James McGill, 120
Strachan*, John (1778–1867), 35, 40, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 60, 61, 80, 84, 119, 120, 121, 206, 207, 224, 253, 256, 269, 270, 274, 321, 350, 381, 382, 442, 452, 453, 469, 536, 607, 618, 622, 693
Strathcona and Mount Royal, Baron. See Smith
Strathmore, Earl of. See Bowes-Lyon
Street, Abigail. See Ransom
Street*, George Frederick (1787–1855), 284, 543
Street, Helen (Lewis), 441
Street*, John Ambrose (d. 1865), 494
Street*, Samuel (1775–1844), 668
Street, Thomas Clark, 122, 668–69
Streit, Catherine (Moore), 531
Strickland*, Catharine Parr (Traill) (1802–99), 172, 536
Strickland*, Susanna (Moodie) (1803–85), 536
Strong, Charles Edward, 63
Strong, George Templeton, 63, 64
Strong, George Washington, 63
Stuart*, Andrew (1785–1840), 30, 68, 77, 282, 567
Stuart*, Sir Andrew (1812–91), 20
Stuart, Elmire. See Aubert de Gaspé
Stuart*, George Okill (1776–1862), 60, 155
Stuart*, Sir James (1780–1853), 567
Stutsman, Enos, 628, 669
Stutsman, Jacob, 669
Stutsman, Nicholas, 669
Sue, Eugène, 165
Sullivan*, Edward (1832–99), 207
Sullivan*, Robert Baldwin (1802–53), 255, 618
Sullivan*, Sir William Wilfred (1843–1920), 195, 473
Sulte*, Benjamin (1841–1923), 150, 304, 433, 579, 580, 584
Sulte, Marie-Augustine. See Parent

Sumner, Charles, 263
Sunday, John. See Shah-wun-dais
Sunley, Maria Louisa (Birrell), 68
Sutherland*, George (1830–93), 612
Sutherland*, James (1778–1844), 475
Swabey, Catherine. See Bird
Swabey, Mary Ann. See Hobson
Swabey, Maurice, 669
Swabey, William, 669–70
Swain, James, 324
Swain, Margaret (Gunn), 324
Swayze, Mary (Hopkins), 358
Sweeney*, John (1821–1901), 193, 230
Sweet Grass. See Wikaskokiseyin
Sydenham, Baron. See Thomson
Sykes, Grace Valentine (Waddington), 696
Sykes, Sarah (Fisher), 290
Szalatnay, Márk, 670–71

TABARET*, Joseph-Henri (1828–86), 322, 323
Taché*, Alexandre-Antonin (1823–94), 38, 70, 148, 149, 322, 474, 578
Taché*, Sir Étienne-Paschal (1795–1865), 96, 99, 100, 122, 131, 144, 146, 147, 405, 465, 466, 623, 656, 674, 695
Taché*, Joseph-Charles (1820–94), 21, 78, 152, 203, 231, 415
Taillon, Georgine. See Archambault
Taillon*, Sir Louis-Olivier (1840–1923), 16
Talbot*, Edward Allen (1801–39), 548, 671
Talbot, Freeman, 404, 671
Talbot, John, 548, 671
Talbot, Lydia. See Baird
Talbot, Mary Jane. See Blake
Talbot, Richard, 671
Talbot*, Thomas (1771–1853), 273, 345, 462, 503
Tally, Sarah (Coles), 182
Tambareau, Damien-Henri, 510
Tanguay*, Cyprien (1819–1902), 433
Tarieu de Lanaudière, Catherine (Aubert de Gaspé), 18, 20
Tarieu de Lanaudière, Louise, 20
Tarte*, Joseph-Israël (1848–1907), 193
Taschereau, Élisabeth-Suzanne (Juchereau Duchesnay), 388
Taschereau*, Elzéar-Alexandre (1820–98), 388, 430, 589, 603, 686
Taschereau*, Gabriel-Elzéar (1745–1809), 567
Taschereau*, Jean-Thomas (1778–1832), 388
Taschereau*, Jean-Thomas (1814–93), 136
Taschereau*, Louis-Alexandre (1867–1952), 136
Taschereau, Marie-Joséphine. See Caron
Taunton. See Labouchere
Tavernier*, Marie-Émilie-Eugénie (Gamelin) (1800–51), 297
Taylor, Anne Eliza (wife of JOHN), 672
Taylor, Ervin J., 199
Taylor, Fanny (O'Hara), 557
Taylor, George, 671, 672
Taylor, Isaac Boulton, 46
Taylor, James, 671
Taylor*, James Wickes (1819–93), 646
Taylor, John (father), 671
Taylor, John, 671–72
Taylor, Margaret. See Hawthorne
Taylor, Margaret Anne (Le Marchant), 438
Taylor, Mary. See Hamilton
Taylor, Thomas, 671, 672
Taylor, William, 41, 672–73
Taylor, William Henry, 673–74
Tecumseh* (1768–1813), 181
Teefy*, John Reed (1848–1911), 174
Teignmouth, Baron. See Shore
Telfer, Margaret (Christie), 171
Telfer, Walter, 610
Telmon, Pierre-Antoine-Adrien, 86, 107
Temple, Henry John, 3rd Viscount Palmerston, 258, 482, 483
Tench, Frances (Hodder), 350
Terrill, Harriet (wife of TIMOTHY LEE), 674
Terrill, Hazard Bailey, 674
Terrill, Joseph Hazard, 674
Terrill, Timothy Lee, 548, 642, 674
Tessier, Marie-Anne (Gaboury), 296
Testard* de Montigny, Benjamin-Antoine (1838–99), 420, 542
Tétreau, Harriet (wife of HUBERT-JOSEPH), 675
Tétreau (Tétreault, Tetrault, Tetrau), Hubert-Joseph, 674–75
Tétreau, Jean-Baptiste, 674
Tétreau, Marie-Anne. See Guyon
Têtu, David-Henri, 161
Têtu, Vital, 132
Theller*, Edward Alexander (1804–59), 260, 346
Thésié. See Tessier
Thibaudeau, Émilie. See Delisle
Thibaudeau, Félicité. See Larue
Thibaudeau*, Isidore (1819–93), 615, 676
Thibaudeau, Joseph-Élie, 675–76
Thibaudeau*, Joseph-Rosaire (1837–1910), 676
Thibaudeau, Pierre-Chrysologue, 675
Thibault, Charlotte. See Carrier
Thibault, Jean-Baptiste (father), 676
Thibault (Thebo, Thibaud), Jean-Baptiste, 676–78
Thiboutot, Mr, 635
Thom*, Adam (1802–90), 47, 69
Thomas, Ann (Evans), 274
Thomas, Anne (Christie), 167
Thomas, Catherine (Bunn), 111
Thomas, Jennie (Belford), 43
Thomas*, Thomas (1766?–1828), 167
Thomas*, William (d. 1863), 600
Thompson*, David (1770–1857), 30
Thompson, Eliza (Birrell), 68
Thompson, Euphemia (Milloy), 515
Thompson, James, 21
Thompson, John, 32
Thompson, John Gawler, 217
Thompson, Joshua Spencer, 678–79
Thompson, Lewis, 558
Thompson, Maggie, 234
Thompson*, Samuel (1810–86), 80, 119, 120, 172, 554
Thompson, Toussaint, 422
Thomson, Alexander, 721
Thomson, Catherine. See McDonell

Thomson*, Charles Edward Poulett, 1st Baron Sydenham (1799–1841), 35, 125, 130, 131, 132, 219, 220, 254, 255, 257, 262, 263, 325, 326, 358, 364, 384, 403, 521, 527, 583, 619, 625, 655
Thomson*, Edward William (1794–1865), 290
Thomson, George (lawyer), 679
Thomson, George (shipbuilder), 718
Thomson, Heriot Frances (Nicolls), 547
Thomson, Jane (Fyfe), 295
Thomson, Johnson, 524
Thomson, Samuel Robert, 679–80
Thomson, Sarah Maria (Fisher), 290
Thomson, Skeffington, 679
Thomson, William Alexander, 680–81
Thorne, James, 511
Thornton, Sir Edward, 102
Thorp, Ann Eliza (Buell), 110
Thorpe*, Robert (fl. 1781–1820), 705
Thoureault. See Toureault
Thurgar, Anna. See Paddock
Thurgar, John Venner, 681
Thurgar, John Venner (son), 681
Tickell, Zipporah (Roebuck; Simpson), 626, 655
Tilley, Amelia Jane (Young), 726
Tilley*, Sir Samuel Leonard (1818–96), 100, 101, 160, 191, 286, 287, 288, 289, 340, 494, 543, 621, 666, 713, 719
Timpany, A. V., 215
Timpany, Mrs A. V., 215
Tindal, John, 380
Tipperary, Earl of. See George William Frederick Charles
Tobin*, James (1774–1838), 189
Tobin, James (public servant), 590
Tobin, John Michael, 521
Tocqueville. See Clérel
Tod*, John (1791–1882), 196, 239, 241, 242, 248, 495
Todd, Clarissa. See Hill
Todd*, Freeman H. (1809–85), 682
Todd, Hannah. See Worthley
Todd, Mary Jane (Haney; wife of WILLIAM), 681
Todd*, Robert Clow (b. 1809; d.c. 1865), 306
Todd, William (father), 681
Todd, William, 681–82
Todington, Eliza (Osborn), 561
Tolmie*, William Fraser (1812–86), 242, 486, 535
Tompson, Georgiana (Manners-Sutton), 494
Tookolito (Hannah), 327, 328
Topp, Alexander, 682–83
Topp, Jane. See Mortimer
Torrance, David, 657, 683–85, 717, 722
Torrance, Edward Fraser, 684
Torrance, Elizabeth Kissock (wife of James), 683
Torrance, George William, 683
Torrance, James, 683
Torrance, Jane (Torrance), 683
Torrance*, John (1786–1870), 394, 591, 683, 684, 722
Torrance, John (son of DAVID), 683
Torrance, Thomas, 683, 684
Torrance*, Thomas (d. 1826), 440, 518, 683, 684, 722
Torrington*, Frederic Herbert (1837–1917), 173, 371
Toureault, Françoise (Archambault), 15
Tourond, Baptiste, 439
Touvrey, P., 546
Townley*, Adam (1808–87), 208
Townsend, Lucinda, 685
Townsend, Sarah. See Gardner
Townsend, William, 685
Townsend, William H., 685
Townshend*, Sir Charles James (1844–1924), 71
Toyer, Ellen (Abbott), 3
Toyer, Jane (Judah), 3
Toyer, Mary, 3
Tracey, Ann (Wilson), 715
Tracey*, Daniel (1795–1832), 526, 581, 715
Traill, Catharine Parr. See Strickland
Trefry, Elizabeth (Churchill; Faulkner), 171
Trelford, Sarah (McClure), 455
Tremblay, Alexis, 685
Tremblay, Josephte. See Duguay
Tremblay, Marguerite (Moreau), 532
Tremblay, Mary Ellen. See Connolly
Tremblay, Pierre-Alexis, 36, 602, 685–87
Trestler, Miss (Dorion), 238
Trigge, Arthur St Lawrence, 735
Trollope, Anthony, 44
Trotter*, Reginald George (1888–1951), 369
Trottier, Jules, 36
Troy, Edward, 180, 553, 600, 687–88
Trudel. See also Trudelle
Trudel, Eudoxie (Viger), 694
Trudel*, François-Xavier-Anselme (1838–90), 193, 614
Trudel, Zoé-Aimée. See Renaud
Trudelle, Marie (Gauthier), 301
Trudelle, Véronique-Aimée (Pigeon), 613
Trunel de la Croix-Nord, Irma (Dessane), 228
Truteau, Alexis-Frédéric, 154, 176, 250, 251, 532, 688–90
Truteau, Marie-Louise. See Papineau
Truteau, Toussaint, 688
Tucker*, Richard Alexander (1783–1868), 178
Tudor, Constance Ada (McClure), 455
Tully*, Kivas (1820–1905), 405
Tupper*, Sir Charles (1821–1915), 7, 71, 100, 172, 192, 300, 353, 366, 367, 368, 369, 387, 395, 440, 457, 458, 476, 688
Turcotte, Jean-Baptiste, 690
Turcotte*, Joseph-Édouard (1808–64), 321, 418
Turcotte, Louis-Philippe, 136, 433, 690
Turcotte, Marie-Josephte. See Fortier
Turgeon, Hélène-Olive (Laberge), 415
Turgeon*, Joseph-Ovide (1797–1856), 415
Turgeon*, Pierre-Flavien (1787–1867), 87, 603
Turnbull, Isabella (Christie), 171
Turner, Francis Anne (Gowan), 313
Turner, Sarah (Duval), 268
Turner, W. S., 726
Turnpenny, Mary (Cawthra), 155
Tuyll* van Serooskerken, Vincent Gildemeester, Baron van (1812–60), 127
Tuzo, Anna Maria (Alston), 9
Twain, Mark. See Clemens, Samuel Langhorne
Twenhofel, W. H., 65
Twining*, John Thomas (1793–1860), 383, 384
Tyson*, George Emory (1829–1906), 328

Uniacke*, James Boyle (1800–58), 7, 73, 365, 385, 438
Uniacke*, Richard John (1789–1834), 73
Unwin, Mary Hardwick (Humphreys; Ridout), 370
Upham*, Josphua (1741–1808), 157
Upham, Mary. See Chandler
Uriah Heap. See O'Donoghue, William Bernard
Urie, Margaret (Gilmour), 305
Urquhart, Hugh, 462

Valière, Julie (Dumont), 435
Vallée, Pierre-Stanislas, 694
Vallerand, Flavien, 580
Vallières* de Saint-Réal, Joseph-Rémi (1787–1847), 567, 580, 582
Valls, Anna Maria (Felton), 282
Valois, Agathe. See Lalonde
Valois, Jude, 691
Valois*, Narcisse (1786–1859), 690
Valois, Narcisse, 423, 690–91
Valois*, Salomé, dite Marie du Sacré-Coeur (1830–1906), 222
Valois*, Simon (1791–1866), 691
Valois, Ursule. See Ritchot
Van Bramer, James, 530
Van Cortlandt, Edward, 108, 691–92
Van Cortlandt, Gertrude, 691
Van Cortlandt, Harriet Amelia. See Harrington
Van Cortlandt, Philip, 691
Vandandaigue, dit Gadbois, Angélique. See Daignault
Vandandaigue, dit Gadbois, Victor, 297
Vandusen, Conrad (father), 692
Vandusen, (Van Dusen), Conrad, 692–93
Van Felson*, George (1784–1856), 589
Van Felson, Suzanne Ellen (Peltier), 589
Van Keugh. See Cook
VanKoughnet, Eve. See Empey
VanKoughnet, Harriet Sophia. See Scott
Vankoughnet, Margaret Ann (Chesley), 163
VanKoughnet, Michael, 693
VanKoughnet, Philip, 632, 693–94
Vankoughnet*, Philip Michael Matthew Scott (1823–69), 231, 693
Van Rensselaer*, Rensselaer (1801–50), 483
Van Serooskerken. See Tuyll
Vansittart*, Henry (1779–1844), 59, 259
Van Tuyll. See Tuyll
Vardon, George, 164
Vaughan, Sarah Insley (Molson), 517
Vavasour*, Mervin (d. 1866), 426
Venner, John Lawder (Lauder), 681
Vennor*, Henry George (1841–84), 445
Verchères. See Lafleur
Verne, Jules, 90
Verner*, Frederick Arthur (1836–1928), 393
Verney, Sir Harry, 698
Verreau*, Hospice-Anthelme-Jean-Baptiste (1828–1901), 218, 736, 741
Verrill, Addison Emery, 65
Vesconte, Charlotte Sarah (Macaulay), 453
Veuillot, Louis, 87, 166, 430
Victor Emmanuel II, King of Sardinia and King of Italy, 542
Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, 43, 48, 66, 73, 74, 116, 132, 145, 148, 191, 207, 320, 327, 345, 397, 443, 448, 503, 529, 623, 625, 632, 648, 663
Vidal*, Alexander (1819–1906), 138, 623
Viger. See also Labrèche-Viger
Viger, Bonaventure (father), 694
Viger, Bonaventure, 694
Viger*, Denis-Benjamin (1774–1861), 93, 133, 255, 256, 417, 436, 566, 575, 694
Viger, Eudoxie. See Trudel
Viger*, Jacques (1787–1858), 51, 577, 736
Viger, Louise. See Carmel-Levasseur
Viger*, Louis-Michel (1785–1855), 337, 575
Viger, Marguerite (Berthelet), 52
Viger, Marguerite-Julie (Labrèche), 417
Vigny, Alfred de, 22
Villeneuve*, Jean-Marie-Rodrigue (1883–1947), 737
Vincent, Archange (Bétournay), 59
Voltaire. See Arouet
Vondenvelden*, William (d. 1809), 527
Von Kreuz, Paul. See Lacroix, Paul
Vorce, Lydia (Green), 316
Vosburgh (loyalist), 694
Voyer, Arline. See Laroche
Voyer, Louis, 694
Voyer, Ludger-Napoléon, 694–95

Waddell, James, 303
Waddell, Jane Walker. See Blanchard
Waddell, John (father), 695
Waddell, John, 666, 695–96
Waddell, Nancy. See Blanchard
Waddell, Susan. See Lynds
Waddilove*, William James Darley (1785?–1859), 269
Waddin, Véronique (Bethune), 53, 57
Waddington, Alfred Penderell, 104, 198, 696–98
Waddington, Frederick, 696
Waddington, Grace Valentine. See Sykes
Waddington, Thomas, 696
Waddington, William, 696
Wadsworth, George, 450
Waggaman, Camille. See Armault
Waggaman, George Augustus, 462
Waggaman, Marie Christine (Macdonald), 462
Waite, Annette (Watson), 699
Wales, Prince of. See Edward VII
Walkem*, George Anthony (1834–1908), 139
Walker, Robert, 434
Wallace, Catherine (Bell), 45
Wallace*, William Stewart (1884–1970), 627
Walsh, Catherine (Cochran), 176
Walsh*, William (1804–58), 191, 480
Ward, William George, 548
Ward, William H., 394
Ward, William James, 716
Warre*, Sir Henry James (1819–98), 391, 426
Warren, Annie (MacLean), 482
Warren, William, 561
Washburn, Daniel, 60
Washburn, Simon E., 262
Watier, Joachim, 500
Watier, Odile (Élodie) (Masson), 500

Watkin*, Sir Edward William (1819–1901), 633
Watkins, John, 335
Watkins, Louisa Mary (How), 361
Watson, Annette. See Waite
Watson, James Craig, 698–99
Watson, Janet McAuslyn (Moody), 530
Watson, Rebecca. See Bacon
Watson, Sereno, 82
Watson, Stewart, 390
Watson, William, 698
Waugh, Alexander, 659
Waugh, Samuel Bell, 390
Wauters, Isabella Ludivica (Krieghoff), 408
Weals, John, 412
Weatherald, Thomas, 517
Webb, Philip Barker, 81, 82
Webb, Sophia Elizabeth (Cox), 198
Webster, Daniel, 483, 591
Webster, Joseph H., 612
Wee-kas-koo-kee-say-yin. See Wikaskokiseyin
Weeks, Mary Ann Sarah (Dodd), 232
Weilbrenner, Marie-Julie (Boucher de La Bruère), 76
Weir, George, 527
Wellbeloved, Emma (Carter), 140
Weller, Mercy. See Willcox
Wellesley, Arthur, 1st Duke of Wellington, 334, 403, 404, 438, 439, 634
Wellesley, Richard Colley, 1st Marquis of Wellesley, 309
Wellington. See Wellesley
Wells, Delia Almira (Lyman), 451
Wells*, Joseph (1773?–1853), 35, 343
Wendt, Count de, 413
Wendt, Emily de. See Krieghoff
Wenham, Minerva Anne. See Niles
Wentworth, Louisa. See Pryor
Wentworth-Fitzwilliam, Charles William, 196, 242
Wentworth-Fitzwilliam, Frances Harriet. See Douglas
Wentworth-Fitzwilliam, Laura Maria Theresa. See Beauclerk
Wentworth-Fitzwilliam, William, Viscount Milton, 699–700
Wentworth-Fitzwilliam, Sir William Thomas Spencer, 6th Earl Fitzwilliam and Viscount Milton, 699
Wesley, John, 615, 616
West*, John (1775?–1845), 108
Weston, Anne (Carter), 141
Westphal, Alicia (Chambers; wife of GEORGE AUGUSTUS ALEXANDER), 700
Westphal, Anna (wife of George Frederick), 700
Westphal, Sir George Augustus Alexander, 700–1
Westphal, George Frederick, 700
Westphal, Philip, 701
Wetenhall*, John (d. 1850), 126, 359
Wetherall, Edward R., 406
Wetherall*, Sir George Augustus (1788–1868), 491
Wetmore*, Andrew Rainsford (1820–92), 41
Wheate, Jacob, 178
Wheate, Maria. See Shaw
Whelan*, Edward (1824–67), 185, 187, 264, 339, 594, 595, 598, 612, 613
Whelan*, Patrick James (d. 1869), 123, 561
Whitaker*, George (1810?–82), 55, 56, 208
White, Caroline (Gilmour), 305
White, Catherine (McKay), 475
White, Edward, 701–2
White, Elijah P., 241
White, Hannah (wife of William), 701
White, Harriet (Grey), 318
White, Mary (Draper), 258
White, Matilda (Gilmour), 305
White, Peter, 471
White, Sarah Jane. See Woodman
White, William, 701
White Antelope. See Apawakaasi
White Wolf. See Sotai-na
Whittingham, Bernard, 405
Whitworth-Aylmer*, Matthew, 5th Baron Aylmer (1775–1850), 163, 512, 555
Widder*, Frederick (d. 1865), 623
Widmer*, Christopher (1790–1858), 39, 325, 351, 610
Wiederhold, Alice de. See Douglas
Wier*, Benjamin (1805–68), 176
Wiggins, Martha (Shives), 653
Wightman, Sir William, 72
Wikaskokiseyin, Abraham, 702
Wild Person. See Onistah-sokaksin
Wilkes*, Henry (1805–86), 599, 683
Wilkes, Martha. See Cooke
Wilkes, Robert, 702–3
Wilkie*, Daniel (1777–1851), 24, 68, 77, 691
Wilkins*, Lewis Morris (1801–85), 496
Wilkinson, John, 703–4
Wilkinson, Mary Rebecca. See Curry
Willcox, Clara (Bidwell), 60
Willcox, Mercy (Weller), 390
William IV, King of Great Britain and Ireland, 342, 503
Williams*, Éléazar (d. 1858?), 163
Williams, Henry Rogers, 156
Williams, Susanna (Fisher), 284
Williams*, Sir William Fenwick (1800–83), 291, 405, 534
Willis, Ann Susanna. See Kent
Willis, Eliza Jane. See Mosely
Willis, John, 704
Willis, John Robert, 362, 704
Willis, John Walpole, 233, 704–7
Willis, Mary. See Smith
Willis, Mary Ann. See Artz
Willis, Mary Isabella. See Bowes-Lyon
Willis, Michael, 3, 455, 707–8
Willis, William (father of JOHN WALPOLE), 704
Willis, William (Presbyterian clergyman), 707
Willoughby, William, 3rd Earl of Enniskillen, 313
Willson, Elizabeth. See Bowlby
Willson, Harriot Conway. See Ladde
Willson, Hugh Bowlby, 607, 708–9
Willson*, John (1776–1860), 708
Willson*, Thomas Leopold (Carbide) (1860–1915), 708
Wilmot, Elizabeth. See Black
Wilmot, Hannah. See Bliss
Wilmot, Jane. See Ballock
Wilmot, Lemuel Allan, 41, 140, 158, 159, 285, 286, 288, 341, 709–14

Wilmot, Mary (Montgomery), 530
Wilmot*, Robert Duncan (1809–91), 191, 287, 543, 666, 713
Wilmot, William, 709
Wilmot-Horton, Sir Robert John, 636
Wilson*, Sir Adam (1814–91), 79, 258
Wilson, Alexander, 715
Wilson, Ann. See Tracey
Wilson, Catherine-Angélique. See Ailleboust de Manthet
Wilson, Charles, 130, 715
Wilson*, Sir Daniel (1816–92), 40, 258, 393
Wilson, Elizabeth Susan (Lewis), 441
Wilson, Helen Walker (Billings), 64
Wilson, Henry Maitland, 1st Baron of Libya, 558
Wilson, Jane. See Brown
Wilson, Marguerite (Couillard; Leblanc), 435
Wilson, Mary (Rowan), 634
Wilson, Mary Elizabeth. See Dixon
Wilson, Susan Grace. See Codner
Wilson, William Mercer, 715–16
Winans, George E. A., 692
Winans, William Henry, 692
Windham*, Sir Charles Ash (1810–70), 443
Winser, Peter, 332
Winton, Ebenezer, 716
Winton*, Henry David (1793–1855), 180, 398, 687
Wiseman, Nicholas Patrick Stephen, 176
Withewacapo, 108
Wix*, Edward (1802–66), 278
Wodehouse, John, 1st Earl of Kimberley, 444
Wolfe*, James (1727–59), 440
Wolseley*, Garnet Joseph, 1st Viscount Wolseley (1833–1913), 111, 152, 443, 556, 631
Wood*, Edmund Burke (1820–82), 468, 641
Wood, Elizabeth (Duval), 268
Wood*, Enoch (1804–88), 646, 710
Woodburn, Mary (Greeley), 315
Woodman, Emily (Cunningham), 701
Woodman, Sarah Jane (White), 701
Woods, John, 716
Woods, Joseph (father), 716
Woods, Joseph, 716–17
Woods, Mary (wife of Joseph, Sr), 717
Woolsey, Thomas, 471
Work, Betsy (Budd), 108
Work*, John (1792?–1861), 108, 239, 241, 273, 486, 495
Workman, Alexander, 717
Workman, Benjamin, 717
Workman, Catherine. See Goudie
Workman, Joseph, 717
Workman, Matthew, 717
Workman, Samuel, 717
Workman*, Thomas (1813–89), 717
Workman, William, 138, 219, 220, 717–18, 727
Worlingham, Baron. See Acheson
Worrell, Charles, 593, 594
Worthington, John, 73
Worthington, Mary (Bliss), 71, 72
Worthley, Hannah (Todd), 681
Worts*, James Gooderham (1818–82), 651
Wright, Jane. See Nevins
Wright, Joseph, 721
Wright, Mary Ann (Ridout), 619
Wright*, Philemon (1760–1839), 691
Wright, Richard, 718, 719
Wright*, Ruggles (1793–1863), 23, 691
Wright, William, 718–19
Wyllie, Jean (Shedden), 650
Wyllie, Robert Crichton, 608
Wyndham, George Francis, 4th Earl of Egremont, 636

YALE, James Murray, 6, 719–20
Yandell, Maria Ann (Hincks), 350
Yellowhead*, William (d. 1864), 12, 622
Yeo*, James (1788–1868), 183, 184
Yeomans, Lené (Chasley), 163
Youmans, David, 640
Young, Adelaide Annabella. See Dalton
Young, Amelia Jane. See Tilley
Young, Anne. See Coleman
Young, Archibald, 128
Young, Brigham, 320
Young, Cecilia Eliza. See Cowan
Young*, George (1821–1910), 471
Young*, George Renny (1802–53), 7, 363
Young, James (father of JOHN, 1808–73), 720
Young, James (brother of JOHN, 1808–73), 720
Young, Janet. See Gibson
Young, John (1808–73), 720–22
Young, John (1811–78), 522, 591, 613, 683, 722–28
Young, Sir John, Baron Lisgar, 728–29
Young, Lucy. See Frederick
Young, Margaret. See Mason
Young, William, 192, 722
Young*, Sir William (1799–1887), 71, 73, 85, 352, 367, 387, 438, 457, 685, 728
Young*, William Alexander George (1827–85), 117
Young*, Sir William Allen (1827–1915), 320
Youville, Marie-Marguerite d'. See Dufrost

ZIMMERMAN*, Samuel (1815–57), 394, 515